5-13. But the prophet is not finished. Men are what they are. But God is also what he is—inexorably righteous. Such a state of affairs cannot go on without challenge from him. So surely as he orders the rising of the sun in the world of nature, so surely will the sun rise again in the realm of human relationships and the dark shadows of crime and oppression be annihilated, with all who walk in them, before his irresistible righteousness.

Therefore, Jehovah now challenges the wicked city, wait ye for me (v. 8). My righteousness is about to be vindicated. One final proof will I give of it in a gathering together for destruction of the corrupted peoples of an outward social order. My punishment will be comprehensive and final; all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy against those who dispute my moral sovereignty. "Then, and then only," the divine judgment proceeds, "will I cleanse this wicked city, sweeping away its proud and haughty oppressors in the debris of the great debacle."

The oracle is not, however, to close on the discordant note of doom. But, says Jehovah, I will leave in the midst of thee a people humble and poor by the standards of perverted mankind, but rich and exalted by a higher standard because they shall trust in the name of the Lord.

14-20. The Conclusion of the Major Theme: Israel's Golden Age. 15. For judgments read opponents; omit even the Lord. 16. Omit as an interpolation interrupting the logical connection between vv. 15, 17. 17. He will rest in his love—read he will renew them in his love; omit he will joy over thee with singing. 18. For this verse read I will take away those smiting thee and those bringing reproach upon thee. 19. Omit whose shame hath been. 20. Omit as an explanatory gloss definitely referring v. 19, of which it is practically a repetition, to the Babylonian Exile.

The reader who has appreciated the significance of the continuous recurrence of the prediction of disaster in 12-313, and who has observed how consistently the prophet there includes his own land and city in it, can hardly fail to realize that at this point there is a complete reversal of the prevailing mood of the prophecy.

Leaving aside later interpolations, the thought of the original supplementer is as follows: Zion, Israel, Jerusalem are called to whole-hearted rejoicing because Jehovah has vanquished their enemies. This manifestation of his peculiar good will justifies the following promise that a new day of perpetual felicity, due to the active beneficence of Jehovah, is at hand. In that glorious day all Israel's oppressors will be dealt with by him, and his own people will be made a praise and a renown in all the earth.

That here the writer looks back upon disaster as a historical fact and forward to felicity appears evident in vv. 15, 18, 19. But perhaps the clearest indication that Zephaniah did not write the passage lies in the contrast between the conception of the future exhibited here and that which we have observed in the rest of the book.

HAGGAI

BY PROFESSOR J. E. MCFADYEN

INTRODUCTION

The importance of Haggai is out of all proportion to the length of his book. His two short chapters contain a summary of only four addresses and a few verses of narrative matter (cf. 1¹²⁻¹⁵); but the ideas he expressed and the impulses he stirred produced a situation which profoundly affected the whole subsequent history of Judasim.

Date and Historical Background. Haggai's addresses are accurately dated; they fall between September and December of the year 520 B.C. (cf. 1^{1 220}), and, like pre-exilic prophecy, they were intimately related to the historical situation. The accession of Darius to the Persian throne in 521 had been the occasion of insurrections all over his empire, and reverberations of these may be heard in the messages of Haggai to his own people (26^{f.}, 21^{f.}). This "shaking of the nations" had stirred their hopes, political as well as religious, and Haggai had the genius to seize his opportunity, which was all the more tempting that Zerubbabel, grandson of Jehoiachin the last king of Judah, and thus in the direct Davidic line, was now governor of Judah (cf. 1¹). It is significant, however, that throughout the book the name of "Joshua the high priest" is always, except in the specific promise to Zerubbabel (220-23), coupled with that of Zerubbabel (11, 12, 14 22, 4). The religious leader is as prominent as the civil leader, because the disastrous experiences of the last seventy years or so—the Exile (586-538 B.C.) and the disillusionment consequent on the return (for the causes of this disillusionment see Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. ii, pp. 546, 547), which meant for Judah nothing more than a change of masters—had gravely shattered though it had not quite extinguished the people's political hopes, and they had begun to concentrate their hope and effort upon their organization as a religious community.

Rebuilding of the Temple. This ecclesiastical emphasis explains the passionate interest of Haggai and Zechariah (cf. Ezra 5^{1 614}) in the rebuilding of the Temple. With this, indeed, the prophecy of Haggai is almost exclusively occupied: to initiate and stimulate this effort he devotes his energy and eloquence, and with its anticipated consummation he interweaves the highest hopes (27-9). Haggai is thus one of the founders of post-exilic Judaism: he had doubtless his predecessor in Ezekiel, who sketched the post-exilic program (chs. 40-48), and his successor in Ezra, who confirmed and developed it (see intro. to Ezra-Nehemiah, pp. 460-2; cf. pp. 714-7), but to this development the Temple was indispensable, and it was the insistent and reiterated appeals of Haggai that made it possible. It was completed within four years, in 516 B.C.

The Messianic Hope. In a negative way Haggai also contributed to the spiritualizing of the Messianic hope. He looked for the speedy coming of the day when treasures of silver and gold would pour into the Temple from the ends of the earth (27^{f.}), but the later book of Malachi shows how beggarly the Temple service was in reality, and how utterly those brilliant hopes had been blasted. And to Zerubbabel he had eagerly looked as the coming Messianic King, Jehovah's servant and signet, reigning victorious in a world subdued by Jehovah (220-23); but this daring hope, too, remained unfulfilled. Thus by these failures and disappointments was Israel, at least the nobler minds of Israel, led to abandon their dream of an earthly kingdom. The King and the kingdom came in time, but in a way undreamed of by Haggai (see pp. 185-6).

The Prophet and His Book. Scarcely anything is known of the personal life of Haggai. He appears upon the scene suddenly in 520 B.C., and disappears just as suddenly. Chiefly on the basis of 23 it has been suggested that he was born in Judah before the catastrophe of 586 B.C., and, thus, that he was one of a small company among the exiles who had seen the former Temple in all its glory. If so, he must have been an old man when he prophesied; which supposition agrees with the brevity of his public activity, for a short time after 520 B.C. Zechariah appears as the leading prophet in Jerusalem.

In recent years some attempts have been made to prove that more than one author is responsible for the four brief messages in the book. These efforts, however, cannot be considered successful. All the available evidence supports the view that the four prophetic oracles come from one and the same man. The two chapters may be accepted as containing summaries of Haggai's utterances put in their present form by an editor—who is responsible also for the insertion of the historical section in 1¹²⁻¹⁵—desirous of giving an account of the prophet's contribution to the building of the Temple.

Haggai's One Idea. While Haggai touches upon many topics, he has been rightly described as "a man of one idea"—namely, the speedy restoration of the Temple of Jehovah. (See above paragraph on "Rebuilding of the Temple.") A word should be added in explanation of this emphasis.

The attitude of Haggai toward the Temple was not that of the pre-exilic prophets. True, they too considered the Temple the dwelling place of Jehovah, but their teaching dwelt almost exclusively upon weightier spiritual and ethical matters. The point to remember is that the change in emphasis on the part of Haggai (and Zechariah) was due, not to inferior religious capacity and insight, but to a change in environment. Conditions in Jerusalem in 520 B.C. were far different from what they had been in the eighth century. As a true prophet Haggai must adapt himself and his message to the needs of the new age. The Jews of the latter part of the sixth century were not prepared for the lofty conception of the presence of Jehovah which could dispense with a house made with hands. The common people needed the Temple as an external symbol of the presence of Jehovah as much as earlier generations ever needed the ark. Moreover, with the central political government gone a new bond was needed to hold together the different elements in the local community as well as the exiles scattered among the nations. In a religious community, what institution could serve this purpose better than a common center of worship, a place to which the hearts of pious Jews everywhere might turn, assured that there they could meet their God and hold intercourse with him?

Is it, then, too much to say that undoubtedly the very existence of Jewish religion depended, in the days of Haggai, on the rebuilding of the Temple? If that was the supreme need of the hour, Haggai, by pleading so persistently for the restoration of the Temple, rendered a service of incalculable moment.

Literature: Perowne, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (Cambridge Bible); Driver, The Minor Prophets, vol. ii (New Century Bible); Farrar, The Minor Prophets (The Men of the Bible Series); Eiselen, The Minor Prophets; G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve (Expositor's Bible); Bennett, The Postexilic Prophets; Sanders and Kent, The Messages of the Later Prophets.

CHAPTER I

The exiles had returned in 537 B.C. (Ezra 2) to a dilapidated city and a ruined Temple (2 Kings 25st). Anxious to re-establish their worship, they erected an altar (Ezra 3^d) and possibly made a beginning with the building of the Temple, but under the stress of many discouragements little or nothing had been done during the next sixteen years. (For a somewhat different view of the progress of events during the latter part of the sixth century B.C., see Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. ii, p. 547 and references there given.) As the Messianic age could not dawn, however, until Jehovah had a home in the midst of his people, the thing of central importance to Haggai and Zechariah (cf. Ezra 5th. 6th) was the rebuilding of the Temple. That was the immediate task and to this they urged the people to address themselves with energy and without delay.

1-11. Exhortation to Build the Temple. The exhortation was addressed to the civil governor, Zerubbabel, grandson of King Jehoiachin (cf. 1 Chr. 3rd 17-19), and therefore in the direct Davidic line, and to the religious head of the community, Joshua, in early September 520 B.C., the second year of Darius the Persian king (521-486 B.C., the Persian empire succeeded the Babylonian, which had destroyed Judah). The people had been disheartened by bad harvests; they had sown much and brought in little (v. 6), a drought had been upon the land, withering everything (v. 11), and, worse still, there had been a drought upon their hearts. The brilliant promises of Deutero-Isaiah (Isa. 40-55) had not been fulfilled, and they were disillusioned men. Prices were high and wages low, it seemed as if their money just dropped through holes in their pockets (v. 6). Sincerely enough they may have argued that the time had not yet come to build the Temple (v. 2). Their resources were too pitifully inadequate, and their sad plight showed but too plainly that their God was still angry with them: it was unreasonable to expect them to emulate David (cf. 2 Sam. 7th) in his enthusiasm to build Jehovah a house.

Haggai meets this mood, as prophets always did (cf. Amos 4th-12), by putting a moral interpretation on the people's disasters. He invites them to consider their ways (v. 5)—what their conduct had been and what it had led to. He points out that though they had neglected God's house, they had been careful enough of their own (v. 4), living as they did in ceiled, or, rather, paneled houses, i.e., "wainscotted with costly woodwork" (Driver; cf. Jer. 22nd). If they had, indeed, been disillusioned, looking for much, and lo, it came to little (v. 9), they had only themselves to blame: it was because of their apathy and negligence that the heavens had withheld their dew and the earth her fruit

(v. 10)—because they had let Jehovah's house lie waste, while every man was running about eagerly in the interests of his own house (v. 9).

Let them change their policy and make a start on the building. The drought in Elijah's time had been sent as the punishment for idolatry (1 Kings 17^{1f.} cf. 16^{32f.}) and had been removed when the idolatry was removed (1 Kings 18⁴⁵): so it would be again. Let them go up to the hill country in the neighborhood of Jerusalem and bring wood and build the house (v. 8). The ruins of the old Temple would probably furnish them with all the stones they required—there is an incidental mention of stones in 2¹⁵; but all the woodwork would be burned in the terrible sack of the city in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 25⁹), consequently the immediate need was for wood. Then, when this practical proof of eager interest in the Temple had been shown, Haggai declares in the name of Jehovah, I will take pleasure in it and I will be glorified (v. 8) or, rather, I will get me glory. In other words, the glory of the Messianic age would begin when, but not until, the Temple was erected. That was to be the acid test of their sincerity. Part of what the prophet means here by glory is indicated by 27-9, where the same word is used of the magnificent offerings which will stream into the Temple from heathen nations. But blessings of every kind would be added (cf. Mt. 6³³). Whereas Jehovah had formerly blown upon the produce of their fields (v. 9), ruining the crops by the breath of his terrible east wind (cf. Isa. 40²⁴), now in field and vineyard there would be abounding prosperity (cf. 2¹⁹).

12-15. Result of the Appeal. The prophet's noble appeal was not without effect. In less than a month after it was delivered (v. 15), a genuine response was made and the work was started (v. 14). The point is twice made (vv. 12, 14) that everybody participated in the work—the civil and religious leaders and all the remnant of the people, i.e., all the returned exiles, and they did so under a real religious impulse; they feared before Jehovah, recognizing Haggai as divinely commissioned to declare this message (v. 13), and their new enthusiasm was the work of God himself (v. 14). Their response justified the prophet in his assurance that now God was with them—echo of many a similar assurance in Israel's long history, e.g., to Moses (Ex. 3¹²), to Joshua (Josh. 1⁵), to Jeremiah (Jer. 18).

CHAPTER II

1-9. Renewed Exhortation to Go on With the Building. A day or two past the middle of October, 520 B.C., and after the people had been engaged on the work for about three and one half weeks, Haggai finds it necessary to address them again. The preliminary work of clearing away the rubbish had discouraged them. With the progress of the work the difficulties became more apparent and even the braver spirits were downhearted. To meet this despondency Haggai comes forward with a divine message of encouragement, probably taking advantage of the last day or the last but one of the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Ezek. 45²⁵ Lev. 23³³⁻⁴³) to address the assembled people (v. 1). In 536 when they had erected the altar (Ezra 3^{2f.}) there would be some present who had seen the glorious Temple which had been destroyed by the Babylonians fifty years before, but in 520 very few of them would be still alive. In any case the contrast between then and now was too pitiful (cf. Ezra 3¹²); its former glory had vanished (v. 3). At this point Haggai makes his brave appeal to them all, leaders and people alike, to keep up their courage and go on with the work (v. 4)—wholesome advice, for apathy and indolence can lead nowhere; and in their work they are sustained by the glorious promise of the presence of God. I am with you, and my spirit (cf. Zech. 4⁶) abideth among you (omit with LXX the rest of v. 5).

The promise expands into a vision of almost incredible audacity (vv. 6-9), which reveals the prophet's unconquerable faith. On the accession of Darius in 521, revolutions had broken out all over the Persian Empire; unlike his contemporaries, Haggai interprets these not as a fresh perplexity, but as the prelude to the Messianic age. This shaking of all nations, these political convulsions, are the sign of the glory that is coming in a little while. The glory as before (cf. 1⁸) is associated with the Temple. Into it would soon be streaming the desirable things of all nations, by which, as v. 8 makes clear, is meant their silver and gold, which would go to beautify Jehovah's house and render it even more glorious than the glorious Temple of Solomon. Blessing of every kind would follow, for the Hebrew word rendered peace (v. 9) means not only peace but prosperity and welfare in the widest sense. When we remember the meager material resources of this poor (1⁶) and down-hearted (2⁸) community, we are lost in admiration of the prophet's magnificent courage and faith. Verily, it was "the Lord of hosts" in whom he believed (vv. 7, 9).

10-14. Exhortation to Abandon the Unclean Thing. Exactly three months after the work had been begun (cf. 1¹⁵) the prophet makes another appeal. In imagery drawn from the ritual practice he reminds the people that while direct contact with holy flesh, i.e., the flesh of a sacrifice, infects the thing it touches with its own holiness (cf. Lev. 6²⁷) indirect contact (e.g., through the skirt in which it is carried) does not so infect it. On the other hand, even indirect contact with a ritually unclean thing infects with its uncleanness the thing it touches: one who has touched a corpse, e.g., communicates his ritual uncleanness to whatever he touches (cf. Num. 19²²). In other words, unholiness is more contagious than holiness.

Till lately this "uncleanness" has been uniformly taken to refer to the prevalent apathy in the work of building: their selfish indifference would go on polluting all their pretended holy endeavor until they quite abandoned it and turned with real zeal to the work of building the Temple. Let them cast out this pollution and do with their might what their hands found to do and all would be well. This interpretation is now recognized as inadequate. This people (v. 14), which is usually a contemptuous phrase (cf. Isa. 8⁵), almost certainly refers not to the returned exiles but to the Samaritans, "the people of the land" (cf. Ezra 4⁴), the half-heathen people who were anxious to take part in the building of the Temple (cf. Ezra 4¹⁻⁴), and Haggai is here warning his own people against having anything to do with them. They can only infect the noble enterprise with their own uncleanness.

15-19. The New Era of Blessing is About to Begin. This brief, but somewhat involved and often misunderstood section, becomes clear if we put its opening and closing words together: And now consider . . . from this day will I bless you. The beginning and now indicates a day which is to mark the opening of a new era, and v. 18 leaves no doubt as to the day intended—it is the day on which the foundation of Jehovah's temple was laid, the ever-memorable four and twentieth day of the ninth month. With the new era then and thus inaugurated is contrasted the old bad era when they were indifferent to the Temple and punished for their indifference by the relative failure of their crops. The difficult word is the word misleadingly rendered in vv. 15, 18 by upward (in R.V., by backward in A.S.V.), which in this context should rather be onward or forward. Consider from this day and onward (v. 15); omit from and begin a new sentence. Before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple, how did ye fare? (So LXX.) They fared by suffering disappointment in their crops. When one came to a heap of twenty seahs (so LXX: a seah=two and two-thirds gallons), there were but ten; and when one came to the wine-vat (the lower cavity hewn out in the rock into which the juice flowed through a connecting channel from an upper cavity known as the wine-press), to draw out fifty seahs from the wine-trough (i.e., the wine-vat: A.V. is substantially correct here as against R.V.), there were but twenty. In other words, field and vineyard disappointed expectations; and this was the penalty imposed upon them by Jehovah—I smote you (v. 17)—for their religious indifference. He had sent the blasting east wind and the blight of mildew and the hail—proof enough that I was not with you (as the last clause of v. 17 should probably read), in direct contrast to the assurance which Haggai can offer now, I am with you (11³ 24). Notice how often the word consider (Hebrew "set your hearts upon this") appears (vv. 15, 18, cf. 15⁷; Haggai is anxious that they learn the inner meaning of their disasters and lay it to heart. Now that the foundation stone is laid, let them see whether the vine, etc., will still refuse to yield their fruit. Nay, on the contrary, from this day I will bless you.

20-23. Zerubbabel to be the Messianic King. Here the prophet touches the highest heights of daring hope, which now centers upon Zerubbabel. The earlier promise of the shaking of all nations (v. 7) is here sharpened into the definite prediction of their overthrow, despite their powerful military equipment. Nothing is here said of Joshua the high-priest; in that day Zerubbabel was to be the central figure, and epithets of the highest honor are showered upon him, which show the daring and the vastness of the hopes reposed in him (cf. notes on Zech. 6¹¹⁻¹³). He is compared to the signet-ring upon Jehovah's finger (cf. Jer. 22²⁴), sealing as it were his purposes and clothed with his authority. He is invested with the exalted titles of my servant and my chosen one (v. 23)—titles which have led some scholars to see in Zerubbabel the fulfillment of the prophecy in Isa. 42^{1f}. Haggai, like Zechariah (6¹²), sees in this man the Messianic King. It was an amazing vision to set before the eyes of a poor and helpless people, and is another testimony (cf. 26⁹) to the prophet's unconquerable faith (cf. Zech. 4⁷).

ZECHARIAH

By PROFESSOR J. E. McFADYEN

INTRODUCTION

The book of Zechariah falls naturally into two parts, chs. 1-8 and chs. 9-14. The utterances contained in the first eight chapters are ascribed in their headings to Zechariah (11, 7 71) the contemporary of Haggai; no statements to this effect are found in chs. 9-14. This in itself does not necessarily point to diversity of authorship; but for a variety of other reasons (see below) practically all O.T. scholars believe that chs. 9-14 do not come from the author of chs. 1-8. For simplicity's sake, therefore, the two sections may be considered separately.

I. INTRODUCTION TO CHAPTERS 1 TO 8

Zechariah and Haggai. Haggai and Zechariah were contemporaries. They began their prophetic work in the same year (520 B.C.) and addressed themselves to the same task—that of encouraging the disheartened people (Zech. 1¹⁷) to believe in the imminence of the Messianic age. The initial impulse given by Haggai to the building of the Temple, without which it was vain to look for the coming of that happy day, appears to have died down (Hag. 23), and the fact that Zechariah continued his prophetic work till 518 (cf. 71) suggests that he made it his business to revive and re-enforce that impulse: which he did not unsuccessfully, as the Temple was completed in 516 (cf. Ezra 6¹⁵). Zechariah advances on Haggai (cf. Hag. 220-23) in making the civil and religious leaders, Zerubbabel and Joshua, of almost co-ordinate importance: Joshua is to share with Zerubbabel in the Messianic dignity (cf. 414 613). It would be interesting to know how Haggai and Zechariah felt after the glorious hopes that were centered upon Zerubbabel had been fatally and finally shattered. The collapse of these political hopes explains the post-exilic concentration upon the religious life of the community. (For the historical background of Zechariah's message, see intro. to Haggai, p. 815).

Zechariah and the Pre-exilic Prophets. Zechariah is conscious, as we are, of the gulf that separates him from the pre-exilic prophets. He looks back to them (cf. 14 712), he quotes them (cf. 77-10), and he differs from them in obvious ways, notably in his interest in the Temple and its worship (so unlike Amos; for an explanation see intro. to Haggai) and in the prominence of the visionary element in his prophecies. Indeed, most of his message (chs. 1-6) takes the form of visions, and though some real experience lies behind them, it is clear that in their present form they are the work of conscious art. Point by point (see the notes below) they forecast the removal of the obstacles that stand in the way of the coming of the Messianic King, and they reach their glorious climax in the installation of Zerubbabel and Joshua in their high office (613). God too seems further away from Zechariah than from the pre-exilic prophets; an angel is needed to interpret the visions (cf. 45^f. and contrast Jer. 19).

But between Zechariah and his mighty predecessors there is real kinship of spirit. He knows, as they do, that the better day can never dawn until sin has been removed from the land (cf. 3⁹ 5). He too can envisage the day when all nations shall worship Jehovah (cf. 211 821); and, despite his interest in the Temple, he is no whit behind "the former prophets" in his emphasis upon the supremacy of ethical interests. He, like them, believes that Jehovah is not served by fasting (7⁶) but by the suppression of malice and cruelty and by the practice of justice and kindness between man and man (cf. 816^f.).

Teaching and Significance. Though reference has already been made to some of the points emphasized by Zechariah, a brief summary of his teaching may enable the student to appreciate more fully the prophet's significance.

1. Zechariah differs from his predecessors in three points: (1) the emphasis on visions as a means of divine communication; (2) the apocalyptic symbolism entering into the visions; (3) the large place angelic mediation occupies in his intercourse with Jehovah. In the account of the visions appear in embryo some of the ideas which are found in a more developed stage in the angelology of the intertestamental period and of the N.T. (see art., Intertestamental Religion, pp. 204-5). Closely connected with the increasing emphasis on angels is the tendency to consider Jehovah too sacred for direct contact with men and to remove him so far away that direct communion with him came to be thought of as almost impossible. Even prophecy seems to have lost in a measure its sense of immediate communion with God; at any rate, the prophet is represented as receiving his instructions through an angel, who acts as intermediary, interpreter and guide.

A somewhat different phase of the same development may be seen in the figure of "the adversary," or "Satan," who appears for the first time in the vision of the trial and acquittal of the high priest Joshua (31-10). With Zechariah the word is not yet a proper name; it becomes such only in 1 Chr. 21¹; but it is not difficult to trace the thought development from "the adversary" in Zechariah to the figure called by the same name and playing an important rôle in the prologue of the book of Job, to "Satan"—now a proper name—in Chronicles and to the "Satan" or "Devil" of the intertestamental and N.T. literature.

2. The Temple occupies a unique place in the thought and teaching of Zechariah (see opening paragraph of this introduction and on Haggai, p. 815).

3. Of much interest are the Messianic hopes of Zechariah. The Temple plays a prominent part, but only as an earnest of better things to come; the high priest and his fellows receive honor, but only as a sign of one greater than they, namely "Branch." It is around the person of this Branch that the hopes of Zechariah center: it is he who will complete the building of the Temple, have constant access to Jehovah and reign in peace forever. The prophet identifies Branch with Zerubbabel (cf. 3⁸ with 47-10 69-13 Hag. 220-23). The blessings of the Messianic age will be both temporal and spiritual; they will be enjoyed primarily by the Jews, but not by them exclusively (818-23).

4. The accusation that Zechariah is a teacher of heartless and unspiritual formalism is not well founded; for he clearly and specifically teaches that forms and ceremonies are not essential elements of true religion; they are valuable only as means by the use of which men may be led into purer and nobler lives. His conception of the future includes the removal of sin—people, city, land, all must be holy.

5. Zechariah constantly emphasizes the truth that ultimate victory is dependent on divine co-operation (46). It is only as Jehovah gives his support that the people can be restored to their own land, there to live in joy and felicity forever.

Literature: Perowne, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (Cambridge Bible); Driver, The Minor Prophets, vol. ii (New Century Bible); G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve, vol. ii (Expositor's Bible); Eiselen, The Minor Prophets; Bennett, The Postexilic Prophets; Farrar, The

Minor Prophets; Sanders and Kent, The Messages of the Later Prophets; H. G. Mitchell, Zechariah (International Critical Commentary.)

CHAPTER I

Zechariah is very conscious of addressing a disappointed and discouraged people, and he makes it his business to hearten them (cf. 815). This he does by relating a series of visions (17-615) which are in part the allegorical embodiment of his thought, and which carry the assurance that the obstacles to the coming of the Messianic age will be cleared away. But one of the greatest obstacles is the sinfulness of the people themselves, so to this he first addresses himself.

1-6. Call to Repentance. Though he is of priestly lineage (Neh. 1216), Zechariah's message has all the ring of the former, i.e., the pre-exilic prophets (v. 4) in attributing the people's misfortunes to God's anger at their evil ways and in summoning them to repentance. The fathers were obstinate and suffered; let their children repent. Fathers and prophets die, but not the words of God; his promises and threats will be fulfilled. This warning, delivered toward the end of 520 B.C. (v. 1), is followed by visions of encouragement.

CHAPTERS 17 TO 615: EIGHT VISIONS OF ENCOURAGEMENT

7-17. The First Vision: The Colored Horses. All eight visions seem to fall within one night (cf. 41), about the middle of February, 519 B.C. (17). On close study the first vision seems very confused, with its abrupt introduction of the angel that talked with me (v. 9) and the angel of Jehovah (v. 11), etc. This indistinctness has been explained as involved in the phantasmagoria of the vision, but most modern scholars think it is due to some later modification of the original text. On this assumption it will help to restore the original distinctness of the passage if, with them, we omit in v. 8 riding upon a red horse, and if we remember that the man who stood among the myrtle trees (v. 8) is really a supernatural man and is to be identified with the angel that talked with me (vv. 9, 14), who is also called the angel of Jehovah (vv. 11f.). But there are other difficulties. Omitting the rider with the red horse in v. 8, there are only three horses, but the LXX gives four (red, dappled, piebald, and white) and there are four in the corresponding passage 61f.—which seems more natural, the four horses corresponding to the four quarters of the heaven. Again, the scenery of the vision is quite uncertain. According to v. 8 it seems to be in the shade of a myrtle grove near Jerusalem, and the horsemen are supposed to have been suggested to the prophet's mind by the sight of Persian cavalry scouts. But for myrtles, the LXX reads mountains, which agrees with 6¹ and is adopted by Sellin, who interprets the mountains as the two mythological mountains regarded as the entrance to and the exit from heaven. Whatever may have suggested the vision, it is clear that the figures that move across the scenery are supernatural: nothing less than visitants and voices from heaven could have given Zechariah and his people the assurance that they needed.

And what is that? It is the assurance that Jehovah passionately cares for their welfare, is zealous for them with a great zeal (for jealous, v. 14). It did not look as if he cared. Not long before, Haggai (26. 21) had looked forward to a great upheaval among the nations, which would have proved that Jehovah was bestirring himself, no doubt on behalf of his beloved Judah and Jerusalem: but instead, behold, all the earth sitteth still and is at rest (v. 11). This is the report of the heavenly couriers who have walked to and fro through the earth (v. 11). After the seventy years or so (v. 12) since the fall of Jerusalem (586–520 B.C.) this was more than disappointing: but now at last comes the good and comforting message (v. 13) that Jehovah cares after all (v. 14). Soon the cities of Judah would overflow with prosperity (v. 17, mg.), Jerusalem would be rebuilt (the line, v. 16, is the measuring line, cf. 2¹), and—most convincing proof of all—the building of the Temple, which had just begun, would be completed (v. 16). It was indeed a comforting message to men who needed comfort sorely.

18–21. The Second Vision: The Four Horns and the Four Smiths. But meantime Judah is living in a world of enemies, and Jehovah's indignation at their easy sensuous lives (v. 15) must manifest itself in their destruction. This is the theme of the second vision. The hostile world which has scattered Judah (v. 19) is symbolized by four aggressive horns. These, however, are to be hurled to the ground by four smiths, symbols of the supernatural powers, who will sharpen (so LXX) their axes (read thus, instead of fray or terrify them in v. 21) and effect the destruction of the nations that had dared to invade Jehovah's land and scatter his people.

CHAPTER II

1–5. The Third Vision: The City Without a Wall. The rebuilding of Jerusalem had been assured by the first vision (1¹⁶); this third vision discloses the nature of the city which the prophet would like his rebuilt Jerusalem to be—a city not only populous but unwallled (v. 4). The young man of the vision, typical of the rising generation, more eager for city walls than for the Temple, more concerned for home defense than for religion, is seen with a measuring line in his hand (v. 1); he wishes to set limits to the city and to surround it with a wall. But a wall, designed for protection, ultimately means limitation and exclusion; and God will have neither the one nor the other. The divine ideal is expansion, not exclusion, and the great designs of God for his people cannot be measured with a tape-line. Jerusalem is to be open and unwallled like a great village; partly because many nations shall join themselves to Jehovah in that day and shall be my people (v. 11)—what a generous ideal!—and partly because a city is best protected not by her walls but by her God. He will be at once her defense, a wall of fire round about (v. 5), and her glory. Haggai (28^{t.}) had seen the glory in the sheen of tributary silver and gold; Zechariah, with a more spiritual eye, finds it in the Divine Presence.

It is altogether a most original, courageous, and alluring vision. A city without a wall was for centuries all but inconceivable: here is a prophet who can see the peril of the wall, its power to limit the life of the citizens within it, to obstruct the city's power of expansion, to block its future and stultify its progress. He also sees that, in the end, a nation is saved and protected not by its military defenses, but by its moral and religious character and ideals. A world of unwallled cities is a vastly safer and happier place than a world of cities walled. The prophet's ideal is not a fortress, but an unwallled city; he is an apostle of peace.

6–13. Two Lyrical Epilogues. These verses constitute two little lyrical epilogues (vv. 6–9; 10–13) springing out of the fair vision (vv. 1–5). Into the city (vv. 6–9) must be gathered the Jews who are scattered throughout the world, especially those still exiled in Babylon (v. 7), who are precious to Jehovah as the apple of his eye (v. 8); so they are dramatically summoned to make their escape to Zion (v. 7) from the nations who had despoiled and enslaved them. Zechariah is conscious of his commission to make this appeal: for his majesty, i.e., the glorious Jehovah, hath sent me (so v. 8b should read). More especially is Jerusalem herself, Jehovah's chosen city, summoned to rejoice at the prospect of his coming soon to dwell there in the Temple, where he will be worshiped not only by Judah but by many foreign nations too, though Judah remains pre-eminently the holy land (v. 12).

CHAPTER III

1-8, 10. The Fourth Vision: The High Priest and the Accuser. It is not enough for Zechariah that his Jerusalem be populous and unwarred: he is even more deeply interested in her spiritual quality. That is of a low order. Sin still clings to the people, as is evidenced (according to ancient views) by the misfortunes which dog them (cf. Hag. 1¹¹); they are tainted with the idolatries of the fathers, and they must be purged and forgiven before they are fit to dwell in the fair city promised. All this, on the general view of the passage, is symbolized by Joshua, the high priest, who appears in the vision in filthy garments—emblem of the national sin—at the bar of heaven, where he is accused by Satan, one of God's angels who delights in exposing the weaknesses of men (cf. Job 16). But Satan is solemnly rebuked, Joshua's filthy garments are exchanged for rich apparel (v. 4) in token that the sin is forgiven (vv. 4, 9); a clean mitre or turban, such as the high priest wore (Ex. 28⁴), is set upon his head, and he receives the promise that if he is faithful to his priestly charge, he shall have full authority over the Temple, and rank among Jehovah's attendant angels (v. 7). He and the priests who are under him will be a sign (v. 8) and pledge that the Messianic kingdom is very near. My servant the Branch (v. 8) or Shoot—a name which had been given by Jeremiah (23⁵) to the coming Messianic King—would soon appear, and the happy day would dawn when men would sit in peace and safety under the vine and fig tree (cf. Mic. 4⁴). By the Branch (cf. 6^{12f.}) the prophet unquestionably means Zerubbabel, the civil head of the community, as Joshua was its sacerdotal head.

9. This summary has left v. 9 out of account, as much ambiguity attaches to the stone. This is sometimes taken as the jewel in Messiah's diadem, but it seems more reasonable to identify it with the stone in 4⁷, where (as also probably in 4¹⁰) it unambiguously refers to the coping stone of the Temple. The engraving upon it will doubtless be something like "Holiness to Jehovah" (cf. 14²⁰ Ex. 28³⁶).

It is possible, however, as Sellin suggests, that Joshua appears here, not in a representative, but in a personal capacity. He may have been accused of being tainted with the uncleanness of Babylon (Isa. 52¹¹), from which he had come, and therefore incompetent to be high priest; in that case Zechariah would here be defending him as the man chosen by Jehovah himself to be the religious head of the community.

CHAPTER IV

The Fifth Vision: The Seven-Branded Candlestick With an Olive Tree on Either Side. This confusing chapter becomes clear the moment it is recognized (1) that vv. 6b-10a, which deal entirely with Zerubbabel and interrupt the closely connected vv. 6a, 10b, form an independent piece; and (2) that v. 12, which but repeats and modifies v. 11, should be omitted as a later addition.

1-6a, 10b-14. The Vision. Now that the religious community (or the high priest) has been completely restored to favor, symbolized by the exchange of soiled robes for clean ones, it is important that the community receive the assurance of the unceasing vigilance and protection of the God they worship, the assurance also of the divine authority of their leaders. These assurances are conveyed in the somewhat fantastic vision of the seven-branded candlestick with an olive tree on either side. As in the post-exilic Temple, but not as in that of Solomon, which had ten lamps (1 Kings 7⁴⁹), the candlestick of Zechariah's vision had seven lamps, each of which was connected by a pipe (not seven pipes, v. 2) with a bowl of oil above.

The explanation which this curious vision undoubtedly requires is furnished by v. 10b. The shining lamps fed from the oil in the bowl above represent, not the church fed and illumined by the Divine Spirit, but the all-seeing eyes of Jehovah himself (cf. 2 Chr. 16⁹ Psa. 121^{3f.}), ever vigilant to watch and protect the interests of his people. The olive trees on either side represent the two sons of oil (anointed ones, A.S.V., v. 14), an unmistakable reference to Zerubbabel and Joshua as the (anointed) civil and religious heads of the community who, ranking as attendant angels (cf. 3⁷), stand beside the Lord of the whole earth. (V. 12 introduces the unwarranted thought that the oil in the lamps is ultimately fed from the oil in the trees. The measure of truth in this is that the Divine Spirit is in both—in the light and in the men—but the human figures at either side of the candlestick are detached from and essentially independent of it—see v. 3.)

6b-10a. The Promise to Zerubbabel. Zerubbabel, who may have been relying on his own political and building enterprises (cf. 2²), is here reminded in the great words of v. 6 that success depends not upon human might and power, but on the divine spirit. Trusting to it, the great mountain of difficulty that confronted him would become level as a plain. He would be given the honor of completing the Temple he had begun, and the final placing of its coping stone would be greeted with shouts of joy, Grace, grace, i.e., "How lovely! How lovely!" or "May all favor attend it." Those who had despised the slender and unpromising beginnings would look with joy upon this chosen stone (rather than plummet, v. 10; cf. Psa. 118²²) being set in its place (perhaps with an appropriate inscription, cf. 3⁹) by the hands of Zerubbabel. Again we see how indispensable is the Temple as a preparation for the coming of the Messianic kingdom. (On vv. 10b-14 see under vv. 1-6a.)

CHAPTER V

1-4. The Sixth Vision: The Flying Roll. The next two visions emphasize the necessity for purity within the new community. The ever-wakeful protection of God furnishes no license to sin and no immunity from its consequences. There must be an entire elimination of every sinful thing and sinful person. The sixth vision deals with the persons. The prophet sees an immense roll, thirty feet by fifteen, flying down from heaven across the whole land, crowded with terrible curses and lighting with unerring certainty and destructive power upon the guilty—the crimes singled out for special reprobation (though they are typical of others) being theft and perjury, crimes which may have been specially prevalent in that poverty-stricken community, crimes against neighbors and against God. The heaven-sent curse is tragically effective (v. 4).

5-11. The Seventh Vision: The Woman in the Barrel. This vision is more searching still, for it is not so much the sinner as the very principle of sin that has to be eradicated. The prophet expresses this profound thought through the curious symbol of a small barrel (an ephah=about seven gallons) with a leaden lid (in v. 7 talent=“disk”), which is being pushed up by a woman inside trying to effect her escape. But the angel thrust her down and closed the heavy lid upon her: whereupon two demonic female figures appeared and bore the barrel away on their powerful wings to the land of Shinar, i.e., Babylon (cf. Gen. 11²), where a house, i.e., a temple, is to be erected to the woman, who, as v. 8 discloses (cf. v. 6, where their resemblance should, with LXX, read their iniquity), is Wickedness personified. Incidentally, this throws a lurid light on Zechariah's conception of Babylon—the fitting abode for the worship of Wickedness, whose temple is the counterpart of the Temple of Jehovah at Jerusalem.

Behind this fantastic picture lies the profoundest moral insight. The prophet sees that the real enemy of a community is Sin, and that it is not sinners, nor even sins only, but Sin itself that must be banished. The mechanism by which this banishment is effected must not blind us to the moral penetration of the idea it embodies.

CHAPTER VI

1-8, 15. The Eighth Vision: The Four Chariots. The visions from the third to the seventh have concentrated attention on the Jewish community and on the moral and spiritual quality which must characterize it; this eighth and last vision, like the first two, opens up the wide vista of the world, and its imagery reverts to that of the first vision. From between two mountains of bronze (see note on myrtles, 1⁸) emerge four chariots drawn by horses of different color (in vv. 3, 6 read dappled for grised, and in v. 3 omit bay with A.S.V.; and for the bay in v. 7 read with mg. the strong ones, which refers to all the horses). These horses, after presenting themselves before the Lord of all the earth (v. 5, mg.), go out through all the earth (v. 7), north, south, east, and west (emended text of v. 6), to (as v. 5 properly reads) the four winds of heaven. All the horses are impatient to start (v. 7), but attention is specially directed to the north country (v. 8), i.e., Babylon, where the exiles are.

The meaning of the vision turns on the interpretation of v. 8b. The phrase rendered they have quieted my spirit is usually taken to mean “they have pacified my anger,” and the chariots are supposed to be sent forth to execute Jehovah's anger upon any power which may threaten Judah, and more particularly Babylon. But spirit does not necessarily mean anger, and Sellin may be right in connecting v. 8 with v. 15a and in supposing that the Divine Spirit is the spirit which will bring back the scattered Jews to take their part in the building of the Temple. This would certainly round off the visions admirably.

9-14. The Proclamation of the Messiah. A deputation of Babylonian Jews reaches Jerusalem with gifts of silver and gold doubtless intended for the Temple, and Zechariah is commissioned to make of these gifts a crown to be set on the head of Zerubbabel, the Branch or Shoot (cf. 3⁸)—an eloquent indication that he is the Messianic King. This, which is quite certainly the original meaning of the passage, has been obscured in the text, because the hopes reposed in Zerubbabel were falsified by history. The grammar of v. 14, where shall be is singular, not plural, puts it beyond any doubt that the original passage mentioned only one crown, not two, and that that crown must have been designed for Zerubbabel, the anticipated king. He, and not Joshua, must be the subject of the address in v. 11, as it is he (4⁹) who was building the Temple (612f.). The last clause of v. 13 (them both) certainly implies that Joshua as well as Zerubbabel was mentioned (and that probably there had not been complete harmony between them); but there are not two thrones; v. 13 should read and there shall be a priest, or, better, and Joshua shall be the priest upon his right hand (so LXX). The unfulfilled promise to Zerubbabel was simply transferred by later hands to Joshua, the high priest, who, as in later times, is here regarded as the civil no less than the religious head of the community. The crown is to be deposited in the Temple in memory of the donors. (On v. 15 see under vv. 1-8.)

CHAPTERS 7 AND 8: THE CALL TO CIVIC DUTY AND SOME PRECIOUS PROMISES

CHAPTER VII

The Call to Civic Duty. Already, even through the fantastic visions, we have seen the practical quality of Zechariah's mind: in chs. 7 and 8, where the imaginative expression of truth is discarded, that quality discloses itself in a still more eminent degree. The occasion of the message in ch. 7 was the arrival of a deputation, probably of Samaritans (cf. Ezra 41-5), from Bethel, in December, 518 B.C., to consult the Temple priests and prophets as to whether the fasts in the fifth and seventh months to commemorate the burning of city and Temple (2 Kings 25^{8f.}) and the assassination of the Jewish governor Gedaliah (2 Kings 25²⁵)—fasts which had been observed since the fall of the city in 586—should be continued. Zechariah's answer, which is intended to reach the ears of all the people (v. 5), is of special significance when we remember his profound interest in the Temple: it shows that he, like the former, i.e., the pre-exilic, prophets (14), cared infinitely more for righteousness than for ritual. Their fasting, he reminds them, like their eating and drinking, did not in any way affect God, but only themselves. His demand, voiced by those prophets, was for something very different—for true justice (cf. Amos 5²⁴), kindness (cf. Hos. 6⁶) and pity in their social relationships, and for the temper which would scorn to exploit the defenseless members of society or to harbor malicious designs against them (vv. 9b-11). This prophetic law (v. 12), i.e., instruction, though it had been mediated by the divine Spirit, they had willfully rejected, turning a stubborn shoulder (v. 11) like an animal that refuses to bear the yoke, with the result that Jehovah was indignant (v. 12), scattered them among strange nations (v. 14a), and abandoned their lovely land to desolation (v. 14b).

The force of this answer is somewhat blunted by the intrusion of vv. 8, 9a, which should be omitted. The point, then, is that the words beginning Execute true justice, etc. (v. 9b), quote, in substance, the message of the former prophets: and v. 7 should read Are not these (so LXX) the words of the former prophets, etc., namely, Execute true justice, etc.—Zechariah is conscious that his own words are but a repetition of theirs. The South in v. 7 is the southern district of Judah and the Philistine plain.

CHAPTER VIII

This chapter continues Zechariah's answer to the deputation, and yields a vivid glimpse not only into Zechariah's hopes and ideals, but also into the forlorn condition of the people and the land.

1-17. The Precious Promises. Many of their compatriots were in exile (v. 7). They themselves were slack, timid, disheartened (vv. 9a, 13b). There were few old people to be seen in Jerusalem and few children (v. 4). Unemployment was widespread, the neighboring peoples were hostile, there was internal dissension (v. 10), a drought (Hag. 1¹¹) had ruined the crops (v. 12), their name was a byword for misery in the world (v. 13). The situation was so desperate that it seemed as if only a miracle could transform it (v. 6). Very well, says Zechariah, God is equal to the miracle, it is no miracle for him. The misery of the former days (v. 11) before the building of the Temple was begun in 520 would be turned into joy (v. 19) and abounding prosperity; and this assurance is conveyed in detail in a series of promises, each solemnly introduced by the words, Thus saith Jehovah of hosts. Jehovah would return and dwell in his Temple; then Jerusalem would be a loyal and holy city (v. 3); old folks would sit watching happy boys and girls play in its streets (vv. 4f.), the exiles would be brought home (vv. 7f.), crops would be abundant, the name of the people would be a synonym for blessing; therefore don't be afraid (v. 15). But the prophet takes care to emphasize the point he had so earnestly made before (7^{9f.}), that this happy state could come into being only if they practiced loyalty and justice to one another and abstained from all malice and breach of contract (vv. 16f.).

18-23. The Attractive Power of the Holy City. Here the prophet comes to the real climax of his answer to the deputation (72f.). Their fasts—to the two already mentioned (7⁵) are added other two which commemorated the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem in the tenth month (2 Kings 25¹) and its capture in the fourth (2 Kings 25³⁻⁵)—should be turned into joy and gladness and cheerful seasons. So attractive would this holy happy city be that men from foreign lands would join the Jews in exile who were returning home and would hasten to it to worship the great God of the place. They had caught its secret, for we have heard that God is with you (v. 23).

II. INTRODUCTION TO CHAPTERS 9 TO 14

Date. The one certain thing about this perplexing section is that it is not the work of the prophet who wrote the first eight chapters of the book of Zechariah. An exhaustive discussion of all the arguments which have led to this conclusion would require more space than is available here; hence all that the present writer can do is to point out the lines along which the investigation must proceed and the most probable results to which the inquiry seems to lead. (For a full discussion see Mitchell, Zechariah, pp. 232-259.) The evidence to be considered is threefold—linguistic, historical and theological.

1. The Linguistic Argument. It has been pointed out again and again that between the two sections there are marked differences in diction, style, and other features of composition, and long lists of these differences have been constructed. Over against such lists have been prepared others calling attention to linguistic features thought to favor unity of authorship. But when all is said and done, it cannot be denied that, whatever similarities the two sections may reveal, each section is marked by some striking linguistic and stylistic peculiarities. Moreover, while similarities and resemblances in language and style may easily be explained—in this case they may all be explained by the fact that both sections belong to the same general stage in the history of the Hebrew language—in the presence of numerous dissimilarities one cannot escape the question whether the differences in language and style which remain after all due allowance has been made for difference in subject matter can be harmonized with the theory that the entire book comes from the sixth century Zechariah. To the present writer it seems that, even admitting as a general principle that style and diction by themselves are unsafe criteria, in the present case the two parts differ so widely in broad and general linguistic features that it is exceedingly difficult to believe that they were written by one and the same author.

2. The Historical Argument. The historical situation described and presupposed in chs. 1-8 is not that of chs. 9-14. The prophecies in the early part of the book have an intimate connection with events in Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Darius: the Jews are encouraged to rebuild the Temple and the city, and as reward are promised speedy deliverance from their present distress, and success and prosperity for the immediate future. Are the pictures of the impending destruction of Jerusalem and other calamities, which are to befall the nation prior to the final triumph, as outlined in chs. 9-14, adapted to the needs of the same community in the same age? What is true of conditions within the Jewish community is equally true of conditions throughout the whole Eastern world. Chs. 9-14 reflect a world situation far different from that appearing in chs. 1-8.

3. The Theological Argument. It would be strange indeed if resemblances in ideas were not found in the two sections; but such resemblances do not necessarily establish common authorship. (Similar resemblances can be traced between other prophetic writings certainly coming from different authors; who would claim in such cases that they prove common authorship?) Again, the crucial question is, Can the differences in ideas be harmonized with belief in unity of authorship? For instance, in chs. 9-14 there is not the slightest concern for the rebuilding of the Temple, which is the main theme of chs. 1-8; there are marked differences in the Messianic ideas and ideals of the two sections (cf. 3⁸ 6¹², 13 with 9⁹, 10 and ch. 8 with ch. 14); there are striking differences in the hopes for the future of the Jewish community (cf. 12¹ 28-11 87, 8 with 12^{2f}).

As in all investigations of this character a mathematical demonstration may not be possible, but the facts enumerated make it practically certain that chs. 9-14 do not come from "Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo." It is much more difficult to fix an exact date for the chapters. Such proper names and incidents as occur do not enable us to reach with certainty any tangible historical situation. It is not even certain that the section is a unity. (For a detailed discussion of this question see Eiselen, The Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. ii, pp. 567f.)

The situations change kaleidoscopically (see the notes below). The section rings almost throughout with the clangor of war, and some of the scenes are gruesome enough (cf. 9¹⁵ 12⁴ 14¹², 15). Sometimes Jerusalem is in distress (cf. 14¹⁻⁵), sometimes triumphant; once Jehovah's people displays the basest ingratitude (cf. 11¹²), and again the profoundest penitence (cf. 12¹⁰⁻¹⁴). Some of the utterances are enigmatic in the extreme, notably 11⁸. The general impression made by the prophecy is that it comes as a whole from a relatively late period, perhaps the fourth or third century B.C., when the distinction between the Jewish people and the rest of the world had grown very sharp, and the hope was passionately cherished that the supremacy of Jerusalem would be signally marked by the defeat and destruction of all who were opposed to her. A confirmation of this later date may be seen in the manifest discredit into which prophecy has fallen (cf. 132-6); the decadence already visible in Zechariah and Malachi has reached its climax.

Teaching and Significance. For all their obscurity, these chapters constitute one of the most revealing documents of Judaism. We see in them the characteristic hope of its final triumph over heathenism and its hordes—the hope, however, not only of its political, but still more of its religious triumph. The book closes with a vision of pilgrims from once hostile nations streaming from foreign lands to worship Jehovah in Jerusalem (cf. 14¹⁶). But that very vision marks the limitations as well as the breadth of contemporary Judaism. The nations must come to Jerusalem to worship, their worship must take the form of the celebration of the Jewish feast of booths (14¹⁶), and those who decline this homage are to be punished (14¹⁷⁻¹⁹). The universalism turns out to be, after all, a Levitical and legalistic universalism. The distinctive teaching of the six chapters may be summarized as follows:

1. The Messianic King. The person of the Messianic King appears only in 9⁹, 10, but there very distinctly. The King is primarily the "Prince of Peace" and the general conception of him is in perfect accord with that expressed in other prophetic books. Two new features, however, are introduced: (1) "Having salvation," that is, the ideal king will at all times enjoy the divine help and favor, so that everything he undertakes will prosper; (2) "Lowly," that is, he will be of lowly estate and humble in spirit.

2. The Rejected Shepherd. For details of interpretation see comments on 11⁴⁻¹⁴ and 11¹⁵⁻¹⁷+137⁹. As is pointed out in these comments, the meaning of some features in the passage describing the good and the foolish shepherd is uncertain, but its general significance is clear. Evidently, the allegory presents a solemn warning that the divine care and grace may be frustrated by human obstinacy. It has been done again and again in the past; it has been done in the immediate past to which the prophecy points; it may be done again, unless the prophet's contemporaries take heed. The promises in chs. 9 and 10 are glorious; will they be realized? All will depend upon the attitude of those for whom the blessings are intended.

3. The Restored and Penitent People. All the eschatological hopes of chs. 9-14 center around the restored Jewish community. Whatever the immediate future may have in store, ultimately the Jews will triumph over all their enemies and enjoy abundant external prosperity and rich spiritual gifts. Uncleanness, even the spirit of uncleanness, and everything else that in any wise might interfere with direct personal communion with Jehovah, will be taken away. Ceremonial holiness plays a prominent part in the expectation; but the emphasis which the author places on moral and spiritual regeneration and heartfelt repentance furnishes sufficient evidence to show that the author of these chapters, like the pre-exilic prophets, was not without proper appreciation of the essential elements of Jehovah religion.

4. The Divine Sovereignty. During the Messianic era Jehovah will be supreme over all the nations. True, Jerusalem and Judah will enjoy the divine favor in a special manner; true, the nations will suffer terrible disasters; but when the last conflict is over, a remnant of all the nations will "worship the king, Jehovah of hosts."

Literature: See the titles at the close of the introduction to chs. 1-8, p. 820.

CHAPTER IX

The Coming of the Messianic Kingdom. The post-exilic, like the pre-exilic prophets, followed the course of history with the keenest of eyes, because they regarded it as the arena on which Jehovah's purpose was being worked out (cf. Isa. 51² 14^{26f.}). Nothing is more natural, then, than that the conquering career of Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.) should have been watched with the intensest interest and should have stirred the most daring hopes. It is no accident that the prediction of the advent of the Messianic King (vv. 9f.) follows the prophecy which in all probability describes the anticipated victories of Alexander (vv. 1-8). In the eyes of the prophet that great warrior was preparing the way for the Hebrew King who was to usher in the glorious days to which the prophets as a whole look forward. In this anticipation the prophet read the future more truly than he at the time could have realized; for, through the spread of the Greek language which followed in the wake of his conquests, Alexander was all unconsciously preparing the way for the LXX and the N.T. in which the story of our Lord was told to all the world: so that in a sense little dreamed of either by Alexander or Zechariah, Alexander was one of those who prepared the way for the coming of the Lord.

1-8. Overthrow of Hostile Nations. After Alexander's victory over the Persians at Issus in 333 B.C. the prophet sees him in imagination triumphantly marching on from Syria in the north through Phœnicia to Philistia in the south, subduing Israel's historic enemies and thus making possible the restoration of her ancient kingdom in all its ideal extent. The burden (or, rather, oracle) declares that the cities of Aram, i.e., Syria (instead of the eye of man, Hebrew Adam), no less than the tribes of Israel, belong to Jehovah—Damascus being specially singled out, and Hamath, one hundred and twenty miles north of it, and Hadrach, also in the north (v. 1). Next to fall would be Tyre and Sidon, the chief towns of Phœnicia, despite their wisdom, i.e., skill in war and commerce, and despite their wealth and far-flung commerce (vv. 2-4).

Then would come the turn of the Philistines, four of whose towns are mentioned as marked for destruction, and the surviving population of idolatrous half-breeds (rather than bastards; v. 6), after abandoning the heathen practice of eating sacrificial meat from which the blood had not been drained (cf. 1 Sam. 14^{32f.}) and other customs regarded by Israel as unclean and detestable, would at length be incorporated as a clan (not chieftain) in Judah and regarded as on a level with the people of Jerusalem (vv. 5-7), whose ancient name was Jebus (Judg. 19¹⁰). Jehovah would himself protect his house (i.e., the Holy Land), and the foreign armies that had been seen only too often passing across Palestine would be seen no more (v. 8).

9, 10. The Messianic King. Now that the land from north to south has been won for Jehovah, the Messianic King appears upon the scene, whereat Jerusalem may well rejoice. The description of him shows how the ancient idea of kingship, with its military glory, has been transformed. This King is just and the Saviour (so LXX) of the poor: he comes riding not upon a war-horse but upon an ass, the beast of peace. From end to end of his kingdom military weapons will disappear. By his word of arbitration he will dispense peace to the nations of the world (cf. Isa. 23^{f.}), and because his throne is founded on justice, his reign will be universal.

11-17. Promise of Victory and Freedom. In contrast with the ideal presented in vv. 1-11 is the grim reality. The Jews are dispersed in foreign lands; but if prisoners, they are expectant prisoners (vv. 11f.), and in virtue of the ancient covenant sealed with sacrificial blood, they are urged to return (not turn) to their own land, and are encouraged with the promise that Jehovah himself would fight for them and use them as his weapons—bow, arrow, and lance—against the adversary. (Greece is specially singled out, but most scholars believe this to be a later intrusion.) The sling-stones (v. 15) would eat the flesh (so Sellin) and drink the blood of the foe, the Jews would be drenched with that blood like the corners of the altar, and victorious they would shine like the glittering jewels of a crown (cf. mg.). The fierce description ends upon a quiet note of praise to God for his goodness, which shines resplendent in the fertility of the land.

This wild battle scene stands in such curious contrast to the preceding description of the King of Peace that Sellin proposes to transfer those verses (9f.) to the end of the chapter. In any case they represent conflicting ideals. Of the savage temper reflected in v. 15 the world has seen enough, and we turn from it with relief to the lovely picture of the King who rules the world not with weapons of war but with words of peace. And we also rejoice at the noble large-heartedness which deliberately put the Philistines, ancient enemies, upon the level of Jerusalem, and welcomed them into the Jewish commonwealth (cf. Isa. 19²³⁻²⁵).

CHAPTER X

1, 2. The Folly of Superstition. This passage has only an external connection with the context: the idea of fertility connects it with 9¹⁷, and the word shepherd with 10³. In a time of drought the people had sought in superstitious ways to secure rain, by consulting diviners and teraphim (household gods used in divination; cf. Ezek. 21²¹): the prophet urges them to ask it from Jehovah, who, as Lord of nature, is Lord of the rain, on which the food of man and beast depends. Superstition, i.e., a way of life divorced from God and his guidance, is the parent of restlessness and instability and reduces men to the level of shepherdless sheep.

The Destruction of the World-Powers and the Gathering of Dispersed Israel. (10³⁻¹¹.) This passage is parallel in thought to ch. 9, only it emphasizes the annihilation of the hostile powers rather than the reign of peace which is the sequel to their destruction, and it dwells more elaborately on the return of Israel from the lands in which they are scattered. Egypt and Assyria are definitely mentioned as the hostile powers (vv. 10f.), by which we are to understand the Ptolemaic dynasty of Egypt and the Seleucid dynasty of Syria, which contended for the possession of Palestine during the latter part of the fourth and throughout the third century B.C. (See pp. 70-1.)

3-7. The Victory. The Jews had been crushed by shepherds and he-goats (cf. Isa. 149 mg.), i.e., foreign rulers. The prophet here promises that Jehovah will punish these oppressors. They would have rulers of their own (all the nouns in v. 4, including the word rendered exactor, are pictorial terms for rulers), and under their rule the helpless sheep of Jehovah's flock would be transformed into glorious war-horses (v. 3)—a promise which was amply fulfilled in the Maccabean struggles of the second century. With Jehovah on their side, their victory would be so complete that they would trample their mighty enemy in the mire (v. 5), and their joy would be exuberant (v. 7).

8-12. The Restoration. From the distant lands in which they were scattered (v. 9: read I scattered instead of I will sow), especially from Syria and Egypt (v. 10), where for some centuries Jews had resided, Jehovah would summon them by a call like a hiss (v. 8; cf. Isa. 52⁶) or whistle, as a beekeeper summons his bees (cf. Isa. 71⁸), and they would return in throngs (v. 10c) to Palestine with the children whom they had reared (v. 9, LXX). No conceivable obstacle would bar their way. Ancient miracles would be repeated to facilitate their journey home (cf. Isa. 111⁵, 16). As of old (cf. Ex. 14) they would cross the Red Sea in safety (for sea of affliction, v. 11, read sea of Egypt), and the power of their enemies would be broken no less surely than the barriers of nature. Their strength would come from Jehovah and in his name would they make their boast (so LXX, v. 12).

CHAPTER XI

1-3. The Ruin of the Hostile Powers. (See also 103-12.) It is possible that these verses, with their allusions to Bashan and Jordan, may describe an invasion of Israel; but more probably, in the context, they repeat the threat of 103-7 of the destruction of the powers hostile to Israel, the more so as great forests (particularly Lebanon; cf. Isa. 103⁴) sometimes symbolize a mighty world-power. The shepherds (v. 3) are, as before (103), the rulers of these powers. The devouring fire (v. 1), symbol of irremediable destruction, would swiftly come upon those powers, whose rulers would then howl in despair like the lions when driven from their lairs in the jungle of Jordan.

The whole passage (103-113) is alive with the keen consciousness of the distinction between Israel and the world-powers which oppress her and glows with anticipation of the day when the tables would be turned and victorious Israel would recover her rightful place; and this could be only when she was restored to her own land. Here again is revealed her passionate love of the ancient land.

The Two Shepherds, the Faithful and the False. (114-17 137-9.) Driver truly remarks that this "prophecy is the most enigmatic in the O.T." It is quite certain that 137-9 should follow 114-17, as the "shepherd" idea controls both sections: 137-9, which has no connection whatever with 131-6, makes an admirable sequel to 1115-17. But scarcely any two critics are agreed as to the historical background or implications of the prophecy. The clause on which everything has been made to turn, I cut off the three shepherds in one month (118^a), besides being capable of interpretation in a great variety of ways, is believed by Sellin and other scholars to be an interpolation, in which case it cannot be used as a key to the meaning of the passage. Some take the month literally, others as implying a short period, others as several years, even centuries. The three shepherds have been taken to represent kings, or even empires, but are most commonly believed to stand for three successive high priests of the Maccabean period (2d century B.C.). In this overwhelming uncertainty it will be enough to admit with Driver that the expression "does seem to point to three definite persons, though our knowledge of the history does not enable us to say who they are. We are equally unable to explain with certainty other historical allusions in the prophecy."

But our difficulties do not end here. Usually 114-14 is regarded as describing the conduct and the destiny of the faithful shepherd, and 1115-17 137-9 as describing the conduct and fate of the false shepherd. But some scholars believe that 137-9 describes the fate of the good shepherd (cf. Mt. 2631), while Mitchell thinks that both shepherds are bad, the one he describes as "the careless shepherd" (114-14), and the other as "a foolish shepherd" (1115-17 137-9). The terms of the prophecy may have been intentionally obscured: the initiated among the writer's contemporaries would understand. But we, who are not in his secret, are not in a position to dogmatize. It will be a good exercise of the critical judgment for the reader to note, as he studies the passage for himself, expressions which create the ambiguity by lending themselves to either interpretation; e.g., could a good shepherd as well as a bad say of his sheep, my soul was weary of them? (118^b.) Could a bad shepherd as well as a good be described as my (i.e., Jehovah's) shepherd and the man that is my fellow? (137.)

Our view of the passage will be determined by our answers to these and similar questions. In any case it is clear that the prophet has an inward call to impersonate first one shepherd and then another (114, 15). The shepherd represents the ruler, and the flock the people; in this way the prophet brings vividly home the quality of the rulers and the nature of the popular response to them.

4-14. The Faithful Shepherd. The people are like sheep, heartlessly bought and sold by the very shepherds, i.e., rulers, who ought to protect them and who actually have the effrontery to thank Jehovah (they appear to be native, not foreign rulers) for their ill-gotten gain (v. 5). So the prophet is summoned to feed, or, rather, shepherd (i.e., act the rôle of shepherd to) this flock exposed to slaughter (v. 4)—especially in view of the anarchy that is coming upon the earth (v. 6, not the land). The prophet did as he was told and took upon himself the task of shepherding, which had been so heartlessly performed by those who had trafficked in the flock (as, with LXX, we should read in v. 7 for verily the poor of the flock). Like the Oriental shepherd (cf. Psa. 234) he equipped himself with two staffs, named Grace and Union (v. 7, mg.); to symbolize respectively the divine favor by which Jehovah had guaranteed Israel against invasion by the neighboring peoples (v. 10) and the unity that should subsist between the two great sections of the people (v. 14). But the flock rejected this good shepherd (v. 8a is probably a gloss); so, growing impatient with them, he decided to shepherd them no longer, but to abandon them to internecine strife (vv. 8f.). To symbolize this decision, he broke the staffs, first the one (v. 10) and then the other (v. 14)—an act which made it plain to those who had trafficked in the flock (v. 11, cf. v. 7) and who had been watching him, that he was indeed a messenger of Jehovah (v. 11).

The shepherd then asked for his wages (vv. 12, 13); and their contemptuous response—thirty shekels of silver (about $25), which was the compensation for an injured slave (cf. Ex. 2132)—showed how meanly they thought of him and his services. And not only of him, but of the God who had appointed him, for he deposits the money in the treasury of Jehovah's house, i.e., the Temple (for potter read treasury, which is very similar in Hebrew)—a symbol that Jehovah had been insulted in the person of his prophet.

15-17. The False Shepherd. (See also 137-9.) Next the prophet impersonates a foolish, worthless (v. 17), wicked shepherd who cares nothing for the sheep when lost, scattered, bruised or hungry (for sound in v. 16 read hungry)— symbol of the ruler who neglects his people. In the shock of war he will meet his doom—paralysis and blindness. The sword is summoned to execute the doom, and the fall of the shepherd will involve the dispersal of the flock (137), two thirds of which will perish; but the surviving third, purified by trial, will become the devoted people of their God. Here we come upon Isaiah's doctrine of the remnant (cf. Isa. 3732), through whom the religious mission and testimony of Israel will be carried on.

It is impossible to read of the insulting response accorded by the people to the good shepherd (1112) without feeling how prophetic the passage is. Israel had not had a superabundance of good shepherds in the course of her history (cf. Ezek. 34); but when the greatest Shepherd of all came, ready to lay down his life for the sheep (cf. Jn. 1015), he was despised and rejected, sold for the price of a slave (Mt. 2615) and nailed to a cross. "The guilty sacrifice the innocent, but in this execute their own doom. That is a summary of the history of Israel" (G. A. Smith).

CHAPTER XII

The Heathen Assault upon Jerusalem. Her Deliverance, Penitence, and Purification. (121-14; including also 131-6.) The Jews were keenly conscious of their religious pre-eminence among the nations; in later times this contrast assumed the form of Judæa contra mundum. The nations, first her neighbors (122), then all the nations (129), are conceived as organizing a stupendous assault upon Jerusalem, which is not only defended (128), but crowned with victory, by the power of her God. With this political transformation is allied the more attractive thought of her religious transformation (1210-136).

This passage, like the last (114f.), is beset by difficulties, the chief of which is created by the mention of Judah. Certain verses (e.g., 122, 7) suggest a rivalry and even a conflict between Judah and Jerusalem; but it seems best, on the whole, with Sellin, to regard Judah as practically synonymous with Jerusalem and its immediate environment (except in v. 7, which may be a Maccabean gloss).

1-9. The Assault and Deliverance. The prophet anticipates a siege of Jerusalem (v. 2: omit upon Judah also), which is compared to a heavy stone (v. 3) which will but tear the hands of the nations that seek to lift it; for all their efforts, she will remain firmly planted and prosperous on her own site (v. 6), supported as she is by the God of the universe (v. 1). In v. 2 she is compared to a cup of reeling, i.e., a huge bowl, from which her assailants will drink to intoxication and then reel to their ruin. Their destruction will be created by a panic (v. 4; cf. Deut. 28²⁸), of which Judah, enjoying the favor of God (v. 4b), will take advantage to consume the enemy, all of them (v. 9), like devouring fire (v. 6). The weakest Jew would prove as strong as David, and the descendants of David like God himself (v. 8)—inspired with supernatural strength by Jehovah of hosts (v. 5).

10-14. Penitential Mourning. But penitence is a greater quality than strength, and forgiveness is more than victory. So the outpouring of the divine spirit impels the people, high and low, to supplicate Jehovah's favor and forgiveness for some great crime in which they had all had a share (v. 14). Some noble representative of Jehovah had been martyred (pierced, v. 10; read they shall look upon him, not me), and they are now filled with shame and sorrow. Who this martyr was we have no means of knowing. Those who see in 137 a reference to the fate of the good shepherd naturally connect this passage with that; in any case it is tempting to connect this martyr with the shepherd who in 111^{2f}. was treated with such cruel ingratitude. Every family in the land would mourn, or, rather, wail, for their share in this public crime (v. 14): the princely and the priestly families are perhaps singled out as specially guilty (vv. 12f. Nathan was a son of David, 2 Sam. 514, and Shimei a grandson of Levi, Num. 321.) The monotony of the repetition in vv. 12-14 suggests the mourning litanies, and the bitterness of the wailing (v. 10) is compared to the bitterness of the wailing for Hadad-rimmon (v. 11), a deity with a compound name whose worship may have been akin to or confused with Tammuz (i.e., Adonis), whom Ezekiel (814) represents the women of his time as bewailing. (This seems better than to regard Hadad-rimmon as a place in the valley of Megiddo where Josiah was slain, 2 Kings 23²⁹, cf. 2 Chr. 35²⁵, for in any case the wailing for Josiah would have taken place at Jerusalem, where he was buried, 2 Kings 23³⁰.)

CHAPTER XIII

1-6. Forgiveness and Reformation. (See also opening paragraphs under ch. 12 above.) Just as there were ceremonial lustrations to purify from physical uncleanness (Num. 19), so a fountain would be permanently opened to cleanse the stain of this crime and every stain upon the soul; in particular, the stain of idolatry, which in Ezek. 36²⁵ is associated with uncleanness. But much more than idolatry does false prophecy receive prominence in this passage: indeed, whereas Jeremiah (ch. 23) and Ezekiel (ch. 13) condemn false prophecy, here all prophecy seems to be condemned—a fact which shows that the era of prophecy is passing away. A prophet is an impostor; and any man who poses as such must be put to death by his own parents (cf. Deut. 13^{6f}. 18^{20f}.). The prophet will discard the insignia (cf. 2 Kings 18) of his disgraceful profession (v. 4), and will hasten to repudiate his professional status, claiming to be but a simple peasant (the last clause of v. 5 should read the soil has been my possession from my youth); and if anyone should point to the marks on his breast such as the Baal prophets inflicted on themselves (cf. 1 Kings 18²⁸) as evidence that he is a prophet after all, he will explain them as wounds he had received from his friends, possibly his parents, for attempting to play the prophet.

The finest thought in the passage (121-136) is that the deliverance of Jerusalem inspires her people not to transports of jubilation, but to profound penitence for the shepherd whom they had rejected and slain. In Rev. 17 the passage receives a stern turn; it is with remorse that those who had pierced him will look upon him.

7-9. See notes under 114-17.

CHAPTER XIV

The Final Assault upon Jerusalem. The Issue in the Universal Recognition and Worship of Jehovah as King. In a general way this chapter duplicates ch. 12, but there are significant differences. There Jerusalem was inviolable (128), here she is captured (142). There her deliverance was followed by the penitence and inward transformation of the people (1210), here by pilgrimages of the lately hostile nations to Jerusalem. This chapter is less profound and spiritual and moves upon a more legalistic level; the nations express their allegiance to Jehovah by taking part in the feast of Tabernacles.

1-5. Jehovah Fights Against the Heathen Assailants of Jerusalem. All the nations are conceived as assaulting Jerusalem and perpetrating within her all the horrors of war; but Jehovah works a miracle for her, splitting by an earthquake the Mount of Olives in two, half of it moving to the north and half to the south, leaving from west to east a great valley or gorge, through which the people remaining in the city might escape. (The earthquake in the days of Uziah (Amos 11), which their flight recalls, must have made a stupendous impression, as it had occurred four hundred years before.) One effect of the cleaving of the Mount of Olives is that (the spring of) Gihon on the east of the city shall be stopped, for the gorge of the mountains shall reach to the side of it, as we should probably read with Mitchell in v. 5a. (Others emend "the valley of Hinnom shall be stopped"—less probably, as this was west and south of the city, not east.) The holy ones of v. 5 are the angels (cf. Job 51).

6-11. Climate and Scenery Miraculously Transformed. This miraculous deliverance will have its physical counterpart in the transformation of nature. In that great day cold and frost would be no more (v. 6, LXX), nor would there be alternating day and night (v. 7), but only one continuous day, with evening clear as the morning; and running water, without which there could be no Paradise for the denizens of that dry and rugged region, would be there in abundance—one stream flowing into the Dead Sea, another into the Mediterranean, never drying up in summer, like many a Palestinian stream. The rugged mountain land of Judah from north to south (Geba six miles northeast of Jerusalem; Rimmon, about ten miles north of Beersheba) would become level like a plain (the Arabah is the Jordan Valley) above which Jerusalem would rise conspicuous with Benjamin's gate at the northeast corner, another unnamed corner-gate at the northwest, the tower of Hananel near the northeast corner, and the king's winepresses at the southeast. Best of all would be the universal recognition of Jehovah as the only God and King over all the earth (v. 9). Idolatry abolished; monotheism triumphant.

12-15. The Fate of the Hostile Heathen. This fair vision is followed by two appalling pictures of the fate of Jerusalem's foes. In vv. 13f. they are seized by a panic in which they slay one another, and, the tables now turned (v. 1), Jerusalem seizes the abundant spoil. More terrible is the other picture (vv. 12, 15) in which man and beast, smitten as by some supernaturally swift stroke of leprosy, rot away while they stand on their feet.

16-21. The Universal Worship of Jehovah. So fearful a judgment brings all who are left of the nations to their senses. They confess their allegiance to the King (v. 9), Jehovah of Hosts, by making an annual pilgrimage to Jerusalem to keep the greatest of the Hebrew feasts, the feast of tabernacles or Ingathering (Ex. 23¹⁶) at the end of the agricultural year, in honor of Jehovah who crowns the year with his goodness (Psa. 65¹¹) by blessing the land with rain. Should any nation decline to come, Jehovah would punish it by withholding his rain (vv. 16f.). But as this threat could not terrify Egypt, whose fertility depended not upon rain but upon the Nile, a special punishment would be reserved for her (vv. 18f.). In that blessed day the distinction between the holy and the profane would be done away, for all Judah and everything in it would be holy. The horses, once shunned (cf. Hos. 14³) as symbolic of war (see note on 9⁹), now ridden not by warriors, but by pilgrims, are holy. Holy too are the pots—not the Temple pots alone, but every pot in Jerusalem and Judah, so that any one of them can be used for boiling the sacrificial flesh (cf. Lev. 6²⁸).

The religious temper of this chapter has unattractive and unprophetic traits. The picture of the enemies rotting away as they stand upon their feet is repellent, and an allegiance to Jehovah expressed in terms of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Tabernacles is conceived in the priestly rather than in the prophetic spirit. But the passage is redeemed by its confidence in the ultimate triumph of monotheism and by its vision of a day when Jehovah would be King over all the earth.

MALACHI

BY PROFESSOR J. E. MCFADYEN

INTRODUCTION

Date and Background. Malachi's prophecy may be set somewhere about 460 B.C. (For a full discussion of the date see Eiselen, Prophetic Books of the O.T., vol. ii, pp. 596-602.) The Temple, on whose construction Haggai and Zechariah had set such high hopes, is standing (1¹⁰), but the whole book pathetically shows how deeply those hopes had been disappointed. (See Eiselen, Prophetic Books, vol. ii, p. 605.) The intervening sixty years or so had been years of disillusion and misery, and the situation to which Malachi addresses himself is melancholy beyond words. (For a description of the general historical situation during this period see intro. to Ezra-Nehe-miah, pp. 458-61.) A curse is lying upon the land (3⁹). Translated into concrete terms, the curse may seem to be nothing more than the not unfamiliar experience of drought and locusts (3^{10f.}), but it goes far deeper than that. The blight is on men's hearts and on their faith.

Religious Indifference. As in pre-exilic times, popular religion is now largely a matter of ritual; but whereas in the days of Isaiah (cf. 1¹¹) and Micah (cf. 6^{6f.}), the ritualists were in deadly earnest, willing and eager to render a service of extravagant devotion, in Malachi's time apathy and niggardliness prevailed. Priests and people alike were guilty. The laymen made vows which they did not keep, acting as if anything were good enough for God. They offered blemished and imperfect beasts for sacrifice (1¹⁴). They robbed God, by keeping back the tithes and offerings (3^{8f.}). The priests appear, if possible, in a still more unlovely light. They had traveled pitifully far from the ancient ideals of their order (25-9). They offer blind, lame, and sick animals, which they would be ashamed and afraid to offer to the Persian governor, yet they say (18-13), "Where's the harm." They groan under their professional obligations, and mutter, as they conduct the service (1¹³), "What a bore it is!" thus treating the holy name with a hardly disguised contempt.

Skepticism and Social Corruption. This low religious life had its counterpart, as was inevitable, in an equally low social life. Adultery and perjury and exploitation of the poor were rife (3⁵). Families were torn with dissension (4⁸), among the well-to-do divorce was the order of the day (2¹⁴), and in many cases the motive to it was the desire to marry a younger foreign woman (2¹¹), though she was likely to be a menace to the purer faith of the Hebrews. A spirit of skepticism too was abroad. The word of the prophet was challenged at every turn; notice the frequency of the phrase "But ye say" (cf. 12, 6, etc.). Worse still, the ways of God were challenged. Belief in his love had vanished (12). The world was turned upside down (2¹⁷) and it seemed idle to serve God. There was no "profit" in it (3¹⁴)—a phrase significant of the utilitarian quality of contemporary religion. And the sad thing was that these challenges were uttered, not by blasphemers, but by good and pious men, who, seeing no traces of a moral order, cried in the anguish of their doubt (2¹⁷), "Where is the God of Justice?"

Message of Malachi. Such was the situation which Malachi, or, better, the anonymous author of the prophecy (see comment on 1¹), had to face. He met it, on the one hand, by reminding the people that God's seeming indifference to them was due to their real indifference to him (cf. 3^{9f.}); and, on the other, by assuring them that a day of judgment was coming speedily (3^{1, 5}), in which destiny would correspond to character (3¹⁸⁻⁴³), and that meantime God had not forgotten them—the names of the good were being faithfully recorded in his book (3¹⁶).

Malachi is not one of the giants of prophecy. His interest in ritual, his attitude to Edom (13), and his restriction of the Fatherhood of God to the Jewish people (2¹⁰) stamp him as sharing the conventional opinions of his contemporaries. But in two respects he soars far above them—in his detestations of divorce (2¹⁶), which Deuteronomy (24¹) had permitted, and in his magnificent recognition of all sincere heathen worship as being in reality offered to and accepted by Jehovah, the one God of all the earth (1¹¹). In these great words we breathe the very atmosphere of the N.T. (cf. Eph. 5:28-33 Acts 10:35).

The book has been aptly described as "Prophecy within the Law." On the one hand, it reaffirms the truths taught by the great pre-exilic prophets, such as Jehovah's fatherly and loving care for Israel, his holiness and righteousness, the terrible judgment awaiting the wicked, and the exaltation of the righteous. On the other hand, unlike the earlier prophets, it places great stress on the Law as a disciplinary rule of life, bitterly condemns its lax observance, and closes with the exhortation, "Remember ye the law of Moses, my servant."

In fairness to Malachi the second characteristic must not be allowed to overshadow the first. True, he shared with other religious leaders of the postexilic period a high regard for the forms and institutions of religion, including the Law; but this new emphasis was due, not to lower religious conceptions, but to a different interpretation of the religious need of the hour (see on Haggai). He saw, as many others must have seen, that, after all, prophecy, as represented by the pre-exilic prophets, had failed to produce the transformation for which they had toiled so persistently. Generation after generation they had sought to build up a pure and holy nation, but after the lapse of centuries the people appeared to be as far from the ideal as ever.

Consequently, the question must have arisen in the minds of many whether the prophetic method was the one best adapted to the needs of the time, whether the people could be trusted to apply the principles of prophetic religion to the daily life or whether it would not be wiser to lay down specific rules and urge the people to observe these, and thus avoid the lapses of the past. The last question was answered in the affirmative, and the postexilic legalism was the result. However, in the beginning it was permeated by a spirit of intense moral earnestness; the exaltation of the letter of the Law is a later development. Malachi was a prophet as truly as were Isaiah and Jeremiah; but, unlike them, he emphasized the embodiment of the prophetic spirit and principles in external law.

Literature: Perowne, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (Cambridge Bible); Driver, The Minor Prophets, vol. ii (New Century Bible); Eiselen, The Minor Prophets; G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve, vol. ii (Expositor's Bible); Bennett, The Postexilic Prophets; D. Macfadyen, The Messenger of God; Sanders and Kent, The Messages of the Later Prophets.

CHAPTER I

1. Title. This book (cf. Zech. 9¹ 12¹) is anonymous. The name Malachi, which means my servant (or "my messenger," or, by contraction, servant [messenger] of Jehovah), was apparently borrowed by the editor from 31.

2-5. Jehovah's Love for Israel. Malachi begins well—by emphasizing Jehovah's love for Israel. But the people whom he addresses find it difficult to believe in that love, for they see no evidence of it. They are a disillusioned and disappointed people. The daring promises of Haggai (cf. 26-9, 20f.) and Zechariah (ch. 8) remained, after sixty or seventy years, unfulfilled; and the whole book is darkened by the skepticism of the people. Everything the prophet says is challenged; but ye say. The proof he offers them of the love of God is as unlovely as could be; it is that I hated Esau, i.e., Edom (cf. Gen. 36¹), and the proof of that again is that Edom's mountainous land has been recently desolated—apparently by an Arab invasion from the south. From time immemorial (cf. Gen. 25²³) Israel and Edom had been deadly enemies (cf. Ps. 137⁷), and the desolation of Edom Malachi interpreted as Jehovah's indignation at and hatred of her, and as proof of his love for Israel, who, when they see the desolation, will be convinced that their own God is no petty national God, but is great beyond the border of Israel—is, indeed, the God of all the earth (cf. v. 11).

6-14. The Clergy with the Low Ideals. Israel had answered Jehovah's love with ingratitude—especially the priests (v. 6), who, though responsible for the worship, had acted as if anything were good enough for God. Father (cf. 210) and Master, as Jehovah was, they had shown him neither honor nor fear (i.e., reverence), but contempt, evidenced by the polluted bread, i.e., sacrificial flesh, they offered him, polluted by the spirit of irreverence in which it was offered; for they said—not, indeed, in words, but in their hearts—the table of Jehovah, i.e., the altar, is contemptible. Note how the priests, like the people, challenged every word of the prophet—ye say (vv. 6, 7). There was a law against offering blemished animals (Deut. 17¹), but they had coolly disregarded it by offering animals that were blind, lame, or sick (v. 8), which they would not have dared to offer to the Persian governor of Judah (v. 8). It is no evil, i.e., there is no harm in it, they said. The appeal to the priests—such priests—to entreat the favor of God (v. 9) is ironical rather than a call to repentance. If this is the sort of sacrifice you offer (see mg. from your hand), can you expect him to look upon you with favor? Better close the Temple doors and extinguish the altar fires—which are but kindled in vain—than have the worship conducted by such low-minded, half-hearted ministers (v. 10). "The great God of hosts can accept no offering at the hands of men like these. Sincerity in public worship meant much to Malachi. He virtually says, "Give God the best you have, or bring the worship to an end and get out of his service altogether."

Then follows one of the greatest utterances in the O.T., which stamps Malachi as a prophet indeed (v. 11). He reminds the unworthy priests that among the Gentiles, i.e., the heathen nations whom Israel despised, from east to west Jehovah's name was great—twice over—and that in every place across the world pure offerings, i.e., offerings unstained by irreverence—unlike those presented by his own people at Jerusalem—were offered to his name. This noble word of Malachi virtually recognizes all sincere worship, wheresoever and by whomsoever offered, as in reality offered to Jehovah (cf. Jonah 116), the God therefore not of the Jews only but of all the earth. In sorrowful contrast with this is the worship of the Jews who, despite Jehovah's love for them (12, Amos 32), profane his name (v. 12) by their blemished offerings (v. 13; for that which was taken by violence read the blind; the fruit and meat of v. 12 are just the sacrificial offerings). We cannot wonder at Malachi's stern condemnation of ministers of religion (cf. 23) who said of the worship they were conducting (v. 13), What a bore it is! And the laymen who brought these blemished things to be offered (v. 14) were as guilty as the priests; so a curse upon them too! The peculiar shame of it all was that the God to whom these disgraceful offerings were presented was a great King, whose name, thus dishonored by the Jews, was reverenced (not terrible) among the Gentiles.

CHAPTER II

1-9. The Doom of the Clergy. For their careless and contemptuous conduct of the worship (16-13), for not giving glory to Jehovah's name (v. 2), the word of doom (rather than commandment, v. 1) is now pronounced. Their blessings, i.e., the prestige and privileges of the priesthood, would be turned into curses (v. 2; cf. Deut. 2820). The opening words of doom, (v. 3), Behold, I will hew off your arm (which should be read instead of I will rebuke the seed for your sake), are very vigorous, implying that they would be forcibly deprived of their power and authority; and insult would be added to injury, for they would be bespattered with the dung of their sacrifices, and dragged away to the dung-heap! Then they would realize—when for them it would be too late—on what terms alone the covenant with Levi (v. 8, or "the sons of Levi," 33, i.e., the priests) could stand.

Then follows a beautiful description of the ideal minister (vv. 5-7)—an ideal so grossly violated by the priests (v. 8). Life and all that makes life worth living, peace, i.e., not only quiet of soul but welfare of every kind—these were the things that Jehovah promised and gave in the covenant; to this the true priest responded with fear, i.e., reverence, and humble awe (v. 5). He faithfully expounded the will of God, and he could do this because in peace and uprightness he walked with God, and did not merely talk about him, which is the preacher's temptation. Knowledge and law, i.e., true direction, could be sought from him by the perplexed (v. 7), and by his earnest instruction of them in the will of God he turned many away from iniquity (v. 6), for he was nothing less than Jehovah's messenger (the same word as angel). What a glorious ideal! The true priest is a veritable angel of God.

To this noble ideal, however, the priests of Malachi's time had proved utterly recreant. They had turned aside out of the way of life, peace, and reverence (v. 5), the noble way in which they had walked with God (v. 6); blind leaders of the blind, they had in the law, i.e., by their direction, caused many to stumble, and had corrupted (or ruined) the covenant which it was theirs to maintain (v. 8). But such things cannot be done by religious leaders with impunity. Therefore have I also (v. 9)—God on his part will deal with these men as they deserve by bringing their prestige and popularity to an end. I will (for have) assuredly make (for made) you contemptible and base before all the people. Noblesse oblige, and in the long run even a trustful people will despise the clergy who fall too pitifully below their ideal.

10-16. The Prophet's Challenge of Divorce.

Malachi now turns to the laymen, for with them—with the people as a whole—Jehovah had a covenant (v. 10) as well as with the priests (vv. 4, 8). This covenant was being profaned by the people, who played the traitor against one another, an offense all the more despicable that, as Jehovah was the father of them all (not of all men, but of all Israel—cf. Isa. 12); they were brethren and should have behaved like brethren. But they had profaned the covenant and the holiness of Jehovah by marrying foreign women. Each of these women, as the daughter of a strange god (v. 11, just as the Israelites were sons of Jehovah, v. 10), was a menace to the holiness, the distinctive religious and ethical quality, of the Hebrew faith. These were probably wealthy women of the neighboring peoples, e.g., Philistia, Moab, Ammon; but they would bring their alien religion into the Hebrew home, with the result that the Hebrew faith would be contaminated and Hebrew distinctiveness so obliterated that the children could not even speak proper Hebrew (cf. Neh. 1323f.). The prophet's threats are that such traitors will in the end be deprived of all civil and religious rights (v. 12).

Worse still, these marriages with foreign women had led to the divorce of native Hebrew women. Therein lay the climax of the treachery, that the wife of thy covenant, i.e., pledged to thee in a marriage contract which has been solemnly witnessed before and by Jehovah himself, should be repudiated in favor of an alien (v. 14)—the wife too of thy youth, the faithful companion of many years, discarded, when she is old, for a young and handsome stranger. It was for treachery like this that Jehovah had refused to regard their offerings and had shown his displeasure by sending some disaster, such as drought (cf. 3¹⁰), which had led the people, in the passion of their grief, to cover the altar with their tears (v. 13). This treachery of divorce must therefore be abandoned. Besides, did he, i.e., God, not make man and wife one (cf. Gen. 2²⁴)—one flesh and one life (literally, breath)? “But what else,” they reply, “does God want but seed, i.e., children? It is therefore no crime to divorce an older woman for an younger one.” To which Malachi replies, “Beware, the life of the two is one, and it dies if sundered by divorce.” This appears to be the meaning of the very difficult v. 15; and this great defense of the sanctity of the marriage-bond concludes with the glorious word, which definitely anticipates N.T. teaching and again stamps Malachi as a prophet indeed, I hate divorce (v. 16; the next clause may refer to violence done to the wife—that too is detestable).

17. See under 3¹-5.

CHAPTER III

1-5. The Prophet's Challenge of the Popular Skepticism. This section, which begins with 2¹⁷, goes to the root of the matter. The real reason which explains, on the one hand, the unworthy conduct of priests and people, and, on the other, the misery of the times and the withholding of the divine blessing (cf. v. 10) is that they have all alike lost faith in God. Even good men have grown skeptical, for it should be carefully noted that 2¹⁷ and 3^{14f.} are the words, not of blasphemers or of the indifferent, but of God-fearing men. It looks as if God favored and prospered the wicked, and the good ask in despair, Where is the God of justice? (2¹⁷.) Malachi's answer is that he is coming, suddenly and soon (3¹). His messenger is already on the way, to clear away the obstacles created by the people's sin, and the messenger will be followed by the Lord himself. But when he appears only the purest will be able to stand his searching test; for he will come to cleanse in a purifying judgment, like the fire which separates the base metal from the true (v. 2). And this judgment will fall first upon the sons of Levi (cf. 2⁴), i.e., the priests, as the most highly privileged (cf. 2⁵⁻⁷), the most responsible, and the most guilty. When the judgment has done its purifying work upon them, then their offerings would be accepted as in the days of old (vv. 3, 4). But the people, as we have seen (cf. 1¹⁴ 2¹⁰⁻¹⁶), are no less guilty than the priests; so to them too I will come near in judgment (v. 5). Their crimes are summarized as sorcery, adultery, perjury, exploitation of the poor and defenseless, crimes which have their root and explanation in the lack of religion, for they fear not me (v. 5)—a profound diagnosis. This verse is peculiarly welcome as showing that Malachi, interested in ritual as he was, yet breathes the true spirit of the pre-exilic prophets with their emphasis upon the moral life of society.

6-12. The Prophet's Challenge of the People's Failure to Pay the Sanctuary Dues. V. 6 should probably read For I, Jehovah, change not; but as for you, ye have never ceased to be sons of Jacob, veritable tricksters. They had robbed God (v. 8) from the beginning (v. 7); that was why they were cursed (v. 9) with drought (v. 10). They had robbed him by failing to bring in, as the Law demanded (cf. Deut. 14²²⁻²⁷ Lev. 27³⁰⁻³²), the tithes and offerings into the storehouse or treasury of the Temple. Dishonesty had brought a curse in the form of drought and the devouring locust (v. 11); let them return to Jehovah (v. 7) and show their penitence by paying their dues, and Jehovah would, in return, send his blessed rain in abundance from heaven (v. 10). Their prosperity would be so conspicuous that they would be the envy of all nations (v. 12).

13-18. Comfort for the Disconsolate. Again the old challenge (cf. 2¹⁷ 3⁵) of God's ways with men, uttered as before (2¹⁷) by the pious (3¹⁴) who feared Jehovah (v. 16; the then should be thus, and their speech is in vv. 14, 15), but whose religion had a utilitarian tinge. They looked for profit (v. 14) from their service of God, but their obedience seemed unrewarded, while it was the wicked who were built up in prosperity (v. 15). Malachi comforts them by assuring them that they were not forgotten; a book of remembrance was being written, i.e., a book in which their names were recorded (cf. Esth. 6) and which would keep Jehovah in mind of them (v. 16). In the day of judgment, the day when I act, i.e., interpose (rather than that I do make, cf. 4³), they would not only be spared, but they would be Jehovah's peculiar treasure, specially guarded and specially dear (v. 17); and then they would see the difference that they cannot now discern between the righteous and the wicked.

CHAPTER IV

1-3. The Differing Destinies of Righteous and Wicked. The difference in the destinies of the righteous and the wicked would be infinite—for the wicked, a fire would burn them up, root and branch (v. 1); while upon the righteous the sun would arise in whose light they would be vindicated, and from whose wings, i.e., rays, would stream healing for wounded hearts and minds perplexed (v. 2). In their joy they would frisk like calves, and part of that joy would be to trample the wicked like ashes under the soles of their feet. This ugly vindictive trait reminds us how fierce the temper even of the later time could be, and how far we still are from the Spirit of Jesus (cf. Zech. 14¹²).

4-6. Concluding Appeal and Promise. The book concludes with an appeal to remember the law of Moses (probably Deuteronomy, whose ritual and ethical demands had been violated), and with a promise of the return of Elijah, who had left the world about four hundred years before; a promise which suggests that the age of the prophets is now felt to be over; and when he comes his business will be to restore harmony in the homes which had been ruined (cf. Mic. 7^{5f.}) by divorce (2¹⁰⁻¹⁶); otherwise the land would be smitten with destruction.

IV. ARTICLES
THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE HISTORICAL AND RELIGIOUS BACKGROUNDS OF THE EARLY CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT

THE FORMATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE TRANSMISSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE STRUCTURE OF THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE NEW TESTAMENT AND CRITICISM

THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST

THE TEACHING OF JESUS

THE PARABLES OF JESUS

THE MIRACLES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE LIFE AND WORK OF PAUL

THE NEW TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

THE HISTORICAL AND RELIGIOUS BACKGROUNDS OF THE EARLY CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT

BY CANON GEORGE H. BOX

I. SURVEY OF POST-EXILIC JUDAISM

The Christian movement began its development in Palestine, in a Jewish environment, and therefore can properly be understood only in the light of contemporary Palestinian Judaism. It is true there was a larger Judaism, extended over the Græco-Roman world, which exercised a profound influence over the Judaism of Palestine, and also played a great part in the expansion of Christianity in the apostolic age and later. And here we are brought into closer touch with the manifold foreign influences which streamed in from the pagan world. These factors it will be necessary to consider in the latter part of this article. Our immediate task is to attempt to reconstruct the salient features of this Palestinian environment.

Devotion to the Law. The Judaism which flourished at this time in Palestine was a much more variegated and complex thing than the purely rabbinical Judaism which succeeded it in the reorganization that followed the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. In order to realize this it is only necessary to remember the various sects and parties which were active down to 70 A.D. Then, too, while the Temple existed it constituted a rallying spot and a spiritual center for the whole Jewish world. Pilgrims were constantly streaming to Jerusalem at the great festivals, and in this way the Temple became a focus of the manifold influences which flowed in from the Dispersion (Diaspora). Throughout the world every Jew of mature years contributed to the upkeep of the Temple by the payment of the Temple tax, and in this way was made to feel a personal interest in the maintenance of the cultus. Nevertheless, perhaps the most striking development of Jewish piety that occurred in the period of late Judaism was the displacement of devotion to the cultus, as such, by devotion to the Law. Indications of this meet us in the Psalter. Whereas the earlier Psalms of the post-exilic period, such as Psa. 27, 84, 122, breathe the deepest affection for and joy in the religious activities of the Temple as a source of spiritual satisfaction, a different note is struck in Psa. 1, the second part of 19, and 119. Here every line breathes devotion to the Law. All this is but the expression of a profound conviction that God has chosen to make a supreme revelation of himself and his requirements in the divine Law; and that man is sanctified by the divine Law which is the very principle of his perfection. The Law thus came to occupy in Judaism exactly the same position as the Person of Christ and the Incarnation in the Christian religion. Jewish piety of this type exhausts and expresses itself in the minute and punctilious performance of the divine Law, especially as this was later elaborately codified and defined by the rabbis. The performance of these duties was regarded as exercising a sanctifying influence on the worshiper; he felt that by so doing he was obeying the divine voice; and in this utter obedience he found a real spiritual satisfaction. This devotion to the Law became firmly marked, as an indelible characteristic of orthodox Judaism, from the Maccabean period (see below and art., Literature of the Inter-testamental Period, p. 199b). The persecution then endured made the practice and observance of the Law, for its own sake, a thing specially dear to pious Jews. Fidelity to the Law became the hallmark of Jewish piety; and though the stately ceremonial of the Temple went on in its full splendor for more than two centuries the real center of gravity in Judaism was no longer the Temple and its cultus but fidelity to the Law as such; so that when the ruin of the Temple came in 70 A.D., the reorganization of Judaism, on the basis of the Law, was effected without difficulty. Devotion to the Law, as such, determined the character of later Judaism.

Bousset points out in this connection certain indications of the process described above. These are: (1) The existence of the sect of the Essenes, who deliberately abstained from taking any part in the Temple animal-sacrifices, and yet were regarded by masses of the people as models of piety. (2) The general tendency of the preaching of Jesus. The features in popular piety which he attacked are the sins to which the legalistic type of religion is specially prone, namely, undue emphasis upon the external observance of the Sabbath, the importance attached to the distinction between clean and unclean, the hypocritical assumption of special holiness in prayer, almsgiving and fasting. On the other hand, of exaggerated estimation of the sacrifices of the cultus his invective takes little account. His opponents are the Pharisees and the teachers of the Law, not the Priests; the Law and not the cultus. Jesus, indeed, was possessed by a holy zeal for the Temple of Jehovah and its purity. (3) Another indication to which attention has already been called is to be seen in the ease with which rabbinical Judaism became the predominant factor after the destruction of the Temple in 70 A.D.

The Maccabean Revolt. The decisive dates of the period of Judaism with which we are primarily concerned are from the beginning of the Maccabean revolt to the final destruction of Jewish national independence in 70 A.D., and later in the Bar-Kokba revolt in 132-135 A.D. i.e., from about 166 B.C. to 135 A.D.—a period of about three centuries. During this fruitful epoch Jewish patriotism asserted itself through the Maccabean movement, and, for a time, won national independence. The effects of this development on Judaism as a whole were marked. The range of Jewish influence in Palestine was decisively extended. The community expanded on a large scale, and Judaism itself became intensely proud and self-conscious. These results were by no means destroyed when Judæa, her national independence finally lost, became a Roman province in 6 A.D. The national feeling flared up from time to time, and culminated finally in the disastrous rebellion against Rome, 66-70 A.D., which ended in the destruction of the Temple and the ruin of the Holy City. The party of peace, which had never approved of the rebellion, now for a time triumphed, and under Jochanan ben Zakkai, Judaism was reorganized at Jamnia. But the nationalist elements were by no means finally overcome, and rebellions broke out again, first in 117 A.D., and finally in the great revolt of 132-135, under Bar-Kokba, in which the most famous rabbi of the time, Akiba, took a prominent part, and, with other rabbis, suffered martyrdom. After the suppression of the final rebellion, Judaism devoted its energies, without distraction, to the task of consolidating its life as a community primarily on a religious basis. The teachers of the Law were now supreme as leaders, and the Jews became "the People of the Book." This is the era of rabbinical Judaism or Talmudism.

Rise of Parties. During the three centuries already referred to, the great parties and sects of Judaism were developed into the form in which we meet with them in the N.T. period. By far the most important of these developments was the growth of the Pharisaic party, which first emerges distinctly in the reign of the Maccabean prince John Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.), and of which it will be necessary to speak, in greater detail, later (see below).

An older party, which continued to play a prominent part as the opponents of the popular and nationalist Pharisees, was that of the Sadducees. This party was mainly recruited from the priests, and represented priestly tradition and privilege, as these had grown up in conjunction with the Temple and its cultus. Though the Sadducees embraced within their ranks the high-priestly families and their adherents (i.e., the priestly aristocracy), and though these often included a worldly element, Sadduceism was by no means deficient in piety. It often represented the conservative type of Judaism at its best.

Apocalyptic Literature. This period also saw the remarkable development of the Apocalyptic literature, which is largely embodied in extra-canonical forms, such as the Book of Enoch. The oldest elements in the Enochic literature date from a time possibly slightly anterior to the book of Daniel (165 B.C.), and this literature culminates in the twin apocalypses of the Syriac Baruch and 4 Ezra (=2 Esdras, chs. 3-14), which may be dated in their final form about 120 A.D.

The importance of this literature lies, to a large extent, in the fact that it emanated from lay circles, outside the rabbinical schools. The Apocalyptists were not an organized party like the Pharisees, yet seem to represent a distinct tendency within Judaism. It is possible that circles of this kind may have flourished in Galilee. (Cf. p. 188.)

II. THE GREAT PARTIES OF JUDAISM

It will now be necessary to speak in greater detail of the parties and institutions of Judaism.

Pharisees and Sadducees. The Pharisees, as we have seen, emerge into prominence toward the end of the second century B.C. The movement was essentially a lay movement in its inception, and largely so remained. It is true that priests occasionally are found within its ranks, but this fact did not seriously modify its fundamentally lay character. The Pharisees, in fact, seem to have been originally a body of pious laymen who carried on the work of teaching the Scriptures to the people, which originally had been carried out by the priestly scribes, or soferim. The last great representative of this class seems to have been Simon the Just (died about 270 B.C.). The supply of priestly teachers had apparently broken down, and their places were taken by laymen, who afterward became the Pharisees.

As the present writer has said elsewhere: "The age-long conflict between the Sadducees and the Pharisees was the most important factor in the development of Judaism. The Pharisees were the champions of the oral Law which at first was quite independent of the written Tôrâh, and was deeply entrenched in old popular custom and usage. On the other hand, the Sadducees mainly represented the old conservative positions of the priesthood, and inherited the tradition of the older scribism. The 'scribe,' as he is depicted in Sirach (c. 190 B.C.), is a judge and man of affairs, a cultivated student of 'wisdom,' well acquainted, of course, with the contents of the written Law, and a frequenter of the courts of kings. He belongs to the leisured, aristocratic class and is poles asunder from the typical Pharisee and teacher of the Law, who was drawn from the ranks of the people. It was in the reaction against Hellenism that Tôrâh-study [study of the Law] was born. The public reading and exposition of it in the synagogue probably dates only from the Maccabean period. Both parties were compelled now to devote themselves to Tôrâh-study, in the new and exacting way demanded by the times, the Sadducees because, on their view, the Law was the only valid standard for fixing juristic and religious practice, and the Pharisees, because it was necessary for them to adjust their oral tradition, as far as possible, to the written word. The first result of Pharisaic activity in this direction was the development of a remarkably rich and subtle exegesis. A further result was the evolution of new laws by exegetical methods" (Hastings' Encyc. of Religion and Ethics, vol. ix, p. 833, art., "Pharisees").

The Pharisees exercised an enormous influence with the people, which was due to the fact that they spent their energies without stint in the work of instructing the people in the Tôrâh, and in bringing religion to bear upon the popular life. In marked contrast with those of the Sadducees, their judgments on questions of Law were, as is well known, of a mild and compassionate character. Their positive achievement in the domain of religious observance and institutions was enormous. They built up the synagogue service; they brought religion into the homes of the people; in particular, they invested the home with the sanctions of religion—the home service on Passover night, for example, became a solemn festival of joy, in which the head of the household acted as priest. Their religious ideals were essentially democratic in character. They championed popular religious customs against the rigid conservatism of the Sadducean priesthood. A good instance of this is the solemn procession in which water was transferred from the pool of Siloam and poured out at the base of the altar in the Temple on the feast of Tabernacles (cf. Jesus' words, Jn. 7:37f.). This custom was opposed by the Sadducees on the ground that it had no sanction in the Law, but they were unable to resist the popular will. Then, again, the Pharisees boldly transferred the atoning power connected with the Day of Atonement from the high priest and the sacerdotal ceremonies in which he functioned to the day itself. Outside the Temple the influence of the Pharisees was supreme, and even within the Temple itself, which, of course, was under the control of the Sadducean priesthood, the influence of the Pharisees made itself felt in decisive fashion. This influence grew as time went on until, during the last ten or twenty years of the Temple's existence, the direction of its ceremonial was practically under the control of the Pharisees. In the Mishnah tractate, Yoma, which deals with the ceremonies of the Day of Atonement in the Temple, from the Pharisaic point of view, we are told that seven days before the Day of Atonement the high priest, who was, of course, a Sadducee, went into retreat surrounded by a sort of Pharisaic commission of teachers of the Law, who took care to see that this sacerdotal head should carry out the ceremonial of the day itself in accordance with Pharisaic ideas. The high priest was made to rehearse the various acts connected with the day, and was fully instructed in the meaning and rationale of the ceremonial as understood by Pharisees.

Pharisaic Schools. It is well known that in the time of our Lord the Pharisaic party was divided into two opposed schools—the school of Hillel and the school of Shammai. The former represented the more moderate elements while the latter was more aggressive. The Pharisees at this time were sharply divided into various sections which were not exhausted by the rival schools of Hillel and Shammai. It is probable that the school of Shammai at this period was in the ascendant, though later the milder school of the Hillelites secured the supremacy (after the destruction of Jerusalem). There appears to have been a section of the school of Shammai, consisting of extremists, who were bitter and exclusive and were open to the charge of formalism and hypocrisy. It is probable that our Lord's invective in the Gospels was primarily directed against this section. It is notorious that the Shammaites were rigorous to excess in their requirements, and were the champions of a narrow and exclusive form of legal piety. Their attitude to the outside world was also harsh and unsympathetic. The fanatical section of the Pharisees—the Zealots—were closely allied with them. It may plausibly be inferred, to take an example, that in the time of Christ the matter of ritual hand-washing before meals was a party issue, championed by the fanatical Shammaites, and that Jesus strongly opposed the Shammaite view (cf. Mk. 7). That the neglect by Jesus' disciples of the practice of ritual hand-washing was not a departure from general lay usage may be inferred from the Gospel account itself. No protest was raised against it, apparently, until a deputation of scribes from Jerusalem arrived on the scene; and what they objected to was that a teacher—a rabbi—should permit his disciples to neglect the rite. As has already been pointed out, the influence of the Shammaites, up to the catastrophe of 70 A.D., seems to have been in the ascendant; but later the peace-loving and milder party of Hillel triumphed, and the oral Law was revised to accord with Hillelite views.

It is impossible, owing to restrictions of space, to do more than refer to the Essenes. Though they are not referred to in the Bible, nor for certain in the rabbinical literature, they are mentioned quite explicitly by Josephus and Philo. From these sources they appear to have been formed of small communities leading a religious and communistic life on the shores of the Dead Sea. They were organized in several grades and formed a closely knit brotherhood. They attached great importance to purity of life, practiced daily lustration and rejected animal sacrifices. We may, to use Moffatt's words, see in this "little Jewish order of over four thousand souls a league of virtue, with their agricultural settlements, their quaint semi-ascetic practices, their strict novitiate, their silent meals, their white robes, their baths, their prayers, their simple but stringent socialism, their sacerdotal puritanism, their soothing, their passion for the mystical world of angels, their indifference to Messianic and nationalistic hopes, their esoteric beliefs, and their approximation to sacramental religion" (Hastings' Encyc. of Religion and Ethics, vol. v, p. 400, art., "Essenes"). In spite of assertions to the contrary there is little reason to believe that Esseneism influenced early Christianity in any appreciable degree.

III. PALESTINIAN LANGUAGES

Before we come to importance of the apocalyptic literature and the apocalyptists, a word must be said on the question of the language or languages with which our Lord was familiar.

It must be borne in mind that he spent his early life in Galilee, and that there were marked differences, in external conditions and in the general character of the population, between Galilee and Judæa.

Judæa was the central stronghold of everything Jewish, in the strict sense of the word. Galilee, on the other hand, as its original name "Galilee of the Gentiles" suggests, was more mixed in character. In the time of Jesus it was densely populated, and was full of bustling life. "There were settlers from the neighboring cities of Phœnicia, Greek colonists, Roman officers and soldiers; there were wanderers, too, from the wild deserts of the East, or travelers from Syria and Arabia, passing to and fro. Everywhere there was life, there was stir, there was energy; and Jesus, moving among these mingled elements, found a readier hearing for his word" (Carpenter, Life in Palestine When Jesus Lived, p. 19). The population was mixed, but at this time was predominantly Jewish. According to the Talmud, the Galilæans were quarrelsome, but they are said to have possessed certain good qualities. Widows were well treated. There were certain differences in marriage and funeral customs; the Galilæans are said to have been strict in their religious observances. They were not particularly fond of the dialectical methods which were so assiduously cultivated in Judæa.

On the other hand, they were adepts in the whole field of Haggadah, which included everything non-legalistic, such as tales, parables, sermons, etc. (For the meaning of the Talmudic terms Haggadah and Halakhah, see p. 456.) Indeed, according to the Jewish scholar Geiger, the origin of the Haggadah must be ascribed to the Galilæans. It is interesting to note that the Galilæan pronunciation, especially of the gutturals, is ridiculed in the Talmud, as it is noticed in the Gospels (cf. Mt. 2673), and by rabbinical enactment no Galilæan could act as reader of public prayers. In Galilee it is not surprising to find that the population was bi-lingual. The mother tongue of the Jewish population was the Galilæan Aramaic, but Greek was also known as a second language. We are told that it was customary for Galilæans to have two names, one Aramaic, and one Greek (cf. Peter's names Cephas, 1 Cor. 322, and Petros, both meaning "rock"). Sometimes, apparently, as in the case of Bethsaida, the Galilæan town had two quarters, one in which Greek was regularly spoken, and the other, where the poorer population lived, in which Aramaic predominated. Both languages were understood more or less by everyone.

But the position of Greek as a second language was not peculiar to Galilee; it was also spoken and understood generally in Judæa, in the time of Jesus. It has already been pointed out that Jerusalem was the metropolis not merely of Judæa but of Jewry, scattered throughout the world. Pilgrims were constantly visiting the Holy City, especially at the great feasts, and this meant a large influx of Greek-speaking Jews. Further, the presence of Roman officials and soldiers in the land must be reckoned with. All these factors contributed to make the population bi-lingual.

An eloquent witness to the fact is the extent to which Greek words have penetrated the dialect of rabbinical Hebrew. Some eleven hundred Greek loan words have been enumerated in the Talmudical literature. It may be inferred that the educated classes among the Jews of Judæa would be able not merely to speak but to write Greek. The fourth Gospel, as recent discussion has made increasingly probable, may be regarded as a work of a Jew whose mother tongue was Aramaic and who wrote Greek as a second language. The Greek is profoundly affected by Semitic constructions and locutions, and this would apply even more to the spoken language.

That Jesus was able to converse in Greek is thus highly probable. The conversation reported in Jn. 19^{11f}. between Jesus and Pilate must have been in Greek (cf. p. 928b).

It is not, of course, suggested that Jesus did not habitually employ his native Aramaic in speech, both public and private. Greek was a second language only, to be used on occasion when necessity arose. But it is necessary to emphasize the fact again that the Greek so used had been profoundly modified by the Aramaic mother tongue. In consequence the gulf between the two languages was not nearly so great as might, on a priori grounds, at first be supposed. This fact has an important bearing on the gospel tradition in which the words and discourses of Jesus have been preserved. The Greek medium in which this is embodied is not so entirely alien as to be an uncongenial means of expression for the Aramaic material. The Greek of the N.T. varies in this respect in different parts. The Greek of the second Gospel is strongly tinged with Aramaisms, and C. F. Burney has shown (in The Poetry of Our Lord) that the discourse material in the first and third Gospels readily retranslates into Aramaic. (For further discussion of this whole subject, see art., Language of N.T., p. 880.)

IV. JEWISH APOCALYPSES AND THEIR MAIN CONCEPTIONS

By the end of the first Christian century, the idea represented by the apocalyptic literature of Judaism had come to its most complete expression. This literature (produced approximately between the years 165 B.C. and 120 A.D.) has come down to us mainly in translations which owe their survival to the fact that they circulated among Christian communities where the apocalyptic books for a time enjoyed great popularity; but, with the important exception of the book of Daniel, the Hebrew or Aramaic originals have been lost. The latter book owes its good fortune to the fact that it was ultimately—only, it would seem, with some reluctance—included in the canon of the Hebrew Scriptures. The loss of the Semitic originals is highly significant.

Daniel and the Apocalypses. All this literature is important, not only from the historical point of view as enabling us to trace the evolution of certain doctrines and views, but also as possessing a certain validity even for an age later than that for which some of these books were primarily written. The book of Daniel, for instance, though originally it was evoked by a particular historical crisis—the persecution of the Jewish religion by Antiochus Epiphanes in 168 B.C. and the following years—yet continued to be studied and to exercise a marked influence long after the time when the original crisis had passed away. In fact, it served to shape a tradition which persisted, and was adjusted from time to time to meet new situations. The same is true, in greater or less degree, of the other apocalypses that have survived, such as the Books of Enoch, Assumption of Moses, Apocalypse of Abraham and Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; they continued to be cherished in certain circles, as is shown by the fact that they have come down to us in translations which were in circulation for a long time after the original publication of the books. (For a detailed consideration of the history and character of these books, see art., Literature of Intertestamental Period, pp. 191–9.)

Supernatural Coloring. The writers of the apocalypses regarded the written Law and its oral interpretation in much the same way as the rabbis. Nevertheless, there is a certain difference between the rabbinic and the apocalyptic types of thought. They are preoccupied with different things. To the rabbis “the Law was the center round which Jewish life and thought revolved.” To spread abroad the knowledge of the Law, to extend the range of its practical application to the routine of everyday life—in a word, to reduce the Law to practice, on the largest scale, as a rule of life for priests and people of the community of Israel, was the primary object of the rabbinical teachers. True, they hoped for a better future; but they did not dwell unduly upon it. The best preparation for it, and the best means for bringing it about, would be to enlarge the area of the Law's loyal adherents. The rabbinic ideal is aptly expressed in the opening paragraph of the Mishnah tractate, The Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, in the dicum ascribed to "the men of the Great Synagogue." They said three things: "Be deliberate in judgment"; and "Raise up many disciples"; and "Make a fence to the Tōrah" (Law), i.e., "Impose additional restrictions so as to keep at a safe distance from forbidden ground" (Taylor).

On the other hand, when we turn to the typical apocalyptic books we at once feel ourselves in a different atmosphere. Perhaps the most striking characteristic of these books is their supernatural coloring. The two poles of apocalyptic thought are not so much present and future, on the plane of earthly development, as above and below. Earth is but a shadow of heaven, the issues are really determined in the realm above. The future age is conceived as a sudden irruption of celestial forces from the other world. It is for this blinding but glorious catastrophe that the Apocalypticist longs and yearns with painful eagerness. The otherworldly spirit thus reaches, in these books, its most sublimated expression. This supernatural coloring is also reflected in the form of the apocalyptic books. They are full of strange and cryptic symbolism (e.g., the animal symbolism of Daniel and parts of Enoch); they employ the vision and the dream as regular vehicles for revelation; there is also a rich angelology and demonology. Doubtless the employment of cryptograms and mystic signs (such as the number 666, and the "beast" in the Revelation or Apocalypse of John, and the "little horn" in Daniel, as symbols for Nero and Antiochus respectively) was dictated partly by reasons of prudence. Nevertheless, the particular symbols chosen reflect the mysterious character so much loved by these writers. But the mystery is not mere literary mystification. The Apocalypticists were conscious that divine secrets must contain in them something incomprehensible by merely finite intelligence. This feeling often comes to expression.

A Philosophy of History. In contrast with the rabbis, the Apocalypticists, who were eager students of Scripture, devoted themselves to the study of the Prophets rather than the Law. In a sense they may be regarded as the successors of the prophets. It is noticeable that in the later developments of O.T. prophecy the apocalyptic element becomes more and more marked. In the book of Daniel, which is almost purely apocalyptic in character, this tendency reaches a climax in the O.T. The Apocalypticists, who were deeply religious men, were profoundly concerned with the problems incident to the divine government of the world. They ardently desired to vindicate God's providential ordering of events, and so they evolved a sort of philosophy of history. They were striving to frame a theory of the world which should account for all the facts of experience. Their scheme was conceived on the grandest scale. It embraced not only the earth but the celestial sphere. History is surveyed from the beginning to the end—for the Apocalypticists envisaged as an imminent fact the end of the present age. Thus, to take an instance, the Ezra-Apocalypse begins its survey with creation (4 Ezra 34^{f.}), not, as the prophets do, with the exodus from Egypt, which marked the birthday of Israel as a nation (cf. Jer. 22 Hos. 11¹). The whole course of events is pictured dramatically; the actors include not only men but the angelic and dæmonic powers, all working under the control of God; and the drama moves onward to the inevitable dénouement. Thus the apocalyptic literature may be regarded as the assertion of a profound belief that the course of human affairs is not purposeless; what happens is not the mere result of the action and reaction of blind and uncontrolled forces. The sequence of events has a meaning. History is marching onward to a predestined goal. It is subservient to the will of a higher and moral power; and to this power the evil forces of the world—which are dread realities to the Apocalypticists—however victorious they may seem to be for a time, are in the end subordinated.

Divine Transcendence. A word must be said about some of the more important theological conceptions that emerge in this literature. (See also art., Religious Development of the Intertestamental Period, pp. 200-13.) The transcendental view of God that characterizes it has often been remarked and is obvious. God is pictured as supreme over the world. He dwells at an inaccessible height, and is surrounded with an impassable barrier of fiery glory. One need only read such passages as Dan. 79^{f.} which describes "the Ancient of Days" seated upon a throne in heaven—a throne of "fiery flames, and the wheels thereof burning fire"—and ministered to by myriads of attendant spirits, to realize this aspect of the conception. Such descriptions as "the Most High," "the Exalted One" are common paraphrases for "God" (cf. 4 Ezra 733, 52, 62, Baruch 410, 14, 22 Dan. 431^{f.}), and we may compare with these the terms common in the rabbinic literature, "The Holy One, blessed be he," "The Omnipresent," and similar expressions. One effect of this conception was to stimulate the development of a rich angelology and demonology. As Professor Porter remarks: "One-sided stress on the transcendence of God, above and apart from the world, always involves the substitution for his presence in the world of some sort of intermediary agency." This again is a characteristic of popular Judaism, as it had developed in the apostolic age, and can be traced not only in apocalyptic, but also in the Targums and other late Jewish literature. The way had been prepared by the quasi-personification of Wisdom (cf. Prov. 8), and the tendency is illustrated in later literature in the way in which such agencies as the Memra ("Word"), the Holy Spirit, the Shekinah, and the figure of Metatron are spoken of. In the apocalyptic literature the rôle of Metatron is assumed by Enoch "the heavenly Scribe," while in the figure of the heavenly Son of man of the Similitudes of 1 Enoch 37-71, the idea of a supernatural being, second only to God himself, who shares God's throne (62³, 5), possesses universal dominion (62⁶), and to whom all judgment is committed (41⁹ 69²⁷), the conception attains its highest expression. To the whole idea of any intermediate agency between God and man later rabbinical Judaism was intensely hostile, and the rabbinical teachers strove as far as possible to eliminate it from the popular consciousness.

It is sometimes assumed that the ideas thus current about the divine transcendence must necessarily have tended to remove God entirely from all contact with his world and to make him inaccessible remote to the pious worshiper. Doubtless the danger was present; but that it could be—and was—overcome is shown by such a passage as 4 Ezra 82^{of}. where the seer, in a prayer addressed to God, after heaping up expressions emphasizing the divine majesty and transcendence—"whose throne is beyond imagination, whose glory inconceivable," etc.—makes a direct appeal to the divine compassion:

*Hear the voice of thy servant,
Give ear to thy creature's petition, and attend to my words (v. 24).*

The danger of "a one-sided stress on the transcendence of God" was present, but the religious instinct was strong and vital enough to overcome it, without sacrificing the truth underlying the transcendental idea.

Resurrection of the Dead. Transcendental conceptions also exercised a profound influence in other directions. The older Messianic hope was sublimated. The golden age promised by the older prophets was lifted up from the place of the present earth into the heavenly sphere. "The contrast between the present and the coming age became a contrast of two worlds." This comes to most complete expression in 4 Ezra 7. "The most High hath made not one age but two."

Perhaps the most distinctive advance in doctrine made in the apocalyptic literature is seen in the emergence of the belief—which became a dogma in later Judaism—in the resurrection of the dead. This is the most important contribution made by apocalyptic to doctrinal belief. It first comes to clear expression in the apocalyptic section of Isaiah (chs. 24-27), which almost certainly is older than the book of Daniel. Here the belief is expressed that death will be abolished in the Messianic Age, and that the righteous dead will be raised to share in the coming glory of the nation.

In Daniel the belief assumes a fixed form (cf. 12², 3, 13). The author has in view more particularly those who have suffered martyrdom for the faith in the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes (168 B.C., and following years). The older view which knows nothing of the resurrection still appears in the older apocalyptic literature. Thus in 1 Enoch 57-9 what seems to be contemplated is not a resurrection to life, but a life on earth unusually prolonged. It is worth noting that the association of martyrdom with the resurrection persisted, and reappears in the N.T. apocalypse (Rev. 20^{4f.}; cf. 2 Maccabees.). For some time belief fluctuated as to whether the resurrection should be confined to the righteous only, or should embrace righteous and sinners alike. According to Josephus (Antiquities, bk. xviii, ch. 1, parag. 3), the former view was that of the Pharisees, as it certainly was of the author of 2 Maccabees (626 79, 14, 36 1244 1446). It is also represented in the Gospels (cf. Lk. 14¹⁴ and 20³⁶). Both theories are contained in the Johannine Apocalypse, where the martyrs are raised first, at the beginning of the millennium, to reign with Christ "a thousand years"; then at the final consummation, after the thousand years have ended, all the dead are raised to be judged (Rev. 20^{4f.}, 11f.).

It was inevitable that the question should arise: What is the nature of the resurrection body? (Cf. 1 Cor. 15). As a matter of fact a long passage is devoted to this subject in Baruch. Here it is said that the dead will first of all be raised in their old bodily form, in such a way as to be recognizable: afterward they will be transformed, the aspect of the wicked changing for the worse, while the glory of the righteous becomes ever more splendid.

A Transcendental Messiah. Another important development in apocalyptic thinking is the conception of the transcendental Messiah. This idea was apparently confined to a limited circle, and seems at no time to have penetrated the popular Messianic belief. It seems to have grown out of Dan. 7¹³ ("one like unto a son of man"). The kinship between this mysterious figure and the heavenly "Son of man" of the Similitudes of 1 Enoch is fairly clear, and probably also extends to the "man" of 4 Ezra 13. The author of Daniel used the term "one like unto a son of man" in contrast with the beasts who represent the world-empires, as a symbol for the people of Israel. But it does not follow that the figure "like a man" (or "son of man") may not have an individual significance. On the contrary, it seems probable that the term is a descriptive one for an angelic being—presumably Michael in the thought of the writer of Daniel—who acts as Israel's representative and counterpart. The figure is thus both a symbol and a person. The author of Daniel may have been influenced, in using the term "son of man," by the figure of the Cosmic Man, who in apocalyptic tradition was gradually invested with Messianic attributes. Originally in apocalyptic tradition this "man" or "son of man" was conceived as a heavenly being or angel, and was invested with attributes proper only to Jehovah himself.

The idea of the heavenly being who thus comes to view as a feature in old apocalyptic tradition is the source of the conception of the heavenly Messiah—the Son of Man—of the Similitudes of the Book of Enoch (1 Enoch 37-71). We have already seen that the heavenly being "like unto a son of man" of Dan. 7 was probably identified by the author of Daniel with Israel's angel-prince Michael; this angelic being was later, it would seem, invested with Messianic attributes, and so became the pre-existent heavenly Messiah of the Book of Enoch, who is to judge both men and angels.

His standing designation in the Similitudes is "this (or that) Son of Man," seldom "the Son of Man." In other passages in the same section of the book he is called "the Righteous One" (38² 53⁶); "the Elect One" (39⁶ 40⁵); "the Elect One of righteousness and of faith" (39⁶), and God's "Anointed" (i.e., Christ) (48¹⁰ 52⁴). Unlike the earthly Messiah of the national hope, who is born on earth of the seed of David, the angelic Son of Man of the Similitudes has his home in heaven "under the wings of the Lord of the Spirits" (39⁷). He is pre-existent in heaven (46¹⁴); his name was named "before the sun and the signs were created, and before the stars of the heaven were made" (48³); he was "chosen and hidden" before the Lord of the Spirits, "before the creation of the world" (48⁶). A real pre-existence of the heavenly Messiah is here taught. It is to be noticed that the heavenly Messiah, according to the original conception, is not "born" upon the earth at all. When he appears upon earth he is suddenly "revealed." The Son of man comes like a lightning flash "in his day" (Lk. 17²⁴, cf. Baruch 53⁸⁻¹¹). This is one of the fundamental differences between the representation of the heavenly Son of man and the national Messiah. The latter is born of human parentage at Bethlehem, and though he might be concealed for a time, and then suddenly be "revealed," so that it could be said "when the Christ cometh no one knoweth whence he is" (Jn. 7²⁷), this representation in no wise impugns his human birth. But how difficult it was to conceive of a being, who pre-existed in heaven, as being born at all, is shown by such a passage as Jn. 6⁴¹, where the Jews are represented as saying: "Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? How doth he now say, I am come down out of heaven?"

The Eschatological Scheme. A word must be added about the eschatological scheme of the later Apocalypses. These combined together the old national eschatology which envisaged a temporary period of felicity upon this earth, with the idea of the eternal heavenly bliss. Hence arose a curious compromise. The belief grew up that the present age would terminate with a temporary Messianic kingdom, the duration of which was variously estimated. In the Apocalypse of Ezra it is fixed at four hundred, and in the Johannine Apocalypse at one thousand years (the millennium). The currently received eschatology, as is well known, pictured the Messianic Age as being preceded by a time of "travail" called the "birth pangs" or sufferings of the Messiah (cf. Mt. 24⁸ Mk. 13⁸), the idea being a deduction from certain passages in the prophets (cf. Hos. 13^{12f}. Joel 2^{10f}. Micah 5¹⁻⁶). Finally a word must be said about the anti-Christ idea. The conception arose of the battle of God (or his representative) with the devil at the end of the world. "It is very likely," says Bousset, "that anti-Christ is originally nothing else than the incarnate devil, and that the idea of a battle of God with a human opponent, in whom all devilish wickedness would become incarnate, arose under the influence of definite historical conditions."

Apocalyptic Ideas in Jesus and Paul. How far was the transcendental conception of the Messiah prevalent among Jews in the time of Jesus? It was undoubtedly known to and influenced the mind of our Lord himself, as is shown by his appropriation of the title "Son of man." But he profoundly modified its import by combining with the idea of the glorious heavenly Son of man that of the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53—a combination which fused the ideas of humiliation and glory, and which could not have been invented by any disciple. In the idea so modified Jesus seems to have found the most adequate expression of his Messianic consciousness.

There is some reason to believe that the idea of the heavenly Messiah grew up outside Judæa—probably in apocalyptic circles in Galilee. In Judæa, where Pharisaism had its stronghold, the orthodox rabbinic conception of the national Messiah, who was to spring from the family of David, prevailed. The Son of man was certainly not a popular or well-understood name for the Messiah. It is significant that in Jn. 7:25-36 “the multitude” (in the neighborhood of Jerusalem) are represented as asking, “Who is this Son of man?”

Apocalyptic ideas also influenced Paul. This can be most clearly seen in 4 Ezra (2 Esdras). “It is nothing less than astonishing,” says Schweitzer, “that the close affinities [of St. Paul’s writings] with the Apocalypse of Ezra do not receive any recognition. In this work there are elaborate discussions of the problem of sin, the Fall of our first parents, Election, the wrath, long-suffering, and mercy of God, the prerogative of Israel, the significance of the Law, the temporal and eternal Jerusalem, of the prospect of dying or surviving to the Parousia, the tribulation of the times of the End and the Judgment” (Paul and His Interpreters, p. 51). It should, of course, be added that Paul’s discussion of these ideas is carried on under the influence of his knowledge of the crucified and risen Christ, a fact which lifts Paul out of the class of mere Apocalyptists.

V. THE JEWISH DISPERSION (DIASPORA)

“The first and most remarkable phenomenon,” says Reinach, “presented by Judaism during the Græco-Roman period is its dispersion along the shores of the Mediterranean” (Jewish Encyc., art., “Diaspora,” vol. iv, p. 560). By the time of the rise of Christianity by far the greater part of the Jewish people lived outside the boundaries of Palestine. Exact numbers can hardly be determined; but the number of Jews dispersed must have been at least four times as great as those living in Palestine. They were mainly concentrated in the cities of the Græco-Roman world; agriculture was no longer, as in Judæa, their almost exclusive occupation.

Propagandist Zeal of the Jews. Theoretically the intercourse of the Jews with the pagan world was confined to commercial relations.

The Jews lived in their own quarters, separate from the rest of the population. The pious Jew could neither dine at the table of a pagan nor receive him at his own table. Attendance at the theaters, the circuses, and the gymnasia was forbidden. These rules were not always, however, by any means rigidly adhered to. The Jews were profoundly affected by their environment in many ways. The influence of Greek culture told heavily upon them—as the Judæo-Alexandrine literature eloquently attests. They used Greek even in their religious services; they read the Bible in Greek, and they adopted Greek names, and to some extent Greek organization in their communal institutions. Above all they were animated by an intense missionary zeal to win over the pagan population to the higher monotheistic religion of which they were the chosen representatives. The Jews of the Diaspora were possessed with the conviction that they were destined to realize the prophetic word, “I have set thee for a light of the nations” (Isa. 49:6).

This propagandist zeal was probably no new thing in the Diaspora. Its beginnings go back to the beginnings of the Diaspora itself. In fact, the Greek translation of the Bible—the LXX—doubtless owes its existence to zeal in converting the heathen world. So Philo (Vita Moysi, ii, 136) expressly says: “Some held it unfitting that the Laws were known only to a part of the human race, and that a non-Hellenic part, the Greeks knowing nothing about it; therefore they bestirred themselves about a translation of it.”

An eloquent witness, too, to the energy and success of this propaganda is to be seen also in the fierce opposition it provoked from heathen writers. Cf. Apollonius Molon of Rhodes, 90 B.C.; Posidonius of Apamea, 70 B.C.; the Alexandrine Charemon, 50 B.C.; Lysimachus, 30 B.C.; Apion, the contemporary of Josephus.

Thus we see the Diaspora Jew fired with unquenchable zeal to convert the heathen world to his own pure, ethically severe, and monotheistic faith. All the Græco-Roman world was his field of operations: and over this world a number of forces were at work to make the missionary’s message at once timely and welcome. “It must be admitted,” says Reinach, “that Judaism lacked certain of those attractive features which drew the multitude to the cult of Mithras and of the Egyptian deities. Its physical exactions repulsed those wanting in stout courage; its cult, devoid of imagery and sensuous rites, presented only an austere poesy separating its adepts from the world and cutting them off, to some extent, from communion with the cultured. But the practical and legal character of its doctrine, furnishing a rule of life for every occasion, could not but appeal to a disorganized society. The purity and simplicity of its theology captivated the high minded, while the mystery and quaintness of its customs, the welcome Sabbath rest, the privileges enjoyed at the hand of public authorities, recommended the Jewish faith to those more materialistically inclined" (op. cit.).

The Græco-Roman world was ripe for welcoming a monotheistic faith which could combine with a pure doctrine of God high ethical fervor. The old pagan religion had largely lost its vitality; and the higher souls had taken refuge in philosophy. The causes which produced the success of the Jewish propaganda were thus fundamentally moral.

Success of the Propaganda. That this propaganda was highly successful there cannot be a shadow of doubt. No doubt the statements of Josephus, Philo, and even Seneca, "who represent the whole world as rushing toward Jewish observances, are, in some degree, exaggerated." "At the same time it is indisputable that proselytes were found in large numbers in every country of the Diaspora. The pagan authors, struck by this phenomenon, carefully distinguish the Jews by race from the Jews by adoption." We are told by Josephus (Wars, bk. vii, ch. 3, parag. 3) that in his time a large portion of the Greek population in Antioch was Judaized. Later, as we know, they became Christians (see Acts 11¹⁹⁻²⁶). According to the same authority also "almost all the women" in Damascus observed the Jewish customs. Paul met with proselytes in Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13⁴³), in Thyatira (16¹⁴), Thessalonica (17^{1, 11}) and Athens (17³⁴). In Asia Minor numerous indications suggest that Jewish proselytes were to be met with in large numbers. In Rome, the success of the propaganda is attested by Horace, Persius, and Juvenal. We cannot account for the enormous growth of the Jewish population in Egypt, Cyprus, and Cyrene without assuming a large adhesion of Gentile proselytes. It is noteworthy that Aquila, whose Greek translation of the Bible (second century A.D.) superseded in the synagogues that of the LXX, and Bar Giora, chief of the insurgents in the siege of Jerusalem, were proselytes, or sons of proselytes.

The question of the admission of proselytes had stirred Judaism to its depths. It threatened, in fact, to separate Hellenistic from Palestinian Judaism. The former was willing to admit Gentiles after they had undergone the rite of baptism, and without circumcision. The story of the conversion of the royal family of Adiabene, narrated by Josephus (Antiquities, bk. xx, ch. 2), illustrates the controversy. According to the story a Jewish merchant, Ananias, converts the royal household and assures the Prince Izates that circumcision is not essential. Then the Galilean zealot Eliezer intervenes, and insists on the necessity of circumcision. The former denied to the uncircumcised proselyte the status of a full member of the Jewish community; but non-Palestinian Judaism did not make such a distinction till the Roman Wars, when the more rigorous view became prevalent everywhere.

A Preparation for Christianity. As we have seen, the Judaism of the Diaspora down to the second Christian century was possessed with a glowing zeal to convert the heathen world surrounding it to the higher monotheistic religion. It knew how to commend itself to the Greek world by a very clever literature, largely apologetic, which was clothed in a Greek garb and assumed a classical form. The thought of Israel as the chosen nation received a lofty interpretation. Israel was chosen to be a priestly nation for the whole world. To Philo the Jewish people is "above all the nations beloved of God, one that has secured the priesthood for the whole human race" (De Abraham, ii, 15). This liberal propaganda prepared the way in the most effective manner for the coming of a broad universalistic religion, freed from the trammels of race connection. But the Pharisaic Judaism of Palestine succeeded only too well in imposing particularistic limitations on the whole of Judaism.

A Jewish writer, referring to the liberal propaganda of the Dispersion, says truly: "It would have found even more appreciation if it had divested itself of its purely ethnic spirit; had sacrificed the accessory element (the manifold and vexatious usages) to the essential element (the religious and moral instruction); and had consummated at the proper time the transformation from a race to a religion—a transformation which is at once the program of its history and the problem of its destiny."

The transformation here indicated was, in fact, accomplished by a Hellenistic Jew—Paul of Tarsus—who by removing the barrier of circumcision and by proclaiming the great principle that in Christ is neither Jew nor Gentile, Greek nor barbarian, bond nor free, male nor female, abolished all artificial distinctions regarding religious status, and enunciated a universalism which could form the foundation-principle of a world-religion. The great apostle's inspired intuition enabled Christianity to reap the harvest so nobly sown by the missionary zeal of Hellenistic Judaism. This new Judaism—whose gospel was the Greek Bible, and its goal the establishment of a world-religion—lacked only one element, the Messiah, who could sanction this more or less denationalized type of Judaism, supersede Jerusalem, Temple, and cultus, abolish the burden of Pharisaic ordinances, and lighten the yoke, even of the Mosaic laws, for the Gentiles. This Messiah was found in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. As the Jewish scholar Moriz Friedländer remarks: "If Jesus was the Christ, then the religion of the Jewish Diaspora was Christendom."

Specific Instruments of the Preparation. The three great means employed by Diaspora Judaism to produce these remarkable results may be summed up under the heads: (a) the Synagogue, (b) the Greek Bible, and (c) the Sabbath-rest.

(a) The Synagogue. The enormous importance which the synagogue possessed in binding the Jews of the Dispersion together, on the one hand, and in drawing the heathen to the monotheistic faith, on the other, has not, perhaps, been sufficiently recognized. The origin of the institution is wrapped in obscurity, but it probably spread from the countries of the Diaspora to Palestine. By the first century A.D., it had become an established institution wherever Jews were settled (cf. Acts 15²¹). In the Græco-Roman world outside Palestine the synagogue services were conducted in Greek. Every town had its synagogue—"a teaching-place of all the virtues"—whose open doors every Sabbath proved a great attraction to the heathen. It may be in reference to the widespread influence exercised by the synagogues that the remark of Seneca quoted in a famous passage by Augustine was made: "To such an extent have the customs of that detestable race prevailed, that they have found acceptance in all countries: the conquered have dictated laws to the conquerors."

(b) The Greek Bible. It is clear that the language employed for the discourses in the public services in the synagogues of the Dispersion was Greek. This must have been the case because of the large numbers of proselytes and adherents of the Jews who frequented them. The use of the Greek Bible (the LXX) is also just as certain. When Philo says that the fame of the laws handed down by Moses has penetrated all inhabited lands and has been spread abroad to the ends of the earth, we are not left in any doubt as to whether he is referring to the Hebrew or the Greek Bible. For he goes on to remark: "Originally the laws were written in the Chaldee language, their beauty being unknown to the rest of mankind. . . . Some thinking it unfitting that the laws should be known to a portion of mankind only . . . brought about a translation of it. For this reason there is still held yearly a great festival in the land of Pharos, in which not only Jews, but also many others, take part, in honor of the place where the translation originated, and to thank God for the old yet ever new deeds of good will." (Vita Moysi, ii, 137f.) It is a significant fact that the LXX became the Bible of the Christian Church.

(c) The Sabbath-Rest. The Sabbath was the regular time for the assemblages of the Jewish community. The seventh day thus acquired great significance and importance not only in the Jewish community but also in the Gentile world generally. Philo says: "God singled out for special honor the Seventh Day, because it is the festival not merely of a town or district, but of the world, and is alone worthy of being called the birthday of creation." (De mundi opif., I, 22). It made a great impression upon the heathen world, and was respected by the Roman authorities. Thus taxes falling due on the Sabbath could be paid by Jews the following day, and by decree of Augustus no Jew could be haled before a judge on the Sabbath day (Josephus, Antiquities, bk. xvi, 6. 2).

VI. INFLUENCE OF GREEK CULTURE

At the time Christianity came out into the world, the world that confronted it was a Hellenized world, and this was true not only of Europe but of Asia over a very wide area. Everywhere both in the East and the West, in the countries included within the Roman Empire, the Greek language was spoken and read by the educated classes. Over a large area, of course, it was the language of everyday life. Everywhere, too, Greek institutions like the gymnasium and the theater were in evidence. Bevan, in his vivid and arresting way, says:

"We are often told in popular books that 'the East never changes,' that Orientals have an invincible repugnance to Western ideas, and so forth. . . . Well, you would make a great mistake if you imagined, say, the Damascus of St. Paul's time like the Damascus of to-day. In St. Paul's time we should have found ourselves in a Greek city: Arabs from the desert in native dress would no doubt have appeared in the streets, and Jews with their fringes and phylacteries, but we should have seen the citizens of the upper class to all appearance Greek, we should continually have heard Greek talked around us, and the environment would be largely made up of Greek temples, halls and colonnades" (Jerusalem Under the High Priests, p. 39).

Greek civilization and Greek institutions had indeed transformed the world. Hellenism had filled life with new interests. There was something very alluring about Greek culture—it captivated and enthralled. Among other achievements it created a new tradition of education. When Christianity emerged into the wider world it came face to face with an educated world. Everywhere in the towns grammar schools were to be found, while at certain centers were great seats of learning, rather like the mediæval universities to which students of all classes resorted. Tarsus in Paul's time was a center of this sort. Students then, as now, attended lectures, and sometimes showed by their manner that they were thinking of other things—"leaving their minds outside," says Philo.

Teachers and professors occupied positions of social distinction and were treated with special consideration by state and municipal authorities, both in the matter of endowment and exemption from taxation. The Hellenic world—or perhaps it would be more accurate to describe it as the "Hellenized world"—was thus permeated with cultural forces which were all-powerful and all-absorbing. On its nobler side this Greek culture quickened and enriched human life generally. But it sometimes assumed base and degraded forms. Bevan (op. cit., p. 41f.) has noted how these effects were specially noticeable in the province of Syria, in the centuries both immediately before and after the opening of the Christian era.

Signs of Moral Disintegration. When we ask ourselves, What was the moral state of the Græco-Roman world in the first two centuries of our era? it is perhaps not quite so easy to generalize as is sometimes assumed. Hatch, indeed, attempts to discount the evidence that has come down to us. He says: "It has been common to construct pictures of the state of morals in the first centuries of the Christian era from the statements of satirists who, like all satirists, had a large element of caricature, and from the denunciations of the Christian apologists, which, like all denunciations, have a large element of exaggeration. The pictures so constructed are mosaics of singular vices, and they have led to the not unnatural impression that these centuries constituted an era of exceptional wickedness" (Hibbert Lectures, p. 139, Scribner). Hatch goes on: "It is no doubt difficult to gauge the average morality of any age. It is questionable whether the average morality of civilized ages has largely varied; it is possible that if the satirists of our own time were equally outspoken, the vices of ancient Rome might be found to have a parallel in modern London; and it is probable, not on merely a priori grounds, but from the nature of the evidence which remains, that there was in ancient Rome, as there is in modern London, a preponderating mass of those who loved their children and their homes, who were good neighbors and faithful friends, who conscientiously discharged their civil duties, and were in all the current senses of the word 'moral men'" (ibid.).

This statement puts the case in as persuasive a manner as is possible. Yet it seems to the writer not to allow for the fact that the age was one of disintegration—the old moral and religious sanctions had broken down; the best spirits of the time were acutely conscious of this, and this fact will explain the movements toward moral reformation that had grown up. The world was desperately in need of a religion that would be adequate to the new needs; there was a conflict of religions—and in the end Christianity emerged victorious as the world-religion; but the conflict had not become decisive till well on toward the end of the second century of our era; and in the interval there was, to a large extent, religious and moral chaos. How can we explain the moral energy of the Jewish (and later the Christian) missionary propaganda unless there was present the conviction on both sides that paganism lacked the moral fiber that only Judaism or Christianity could give?

VII. RELIGIOUS UNREST

"The age in which Christianity grew was in reality an age of moral reformation" (Hatch, op. cit., p. 149). This manifested itself especially in Stoicism and the growth of the religious guilds associated with "mystery" cults.

Stoicism. "In Stoicism"—to use Bevan's words—"the mind of antiquity had not only reached in some respects the highest expression, but that expression had become popular in a way unparalleled in the history of any later school. The Stoic missionary, preaching the self-sufficiency of virtue in a threadbare cloak at the street corners, had been one of the typical figures of a Greek town many generations before Paul" (Hellenism and Christianity, pp. 72, 73, Doran).

Through these cynic preachers of righteousness Stoicism had made a profound impression upon the public conscience. Perhaps the most striking evidence of this is the fact that it had created a new set of ethical terms. Lightfoot, commenting on this fact, says: "It is difficult to estimate, and perhaps not very easy to overrate the extent to which Stoic philosophy had leavened the moral vocabulary of the civilized world at the time of the Christian era. To take a single instance: the most important of moral terms, the crowning triumph of ethical nomenclature, suneidēsis, conscientia, the internal, absolute, supreme judge of individual action, if not struck in the mint of the Stoics, at all events became current coin through their influence. To a great extent, therefore, the general diffusion of Stoic language would lead to its adoption by the first teachers of Christianity" (On Philippians, p. 303).

Stoicism was thus a real preparation for Christianity. It was governed by a great ideal, it was marked by high ethical power, and it produced a few great men of noble character. It impressed the conscience of the Greek and Roman world. But its ethics were not Christian: it was a creed of despair and acquiescence, and it despised all the Christian virtues that depend upon the affirmation, "God is love." It had no belief in progress, and its outlook on the world was dark and forbidding—removed poles asunder from that of the Christian. It totally lacked the dynamic which carried Christianity forward and made it a religion of moving power for mankind. If Christianity largely absorbed the ethical terminology of Stoicism, it invested the terms with an entirely new content and with new values.

Mystery Religions. If we turn to the "mystery" cults we can see in these religious brotherhoods another indication of the pathetic yearning of the ancient world for regeneration and salvation. The vogue of the mystery cults in the imperial age is well known. One of the most influential, and one, moreover, that illustrates the syncretistic character of these later religious movements, is the cult of Isis, as described by Plutarch in his famous treatise. The Isis-Serapis worship was widely practiced in the Hellenistic world. It can be traced at Athens, Pompeii, and Rome, and it spread wherever Roman influence penetrated. The cult evidently made a wide appeal, with its splendid ceremonial and "contemplative devotion" ordered with all the precision characteristic of Egyptian liturgic tradition. It also embodied the elaborate precision of the ancient Egyptian eschatology.

No detailed evidence has come down to us as to the character of the rites connected with the mystery-cults earlier than the second century A.D. The fullest is the well-known description in Apuleius of the initiation of Lucius at Cenchreæ into the Isis mystery-cult. The preparation of the candidate lasted several days, during which he was instructed by the high priest as to the meaning of what was to follow. (See Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions, pp. 100f.) He was informed that "the initiation itself is solemnized as the symbol of a voluntary death and a salvation given in answer to prayer . . . and after [the initiates] have been by [the goddess's] providence in a sense born again she places them again in the course of a new life in salvation" (ibid., p. 101). The initiation itself culminated in an experience which is thus mystically described: "I penetrated to the boundaries of death," he says; "I trod the threshold of Proserpine, and after being borne through all the elements I returned to earth: at midnight I beheld the sun radiating white light. I came into the presence of the gods below and the gods above, and did them reverence close at hand" (quoted ibid.).

Fortunately, we have this sympathetic picture of some of the aspects of a typical Hellenistic Mystery Religion, the solemn external preparation in the prescribed abstinences, the solemn baptism, the communication of the mystic formulæ, culminating in the overpowering scenes which came at the last; there is also the inward experience, a genuinely religious one, in the heart preparation, the idea of cleansing, the conception of regeneration, and the final mystical rapture which unites the soul of the initiate with the deity.

Paul and the Mysteries. These and the religious brotherhoods which made purity of life a condition of membership are genuine manifestations of the religious spirit, and may be regarded as a real preparation for Christianity. But it is very doubtful whether these cults entered so closely and intimately into the organic life of Pauline Christianity as is sometimes suggested. That Paul was ever really influenced in his thought by the mystery-religions is very unlikely. His thought and that of the mysteries move in two different worlds.

Paul's mysticism is thoroughly ethical in character. The Cross is central. The mystic death to sin of which he speaks is wholly different in conception from the mystical identification of the initiate in the mystery-cult with the death of the divine personage whose restoration to life was celebrated and depicted in the mystery ceremonial.

Paul undoubtedly uses terms which are characteristic of the terminology of the mystery-religions, just as he uses occasionally Stoic technical terms. But in both cases the language is charged with a new meaning and a new content.

The truth is that behind Paul's language there is a fundamentally different conception of God. The Jewish conception of God could not make terms with the Greek idea at all. To the Jew, God was one unique and holy Being, supreme and transcendent, the Creator and Ruler of the world, whose majesty could not be shared. To the Jew, the very idea of the deification of a man was utterly abhorrent. Not so to the Greek. Apparently in the earlier period of Greek religion, heroic qualities or the possession of unusual powers might lead to apotheosis. The mortal, as in the mystery-cults, might achieve divinity. The extent to which this was carried in the Hellenistic world from the time of Alexander the Great and onward, when divine honors were paid to living rulers, and legends grew up about their supernatural origin, is well known. First the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies adopted the cult, and finally it was transferred to the Roman world and culminated in the state worship of the emperors. It may be possible to regard all this as the perversion of a true instinct in humanity, which leads men to regard supreme powers and endowments as God-like, and therefore to be invested with the halo of divinity. But to carry the process to the lengths reached in the Hellenistic period inevitably meant the frittering away of all worthy conceptions of Deity. To the Jew the state worship of the emperor was the blasphemy of blasphemies.

When Christianity came face to face with this Hellenic world, it confronted it with a lofty conception of God which had its roots in the ethical monotheism of the Hebrew prophets. It was the God revealed in Jesus Christ whom it preached, a lofty and exclusive conception that would tolerate nothing in the nature of apotheosis in the Greek manner. Whatever use Christianity made of Greek philosophical terms like Logos, or other terms like "salvation," it never compromised its central conception of God, which, indeed, stamped its use of these terms with a new meaning. And this is true not only of Pauline Christianity, but also, fundamentally, of the later type of Christian thought and theology, when the church had really become deeply influenced by Hellenism in various ways. Though threatened in the third century with syncretistic tendencies, the church kept its recognized theology free from idolatrous taint, and this result was due primarily and ultimately to the conception of God which is its inalienable heritage from Judaism.

Literature: General: Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (Eng. trans., 6 vols., 2nd ed.); Morrison, The Jews under Roman Rule; Bevan, Jerusalem under the High Priests; Shailer Mathews, History of N.T. Times in Palestine, 175 B.C. to 70 A.D.; Box, Jewish Environment of Early Christianity (Expositor, July, 1916). For part II: Hastings' Encyc. of Religion and Ethics, arts., "Pharisees," "Sadducees," "Essenes." For part III: see literature cited under art. on Language of N.T., p. 884. For part IV: Porter, Messages of the Apocalyptic Writers; Charles, Religious Development between the O.T. and N.T.; Box, Jewish Apocalyptic in the Apostolic Age (Expositor, Nov. and Dec., 1922); the various Apocalypses in Translations of Early Documents (S.P.C.K.). For part V: Jewish Encyc., art., "Diaspora." For parts VI and VII: Hatch, Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages upon the Christian Church; Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions; Angus, The Mystery Religions and Christianity; Cumont, Mysteries of Mithra (Eng. trans.); Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources (Eng. trans.); Legge, Forerunners and Rivals of Christianity (2 vols.); H. C. Sheldon, Mystery Religions and the N.T.; Hastings, op. cit., art. "Mysteries"; C. Anderson Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul, ch. 3; Box, Early Christianity and the Hellenic World (Expositor, Aug., 1924); Hayes, Greek Culture and the Greek Testament.

THE FORMATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR JAMES MOFFATT

Sacred Books. The function of the Sacred Book in the religions of the world has yet to be studied thoroughly. Most of the great religions have their scriptures, but their character differs, and the relation of the worshiper to the Sacred Book is by no means the same in the various faiths. Judaism and Islam perhaps make this relation stricter than any of the far Eastern faiths like Hinduism or Sikhism or Buddhism. Yet even in them the precise character of the Sacred Book is not exactly what it is in Christianity. What is common to all sacred books is the conviction that they contain revelations of divine truth which are vital to the worshiper. But how this vitality is realized is another matter.

The Christian Book a Historic Record. The outstanding feature of the Christian Book, or Bible, is that it consists of two parts, the O.T. and the N.T. All religious literature is determined, in shape and form, by the particular conditions of life in the special nation or race or community for which and within which it was produced. Now both the O.T. and the N.T. reflect a religious movement which was stirred by faith in a God who acted within history. His revelations are made to his people from time to time, as they pass through certain well-marked phases and periods. "Testament" echoes the Latin term for "covenant," and "covenant" denotes the gracious purpose of God entering history, a purpose whose initiative is with him and whose outcome is revealed in his relations and dealings with his people. In Islam the Koran is regarded as an inspired book of oracles, given to the prophet by Allah. It claims absolute authority, on the ground that the oracles are either immediately made to the prophet or that he is commissioned to speak in the name of Allah. But the Koran is not a book of history. Its contents are the disclosures made by Allah to the prophet at one time. Whereas the Christian Bible is literature covering centuries, during which the revelation of the divine purpose passed through phases, but pre-eminently through two: the first, the period of God's people known as Hebrews, Israelites, and Jews, and the second, the period of the people as the Christian Church in its initial and classical period. This was the period in which the church set out upon its mission as God's people, fulfilling the former hopes and destinies of the community under the Old Covenant, no longer in any national sense but as intrusted with his message for all nations. What is common to both parts of the Bible is therefore the consciousness that God reveals himself in history, manifesting his purpose and mind through actions and events.

Use of the Old Testament by Early Christians. Our task is to survey the formation of the second part of the Sacred Book of Christians. But it must be remembered that this literature arose within a community which had the O.T. in its hands, mainly in the Greek version. For a while the church had no idea of forming any other collection of sacred books. "From a babe thou hast known the sacred writings which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 3¹⁵). This might have been said to almost any early Christian of the first generation. The Scriptures here are the O.T. books, read in the light of the Christian faith. They were the Bible of the church during the period in which the N.T. writings were being prepared; and at first the people of God never dreamed of needing any other. They lived by faith in Christ Jesus as the Son of God and the Redeemer of his people. This was the core and center, the new, vital element of their life as the Community of God. But they found much about their Lord in the O.T.; to their eyes he seemed to shine out from the pages of the Law, the prophets, and the Psalter. They discovered a sort of biography of Jesus, by anticipation, in the literature of the Old Covenant which they read in the light of Christ. To them it appeared, as the apostle put it (2 Cor. 3¹³⁻¹⁶), that a veil was removed from the O.T., once Christian faith approached it; as Christians, they saw in it for the first time what they believed to be its true meaning. It predicted Christ, and they read it for such predictions, as literature of revelation which pointed forward to the Lord.

Effects of this Use on the New Testament. This explains two things. First, it explains why the formation of the N.T. came so slowly. At the outset nothing was written about Jesus by the church, both because everything needful seemed to have been written already in the O.T., and because the original disciples were still living and could tell orally what they had seen and heard. Secondly, it explains why the N.T. writings, when they did come to be formed, were so occupied with the fulfillment of prophecy. The use of the O.T. by the primitive Christians generally took these lines. (1) It was studied as a book which was prophetic of Jesus Christ. The evidences of this are written all over the N.T. pages, but special reference may be made to passages like Lk. 24:27, 44f. Acts 8:25f. 17:1f., 11. (2) It was also involved in the conflict over the Law, as may be seen from the Gospel of Matthew and the Epistles of Paul; this led to a discrimination, although the difficulties were usually solved by means of allegorizing. (3) Finally, it was precious on account of its ethical contents, as a moral code for the discipline of life. When the early church came to draw up rules for private and social life, the appeal was often made to the O.T.; it is significant that the moral sanctions in the Epistles are frequently biblicalized (e.g., in Rom. 12:19 1 Cor. 10:1-11 and Eph. 6:1-4). In the Christian mission the O.T. was prized and employed as an invaluable witness against polytheism and immorality. Furthermore, the early Christians required to construct no cosmogony, for that was already supplied by the book of Genesis. Naturally they had to provide a fresh eschatology, for the belief about the end of things depended upon the new revelation of Jesus Christ, although it rested ultimately on principles implicit in the cosmogony, as is plain from the book of Revelation. But in the Genesis stories about the creation of the world there was already provided for the church an effective weapon against the fantastic pagan myths regarding the universe, myths which failed to rival the biblical story in its simplicity and intelligibility.

Factors Determining the Structure of the New Testament. It is not surprising, therefore, to find (1) quotations and reminiscences of the O.T. in the N.T., and also to discover that (2) the new literature of the people of God occasionally took forms similar to those of the earlier Scriptures; e.g., the epistle and the apocalypse, especially the latter. Nevertheless, the conditions of life in the primitive church were very different from those in which the O.T. literature had been produced, and this served to determine the structure and shape of the writings now called into existence. Round the Mediterranean basin lay scattered communities of Christians, some in Palestine and Syria and Asia Minor, some overseas in Greece and Italy. From time to time they were visited by the apostles who had founded them. But they required constant supervision and guidance, and this was provided in part by means of letters or epistles. A letter implied absence on the part of a friend or counselor. It is the substitute for oral advice or direction. Hence the apostles, in their enforced absence, sent letters to churches which were in difficulties. The earliest part of the N.T. literature consists of such letters, about a dozen in all, mainly sent by the apostle Paul to various communities founded by himself or by some of his coadjutors. Sometimes they would be copied out, in order to be circulated in the neighborhood (Col. 4:16). They were designed for the immediate needs of the communities in question, for the practical instruction and inspiration of people engaged in the attempt to understand and carry out the Christian gospel in novel surroundings, beset by pagan and Jewish practices and beliefs. Their origin was occasional. What moved the writer to send his message was generally some emergency, and the result is that the Epistles do not profess to convey any explicit and systematic outline of the faith; the Epistle to the Romans is a partial exception, but, as a rule, the Epistles merely discuss such aspects and elements of the gospel as happened to be challenged at the time being in any given community. They presuppose the life and belief of the church at large, which may be often inferred from their incidental allusions. They were read at public worship, when the local Christians met. None of them is a private letter, except the note to Philemon, and even that includes more than the actual recipient in its address. The only apostle besides Paul who is known to have written in this way is Peter. The First Epistle of Peter falls with the Pauline letters inside the years 50-65 A.D. Some would, however, include the Epistle of James as one of the earliest in this group.

Between about 70 and 100 A.D. the other epistles came into being, though little is known about their origin. Hebrews was probably written from the East to some community in Rome, the Epistle of Judas (Jude) is apparently an Eastern production, and the two smaller notes of John are associated with the personality of a presbyter called John of the region about Ephesus toward the close of the century. (These and following questions are discussed more fully in the introductions to the various Epistles. The student will observe that in some cases different writers come to different conclusions on the date and authorship of a given book. Cf. art., Chronology of N.T., p. 879).

Literary Problems of the Later Epistles. This second group raises two problems of a literary nature.

(1) The epistle was a widely used literary form in the ancient world, into which it was not uncommon to pour philosophical and even scientific material, and it has been suggested that some of these later Epistles were really not letters so much as addresses put into the form of epistles. But it should be remembered that the church developed a special requirement of its own, which produced an analogous development in literature, namely, the pastoral address or homily. It seems likely that the Epistle of James, e.g., belongs to this class, as well as the First Epistle of John; they were not addressed to any specific circle but to the church at large. Hence they came to be regarded as catholic, or general, Epistles. How easy it was for even church-letters to be classified thus, and used for wider purposes, may be gathered from the letters to the Asiatic churches in Rev. 2, 3. If Ephesians be taken as a letter or homily by some disciple of Paul, it falls into the same category. In any case, its original circle was much wider than that of any single church such as that of Ephesus.

(2) This starts the second problem, namely, of authorship. Second Peter was composed in the beginning of the second century by a Christian who wrote in the name of the apostle; he used the earlier manifesto of Judas, applying it to the special conditions of his age and circle. The Epistles to Timothy and Titus similarly, in their present shape, seem to have been composed by a Paulinist who wrote later than the lifetime of his master, though he incorporated some material from notes by Paul (cf. intro. to Pastoral Epistles for a different view). Here we are faced by a literary method which composed epistles, just as a contemporary historian might compose speeches, in all good faith, under the name of some older hero or apostle, to whom the sentiments are ascribed. This was done with the honest and humble aim of edifying the faithful. The disciple would conceal his own name, as he sought to reproduce what he believed were or would have been the ideas and instructions of an honored master. There was no literary ambition in the practice, but, rather, the consciousness that through the pages of the disciple the apostle still spoke.

Place of the Epistles in the Early Church. These Epistles were never composed as literature, whether they were pseudonymous or anonymous or directly dictated by the man whose name they bear. Frequently they are great literature. But their original aim was to inspire and control groups of Christian people, many of whom could not read at all. "No one will get at my verses," said Walt Whitman, "who insists upon viewing them as a literary performance." The same may be said about the N.T. Epistles. In their style and composition, they present literary problems. So little reliable tradition has been preserved about them that we are thrown back, as a rule, upon internal evidence, and this discloses the fact that in some cases our canonical letters have been edited by a later generation—an awkward fact for "plenary inspiration." The phenomena of the Greek MSS., e.g., point to the fact that the last chapters of Romans were not always as they stand: Romans must have existed once, perhaps during the apostle's lifetime, in two editions (cf. p. 1136). Ephesians did not have "in Ephesus" in the original text of 1¹. The Corinthian Epistles represent a collection of letters written at different times to the church of Corinth, and the last four chapters of the Second Epistle, in particular, were composed prior to the first eight or nine chapters (see intro. to 1 and 2 Corinthians). Such problems engage the attention of the modern student. But his ultimate aim is to recover and reconstruct the state of things when the precious papyrus rolls containing these letters were circulating among the churches, first dictated by the apostle to a secretary, then conveyed by a messenger (like Silvanus, 1 Pet. 5¹²), and finally treasured up in the church's archives or copied out for transmission. And all for purposes of edification! "Faith comes by hearing," said the apostle. It was as these homilies were heard by Christians that their faith was quickened and trained. We may sometimes wonder what they made of difficult Epistles like Romans and Hebrews. Did the early converts understand the arguments that baffle us to-day? How much did they take away from listening to passages like Rom. 5¹¹, for example? Perhaps, like a modern Christian congregation, they got good, even when they could not exactly follow the abstruse reasoning that fell upon their wondering ears. Still, they were accustomed to words and arguments that have long ceased to be familiar to ourselves. What sounds remote to us, in our altered conditions, was once clear and intelligible to men in the first century. For the apostles wrote with their minds upon their hearers. Doubtless Paul sometimes let himself go, as in some passages of Romans, where we have the feeling that for the moment he is developing a theme which has moved his own soul rather than pressing home a truth on the conscience of those who were to receive his words. But this was exceptional. If there is one thing plain in the Epistles it is this, that they were designed for a Fellowship, and that what is not plain to us must have once been plainer to those who heard it read aloud from the papyrus roll of the writer. It is the function of scholarship to throw light upon the social and religious life of the age, until such obscure allusions become clearer to our minds.

Origin of the Written Gospel. Alongside of the Epistles, however, there was growing up another class of literature. One of the most striking features in the N.T.—which would be remarkable, were it not that we read the books with eyes dulled by conventional familiarity—is that four books are specifically called “Gospels.” The title is significant. In the Epistles “the gospel of God” or “the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ” means the entire message of the Christian revelation. For Paul the gospel is the saving message of God in Christ, a devotional and dogmatic expression for the grace and kingdom of the Lord. Yet this term came to be applied to the books which described the life and teaching of Jesus. In literature, that is to say, the word acquired a special connotation. Not that the four Gospels call themselves Gospels, for their canonical headings are, of course, later additions. The original title was “The Gospel according to”—Matthew, etc. There was one gospel, and these books were simply different accounts of it. Still, the essence of the gospel was regarded as the personality and spirit of Jesus Christ, and this it was which served to concentrate the use of the word upon the literary Gospels. “Remember the words of the Lord Jesus” (Acts 20³⁵) was a counsel which must have been often on the lips of the primitive Christians, a far more common cry than we realize. The structure of the Gospels points to this. The earliest confession of faith, “Jesus is Lord,” involved some acquaintance with the historical Jesus, some knowledge of what he was and what he said and did, of his commands and promises as regulative of the Christian communities in their new life. The Epistles reflect a church which knew something about Jesus. They were not written to convey that knowledge; they presuppose information about the Lord transmitted by traditions from the disciples and apostles. These memories supplemented and ratified the O.T. Scriptures (see, e.g., 1 Cor. 15^{1f.}). And it was out of them, circulating in oral form and perhaps in written form during the first three or four decades of the church’s life, that the canonical Gospels eventually arose.

The “Gospel” is a new literary form. Nothing exactly corresponding to it is to be found in ancient literature, for even the edifying biographies of the age are only a very partial parallel. The Epistle had its prototype in Jewish and classical literature, but the “Gospel” is a fresh creation. It is a departure inspired by the same interests and needs as the Epistles. A Gospel was written to instruct Christians about Jesus, to justify them in calling him by the sacred title of “Lord.” It provided the sanction for their habits and hopes by means of tales and traditions about him. It was not a biography, but designed, as we see from Lk. 11-4 and Jn. 20³¹, to promote active and intelligent faith in the communities of the Lord. The supreme interest lay in Jesus. In the preaching of the church, as we overhear it in the Epistles, everything depended upon the significance and authority of his Person. So in the Gospels, though here the interest is concentrated upon his Person as it had once appeared in history. The interest worked along three lines, though the three cannot be always kept separate. There was the moral interest in his actions and sayings, as the norm of the Christian life. There was what may be termed the theological interest, to which we have already referred, namely, the interest which led Christians to think of him as occupying the commanding place in the redemptive purpose of God, in the light of ancient prophecy. Furthermore, there was the human interest, felt by many, in his personality, which loved to recall the memories of his actions and sayings as he lived and moved among men. All these interests throbbed in the pre-literary phase of the gospel traditions, when oral tradition in the main preserved anecdotes about him, and also in the later period, when such traditions began to be put together for catechetical purposes, in a more or less complete form, particularly traditions about his Passion, his miracles, and his teaching.

Mark, Matthew and Luke. The earliest attempts at preserving these memories in literary shape for teaching purposes have not survived, although one or two of them may be traced behind our extant Gospels. Of the latter the earliest is Mark’s. Tradition connects it with information supplied by Peter, and may justify us in associating its composition with the Roman church about 70 A.D. Matthew’s Gospel is arranged upon a more systematic plan, with plain traces of its origin in the catechetical education of the communities, and with an equally plain aim of explaining Christianity as the true fulfillment of O.T. prophecies. No Gospel is so suitable for the position of opening the N.T., as the crown and sequel of the O.T. Nor is any Gospel so marked by the church-consciousness. Mark’s Gospel is one of its sources, but only one; the unknown author draws on special traditions, including a collection of Sayings, which, in some form or other, must also have lain before Luke. The third Gospel is the most literary of the four, with a preface in which the author explains his aim and method. He too had access to special traditions, besides the Gospel of Mark, but they were traditions unknown to his predecessors, possibly such as he learned at Antioch and Caesarea as well as at Rome. The modern tendency is to note the literary quality of the Gospel (which, by the way, in its handling of earlier material, proves that no verbal accuracy was regarded as essential in the transmission of the evangelic traditions), and at the same time to recognize the historical value of much that is characteristic of Luke. Few doubts are felt that he was the physician and friend of the apostle Paul, although his work was written after the latter's death. The audience he has in mind belonged to Christians of the outside world, such as the Theophilus to whom he dedicates his work; they were not acquainted with the inner interests of Judaism, as the readers of Matthew are supposed to be. (For fuller discussion, see art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, p. 867; also the intro. to each of the four Gospels.)

Acts of the Apostles. Luke's Gospel is the only one of the four which has a sequel. His second volume, called The Acts of the Apostles, carries on the tale of the primitive disciples from the Ascension to the arrival of Paul at Rome about 60 (65) A.D. That is, it covers about thirty years. Apart from some details about John and Peter and James, in the early chapters, it recounts, however, the acts and adventures of only one apostle, his hero, Paul. Here again sources have been employed, including a diary of travel composed by himself, extracts from which are incorporated in the book. It is far from giving a complete record of even Paul's missions. The interior troubles of the Pauline churches, e.g., are ignored in his pages, and we do not learn that the apostle ever wrote an epistle at all. But Acts is the first contribution to church history (see p. 1094), and, together with the Epistles, enables us to make out dimly the primitive expansion and obstacles of the communities within the empire. The data supplied by Luke and the inferences which may be drawn from his pages permit us to reconstruct an outline of the apostle's movements down to his final journey to the capital. In this class of literature Luke has predecessors. The art of writing speeches in character, the use of material from journals, the effective employment of dialogue and letters, are all signs that the author was familiar with the literary methods of historiography in his age.

The Fourth Gospel. The fourth Gospel was intended to supplant or, rather, to supplement the earlier narratives. It is written out of some independent apostolic traditions about Jesus, but in no Gospel, indeed, in no book of the N.T., do the Hebrew and the Greek worlds meet so conspicuously. The presentation of the Lord's life and teaching is recast, in order to confront speculative difficulties of Hellenism in the contemporary Asiatic world (see p. 1066). The author seeks to interpret the Christian revelation afresh for believers who were no longer living in days when the primitive Messianic and apocalyptic beliefs formed the main categories of religious thought within the communities. Along with the contemporary pamphlet, called the First Epistle of John, it comes from a circle at Ephesus toward the close of the first century, and, whatever be its sources, its affinities are Greek, in thought and language. It is inspired by a breath of the Platonic idealism which has touched the Epistle to the Hebrews (see intro. to Hebrews). In its dialogues and descriptions we note the desire of naturalizing Christianity in a new world of thought and feeling, where conceptions of reality and truth were swaying the religious mind. This is the preoccupation which distinguishes the fourth Gospel from the other three. Jesus is still the center of the revelation. The mystical inwardness of the faith rests on history, but the story is recast until allegorical or symbolical methods make it a new thing. "The Word was made flesh." Only a Hebrew mind could have written that sentence, which is the keynote to the book. As it develops, the reader is shown a deep, divine significance in the history by means of an Hellenic symbolism which goes far beyond anything in the first three Gospels, and for which the only anticipations are to be found in the later Epistles of Paul and in Hebrews.

The present form of the book shows that it has undergone some editing. The last chapter was either an afterthought, or added later by another hand. Also, in the course of transmission, the text has been changed by the transportation of certain passages. Ch. 6, e.g., originally lay before ch. 5 (see notes there). Other alterations can be detected. But there is an impressive unity of style and thought which renders it next to impossible to suppose that any original source can be disentangled from the extant text. Tradition in the second century assigned the book to a certain John at Ephesus, and some still hold that it may be the work either of the apostle John or of one of his disciples (see intro. to John, p. 1062-6). But there was a Presbyter John also, at this period and in this quarter, to whom the second and third of the Johannine letters are due. The intricacy of the literary and the historical problems, however, ought not to blind us to the startling novelty of its teaching, and aspecially to the relegation of the apocalyptic eschatology to the background. It is this concentration on the present and lasting message of the Gospel, coupled with a limpid style in its higher reaches, and an arresting power of religious intuition, which have made the book a prized possession of the church.

The Revelation of John. If apocalyptic prophecy is subordinated to the new interpretation in the fourth Gospel, it is otherwise in its contemporary book, the Revelation of John. Here the prototype is the book of Daniel and Jewish apocalypses of that class (see art., Literature of the Intertestamental Period, p. 107). It is a tract for bad times, written at the end of Domitian's reign, about 95 or 96 A.D., when the prophet warned the faithful in Asia Minor, his diocese, against the perils of the persecution, and promised them immediate relief in the second advent of Jesus from heaven. Like most apocalyptic writers, he freely drew on earlier sources. With the glow and fantasy of the Oriental imagination he depicted the sudden, near end of all things,

"With hue like that when some great painter dips

His pencil in the gloom of earthquake and eclipse."

Many of the details are cryptic, the symbolism is weird, and the literary arrangement of the oracles, in the middle part, is perplexing; but the clear message is that through the crises of history a divine purpose runs, which is bound up with Jesus Christ, and that loyalty to his cause and kingdom at all costs is the one hope and safety of the community, even although the state may threaten and harry the loyalists. Victory is assured to the gospel, and victory soon. The author, a true prophet, is in touch with the Asiatic communities, but we know little more about his personality. His pages prove that he was a master of this literary method, which he employs with splendid and strange power to present his thrilling call to arms, the arms being faith and patience. It is as though he were endeavoring to make his readers hear what he had heard the Lord say to himself, "Hold the fort, for I am coming."

Gradual Assembling of the Writings. No writer of these books was conscious that he was contributing to a N.T. The books came into circulation gradually and locally, as books of the fellowship, intended to keep Christians faithful until the end arrived. The writers, however, had done more permanent work than they knew. As copies were exchanged, a collection of Paul's Epistles was formed, perhaps in Asia Minor or at Corinth; thus a nucleus of the canon arose, and by the middle of the second century the beginnings of an authoritative collection of what is now known as the N.T. writings were laid. The four Gospels were selected out of a number of others, as genuinely apostolic, and Acts was added as a connecting link between the Gospels and the Epistles. The earlier stages of this process are obscure. But in the course of it the writings were edited; titles were supplied, gaps were filled (as at the end of Mark's Gospel), and some textual changes were made, in order to emphasize the catholic bearing of the various books, which were now the sacred writings of a world-wide church.

The Literature of a Religious Fellowship. From the first these books had been writings of a community, for church use. The N.T., in its formation, reveals itself more and more as literature of a great fellowship, and that in two special aspects. One is worship and the other is the sense of a mission. The various books become more intelligible in the light of these considerations. Their genesis and their form are plain, as we recognize them under these aspects; they are the Sacred Books of a church which produced them for the dual functions of worship and mission service.

(1) The very form of the Epistles occasionally betrays their use in worship. They end with "Amen," and although this is now and then due to the canonical editing (for the object of the canon was to sanction the books which could be read at worship), the tone and style of these writings show that they were naturally employed in worship as homilies. Indeed, an Epistle like Hebrews reads like a series of Bible-readings from the O.T. by a trained Christian expositor. The Apocalypse of the prophet John, which we call the Book of Revelation, has a special blessing for the reader (13), i.e., for the Christian minister who reads this prophecy aloud at public worship (see Mt. 24¹⁵). The hymns in Luke's Gospel and the songs in the Revelation are probably early specimens of hymnology in the churches. And, in this connection, it is worth noting that the earliest confession of faith falls into rhythmical form. The fragment of primitive hymnology in 1 Tim. 3¹⁶ served as a semi-liturgical confession of faith; its short cola were written to be chanted or sung. For the primitive Christians recognized that any confession of faith ought to be "sung rather than signed."

(2) The subject of this early confession was Christ, and this was the topic of the N.T. books as literature of a mission. The Gospels in particular reveal the working of this interest, as they bring out the significance of Jesus for the world. They present the distinctive features which commended Christ. That he was a real historical person, for example; that he truly fulfilled the prophecies of the O.T.; that he was no mere mythical or dubious figure like some of the heroes of the Mystery-cults of the age. Above all, it was essential for the Christian mission that the differentia of his person and career should be brought out, in order to make it clear in what sense he marked an advance upon Judaism and filled a gap left by any pagan cult. Hence three elements are singled out in the evangelic tradition: he taught, he suffered, he forgave sins. No real precedent for these, as they were exemplified in the story of Jesus, existed in any Messianic expectation. It was the hold of such truths that gave the communities their power and chance in propaganda. Probably there is no N.T. book written directly for outsiders, but every book was written more or less for communities which were conscious of their responsibility for the great mission and of their interest in the enterprise. In many there is an apologetic element, and this is bound up with their function as literature of communities sensible of wider aims than self-preservation. It is as we keep in mind the mission-interest that we realize why the Gospels concentrate upon certain phases of the life of Jesus, and why these phases are handled thus, and not otherwise.

Why Written in Greek. Finally, it was due to this mission-interest that the literature was composed in Greek. The O.T. of the time was a Greek translation made for the purpose of instruction and of religious propaganda by the Jews, and the N.T. could go anywhere in the empire because it was written in the Hellenistic vernacular spoken by all educated people. (See art., Language of N.T., p. 880.) A religion whose sacred books were written in this language had an unrivaled opportunity. It was not handicapped by provincial dialects like Hebrew or Aramaic. Possibly some of the sources of the N.T. writings were originally in these languages. But as the books come before us, they are written in what was the most widely circulated tongue of the day. The church went out upon its mission to the great world with a literature which could carry far beyond Judaism or any Oriental range; the fact of these sacred books being in Hellenistic Greek enabled the Christian mission to address itself to men far and wide, in what was the international vernacular of the age.

Literature: Goodspeed, The Story of the N.T.; Harnack, The Origin of the N.T. (Eng. trans.); Milligan, The N.T. Documents; J. A. Robertson, The Hidden Romance of the N.T.; Gregory, Canon and Text of the N.T.; Souter, The Text and Canon of the N.T.; H. R. and C. E. Purinton, The Literature of the N.T.

THE TRANSMISSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR A. T. ROBERTSON

Definitions and Explanations. It is impossible to discuss this subject without using certain terms and symbols which may confuse the ordinary reader. These terms and symbols will be explained in the proper places, but a brief reference to them here will perhaps serve to promote clarity. The term manuscript (MS., plural MSS.) refers to the handwritten documents which from the earliest Christian times to the invention of printing preserved to us, in whole or in part, the contents of the N.T. MSS. are divided into uncials and minuscules or cursives. Uncials are written in large block capitals, each letter separate. Minuscules, or cursives, are written in smaller letters, which are usually joined together as in ordinary handwriting—hence cursive, or running script. The earliest manuscripts were written on papyrus, a material obtained from a reed. When these were of any length, they were rolled, but papyri MSS. have survived to us only in fragments. Papyrus was replaced about the fourth century by vellum or parchment (skin), and this made possible the codex (plural, codices), separate leaves placed together in book form. A version was the translation of the N.T., or a part of it, into another language. The most important early versions were the Syriac, of which there were several, and the Latin Vulgate (symbol, vg.), which included the O.T., made by Jerome in the fourth century. The Textus Receptus (symbol T.R.) means the text now commonly received, and is due chiefly to the work of Erasmus. For more convenient reference, scholars have worked out a system of symbols to indicate the various MSS. and versions. Thus the symbols of the Old Latin MSS. are small roman letters, a, b, c, etc.; of papyri fragments, superior arabic figures, 1, 2, 3, etc.; of the Syriac versions, the abbreviation syr. followed by a superior abbreviation, syr.^{slr.}, syr.^{cu.}, etc. the second abbreviation indicating which version is intended; and of the minuscules, or cursives, ordinary arabic figures, 1, 2, 3, etc. The use of these symbols, however, is not uniform—a fact which often causes confusion. The ordinary reader is most likely to meet the symbols of the six great primary uncial codices, the use of which is fortunately quite uniform. These symbols, with one exception, are capital roman letters. A is the Codex Alexandrinus (British Museum); B the Codex Vaticanus (the Vatican); C the Codex Ephræmi Rescriptus (Paris); D the Codex Bezae (Cambridge, England); W the Washington Codex (Washington, D. C.). The exception is the great Codex Sinaiticus (Petrograd), of which the symbol is Ⲁ (Aleph), the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet. These various matters are all explained at length below.

No New Testament Autographs. We are concerned with the problem of how the books of the N.T. have been handed down to us. If we had the autographs, there would be no problem. No one now expects the discovery of an autographed copy of any book of the N.T., though it is abstractly possible, since there are many specimens of papyrus writing from the first century and even earlier. The dry sand piles of Egypt may yet yield more surprises than have been discovered. But even if an original MS. of one of Paul's Epistles were to be found, it would probably be in another's handwriting, save in the little Epistle to Philemon, which Paul apparently wrote himself (Phil. 19). His habit was to dictate to an amanuensis as in the case of Tertius (Rom. 16:22), or as Peter used Silvanus (1 Pet. 5:12). Paul's method was to sign his name at the close (2 Thess. 3:17) as proof of the genuineness of the Epistle.

The Age of Printing. The Mazarin Bible (1455 A.D.) was the first book to be printed, but it was not till 1514 that the first printed Greek N.T. came, the edition of Ximenes, and this was not actually published till 1522. The first Greek N.T. to be published was that of Erasmus, in 1516. It was hurriedly done because the publisher, Frobenius of Basle, was anxious for Erasmus to get his edition out before Ximenes. He succeeded in doing that, but at great cost. At first Erasmus claimed that he had produced the work ad Græcam veritatem, but finally he admitted that it was not so carefully edited as it might have been. He had five minuscule (cursive) MSS. that were late. He had one fairly good minuscule, 1, a tenth century MS., but he based his edition mainly on 2, a poor minuscule of the twelfth century. For the Apocalypse he had only 1^r, which was deficient in the last six verses of the Apocalypse; these Erasmus put into Greek from the Latin Vulgate. Unfortunately this hurriedly printed edition of Erasmus is the basis of the Textus Receptus and the King James Version (A.V.). The text of Erasmus, with some changes effected by Stephens, Beza and the Elzevirs, became stereotyped and won absolute dominion over scholars and the public generally. When Erasmus published his first edition, he was chided by Stunica for having omitted the passage about the Trinity in 1 Jn. 5⁷. 8. In a rash moment Erasmus said that if the passage could be found in a single Greek MS., he would insert it. The passage was translated from the Latin Vulgate and forged into the Greek minuscule 61 of the sixteenth century (now in Dublin). Erasmus suspected the truth, but stood to his promise and put it in. When the R.V. properly left it out, a cry was raised that it was done in the interest of Unitarianism. It should never have been put into the Greek text at all.

The Battle for the Original Text. It has been a hard and long fight to get back of Erasmus' late and imperfect text to a text closer to that of the first century. Even Bengel in 1734 published the Textus Receptus because the publisher and the public would not accept a corrected text. It was not till the time of Griesbach (1744-1777) that the revolt against the work of Erasmus took shape in a way that counted. Griesbach published his Greek N.T. with a critical apparatus that gave scholars an instrument with which to work. He went back behind the printed Greek Testaments to the MSS., which he divided into three families: (1) the Byzantine or Constantinopolitan (the text of Erasmus); (2) the Western type found in D and the Latin Versions; and (3) the Alexandrian as seen in A, B, C, L. The tide began to turn. Lachmann (1842-50) was brave enough to publish his own text with variations of the Textus Receptus at the end. This great innovation bore fruit. His idea was to restore the text of the oldest MSS. Tregelles (1857-1879) carried on the work by showing what was the oldest type of text, not merely that of old MSS. Tischendorf (1864-1872) gave a fuller apparatus than Tregelles, but to the great loss of scholarship Caspar René Gregory, a famous German specialist in the Greek text, was killed in the Great War without bringing Tischendorf up to date. None of the important new discoveries since 1872 are noted in Tischendorf.

It is Westcott and Hort (1881) who have shown modern scholars how to find the best text. They worked out a reliable theory for using the vast mass of MS. evidence for the N.T. books. There are, they said, two lines of evidence, internal and external. The internal evidence of single readings consists of transcriptional and intrinsic evidence. Transcriptional looks at the problem of variations in a given passage or reading from the standpoint of the copyist or scribe. Intrinsic evidence looks at it from the standpoint of the author. By study and care one is able to weigh the evidence in each single reading and to draw a tentative conclusion. By a like process one may test a whole document when each single reading in the document has been duly weighed. Then a group of documents can likewise be weighed. Last and most important of all, the several families or classes of documents can be tested. Westcott and Hort find four families of documents or MSS. (1) The Syrian (like the Byzantine of Griesbach) is found in the late documents only, and when standing alone is wrong. (2) The Western (same term as that used by Griesbach) appears in early documents like D, Old Latin, and Old Syriac, and is not always geographically "Western." (3) The Neutral is represented by the oldest and best documents, like \aleph , A, B, C, Bohairic and Sahidic. (4) The Alexandrian has no document always Alexandrian; it is often found in \aleph , C, L, and represents scholarly corrections of limited range. Streeter in his Four Gospels prefers the term "Byzantine" to "Syrian"; he makes Alexandrian include Neutral, and he divides the Western into Eastern and Western, all of which is plausible. He argues, however, for a further division of Eastern into Antiochian and Caesarean, which is less probable. Von Soden has his own way of reaching very much the same result as Westcott and Hort by a much more complicated system. The method of Westcott still holds the field as scholars endeavor to feel their way back to the first-century MSS. (For a full statement of Westcott and Hort's principles for arriving at the correct reading, see the Appendix to their Greek N.T.)

The Greek Minuscule Codices. These immediately precede the age of printing and exist in very large numbers. There are so many of them for different parts of the N.T. that one is at first bewildered. Over 2300 are known, though many of them have not been examined with great care. When one remembers that there is not a complete copy of Homer before the thirteenth century A.D., or of Herodotus before the tenth, or of the Hebrew Bible before the tenth, he can realize what a marvelous thing it is that over 4,000 Greek MSS. of the N.T. are at the service of modern scholars (Papyri, 32; Uncials, 170; Minuscules, 2,320; Lectionaries, 156), as Gregory counts them). The minuscules supplant the uncials in the tenth century A.D., though the minuscule codex has been pushing out the uncial codex for two centuries. The minuscule codices are written in a flowing or running hand in smaller letters with accents and breathings, some punctuation, and some space between the words. The later minuscules are usually copied from other minuscules, though some of them are copied from uncials, even from early and excellent uncials. When the minuscules are opposed by the early uncials the presumption is strong against them. The minuscules are denoted by Arabic figures, but there is no uniform system observed. The minuscule termed 582 for the Gospels is called 227 for the Acts and 279 for Paul. Some of the minuscules, like 1 (tenth century), 118 (thirteenth century), seem to be copied from the same uncial. Ferrar, of Dublin, has shown that 13, 69, 124, 346 (all of the twelfth century save 69, which is of the fourteenth) come from a common uncial, the so-called Ferrar Group. There are now eight others known to belong to this same Ferrar Group (230, 543, 788, 826, 828, 983, 1689, 1709), a dozen altogether. Paper was not in common use in the West until the thirteenth century. The ordinary material for minuscule writing was the vellum, or parchment, which could show the smaller letters to advantage. The invention of printing won the victory of paper over vellum. There are only 46 minuscule MSS., according to Kenyon, that contain all the N.T., but Von Soden counts 167. The use of vellum made the Codex, or book form, convenient. The combination of the codex form and the small cursive style of writing made it possible for the whole N.T. to be put upon one MS. The papyrus roll and the uncial style of writing made it too cumbersome and unwieldy. The cursive style of writing for private documents had existed for centuries. What was new was the use of it for literary purposes. There are specimens of non-literary papyri as late as the eighth century. Some of the minuscule MSS. are very elaborately ornamented with flourishes at the beginning and at the end. Some are written on purple vellum and are very handsome.

The Greek Uncial Codices. The minuscules were preceded by the uncial codices, which only gradually gave way to them. The uncial letters were larger and were formed separately, like the printing done by children when they are learning to write. The codex book forms suited the uncial style of writing much better than the papyrus roll which preceded it. The parchment codex displaced the papyrus roll for literary purposes in the fourth century. So, then, the uncial codex period runs from the fourth to the tenth century. The pages in the parchment (membrane) usually were square and had two to four columns to the page. Two was the common number, as in A, though B has three columns to the page and forty-two lines to the column. \aleph has four narrow columns to the page and forty-eight lines to the column. There is no separation between the words; the value of the vellum made it necessary to conserve space. Surely, one needed skill to pick up the words and to read aloud in public, as was often done (Rev. 13). Some of the scribes developed wonderfully fine handwriting. There were schools for publishing books; the reader would dictate and the scribes would copy rapidly. In such cases the spelling would vary greatly because of the similarity of sound in some vowels and diphthongs. The scribe of \aleph is fond of iota (i) while the scribe of B prefers ei to i. It is possible that \aleph and B are two of the fifty copies of the Greek Bible ordered to be published by Constantine, an order carried out under the direction of Eusebius of Cæsarea. There had been great destruction of the Greek MSS. in the Roman persecutions. It is a wonder that any were spared at all.

The first complete Bibles in one language were the Greek Bibles, as we see in \aleph , B, and A, except when portions are lost. \aleph is the only uncial that contains the entire N.T. B stops in the middle of Hebrews (913) while A lacks Mt. 11-256 Jn. 650-862 2 Cor. 413-127. There are 170 uncials for different portions of the N.T. They vary greatly in value. For the Gospels there are six primary uncials (B, \aleph , A, C, D, W). Two of these (\aleph and B) belong to the fourth century, A.D., and are far and away the best in value. B, the Vatican MS., is in the Vatican Library in Rome, and is the best single Greek MS. for the N.T., and the best representative of the Neutral type of text for the Gospels and Acts. Two correctors have made alterations in it. A good photographic copy can now be had. The Codex Sinaiticus is in Petrograd. Tischendorf discovered it at the Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. Its symbol is \aleph . There have been seven correctors who have made changes in it. The discovery of this MS. led Tischendorf to get out the eighth edition of his Novum Testamentum Graece, which, because of \aleph , differs in three thousand places from the seventh edition. It has a mixed text, usually Neutral with B, but sometimes Western with D, or Alexandrian with CL. A (Codex Alexandrinus) is now in the British Museum, and it also has been photographed. This codex belongs to the first half of the fifth century. Enlarged capital letters appear at the beginning of new paragraphs. It shows four different hands in the N.T. and has a mixed text. In the Gospels it frequently has Syrian readings, while in the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse it is mainly Neutral. It is the best MS. known for the Apocalypse. C (Codex Ephræmi Rescriptus) is in Paris and also belongs to the fifth century. It has fragments of all the books save 2 Thessalonians and 2 John. The manuscript is a palimpsest (a parchment which has been written over a second time). In the twelfth century, sermons of Ephræm Syrus in Syriac were written over the Greek of the N.T. (One wonders if other sermons have not sometimes obscured the meaning of Scripture!) The Greek was in one column and the Syriac in two columns. New paragraphs begin with larger letters and the Eusebian or Ammonian sections appear in the margin. It has also a mixed text (Neutral, Alexandrian, even Syrian). D (Codex Bezae) belongs to the sixth century and is in Cambridge, England. It is bilingual, Greek (left page) and Latin (right page), and has only the Gospels and Acts. It is the earliest Greek form of the pure Western Text. The relation between the Greek and the Latin Text is not clear. It was apparently made in the West, as the Old Latin was, though it shows affinities with the Old Syriac of the East (Syriac of Cureton and Syriac Sinaitic—see below). There are some remarkable readings found nowhere else, as in Lk. 64. The MS. contains frequent lacunæ or gaps. At the end of the Gospel of Luke there are many omissions and in the Acts so many additions that Blass, to relieve the scribe of D from the responsibility for these vagaries, has suggested two editions of the Gospel and the Acts by Luke himself, but the theory has not won much following. It is possible that this scribe knew Latin better than he did Greek. The sixth primary uncial is W (Washington Codex) which may belong to the end of the fourth, not later than the early part of the sixth century. It is in Washington and contains only the Gospels. It was bought in Egypt by Mr. C. L. Freer, of Detroit. The chief readings have been published by H. A. Sanders and E. J. Goodspeed. There are no chapter or section titles, though the paragraphs show a little punctuation. Brief titles appear at the beginning and the end of each Gospel. The books appear in the Western order (Matthew, John, Luke, Mark). After Mk. 16¹⁴ there is a peculiar addition, found in no other Greek MS. It has a mixed text (Neutral, Western, Alexandrian, even Syrian). Photographic copies may be obtained of all these codices. Besides these six primary uncials there are over 160 secondary uncials of varying worth and of later date. Some of them have not as much value as the best of the minuscules.

The Greek Lectionaries. There are over 1500 of these lectionaries. They give detached portions of the N.T. for public reading in worship. They show explanatory changes in the text at the beginning or close of the passage to make the paragraph understood by itself apart from the context. The body of the passage is usually unchanged. The earliest lectionary known belongs to the sixth century. Most of them are in the uncial style of writing, which lasts in the lectionaries till the eleventh century, a century longer than the uncial style in the continuous text. The type of text is usually Syrian or Western. Those for the Gospels are called Evangelitaria or Evangelistaria, while those for the Acts or the Epistles are termed Apostoli or Praxapostoli.

Papyrus Fragments. Sometimes papyrus codices appear, but usually the form employed for the papyrus sheets was the roll. The papyrus codex is found in Asia Minor as early as the first century A.D., but by the fourth century the parchment (or vellum) displaced the use of papyrus for literary purposes. Gregory thinks that Christian scribes introduced the codex, or leaf-book form, into the MSS. of the N.T. in order to be able more easily to find a passage.

Papyrus was employed by the Greeks for books from the fifth century B.C., to the fourth century A.D. The papyrus reed grew mainly in Egypt, though it was found also in Sicily and in Syria in marshes or pools. The inner bark or pith was sliced and these slices were placed side by side, pressed, and moistened with sticky glue. Then like pieces were placed crosswise. If only one side was used, the writing would be on the horizontal lines. The separate sheets were glued together to make a roll of any desired length. Often both sides were used in writing, like the roll in Rev. 5¹. One in Greek would begin on the left and make column after column to the right. Then the roll would be folded so that the outside sheet would be at the beginning. As the roll was read, it would be unrolled on the right and folded up on the left. Sometimes a stick would be put in to hold the roll in place. The roll of the prophet Isaiah (probably in the LXX) was handed to Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth, and he opened it (unrolled it) and shut it (rolled it up) and gave it back to the attendant (Lk. 4^{17, 19}). Sometimes writing tablets were used in school or in correspondence. Zacharias apparently employed one (Lk. 1⁶³). They were small, although a tablet might contain as much as 2 John or even Philemon. A stylus was used to write on the wax tablet. The usual method of writing in the first century (and till 300 A.D.) was the papyrus roll. The longer literary works might be on parchment. It is possible (by no means certain) that the Gospels and the Acts were written on parchment, though it is clear that the Epistles were first written on papyrus. A soot ink (black) was used on the papyrus. The pen was made from a reed. Note ink (black) and pen (reed) in 3 Jn. v. 13 and the black ink referred to in 2 Cor. 33. For the roll, papyrus was preferable; for the codex form, parchment. The papyrus was light and delicate, but the parchment allowed the use of larger letters which were more easily read.

The great papyri discoveries of Grenfell and Hunt in Egypt have turned a flood of light on the whole subject of ancient writing. The vast mass of material already printed from Oxyrhynchus, Fayum, Hibeh, and Tebtunis preserve some specimens of the old Greek writers that were lost. Most of the specimens run from the third century B.C. to the third century A.D. (some even later). The papyrus is very brittle and has survived in Egypt only because of preservation in the dry sand. Many specimens are mere scraps and are mainly odds and ends of things, bills, receipts, love letters, tax-bills, etc. But there are thousands of examples of the very material employed by the N.T. writers, written in the very kind of Greek found in the N.T., the current koiné, mostly vernacular, but partly literary. (See art., Language of N.T., p. 880.) But do the papyri furnish any portions of the text of the Greek N.T.? They do, but no entire book has yet been found such as we have so abundantly in the uncial and minuscule codices. But thirty-four N.T. fragments have turned up and one is constantly hoping that others may be found. Some of these fragments are leaves of books. Some are from rolls. A dozen of them belong to the fourth century, and give the text of \aleph B (Neutral). Several others belong to the third or fourth and a half dozen others clearly belong to the third century. Two of these, Papyrus¹ and Papyrus⁵ give the oldest scraps of the Greek N.T. yet found in MS., a century older than \aleph and B. They give the same type of text, and strongly confirm the Neutral type.

The Need for Versions. The Greek Koiné in which the N.T. books were written was the common language of the Græco-Roman world. It was not degenerate Greek by any means, but a language wonderfully adapted to the commercial and literary needs of the time. By this Greek Koiné men of all classes were reached in address, conversation, letters, official documents, books. In Rome itself Greek was a common medium of communication. The Emperor Marcus Aurelius wrote his Meditations in Greek. Paul wrote to the Roman church in Greek a letter that was meant to be read in public. But there were outlying districts where Greek was little known. When the gospel penetrated the mountain districts of Syria, there soon arose a demand for a Syriac translation. A like demand for Egyptian (Coptic) versions came as the gospel went up the Nile from Alexandria. In North Africa around the old Carthage region Latin still held its place against the Greek. In the course of time there arose a call for versions in Æthiopia, in Armenia, in Persia and even in Britain (Anglo-Saxon). These later and secondary versions have little value for the text of the N.T. The versions do not compare in worth with the older Greek MSS. Many of the finer and more precise shades of meaning cannot be put into any translation. But the versions do bear witness to the presence or absence of a sentence, clause, or paragraph. The versions of chief importance are the Syriac, the Egyptian (Coptic), and the Latin. These alone call for discussion. We should not forget that in the versions we are dealing with MSS. often differ among themselves in giving some particular reading. These MSS. differ in date and in value.

The Syriac Versions. Palestine was a bilingual country, and Jesus himself spoke either in Aramaic or in Greek, as was true of Paul. The Syriac of Syria (or Assyria) was not identical with the Aramaic of Palestine, though closely kin to it. We do not know when the first Syriac translation was made. The famous Diatessaron of Tatian appeared in Rome about 170 A.D. It was the first of the Gospel harmonies, of which so many have since been made. Tatian made a continuous narrative by combining the four Gospels. It can now be read in English from the Arabic version. We do not know whether Tatian made his harmony in Syriac or in Greek. The type of text is mainly the Western, though sometimes Neutral with \aleph and B. It is held by Von Soden that Tatian's Diatessaron, because of its continuous narrative, is the chief disturbing factor in the text of the Gospels.

We know the Old Syriac (apparently made about 200 A.D.) from two important MSS. (1) The oldest is the Sinaitic Syriac (Syr.^{sin.}) which seems to belong to the fourth century. Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, two scholarly sisters of Cambridge, England, discovered this MS., a palimpsest, in the same Monastery of Saint Catherine on Mount Sinai where Tischendorf found \aleph . The MS. is still at Mount Sinai, but it has been photographed.

It is defective and contains only portions of the Gospels. In Mt. 11⁶ it has the famous reading, "Joseph begat Jesus," but it also contains the passage Mt. 119-25, the message of the angel to Joseph, showing that the copyist accepted the virgin birth of Jesus. The MS., though belonging to the East, is mainly Western in type. (2) The Curetonian Syriac (Syr.^{cu.}) is the other Old Syriac document. It belongs to the fifth century and gives only the Gospels. Much of it is lost and it often gives the Western text. It does not always agree with the Sinaitic Syriac. It gives the usual text in Mt. 11⁶ and contains also Mt. 1617-20 (absent in the Sinaitic Syriac) and has a short doxology in Mt. 613.

The Peshitta Syriac (Syr.^{sch.}) was once supposed to be the oldest Syriac version, but is now placed in the fifth century. It does not contain 2 and 3 John, 2 Peter, Jude, or the Apocalypse. There are 243 copies of this version. The word Peshitta means "simple," and this version came to be the current version, like the Latin Vulgate or the English A.V. The type of text is usually Syrian, though occasionally pre-Syrian readings are retained. In the year 508 Philoxenus had a new revision made by Polycarp, called the Philoxenian (Syr.^{phil.}). In 616 Thomas of Harkel revised this revision, the Harklean Version (Syr.^{h.}). There are 51 MSS. of this version. It contains marginal readings in Greek which give a different text. The translation is literal and rather rough. When Tischendorf first made his critical apparatus he knew only the Peshitta and the Harklean, which he called posterior (later). The Jerusalem or Palestinian Syriac (Syr.^{h.}) is an independent version made in the sixth century. The various MSS. of this version do not agree, but they give the Neutral or Western type of text. (Cf. pp. 103-5.)

The Egyptian Versions. The Egyptian (Coptic) Versions are mainly two. The Sahidic or Thebaic belongs to upper Egypt, where a version would be needed first as the gospel spread up the Nile. The Coptic language is a sort of bridge between the Greek and the old Egyptian. The translation was probably made about 200 A.D. or a little sooner. There are 751 fragments of this version. The type of text is Neutral or Western. It does not agree with D or the Old Latin in any additions. The Bohairic is called also Memphitic or Coptic and is probably to be dated 250 A.D. It contains the whole of the N.T. and is used to-day by Coptic Christians. The MSS. do not always agree. The better ones omit Jn. 54 and Jn. 753-811. Two copies agree with L in giving both endings for Mark's Gospel. (See notes on Mk. 16^{9f.}) The type of text is usually Neutral or Alexandrian. Very little is known about the Bashmuri or Middle Egyptian Version, though it is rather more like the Sahidic than the Bohairic.

The Latin Versions. Tischendorf knew only two, the Old Latin and the Vulgate, but the Old Latin MSS. (represented by single letters, a, b, etc.) differ so much that scholars now hold to three Latin Versions. The oldest is the African Latin, made in North Africa by the end of the second century or the beginning of the third. Tertullian and Cyprian seemed to know it. The MSS. of it are few, like k, e, r, m. The type of text is mainly Western. The European Latin probably came in the third century. The chief MSS. are a, b, d, g, p, gig. The type of text is now Western, now Neutral. The Latin translation of Irenæus was the European Latin text. The confusion over the Latin MSS. led Pope Damasus to ask Eusebius Hieronymus (Jerome) to make a new translation. This he did, completing the Gospels in 383 A.D., and the whole of the N.T. by 386. He used the best of the Old Latin MSS. (a, b, g, k) and some good Greek MSS. of the Neutral type. As a result the Latin Vulgate is more often Neutral than is the Old Latin (African or European). Some of the 30,000 Vulgate MSS. continued to make use of the Old Latin. The work of Jerome was bitterly fought by many. It won slowly, and finally came to be regarded (as it still is in Roman Catholicism) as the only correct text. It had a tremendous influence on the modern versions and the Textus Receptus. The modern critical text has been fought hard, but not so hard as Jerome's Vulgate text was by "the little asses," as he dubbed them. Wordsworth and White have issued a critical edition of the Latin Vulgate text.

The Fathers. The quotations from the early Greek, Syriac, and Latin writers are helpful especially because they give a date for the type of readings found in them. Most of the quotations are not carefully made and are of more value as proving the existence of a passage than as furnishing the exact language. Occasionally a man expressly says that he is quoting a document. As a rule, a commentator is more reliable because he has a MS. or several of them right before him as he writes. The codex book form was more easily used for quotations than the roll. The Greek writers include Marcion, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Cyril of Alexandria, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus, Epiphanius, Chrysostom. The Latin writers include Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Pelagius, Primasius, the Venerable Bede. The Syriac fathers embrace Aphraates, Ephræm Syrus, Ishodad of Merv. The N.T. could be reproduced in sense from these writers. When we consider all the copyings and translations, it is a marvel how accurately the text of the N.T. can be restored to-day free from any heresy or real error.

Literature: For a fairly exhaustive bibliography on the subject of the Textual Criticism of the N.T. the reader may be referred to the writer's Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the N.T., pp. 265-278. Other books of importance not there mentioned are Pitollot and Batiffol, The Oldest Text of The Gospels; Streeter, The Four Gospels; Robertson, Studies in the Text of the N.T. See also the articles on the subject in the various Bible Dictionaries.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS

By PROFESSOR E. W. BURCH

The Problem. The first three Gospels form a group of N.T. books to be studied in their mutual relations. These works present the oldest known form of the gospel story. They do not, however, represent the earliest written account of the ministry and teaching of Jesus. For Luke (1¹) plainly states that he is indebted to earlier written works. "Many," he says, "took it in hand to write of these things." Tradition warrants the supposition that Mark depended upon information furnished him by others. Tradition also suggests that the writer of the first Gospel depended upon memoranda of sayings of Jesus, and comparison shows that both Luke and Matthew depended upon Mark, the oldest Gospel now in our possession. The fact of mutual relationship is apparent to any reader of these three Gospels. But the explanation of that relationship is another matter. The minute and patient study of the Gospels by expert scholars during the past decades has resulted in the accumulation of a wealth of facts, but these do not submit to the demands of any one explanation thus far offered. Synoptic criticism is the name given to the study and attempted solution of the critical question: How shall all these facts be explained so as to present a clear and convincing account of the rise and interrelations of the first three Gospels? The term "synoptic" (of Greek derivation) as applied to these three Gospels describes their parallelism and general agreement in outline. The three Gospels can be looked at together.

The synoptic question is more than a speculative matter, and its solution will be more than the satisfaction of men's curiosity. For the literary history of the Gospels is closely bound up with the history of Christianity and with the development of thought about Jesus and his message. While the interpretation of the Gospels does not have to wait on the final answer to the synoptic query, all progress toward its solution will serve to shed further light on Jesus' life and teachings and on their effect upon the thought life of the early church.

I. FACTS THAT CONSTITUTE THE LITERARY PROBLEM OF THE GOSPELS

1. Narrative and Discourse Material. There are two different types of material in each of the Gospels, namely, narrative and discourse. The narrative is basic. This is the story as such. In narrative there will occur some spoken words, as dialogue, necessary to carry the story. But in the story proper no extended address or teaching material, as such, is included. In Mark the narrative predominates, only about four thousand words of teaching or discourse being found in a total of over eleven thousand (Greek) words. (For more precise figures on the basis of the original see Burch, Ethical Teaching of the Gospels, pp. 18, 76, 160). In round numbers, Matthew has 8,000 words of narrative, 10,500 of discourse, total 18,500; Luke has 11,750 of narrative, 9,250 of discourse, total 21,000. The narrative of Matthew (8,000) is thus not far from that of Mark (7,270) in extent. Such passages as Mk. 11⁶⁻²⁰, the Call of the Four Disciples, and Mk. 51²⁰, the Gerasene Demoniac, illustrate narrative material.

Serious address to any company, large or small, constitutes discourse material, the second type of composition found in the Gospels. In Mark, the parables in 42⁹, 26³² and in 121¹¹ as well as the long address in 135³⁷ illustrate discourse. The narrative portions are used chiefly in the study of the life of Jesus, while discourse portions form the chief object of study when the teaching of Jesus is under consideration.

2. Comparative Scarcity of Incidents. Relatively few incidents are chosen for portrayal in the gospel narrative, when the great number of things that Jesus did are considered. This is an impressive fact. In the basic Gospel, Mark, not over thirty-one days can be identified, at least as far as definite content is concerned. This count of thirty-one days is based upon the following passages: 19-13 114-20 121-34 135-38 139-45 21-22 223-36 37-19a 319b-441 51-20 521-43 61-6a 67-13 630-52 653-723 724-30 731-37 81-10 811-26 827-91 92-29 933-50 101-31 1032-45 1046-52 111-11 1112-19 1120-33 141-11 1412-52 1453-1547. It is stated that the temptation continued for forty days, but no definite event of any of these days is given. So also such statements as six days later (Mk. 92) occur without accounting for any event within that time. The ministry of Jesus lasted for at least five hundred and fifty days, and probably longer (see art., Chronology of N.T., p. 875). Yet the narrative of the ministry confines itself to less than five weeks in all. When a comparative study of the Gospels reveals that for the most part the synoptic writers all refer to this relatively small part of Jesus' life, the total number of days accounted for in all three scarcely exceeding forty, the fact becomes even more impressive.

3. Use of Mark by Matthew and Luke.

The outline of Mark is traceable in both Matthew and Luke. At the point where the narrative of Matthew joins that of Mark (Mk. 1¹ Mt. 3¹), the common subject is that of John Baptist's ministry. With a Harmony of the Gospels in hand (such as Finney's translation of Huck's Synopsis) one can trace the same subjects in Mark and Matthew in the same order until Mt. 4²² (parallel to Mk. 1²⁰) is reached. Beginning again at the story of Herod and Jesus (Mt. 14¹) and continuing to the narrative of the Empty Grave (Mt. 28¹⁻¹⁰ Mk. 16¹⁻⁸) the narratives of Mark and Matthew proceed in the same order. Between Mt. 4²², parallel to Mk. 1²⁰, and Mt. 14¹, parallel to Mk. 6¹⁴ (the Death of John Baptist), Mark has seventeen incidents (narrative passages), of which Matthew reproduces all but one (Mk. 13⁵⁻³⁸), but here the order of the narratives in Matthew is not the same. As far as Mark's narrative is concerned, it is practically all found in the first Gospel.

From Mk. 6¹⁴ (parallel to Mt. 14¹) to Mk. 16⁸ (parallel to Mt. 28⁸) there are at least thirty narrative sections (the number varying slightly with the arrangement of topics in the Harmonies). Of these Matthew has all but the Widow's Mite (Mk. 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴) and in the same order, excepting that Matthew places the Cleansing of the Temple a day earlier than Mark (cf. Mt. 21¹⁰⁻¹⁷ and Mk. 11^{11, 15-19}). Matthew adds the narratives of the Temple-tax (17²⁴⁻²⁷) and of the Lament Over Jerusalem (23³⁷⁻³⁹). Thus fully does Matthew reproduce the order of the narrative of Mark.

Luke also follows the order of Mark's narrative. From Lk. 3¹, parallel to Mk. 1¹, to Lk. 24¹¹, parallel to Mk. 16⁸, there are about fifty narratives, corresponding to Mark's order, exceptions offering but slight changes. E.g., Luke has a different account of the call of the first disciples (5¹⁻¹¹) which is placed after the day in Capernaum rather than before it (cf. Mk. 1¹⁶⁻²⁰), and in places, as in ch. 8, the introduction of discourse leads to a rearrangement of narrative. These are negligible variations on the order of Mark. Some non-Markan narratives are introduced by Luke. These are Jesus' Rejection at Nazareth (4¹⁶⁻³⁰), the Centurion of Capernaum (7¹⁻¹⁰), Raising of the Widow's Son at Nain (7¹¹⁻¹⁷), the Messengers from John Baptist (7¹⁸⁻²³), Jesus Anointed by a Sinful Woman (7³⁶⁻⁵⁰), Preaching Tour with the Women and the Twelve (8¹⁻³), the Inhospitable Samaritans (9⁵¹⁻⁵⁶), the Mission of the Seventy (10¹⁻²⁰), the Visit to Martha and Mary (10³⁸⁻⁴²), Healing of the Rheumatic Woman (13¹⁰⁻¹⁷), Jesus Warned Against Herod (13³¹⁻³³), Healing of the Dropsical Man (14¹⁻⁶), the Ten Lepers (17¹¹⁻¹⁹), the Visit to Zacchæus (19¹⁻¹⁰) and many circumstances of the Passion Story. The omissions of Luke (with respect to the narrative of Mark) involve chiefly that part of Mark between the Feeding of the Five Thousand (6⁴⁶) and Peter's Confession (8²⁷). This long omission includes the Walking on the Water, Healing of the Greek Woman's Daughter, Return to Galilee, Feeding the Four Thousand, and Healing the Blind Man at Bethsaida. Luke is notable for his additions to the gospel material, perhaps over fifty per cent of his work showing unique material, chiefly discourse. But compared with Mark's fifty-five narrative sections, Luke offers about fifty, exclusive of chs. 1, 2. Luke's omissions in the parts parallel with Mark are balanced by his introduction of new material.

The outline of Mark is traceable in both Matthew and Luke most plainly when only the narrative portions are observed.

Below, under the consideration in section II, 4 and 5, of the document called Q (German Quelle, meaning "Source"), particular attention will be paid to the discourse sections found in Matthew and Luke.

4. Similarities Between the Gospels.

Remarkable similarities in phraseology between the three Gospels often occur, and more often between two, i.e., between Mark and Matthew and between Mark and Luke. Similarities in phraseology between Matthew and Luke, chiefly in discourse, constitute a problem in themselves.

No attempt is made here to marshal all the evidence, but a few characteristic examples follow. (For greater detail see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticae; Sanday, Oxford Studies in the Synoptic Problem; and Streeter, The Four Gospels.)

(1) Similarities between the narratives of the three Gospels. The narrative of the Healing of the Leper, Mk. 140-45, and parallels, is couched in words often exactly the same. The variations are chiefly those of style or word-choice. Attention is called particularly to Mk. 140-42 Mt. 82, 3 Lk. 512, 13. In this part of the threefold narrative, of Mark's 28 words (Greek) Matthew exactly reproduces 20 and Luke 22. In the entire narrative Mark uses 97 words, Matthew 62, Luke 98. Of Mark's 97 words Matthew exactly reproduces 39, while Luke offers 42.

The Healing of the Withered Hand, especially that part of the narrative in Mk. 34-6 Mt. 12:12-14 Lk. 6:9-11, furnishes a typical illustration of threefold agreement.

It cannot be claimed that any threefold parallel of considerable length is given in the same language throughout. The verbal agreement in a large number of these narratives is not far different from the examples above cited. Other passages which will repay study are the Healing of the Demoniac in the Tombs, Mk. 51-20 Mt. 8:23-34 Lk. 8:26-39; the Unrest of Herod at the Appearance of Jesus, Mk. 6:14-16 Mt. 14:1, 2 Lk. 9:7-9; and the Feeding of the Five Thousand, Mk. 6:35-44 Mt. 14:15-21 Lk. 9:12-17.

A study of all the gospel material indicates a somewhat closer verbal correspondence between sections of discourse than between narratives. In the passages above cited the closest verbal agreement is found in words spoken by Jesus and his disciples. This rule applies as well to longer passages of teaching found in the three Gospels. Note such places as the following: Jesus on Fasting, Mk. 2:18-22 Mt. 9:14-17 Lk. 5:33-39; on the Danger of Riches, a combination of narrative and teaching, Mk. 10:17-31 Mt. 19:16-30 Lk. 18:18-30; the Synoptic Apocalypse, Mk. 13 Mt. 24 Lk. 21.

(2) Similarities between narratives of two Gospels. Similarity or identity of phraseology is frequent between Mark and Matthew and between Mark and Luke. In many such places, the remaining Gospel (Matthew or Luke) offers a near-parallel, identified as the same story, yet cast into other words.

The narrative of Mk. 6:45-52 Mt. 14:22-33, describing Jesus walking on the water, has no parallel in Luke (cf. above, Luke's long omission). The narrative of the Alien Exorcist, Mk. 9:38f. Lk. 9:49f., illustrates again the twofold agreement. For other examples of double agreement, with Mark the basic text, see Mk. 1:23-28 Lk. 4:33-37; Mk. 12:41-44 Lk. 21:1-4; Mk. 4:33f. Mt. 13:34f.; Mk. 6:17f. Mt. 14:3f. (cf. Lk. 3:19f.); Mk. 10:35-45 Mt. 20:20-28; Mk. 11:12-14 Mt. 21:18f. As the number of illustrations implies, such parallels are much more frequent between Mark and Matthew than between Mark and Luke.

The occurrence of the third near-parallel, but in different form, is noteworthy in such passages as the story of Jesus' Rejection at Nazareth, Mk. 6:1-6 Mt. 13:53-58, cf. Lk. 4:16-30; and the Storm on the Lake, Mk. 4:35-41 Lk. 8:22-25, cf. Mt. 8:23-27.

The parallelism between Luke and Matthew, mostly in discourse, involves gospel material that is absent from Mark in almost all instances. This material (termed non-Markan) is generally traced to the long-lost document called Q (see below, section II, 4 and 5). Particularly noteworthy passages, frequently involving word-for-word parallelism in the original, are John Baptist's words, Mt. 37-10 Lk. 37-9; Words to the Disciples, Mt. 10:26-33 Lk. 12:2-9; On Backsliding, Mt. 12:43-45 Lk. 11:24-26; The Woe upon Tyre and Sidon, Mt. 11:20-24 Lk. 10:13-15; and many other passages, long and short. Harnack, who prepared the most widely known reconstruction of Q, estimates that the parallel non-Markan material amounts to one sixth of Luke and two elevenths of Matthew. (See Harnack, The Sayings of Jesus [Eng. trans.]. A more recent study of Q appears in Streeter, The Four Gospels, pp. 273-292.)

5. Dissimilarities Between the Gospels. Remarkable dissimilarities appear in a comparative study of the first three Gospels. These dissimilarities consist of (1) changes in context for certain sayings or incidents, (2) differences in content, (3) omissions from or additions to a given saying or incident, and (4) the use of unique material.

(1) Some of these phenomena find illustration in passages cited above. The incident of the anointing of Jesus by a woman (Lk. 7:36-50; cf. Mk. 14:3-9 and Mt. 26:6-13) serves admirably to illustrate a changed context. The Lord's Prayer serves as an illustration in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 6:9-15), but in Lk. 11:1-4 the prayer is repeated to a disciple who asks Jesus to teach him to pray. The so-called Lament Over Jerusalem is uttered by Jesus when in sight of Jerusalem, according to Mt. 23:37-39, but in Lk. 13:34f. the context indicates that Jesus was far from the Holy City (cf. Lk. 19:41-44). Matthew and Luke seldom agree upon the context of discourse material.

A single Gospel frequently contains the same saying in two different contexts. These so-called "doublets" suggest that often the writer himself was not certain of the original context but felt competent to use the saying as appropriate to more than one occasion.

(2) The difference in content between gospel passages is shown in two of the Beatitudes. Matthew says (5:3): "Blessed are the poor in spirit." Luke, in the parallel passage (6:20), says: "Blessed are ye poor." In the other Beatitude (Mt. 5:6, cf. Lk. 6:21), "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness" is set over against "Blessed are ye that hunger now." These are clearly parallel sayings, yet they do not say the same thing.

(3) Omissions and additions are of various kinds and degrees. In narrative it has appeared that both Matthew and Luke reproduce most of Mark, yet each has felt at liberty to omit matter that collided with his aim or with any particular view of the subject that he held. The dissimilarity in the latter instance goes back of the narrative or saying and represents a fundamental difference between writers. Such a datum, naturally, would be seized upon by the so-called Formgeschichtliche School (see below) as an evidence of development of thought about Jesus or about the movement that centered in him. Mark offers without comment the narrative of the Blind Man of Bethsaida (822-26), whose healing is described by no later evangelist, whether in view of the fact that Jesus made a second attempt before the cure was completed, or for other reasons, cannot be known. On the other hand, Matthew adds to his form of the Golden Rule (712) the explanation, "for this is the law and the prophets" (cf. Lk. 631). Such additions to matter found in a discourse source are usually ascribed to the writer of the Gospel. For to a later generation than that to which Jesus spoke some of his words, in the view of the evangelists, had to be explained. If the fourth Gospel were to be adduced here for illustration, there would be no lack of instances in point.

When large blocks of discourse (e.g., Lk. 951-1814) are inserted it is usually supposed that a special source was available. The infancy stories and much of the Passion story come under such a category. Where neither a special source seems likely nor any trace of a personal bias is suspected, differences between the Gospels are accounted for by supposing that the source available to the writer was itself composite. (See, in intro. to Luke in this volume, pp. 1022-3, the newer theory as to Proto-Luke, a document made up of several earlier sources of different dates and places of origin.)

(4) Unique material is included logically in additions to the tradition, but in view of the extent of such material it claims special mention in an exhibit of facts. Recent writers on Gospel origins have emphasized the existence of special sources, from which a writer drew material not available to any of the others. Streeter's document M, containing matter found only in Matthew, and his hypothetical L, containing the Lukan unique tradition, find abundant warrant in the mass of special contributions made by these evangelists respectively. No special source (unless it be the once popular Ur-Markus) is required for Mark. Not even Q seems to be needed to explain the relatively small amount of Markan material that overlaps the reconstructed non-Markan source. On the other hand, such matter in

Matthew and Luke is so extensive as to forbid its presentation in this article. A glance at the beginning of Matthew as compared with that of Luke, and even a superficial study of their respective Passion stories, impresses one with the wealth of special information available to the two evangelists or at least used by each of them. The list of parables peculiar to each of the two later synoptists is instructive and impressive. In Matthew the Tares (1324-30); the Hid Treasure, the Pearl and the Net (1344-50); the Unmerciful Servant (1823-35); the Vineyard Laborers (201-16); the Two Sons (2128-32); and the Ten Virgins (251-13), stand over against fully sixteen parables found in Luke only, among them some of the most frequently quoted, even in colloquial speech. (See art., Parables of Jesus, p. 919.)

Summary. A few statements at this point will summarize the facts comprising the chief elements in the literary problem of the Gospels. 1. The first three Gospels are from different hands, yet they present in the main a unitary view of Jesus' works and words. In this fact the name "synoptic" finds its appropriateness. 2. Two of the Gospels make extensive use of the outline of Mark. Thus one of the sources of both Matthew and Luke, especially for their narrative, lies at hand. 3. A large proportion of Matthew and Luke is non-Markan and also in a high degree parallel. This argues for a single common source (or sources), the substance of which is discourse. The theory of interdependence between Matthew and Luke is not supported. 4. Remarkable similarities in wording between the Gospels are counterbalanced by striking differences. This fact operates as a check upon the finding that the outline of Mark is traceable in both Matthew and Luke. Freedom in the use of sources and the use of sources not available to other writers are suggested by this finding. 5. Change of context for incident or saying is a frequent phenomenon where parallel matter is used. This does not invalidate the view that the matter came from common sources, in view of the freedom generally exercised by each evangelist. 6. The composite nature of both Matthew and Luke is established by the foregoing facts. Mark appears to be unitary, although the author himself was not an eyewitness. The use of sources, then, or at least of one source, oral or written, must be ascribed to Mark.

II. STAGES IN THE SOLUTION OF THE LITERARY PROBLEM OF THE GOSPELS

The foregoing facts are not easily harmonized under a single theory. It is precisely the mixture of agreement and disagreement, of parallelism and non-parallelism, that stands in the way of a complete understanding of the literary history of the first three Gospels. The very multitude of facts brought to light has made progress slow, although the development of better technique in scholarship and the collaboration of a large number of investigators have brought fairly dependable results in this field during the past few decades.

1. The Textual Situation. The Gospels are written in Greek, while Jesus probably spoke in Aramaic. The autographs (original gospel documents) were soon worn out through handling and were replaced by hand-written copies. An unknown number of such copyings intervened between the autographs and the oldest existing MS. of the Gospels (dated in the fourth century A.D.). Thus repeated stages of translation and copying stand between the oldest known Greek Gospel and the actual words spoken by Jesus. In existing MSS. many variations in phraseology exist, and editors differ even to-day as to which of these "various readings" in certain places are original. The Greek Testament used by scholars is not a copy of any one MS. but the result of comparative study of all MSS. Thus it may happen that scholarship in the future will find an increased or a lessened degree of correspondence between the Gospels. It is not likely that a radical change will be made by this means, yet the reconstruction of the Greek text is very important to synoptic criticism and must always be reckoned with. (See further on this the art., Transmission of N.T., p. 861).

2. The Environment of the Gospel Writer. The approach to the study of the Gospels from a historical as well as from a literary point of view has led to a study of the circumstances under which each Gospel was written. (See intro. to commentaries on Matthew, Mark, and Luke.) Each Gospel was written with a limited circulation in view. A given church, be it in Rome, in Antioch, or in Corinth, wished its own "Gospel," or written account of the Lord's life and words. The recognition of a specific place and of a certain group, living and working under its own conditions, has been found to assist in the understanding of the gospel material and its arrangement. The newer school in Germany that approaches the problem from the point of view of the shaping of the message or the incidents (Formgeschichte) makes use of this historic element. In one Gospel a saying of Jesus may be in almost if not quite the form in which Jesus uttered it, while in another Gospel that saying may be adapted to use in the liturgy or in the teaching of catechumens. This manner of historical study of the problem is likely to yield excellent results not yet attained.

3. Priority and Originality of the Canonical Mark. The discovery, about a century ago, that Mark was the basis of Matthew and Luke did much to discredit the theory of oral transmission, to which theory some credence was given even down to recent times. An element of oral transmission must be insisted upon, for writing did not begin at once. But it is clearly seen at present that the canonical Gospels cannot be explained as the product of an existing oral Gospel. The documentary theory was really well established when the priority of Mark was discovered. There was needed only the determination of the type of documentary theory, which awaited the discovery of the number and nature of the documents involved.

The originality of Mark was not established as early as was its priority. The long omission of Luke (see section I, 3), it was supposed, argued for the existence of a shorter form of Mark. It is as easy to suppose that Luke had a defective copy or that he omitted the section involved for some reason not now known. Streeter argues plausibly for the "mutilated copy" theory (op. cit., pp. 174f.). Advocates of an earlier form of Mark could not agree as to its length, whether shorter or longer than the canonical Mark. At present the view that the canonical Mark best answers all critical requirements is chiefly in vogue.

4. Studies of the Non-Markan Discourse Source. Whatever the document or documents designated by the symbols Q or L (Logia or "Sayings") may have been, the same disappeared from human knowledge before the end of the century in which such sources or source found favor with gospel writers. The non-Markan discourse is preserved only in Matthew and Luke. It is possible that such a saying as that in Acts 20³⁵, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," could be traced to one of the written documents which the evangelists used, and many of the so-called agrapha (unrecorded sayings) may bring to us from patristic or other writings (e.g., apocryphal Gospels) traces of this hypothetical literature. The Gospels, however, may be supposed to have drawn from Q (or the Logia) all that was significant.

Many scholars have sought, through the study of the parallel non-Markan sections in Matthew and Luke, to reconstruct one document from which these two writers drew (see "Literature" at close of this article). The net result of these studies has done more to stimulate than to conclude the work of solving the synoptic problem. The resultant document as reconstructed severally by A. Harnack, O. Holtzmann, J. Wellhausen, H. H. Wendt, J. C. Hawkins, B. Weiss, J. Weiss, and other eminent scholars, has been exhibited in convenient form in Moffatt, Introduction to Literature of the N.T., pp. 197-202. With these may be compared a recent study in Streeter, op. cit., pp. 273-292.

Practically all of these results are gained through manipulation of that content of Matthew and Luke which lies outside Mark, consisting of about two hundred verses. For the most part this critical process is skillfully carried out. The relatively high degree of agreement between these scholars indicates that the methods they use are sound. The various reconstructions are, however, only theoretical, as the scholars themselves are the first to admit, and the parts common to Matthew and Luke (lying outside of Mark) may or may not after all represent the contents of a single earlier document.

There is practical agreement that Q contained very little narrative, although the baptism and temptation, together with the story of the centurion at Capernaum are generally included. Some (notably Barth, Réville, and Moffatt) think that a fivefold or sevenfold arrangement of sayings can be traced in Q, but otherwise it appears to be a collection of sayings without the finished form of a purposive work.

Recent criticism shows some impatience with the supposition that a single document is entitled to perform the function of Q, and the symbols QMt. and QLk. have been devised to satisfy the demand for a plurality (at least a duality) of such sources.

It should always be recalled, in the interest of clear thought upon the subject, that, after all, Q is a symbol that somewhat disguises yet does not remove modern ignorance of the early stages in the transmission of the Aramaic gospel. It is the conviction of some N.T. students that the by-products of the study of Q have been fully as constructive and positive in their nature as the direct result sought has been.

Some writers upon the gospel origins have even suggested that the hypothesis of Q has stood in the way of more satisfactory results. He would be a pioneer indeed who took it upon himself to discard the shadowy source, believing it only a name that does not reveal the past of the Gospels. Yet it may be that such a pioneer would lead the students of the Gospels into a state of greater certainty. The abandonment of the Q hypothesis could not be taken as a denial of the existence of rich parallels between Matthew and Luke, in any case. These are facts. They present phases of Jesus' teaching which came by some line of tradition to each of the evangelists. Even if there were at any time a single document such as Q, it could hardly furnish modern students with anything worth while after two such gifted writers had culled from it what they most highly prized. Thus for some Q has become a term of no great significance, since at best it represents only a fragmentary work, and doubtless, if it ever existed, it has been edited into better form, given finer contexts and deeper meaning than it ever had in its own right.

It has been very shrewdly observed that if Mark no longer existed and scholars set out to reconstruct that Gospel, knowing that almost all of it had been incorporated in Matthew and Luke, the resultant document would but faintly resemble the present second Gospel. One can scarcely hope for better success in reconstruction when a document whose very existence is hypothetical submits to the operation.

5. The Two-Document Hypothesis. The prevailing documentary theory has centered about the two foci, Mark and Q (or the Logia). Some of the shortcomings of this hypothesis have already appeared, especially in the discussion of the hypothetical discourse source, or the "second source," as it is frequently called. The weakness of this hypothesis is found in the impossibility of covering the facts with two documents only. There is Mark, the basis of the narrative outline; at least one source containing teaching of Jesus; at least one narrative each of Jesus' birth and youth, for Matthew and Luke; at least one Passion story apiece; and at least one source for each to account for their "unique matter." Here are seven documents at least. If, in the interest of economy, it is supposed that the common discourse document contained the "unique material" as well, one has to explain why Matthew discarded so much that was adopted by Luke. Certainly that portion of Luke (951-1814), mistakenly called the "Perean source," bears evidence of being an entirely distinct document. And what shall be said of the "synoptic apocalypse"? The two-document hypothesis is a good step but far from the final step on the way.

6. The Four-Document Hypothesis. Recently (1925, Streeter, op. cit., pp. 227f.) a four-document hypothesis has been proposed in place of the two-document theory. This would provide for different treatments of Mark at the hands of Matthew and Luke, who probably used different copies of the Roman Gospel. To Matthew the chief authority was Mark, but for Luke there existed a preferred source, namely, an earlier edition of his own Gospel, itself based upon Q, and another document called "L," which contained matter now embodied in Luke as his "unique material." The pre-Lukan Gospel Streeter calls Proto-Luke. It is not considered one of the fundamental (four) documents, but a stage half way between Q plus L and the canonical Luke. Matthew, on the other hand, prized Mark most of all, yet had access to a document called M (containing material now known as the "unique material" of Matthew) and to Q as well. Thus the newer documentary hypothesis, in brief, contemplates the rise of Q first of all (about 50 A.D. at Antioch) as a collection of Jesus' words; of M, a Jerusalem document, dated about 65; which, with L (a creature of a Cæsarean environment about 60), and Mark (Rome, A.D. 60) completes the groundwork of the canonical synoptic structure.

For further discussion of these questions, see the introductions to Matthew, Mark, and Luke in the present volume.

7. The Nature and Authority of the Synoptic Gospels. It is apparent that the synoptic Gospels are composite works. Their purpose was to transmit to later generations what Jesus did and what he taught. Each Gospel as it was prepared fell into the hands of Christians who naturally knew more than modern men ever can know about the literary history of the work. The fact that these early Christians accepted and used the Gospels as they did is therefore sound evidence that they were satisfied that the substance of doctrine contained in them, and their representation of the teaching and mission of Jesus, were in keeping with a much larger body of unwritten but reliable tradition. (See art., N.T. and Christian Doctrine, pp. 946-8.)

For the modern Christian the Gospels do more than report the sayings and deeds of Jesus. These works have also a message from the times in which they were written. They assure the church through the ages that one, two, and three generations after Jesus died and arose from the dead the early church had faith in the living Christ. The authority of the Gospels lies close to the heart of the gospel. And the heart of the gospel is the message of the living Redeemer in his own church, living his life over in the lives of those who loved him and for whom he gave himself.

Literature: Burkitt, The Gospel History and its Transmission; Castor, Matthew's Sayings of Jesus; Hawkins, Horae Synopticae; Hayes, The Synoptic Problem; Streeter, The Four Gospels: A Study in Origins. Harmonies of the Gospels: Huck, A Synopsis of the First Three Gospels (Eng. trans. by Finney); Burton and Goodspeed, A Harmony of the First Three Gospels.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR ISMAR J. PERITZ

Chronology Only Approximate. Luke, who of all N.T. writers gives most attention to chronology, in stating the age of Jesus, says, "he was about thirty years of age" (323). Luke's "about" might well be taken as the keynote of this discussion: approximation only is attainable. The reasons are that N.T. writers apparently did not seem to think that it was important to be specific; the Romans at this time possessed no uniform method of dating the accession of their rulers; and the Jews based their calculations of the festal calendar upon such ordinary observations of the phases of the moon as made exactness impossible. As elements of each of these three contingents often enter into the calculations of an event, it can be seen what difficulties confront the chronologist. These difficulties account for the rather disconcerting variety of dates met with in the chronological schemes from the time of Irenæus and Tertullian down to our own time, when competent authorities sometimes are as much as ten years apart in dating the same event. Nevertheless, encouraging signs are appearing that discoveries of archæological material and a more exact treatment of the subject will bring closer approximations.

Chronology of the Life of Jesus. The main events in the life of Jesus on which the Gospels furnish data are his birth and baptism, the length of his ministry, and his death. Below is a conspectus of some recent representative opinions on the dates of these events; the aim of the following discussion is to account for the divergencies.

Date of Jesus' Birth. The date of 1 A.D., fixed by the Roman monk Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century, was based upon a miscalculation. Matthew furnishes four data: (1) 21, before Herod died, i.e., before 4 B.C.; (2) 216, "two years old and under," the age limit of the children ordered slain by Herod, which would make it 6 B.C.; (3) 22, "the star," in which some have seen a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, calculated by the astronomer Kepler as 7 B.C.; (4) 219-23, a residence in Egypt without indication of its length. Luke 21-5 connects the birth of Jesus with a census ordered by the Roman emperor Augustus when Quirinius was governor of Syria; such a census took place 6 A.D., but that was ten years after Herod's death. It does not seem probable that Luke antedated this census, for he mentions it in Acts 537. According to Tertullian, a census took place under Saturninus, who was governor of Syria about 9-6 B.C.; did Luke confuse the names? New light on the question has come from recent discoveries in archæology to which Sir William M. Ramsay has called attention in his works, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? and The Bearing of Recent Discoveries on the Trustworthiness of the N.T. There is evidence that Quirinius carried on a military expedition against the Homonadenses, a tribe in the Cilician Taurus country, while he held official position in Syria in the lifetime of Herod, between 9-6 B.C. This, according to Ramsay, would meet all the requirements of Luke's statement, and he chooses for the date 6 B.C. A glance at the conspectus will reveal how all the extremes and the shades between them are represented. Probably the most satisfactory date is 6 B.C.

For the month and the day of the birth there are no data available. The earliest source for December 25 is Hippolytus, about 200 A.D.

Date of the Baptism. The baptism of Jesus took place, it would seem, after the ministry of John the Baptist was well under way. Luke gives for the beginning of the Baptist's ministry "the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar" (31-3). The detail with which Luke gives this date is

	BIRTH	BAPTISM	MINISTRY	DEATH
Turner, 1898	7-6 B.C.	26 A.D.	3 years	29 A.D.
v. Soden, 1899	4 B.C.?	c. 28/29 A.D.	1 year	30 A.D.
Moffatt, 1917	c. 6 B.C.	25/26 A.D.	4 years	29/30 A.D.
Headlam, 1923	8/7 B.C.	29/30 A.D.	3 years	33 A.D.
Streeter, 1925	before 4 B.C.	27 A.D.	2 1/2 years	29/30 A.D.

evidence not only of his careful investigation but also of the importance which he attaches to it in fixing the chronology of Jesus. But here we meet with the difficulty whether to count the reign of Tiberius from his accession as coregent of Augustus or from his accession as emperor: the former would make his fifteenth year 26/27 A.D., the latter 29/30 A.D., the difference reflected in the conspectus. Luke's statement (323) that Jesus was "about thirty years" of age when he began his public ministry fits the earlier date; and in view of Luke's chronological interest should be allowed more meaning than a mere phrase stating that he had entered into manhood. This cannot be said of the chronological import of the question in Jn. 857, "Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?" although it led Irenæus to hold that Jesus lived to be fifty years old; and in later time yielded a symbolic meaning to the effect that the life of Jesus covered a jubilee (7x7) of years, the fiftieth or jubilee year being that of his "glorification." According to John (220), "forty-six years was this temple in building," and this was said during Jesus' early ministry. Herod's undertaking of rebuilding the Temple appears to be, according to Josephus, 19-20 B.C., which would yield as the date of the beginning of the ministry 27 A.D., and would accord with the earlier date. Mk. 114 and Mt. 412 connect the beginning of Jesus' ministry with the imprisonment of the Baptist, but its exact date cannot be determined.

The Length of the Ministry. Omitting the extreme view of a ten or twenty years' length, a glance at the conspectus reveals views ranging from one year to four years. Champions of the former appeal to Luke and the authorities of the second century, except Irenæus. Luke's quotation (419), "To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord," and the absence of any other specific note of time—except an evidently intentional division of the ministry into two halves, a longer of a few months (951-1928) and a shorter (414-950), and the mention of only the last Passover—were taken as pointing to a year or even less. Those who contend for a two years' ministry point to Mk. 223 Mt. 121 Lk. 61, where mention is made of standing barley or wheat, followed after a lapse of time by the mention of "green grass" (Mk. 639), implying an early springtime, hence two summers, and suggesting, therefore, a two-years' ministry. It is the fourth Gospel which offers most detail. There are mentioned, 213, a Passover; 435, "four months to the harvest"; 51, "the feast" or "a feast" (cf. text and mg. in A.S.V.); 64, a Passover; 72, the feast of tabernacles; 1022, the feast of dedication; 1155, the Passover. In 51 is an unnamed feast: those who take it as a Passover find in John four Passovers and a three years' ministry; those who take it either as Pentecost or Tabernacles find in John only three Passovers, and consequently a two-years' ministry; but those who question the text in 64, for which there is not sufficient reason, disregard it, and find in John only two Passovers and consequently a one-year's ministry. Thus John is seen to be in harmony with the synoptic Gospels by both those who hold to a two-years' and those who hold to a one-year's ministry. But it has long ago been pointed out that Jn. 5 and 6 are apparently out of place and should be transposed (see p. 857): this would simplify the sequence of events, and it would also make the unnamed feast (which has evidently caused difficulty as the text variants indicate) identical with the Passover of 64. (Cf. Streeter, The Four Gospels, p. 381.) The longer ministry of two or even three years is regarded as the more probable because it accounts more satisfactorily for the geographical movements of Jesus and for the influence which he exerted both upon his friends and foes, for which the element of time is essential.

The Date of the Crucifixion. This is evidently the most important date and the starting-point of N.T. chronology. It involves both the day and the year.

(1) The Day. The synoptists (Mk. 1542 Mt. 2762 Lk. 2354) place the crucifixion on Friday, Nisan 15th; John (1914. 31. 42) places it on Friday, Nisan 14th. According to John, Jesus ate with his disciples the Passover, or a meal that was not really the Passover, the night before the "Preparation," and died on the cross at the time of the "Preparation," when the Jews killed their Passover lambs, thus making his death to coincide with the death of the Passover lamb. The synoptists, on the other hand, identify the Last Supper with the Passover meal, and place the crucifixion on the first day of the Passover, which had begun, according to Jewish reckoning, at sunset of the previous evening when the Passover meal was eaten. The Johannine dating is to be preferred: it is historically the more probable, for the Jewish officials were not likely to break the sacred feast; it accords with the Pauline attitude which identifies the death of Jesus with the Passover lamb (1 Cor. 56-8); and it accords with the practise of the Eastern church which, as the term "Quartodecimans" or "Fourteenthsters" indicates, prided itself on the exactness with which it commemorated the fourteenth day of Nisan as the day of Jesus' death. Further, attention has been called to the words in Luke (2215f.), "With desire I desired to eat this passover with you . . . but I shall not eat it . . ." as indicating that even in the synoptics there is a hint that it was not the Passover meal that Jesus ate with his disciples. It is probable that John writes with his predecessors before him, and possesses data based upon early tradition by which he aims to correct and supplement the synoptists. (Cf. p. 1088.)

(2) The Year. The Gospels furnish three data: (1) Jesus died while Pontius Pilate was procurator, i.e., between 27-37 A.D.; (2) while Caiaphas was high priest, i.e., before 36 A.D.; and (3) when the Passover fell on a Friday, Nisan 14th, computed on the basis of the full moon. The possible dates are from 28 to 35 A.D. For the year 29 Turner is the stoutest champion. It has in its favor that it is the earliest date fixed by the church by use of the consular lists as "the year of the two Gemini," i.e., whose consuls for the year were L. Rubellius Geminus and C. Fufius (or Rufius) Geminus. This date has recently been called in question on astronomical grounds, it being alleged that it was the only one of the possible years when the astronomical conditions were not met. There are some who favor the year 33 A.D., made popular by Eusebius, the church historian of the first quarter of the fourth century. The date, however, most in favor is 30 A.D.; it meets approximately all the requirements as well as the year 29 A.D. and is free from the astronomical objection to the latter.

Chronology of the Apostolic Age. The study of the chronology of the Apostolic Age has in our century entered on a new phase which promises more satisfactory results. It began with the recognition by Turner that Acts is arranged upon a definite plan, namely, six periods, or "panels," each of them ending with a refrain or summary; that these divisions are chronological; and that each covers a period of approximately five years. Acts accordingly is divided into two main sections: (1) 1-12²⁴, consisting of three periods in which the leadership is with Peter and the Twelve; and (2) 12²⁵-28³¹, also consisting of three periods in which the leadership is with Paul, the whole covering some thirty years, corresponding to Luke's chronology of "about thirty years" of his life of Jesus. Turner's contributions have been followed up by C. J. Cadoux (Journal of Theological Studies, vol. xix, pp. 333-341) and B. W. Bacon (Harvard Theological Review, vol. xiv, pp. 137-166). The result is what may be termed the newer chronology of the Apostolic Age, adopted in the remainder of this article, in justification of which it may be claimed that it gives due weight to Luke's interest in chronology, which furnishes the only first-hand data in our possession, and deserves to be the basis of all calculations, considered in the light of other N.T. writings, particularly the letters of Paul, and Jewish and Roman contemporaneous history.

As a further aid in the same direction must be counted the new discovery in the field of archaeology, the Delphian inscription. Adolf Deissmann, who has edited it with a photographic reproduction and reconstructed text, fully discusses its chronological bearings (Saint Paul, Appendix I, first edit., pp. 255-260), which is to fix definitely the date of the proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia for 51-52 A.D. and to furnish a definite starting point for the chronology of Paul. Of similar assistance has been a reconsideration of the visits of Paul to Jerusalem. Acts mentions three visits: (1) 9²⁶, the introduction visit; (2) 11²⁷⁻³⁰ 12²⁵, the famine visit; and (3) 15², the council visit; Galatians mentions two, 1¹⁸ and 2¹. It is generally agreed that the visit mentioned as first in both sources is identical. Opinions differ as to the identity of the others: some holding that Paul failed to mention the famine visit, feeling it to be irrelevant, and that Gal. 2¹ and Acts 15 relate to the council visit. The present writer agrees with those who more recently have come to hold that Gal. 2¹ and Acts 11 are identical, and relate to the famine visit, during which there was a private conference on the Gentile question, and that Galatians was written before the Council of Acts 15 took place, and consequently is not mentioned by Paul. This has important bearings upon the date of the conversion of Paul, which the newer chronology places as late as 38 A.D. The number "fourteen" in Gal. 2¹ has created difficulties on account of its indefiniteness and length. Does it include the three years of 1¹⁸ or not? In either case it involves fourteen or seventeen years' of comparative inactivity, which appears rather strange for the energetic and restless Paul with his passion for regions beyond. On the other hand, the older chronology is forced by this "fourteen" to crowd the events between the death of Jesus and the conversion of Paul "into the limits of two years, or possibly even of a single year." If the element of time has any claim to consideration in a movement which involves the struggles that go with giving up strong beliefs, and in the spread of the movement to Damascus in such proportions as to incite the fiery zeal of a Saul, this is too short a space of time. Out of all these difficulties there is deliverance in following the suggestion of Grotius, to read the number "four" (diadeton), instead of "fourteen" (diadeton), the difference of an tota making the difference of ten years. The newer chronology is inclined to accept the suggestion and adjust its data accordingly. In doing so it finds the glaring inconsistency in the career of Paul removed, and Paul's own biographical chronology brought into approximate accord with that of Luke in Acts. Any one acquainted with the history of the transmission of the text of the N.T. (see p. 860) cannot but consider such a change admissible. It might be accounted for as a harmonizing attempt of a scribe who transferred the number fourteen from 2 Cor. 12², where it belongs, to the last months of Paul's stay in Ephesus, about 54-55 A.D., and where it refers either to Paul's stay in Arabia (Gal. 1¹⁷) or to Luke's account of the vision in the Temple (Acts 22¹⁷⁻²¹), and falls in with Luke's chronological scheme.

The Six Periods of Acts. With these preliminary considerations in view, we may now proceed with the articulation of the six periods or panels into which the chronology of Acts is divided, and add the approximate dates.

Period I. Founding of the church in Jerusalem to the death of Stephen, 29/30-34 A.D. (Acts 11-67). The events here recorded include the re-gathering of the disciples to Jerusalem and the period to Pentecost; the beginning of their evangelistic activity; the growth of the church membership to over five thousand, in spite of the repeated imprisonment of its leaders; the need of better oversight of its relief work; and the implied organization of the church with its apostles and sub-apostles. Five years appear a reasonable time for this development, and there is nothing known as standing in the way of its assumption.

Period II. The expansion of the church in Palestine to the conversion of Paul and his removal to Tarsus, 34-39 A.D. (Acts 68-931). During this period of five years the activity and death of Stephen most probably occupied the earlier part, and might be dated 34 A.D. The subsequent spread of the faith into the country around Jerusalem, Samaria, and even into Egypt, might easily take two years. The remainder of the period, from 37-39, would cover Paul's activity of persecution, conversion, first visit to Jerusalem, and removal to Tarsus; this would bring his conversion to about 37/38. This would approximately allow for Paul's first visit to Jerusalem, dated by him in Gal. 1¹⁸ three years after his conversion, as fractions of inclusive years are counted as if they were wholes; and it would not be excessively out of accord with Acts 9²⁶, which apparently places it nearer to his conversion. The other datum relating to Paul's conversion and first visit to Jerusalem yields a similar result. According to Acts 9²³⁻²⁵ and 2 Cor. 11³², Paul's escape from Damascus took place while the city was being guarded by the ethnarch, "under Aretas the king." No earlier date than 37-38 A.D. is possible for the control of Damascus by Aretas; and Paul the Roman citizen would most probably not have had to escape through a window and in a basket down a wall, if the Romans had been in control.

Period III. The beginnings of Gentile evangelization to the death of Herod Agrippa, 39-44 A.D. (Acts 932-1224). According to an ancient tradition found in the so-called Preaching of Peter quoted by Clement of Alexandria, held to be reliable, the Twelve were to remain in Jerusalem preaching to the Jews before going out to evangelize the Gentiles. The beginning of this five-year period approximately coincides with this twelve-year period, and may well be meant to mark its beginning. It is highly probable that the execution of James (12²) fell in the beginning of the reign of Herod Agrippa, an initial measure to curry the favor of the Jews. Herod's accession took place early in 41 A.D., and his death in 44 A.D. In this period falls the famine visit of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem. The time of this visit is but vaguely indicated in Acts as having been predicted by the prophet Agabus, and it is said to have occurred "in the days of Claudius." Some identify this famine with the one described by Josephus in which Queen Helena of Adiabene brought relief to Jerusalem, and which is dated variously from 44 to 47 A.D. The writer of Acts relates it in collocation with the death of Herod Agrippa, 44 A.D. If we adopt the reading four instead of fourteen in Gal. 2¹, the date 44 A.D. is in accord with the date of Paul's first visit four years previously, with his conversion seven years previously, and with the chronology of Acts.

Period IV. From the beginning of the Antiochian missions to the distribution of the Jerusalem decrees, 44-49 A.D. (Acts 1225-165). The period begins with the first missionary journey, or the evangelization of Galatia. According to Turner, it took over one year, according to Ramsay over two years. The remainder of the period can be accounted for by the references to shorter and longer stays in Antioch (Acts 14²⁸ 15^{35f.}); the council visit to Jerusalem (15¹⁻²⁹); and the first part of the second missionary journey (15³⁶⁻¹⁶⁵), which involved no doubt considerable delay on account of the break with Barnabas and the choice of another companion, the time needed for confirming the churches of Syria and Cilicia, and the visitation of the Galatian churches. Taken altogether it might well cover a period of approximately five years.

Period V. The evangelization of Macedonia,

Achaia, and Asia, 49–54 A.D. (Acts 166–1920). This period covers what is substantially included in the second and third missionary journeys. It appears to have originated with the crisis in Jerusalem at the council, where it became evident that the Jewish Christianity of the mother church was too conservative for Paul, who ultimately broke with both Peter and Barnabas, and chose new companions and new fields, where he was his own master and could preach his free gospel. For this period of the founding of the Greek and Asiatic churches the chronological data are Acts 18¹¹, “a year and six months” in Corinth; 19¹⁰, “two years” for Asia, rounded up to “three years” in 20³¹; allowing six months for the work in Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea (166–173⁴), and adding the “three months” of 19⁸, the interval between his first coming, 18¹⁹, and his return from a journey to Syria, 18^{21f}, it aggregates the five years required for this period or panel. The exact date of Paul’s stay in Corinth can now be ascertained by the Delphian inscription, which yields 50–51 A.D., and meets even more than approximately the requirements of the five years of this period.

Period VI. From Paul’s journey to Jerusalem to his witness at Rome, 54–59/60 A.D. (Acts 19²¹–28³¹). This sixth and last period of Acts includes: “a while” in Asia (19²²), until after the riot in Ephesus (20¹); a journey into Macedonia (20²); a three months’ stay in Corinth; an overland journey to Philippi; a sea voyage of five days to Troas; a week at Troas (20⁴⁻⁶); a land trip to Assos; a sea voyage to Miletus (20¹³⁻¹⁵) and Caesarea (21¹⁻¹⁴); by land to Jerusalem (21¹⁵); the imprisonment in Jerusalem (21²⁷–23²²); imprisonment in Caesarea of two years to the accession of Festus (23²³–24²⁷), whose date most probably was 57 A.D.; voyage to Rome, arriving 58 A.D.; two years at Rome, 60 A.D.; the whole occupying about five years. This is as far as Acts brings us. Paul had evidently planned a third missionary journey, beyond Rome, in the extreme west—Spain (Rom. 15²²⁻²⁹); but there is no convincing evidence that the wish was ever realized. The tradition that involves his release, visit to Asia Minor and Spain, and second imprisonment, is merely an inference from his expressed wish. (The inference, however, has some solid support. See p. 1275.) He died in Rome in the reign of Nero, the most generally accepted date being 64–65 A.D.

Other Dates. Among other dates of the Apostolic Age that can be ascertained is that of the death of Peter, which some think was contemporaneous with that of Paul, while others place it later, Ramsay as late as 80 A.D. The date of the death of James, the brother of Jesus, the later head of the church of Jerusalem, is taken to be 61 or 63.

COMPARATIVE TABLE OF EVENTS IN THE LIFE OF PAUL

	TURNER	HARNACK	RAMSAY	BACON
Crucifixion of Jesus.....	29	29 or 30	30	30
Conversion of Paul.....	35–36	30	33	38
Second Visit.....	46	44	46	44–45
First Journey.....	47	45	47	45–47
Jerusalem Council.....	49	47	50	48
Arrival at Corinth.....	50	48	51	50
Arrest in Jerusalem.....	56	54	57	55
Arrival in Rome.....	59	57	60	58
Death of Paul.....	64–65	64	65

DATES IN THE LIFE OF PAUL ADOPTED IN THIS ARTICLE

(Based mainly upon Turner, Cadoux, and Bacon). Cf. art., Life and Work of Paul, pp. 939–43.

Crucifixion.....	29/30	In “Asia”.....	51–54
Death of Stephen.....	34	Winter in Corinth.....	55
Conversion.....	37/38	Arrest in Jerusalem.....	55
First Visit (Gal. 1, Acts 9).....	39	Imprisonment in Caesarea.....	55–57
In Syria, Galatia, and Antioch.....	39–44	Recall of Felix.....	57
Second Visit (Gal. 2, Acts 11 ³⁰).....	44	Voyage to Rome.....	57/58
First Journey.....	45–47	Arrival in Rome.....	58
Jerusalem Council (Acts 15).....	48	End of “two years”.....	60
Second Journey.....	49–51	Death.....	64/65
In Corinth.....	50–51

COMPARATIVE TABLE OF EVENTS IN ROMAN AND JEWISH HISTORY AND N.T. HISTORY AND LITERATURE

B.C.
9-6	Quirinius' campaign against the Homonadenses
6	Birth of Jesus
4	Death of Herod I
	Herod Antipas to 39
A.D.
6	Philip Tetrarch to 34
	Census of Quirinius Revolt of Zealots
	Annas High-Priest to 15
11 or 14	Accession of Tiberius to 37
18	Caiaphas High-Priest to 36
26	Pilate Procurator to 36	Preaching of the Baptist
27	Baptism of Jesus
29/30	Death of Jesus
37	Accession of Caligula to 41
37/38	Conversion of Paul
41	Accession of Claudius to 44
47	Galatians
49	1 and 2 Thessalonians
52	Felix Procurator to 57
52-54	1 and 2 Corinthians
54	Accession of Nero to 68
55	Arrest of Paul
	Romans
57	Festus Procurator to 62	Paul's voyage to Rome
58-60	Paul in Rome
		Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians, Philip-
		prians, James
61 or 63	Death of James of Jerusalem
		1 Peter
64/65	Burning of Rome	Death of Paul and Peter
66	Revolt of Jews in Palestine
69	Accession of Vespasian to 79
70	Fall of Jerusalem
79	Accession of Titus to 81	Mark
80	Matthew
		Hebrews
81	Accession of Domitian to 96	Jude
93	John the Presbyter (Ephesus)
96	Accession of Nerva to 98	Revelation
		Luke and Acts
98	Accession of Trajan to 117	Fourth Gospel
		Epistles of John
		Pastoral Epistles (in present form) 2 Peter

The dates given in the above table for the Gospels and for the Pauline and other Epistles are not uniformly accepted by scholars. The question of date is discussed in the introductions to these various writings in the present volume.

Literature: Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible (5 vols.), art. by Turner on "Chronology of the N.T." (exhaustive and epoch-making); Hastings' One Volume Dictionary of the Bible, art. by Maclean; art. by von Soden in the Encyclopedia Biblica (represents the scholarly German view); Bacon, The Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate; Moffatt, Introduction to the Literature of the N.T.; Headlam, The Life and Teachings of Jesus the Christ. See also the references to literature in the body of this article, and under "Life and Work of Paul," p. 943.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR HENRY J. CADBURY

The New Testament a Greek Book. All the books of the N.T. were in Greek when they were made into a collection. They were quickly translated into Latin, Syriac, and the languages of Egypt, and later into other languages, including English. But the N.T. as such is a Greek library. Even the O.T. is quoted in it in a Greek translation except for a single sentence of the Psalms (22¹) used by Jesus on the cross, where for special reasons the original Hebrew or Aramaic has been transliterated into the Greek alphabet (Mt. 27⁴⁶ Mk. 15³⁴).

Aramaic Background. Paul's letters, the other Epistles, and probably most if not all of the other parts of the N.T. were written originally in Greek, though nothing prevents our supposing that some of the books or their sources were written in a Semitic language and then translated into their present form. Greek was not the earliest language of Christianity. Jesus almost certainly talked to his disciples and to other Jews in Aramaic. This is one of the Semitic languages like Hebrew. In Palestine and the East it had been used for some centuries by the Jews. Apparently, it was the usual language throughout the Persian Empire before the coming of Alexander the Great, and it kept its currency in Babylonia and among the Jews of Palestine while Greek was making headway nearly everywhere else in the ancient world. Both the sayings of Jesus, therefore, insofar as they are original with him, and also all the N.T. narrative, to the extent that sayings and narrative alike rest upon the oral tradition of the first Palestinian disciples, have been somehow transformed into Greek from Aramaic. The oldest Christian discussion of any Gospels, that by Papias, implies that Matthew wrote in Hebrew or Aramaic and that Mark translated what Peter preached (quoted in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., iii, 39). It has recently been claimed that most of the first five (narrative) books of the N.T. were first written in Aramaic. This theory has been worked out for the fourth Gospel by C. F. Burney and for the first half of Acts (11-535) by C. C. Torrey. But not even in these cases has general agreement with the hypothesis of written Semitic originals been reached by scholars. Our consideration of the language of the N.T. must therefore be directed to the idiom of their present Greek form.

Place of New Testament Greek in History of the Language. The language in which the N.T. books are written used to be designated N.T. Greek. When the N.T. was associated with the Greek O.T., or LXX, the term "biblical Greek" was used. The use of these names implied that this language was unique. It was, indeed, very different from the standard form of Greek language with which scholars have been most familiar. Even now certain phenomena in the diction of the N.T. bring its various parts into resemblance to each other and to the LXX, but the language is not really unparalleled. It represents as a whole a much larger phase in the development of the Greek language. The recognition of this setting has been one of the romantic discoveries of modern times.

The history of the Greek language from Homer to the modern colloquial Greek covers some three thousand years. During this period the language has undergone normal changes, though at various times efforts at artificial standardizing and archaizing have interfered with these natural processes. Prior to the rise of Athens many dialects existed, but the political and literary supremacy of Athens gave to her own Attic dialect a supremacy. When Alexander and his successors extended and transplanted Greek culture until it reached from India to Italy, the Attic dialect developed into a universal or common language (called Koine—"common") which continued in wide use until the downfall of the Roman Empire. Because it endured through this so-called Hellenistic period it is also called Hellenistic Greek. The N.T., written about the middle of this period, is a representative of this lingua franca. (Cf. p. 849.)

The Greek writers of this period did not, however, mostly employ this ordinary speech. Reverence for the past and an artificial standard of archaism led all of them from Polybius on down, more or less to affect the older idiom of the classical writers like Thucydides, Plato, and Xenophon. Even Jewish litterateurs like Philo and Josephus wrote in a Greek idiom of a rhetorical and literary sort. The actual natural everyday Greek broke through the formal writers of the period only in spite of themselves. Our knowledge of the vernacular speech revealed in these lapses from pure ancient Attic is now supplemented by a large body of more unstudied and natural contemporary documents. These are the inscriptions, and still more fully and simply the thousands of papyri containing letters, contracts, and various other simple documents written in Egypt in the centuries before and after the beginning of our era, which disclose the common language as used in ordinary speech and writing.

Characteristics of the "Common" Language. The nature of the common language as shown by these and other sources is singularly uniform in the several places from which evidence has come. In Rome, Asia Minor, Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere the current Greek idiom was evidently much alike. New local dialects are not manifest and the older dialects like Ionic and Doric, having contributed their small or negligible share to the common Attic base of this later tongue, have disappeared. But the older language has changed in vocabulary, in forms, and in syntax. Some of the changes are these: reduction of the number of different inflectional forms by surrendering to other forms the uses of the optative mood and the dual number; the elimination of some of the more irregular words and forms by the use of more regular forms and synonyms; the introduction of new constructions, of new words, and of new meanings for words, with the consequent disuse of the old locutions. If the classical Greek is taken as a standard, Hellenistic Greek is a natural development, just as Modern Greek is a natural development from Hellenistic Greek. Purists ancient and modern regarded Hellenistic Greek as degenerate, but in normal linguistic changes to call any single stage perfect is arbitrary.

Hellenistic Greek when not thus invidiously compared shows eminent convenience for the spread of religion whether by spoken or by written word. In this language even Judaism with its over-literal Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures had made headway in nearly every center of population where Greek was spoken, and Christianity adding its more intelligible Gospels and Epistles followed after. In this language Paul could preach "from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum"; in this language he wrote to Rome. Of course other languages were often in use side by side with Greek. Paul of Tarsus himself knew Aramaic as well as Greek and so did Palestinian Jews. In Lycaonia the multitude still spoke to one another their local patois (Acts 14¹¹). In Rome Latin was far from dead. But wherever bilingualism was found, Hellenistic Greek was one of the media of communication.

An Expressive Language. It was an expressive and elastic language, as much so as any modern speech and as much so as the Attic of Athens' Golden Age. It could be as simple and vivid as the Semitic tongues, but it had capacities for expression of abstract ideas, for exact distinction of tenses, and for the formation of new and compound words such as the O.T. writers did not find available. It was not a hybrid speech. Even the N.T., for all its Semitic backgrounds, has Greek words and constructions for nearly everything. A few special terms are taken over from the Hebrew or Aramaic like abba, amen, rabbi, pascha (=Passover). Also certain Latin words had invaded the official language of the empire, and some of them like census, denarius, and legion appear in the N.T., as they do in other contemporary speech. We find them in the Greek documents of Egyptian scribes or peasants, and in the Aramaic writings of Palestinian or Babylonian rabbis.

In such a natural and universal tongue the N.T. was first written and heard. Whatever we may think of the difficulties of thought in Paul's letters (2 Pet. 3¹⁶), in diction they were simple indeed (2 Cor. 11⁶). Of course, to men of books and literary culture, whether Christians or pagans, the N.T. language fell short of fine writing. The Christians sometimes gloried in this simplicity of their Scriptures and sometimes they apologized for it. In the second century Celsus ridiculed the "sailor style" of the Gospels, and his Christian opponents of that time wrote as good a style as he did. There is later evidence that when the N.T. was quoted by preachers or copied by scribes, its unliterary expressions were often quietly corrected. But it is worth knowing that the Christians had "no special dialect of their own" (Epistle to Diognetus, ch. v; see Ante-Nicene Fathers, Eng. trans., vol. i, p. 26) and that the gospel was distinguished "not in word but in power" (Paul in 1 Thess. 1⁵).

Contemporary Light on the Language. For an understanding of this language it is evident that the bodies of literature closest to it are most useful. Parts of Hellenistic Greek vocabulary and syntax agreed with the older language, as parts of it still are used in Modern Greek. But for the N.T. idioms contemporary Greek, especially its popular records, offer the best illustrations. Some words or meanings in the N.T. have indeed no parallel in the ancient literary Greek writers, but are sufficiently illustrated by inscriptions or papyri. Professors Adolf Deissmann and J. H. Moulton (see "Literature" below) have been the pioneers in collecting such evidence of a grammatical and lexical character. Unexpected testimony to the vernacular character of some N.T. expressions occurs in the rule books of rhetoricians, when they explicitly condemn as modern, or common the very phrases that the Evangelists employ. Of course the original meaning of the N.T. was often well understood by the earliest translators, though they tended to translate it somewhat mechanically with purely verbal equivalents. The later Christian literature, especially the apostolic Fathers, also represent a similar use of the Hellenistic Greek and so extend our knowledge of it. Many an idiom in the N.T. finds its first and most natural illustration in parallel usages within the N.T., particularly those in the same author.

In this connection the Septuagint (LXX) should be especially mentioned (see art., Transmission of O.T., p. 103). It is the largest extant representative of Hellenistic Greek. Furthermore, it was actually known at least in part to most of the N.T. writers. Though it is hardly natural Hellenistic Greek, the literalness of the translation, its wide variety of authorship, its range of vocabulary, its general kinship of subject matter and its kindred unliterary pretensions make it indispensable for an understanding of the N.T. (see Edwin Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, 1889).

Language of Principal Writers of New Testament. That N.T. language can no longer be regarded as unique has been proved by comparison with contemporary vernacular writings. It is also proved by comparisons between the N.T. writers, for the language is not even uniform among the writers themselves. Fully a dozen separate authors have contributed to the contents of our N.T., and they differ from each other in style as writers generally do and as they themselves differ in personal interest and religious viewpoint. In part the differences are due to the unconscious mannerisms and personal terms of speech. In some cases they are due to different degrees of culture, or to the varying effect of Semitic idiom upon the writings. A few of the outstanding traits of style of the more extensive N.T. writers may be described briefly below.

Mark has the most naïve language of any of the Evangelists. Matthew and Luke evidently appreciated this, for they remove many naïve expressions in their paraphrase of Mark. Among the traits of Mark's language are his vernacular vocabulary, his repetitious and picturesque style, and his use of the connective "and" in place of a variety of conjunctions and constructions. Latin words are somewhat numerous in his short Gospel. They have been sometimes regarded as evidence that the book was written in Rome, but they are usually the terms which Roman government would make familiar in all parts of the empire. Mark also retains and translates a few original Aramaic phrases used by Jesus in prayer (14³⁶ abba=father; cf. on 15³⁴ above), or in working cures (5⁴¹ taieitha coum=maiden, arise; 7³⁴ ephphatha=be opened). But his style is not conspicuously Semitic; it is, rather, simple unpolished Greek. In quoting the O.T. he used the LXX.

Matthew, as already said, improves upon the style of Mark, especially in syntax, but Matthew's language also is simple and inconspicuous. He is given to a kind of natural rhetoric which shows in balanced sentences and stanzas in closing refrains, and in the continuous presentation of the sayings of Jesus. Some of his O.T. quotations are not in agreement with the LXX as we know it. This fact makes it possible to suppose that either the Evangelist or one of his sources knew the Hebrew O.T. His narrative, however, has few marks of continuous direct translation from a Semitic original. In fact, he is usually believed to have combined Greek sources, among them Mark and Q. (See art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, p. 868).

Luke's style in the Gospel and Acts is one of the most polished in the N.T. Jerome called Luke "the most erudite of the Evangelists." Evidences of his greater literary taste are found in the changes he makes in paraphrasing Mark, such as the avoidance of repetition, the substitution of more cultivated words and of more grammatical construction; they are found in his apology for or omission of non-Hellenic words (even as proper names), and in his employment of the optative mood and of idiomatic Greek expressions unusual in the N.T. (See Cadbury, The Making of Luke-Acts, 1927, chs. ix and xvi.) Many of these expressions are of the sort used in the literary writers of the period like Lucian, Plutarch, and Josephus. Luke's language is therefore rightly called by Moffatt a "book language," as distinct from the spoken language. But this difference from other N.T. writers is only in a limited degree. Luke falls far short of the artificial Greek of contemporary rhetorical authors.

Luke's language has sometimes been called medical, and his agreement in vocabulary with Galen and other doctors has been utilized as an argument supporting the tradition that attributes Luke and Acts to the "beloved physician Luke" mentioned by Paul (Col. 4¹⁴; see W. K. Hobart, The Medical Language of St. Luke, 1882; Harnack, Luke the Physician, 1906). The uniqueness of such coincidence has been greatly overemphasized, since it is only natural that the cultivated Gentile Christian historian should use words and phrases found also in medical writers though not exclusively in them alone.

The writings of this author display a curious homogeneity of language in all their parts, coupled with a noticeable variety. The literary traits are most numerous in the later chapters of Acts; the style elsewhere (except in the preface, Luke 1¹⁻⁴) is more simple and also more Semitic. The Semitic features constitute an interesting problem to explain. Reference has already been made to Torrey's theory that the first half of Acts is a translation of a continuous Aramaic source (The Date and Composition of Acts, 1916). Torrey appears to hold a like view for the bulk of Luke's Gospel, as, indeed, for all the Gospels, except that he maintains that the stories of the infancy (Luke 15-25²) have been translated from a Hebrew document. Such theories of translation account well for the Semitic idiom in these parts of Luke and Acts and naturally meet with favor.

The most probable alternative explanation is that the author, though himself a Greek and writing from Greek sources alone, was affected by the Semitic idiom of the LXX. It is possible that he really knew no Semitic language, but was familiar with the Greek Bible and through it with such terms as "it came to pass," "he added to send" (=he sent again, Lk. 20^{11, 12}), "by the mouth of," and "before the face of." In composing his books to Theophilus he consciously or unconsciously fell into this biblical style, as English writers sometimes do. If he is more Semitic in some parts than in others, this may be due to the Palestinian background of those parts, which called forth in a kind of dramatic way the appropriate style. Thus at one extreme the idyls of the birth of John and Jesus with their canticles have the aroma of the O.T., while at the other extreme the speeches of Paul at Athens and before Agrippa with the adjacent narratives have what is for the N.T. a strikingly secular flavor in their style. The Semitisms of Luke are according to this latter theory due rather to imitation than to translation. There is evidence even in the choice of religious terms that this writer has an acute sense of the appropriateness of language to the setting. Whichever explanation of their origin is adopted, the intermittent Semitisms of Luke are a notable feature of his style.

The language of Paul is neither so Semitic nor so literary as Luke. The absence of Semitism is at first sight the more strange since Paul is the only N.T. writer of whom we can say with certainty that he knew Aramaic (Acts 21⁴⁰). Yet he quotes the LXX in preference to translating the Hebrew Bible, and besides the Aramaic form of Peter's name (Cephas, 1 Cor. 1¹², etc.; Gal. 1¹⁸, etc.) he uses only three Aramaic expressions, all apparently derived from liturgical usage: amen, abba (Rom. 8¹⁵ Gal. 4⁶), and maran atha (1 Cor. 16²²). It may be recalled that neither Philo nor Josephus is Semitic in style.

The absence of the literary style from Paul is due to the fact that, unlike Luke and Josephus, he was not writing for publication. His letters, even the most general parts of them, were occasional and spontaneous missives (see art., Life and Work of Paul, p. 931). Their style is in all probability the spoken style of Paul's milieu. They have also the particular style of Paul's own oral preaching. In some respects the letters remind us of the "diatribe" or popular ethical and philosophical tract of his time. Correct enough in grammar, comparatively simple in vocabulary, they display a distinct individuality and an emphatic natural rhetoric. They are peculiarly personal and they show with what ease and variety a "vivid" person like Paul could use the common Greek for the expression of every thought and emotion. His language is given to natural antithesis. His connections are loose, his climaxes abundant. There is often a liturgical fullness about the close of his sentences. If Ephesians is a genuine Pauline writing, it represents these traits in a somewhat intensified degree. The Pastoral Epistles, while in parts they have a genuinely Pauline style, differ constantly nevertheless by employing a quite different religious terminology and even a new selection of particles (see intro. to Pastorals, p. 1275). Their religious and ethical language, like that of 2 Peter, finds its closest parallels in writings of the second century, both pagan and Christian. (See P. N. Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles, 1921.)

The language of Hebrews, though, on account of its subject matter, it might be expected to conform to that of the LXX, outside of its actual quotations is strictly grammatical. It ranks with Luke-Acts and Second Maccabees as among the more cultivated styles in the Greek Bible. The alliteration and balance of its opening sentence, the anaphora "by faith" in the eleventh chapter, the idiomatic use of particles and a certain regard for emphasis and perhaps for rhythm in its word order are some of the concrete examples of this elevation of diction. Its difference of style from the style of Paul has been felt by all attentive readers of the original and would supply sufficient evidence, if evidence were needed, that Hebrews was not written or dictated by Paul.

In like manner criteria of style divide the Johannine writings. Readers as early as the acute critic Dionysius of Alexandria in the third century saw that the Gospel and Apocalypse are scarcely from the same author (see intro. to John, p. 1065, and Revelation, p. 1365).

The language of the fourth Gospel is simple and grammatical, with a certain individuality especially in its tendency to repetition and in its limited and somewhat intellectual sounding vocabulary for mystical religion. Among its characteristic words are believe, know, judge, witness, truth, light, life, eternal life, and others less frequent but perhaps equally familiar to readers of this Gospel, like only-begotten, Word, and Paraclete. The Aramaic amen it uses always double: "Verily, verily." Its particles of connection are few, notably "then" (=therefore) and "and." Such simplicity is entirely compatible with the view that John is translated from the Aramaic, and arguments to that effect have been independently issued. (C. F. Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel, 1922; J. A. Montgomery, The Origin of the Gospel according to St. John, 1923-24; C. C. Torrey, Harvard Theological Review, October, 1923.) The arguments do not coincide and have not convinced other scholars generally. In spite of its use in the prologue of a Greek philosophical term, the Logos, the Gospel is apparently in touch with Palestinian places and with some Hebrew terms. Possibly the Semitic element goes no further. The cultural and religious background of this book can scarcely be determined definitely.

The three Epistles of John agree in vocabulary with the Gospel of John. They all share some of its familiar terms; 1 John especially is as akin in style as in subject matter (see intro. to 1 John, p. 1352).

The Revelation of John deals with different subjects and in a different literary mode, namely, the apocalypse. It has a wider vocabulary than has John, but it is not strikingly literary. Without formal quotation of the O.T. it is everywhere strongly influenced by it. Sometimes this influence may be identified as coming through the LXX; at other times, in the view of R. H. Charles the Hebrew O.T. has come into play. This influence need not be directly from the Hebrew. It may imply the use of another and more literal Greek version like that attributed to Theodotion (see art., Transmission of O.T., p. 104). But Charles finds independent evidence of Semitic sources in certain recurrent idioms of the book. It is not clear whether either his evidence or his interpretation must be accepted.

The most remarkable linguistic eccentricity of Revelation is its occasional habit of putting words in the wrong case or gender. The author knows that appositives should agree in case with the nouns they modify and that adjectives and participles should agree with their nouns in gender and case. His lapses (e.g., 15 11⁴ 14¹⁹ 21⁹, etc.; they are, of course, evident only in the Greek) are therefore due either to extraordinary carelessness, or to indifference, or to deliberate intention.

Value of Studying the Original Language. The interest of the study of N.T. language is mainly its help in discovering as closely as possible the thought of the author. Naturally, the nuances of the Greek cannot now always be recovered exactly and still less be carried over into a translation. But a self-respecting student of the Bible will often gain much satisfaction and instruction from a mastery of the original tongue. Even scholars have misunderstood the nature of that language and have misused its phenomena, but that does not prevent the careful use of its evidence in connection with problems of identical authorship and of the use of sources, as well as for determining the meaning of particular passages. Furthermore, a knowledge outside the N.T. of the nature and development of the Greek language through a longer period and in a wider group of writers enables us to place the canonical writers both linguistically and humanly.

Literature: Articles in Bible Dictionaries; Thayer, Greek-English Lexicon of the N.T.; Simcox, The Language of the N.T.; The Writers of the N.T.; H. A. A. Kennedy, The Sources of N.T. Greek; Jamaris, An Historical Greek Grammar; Deissmann, Bible Studies; Light from the Ancient East; J. H. Moulton and Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament; Milligan, Here and There Among the Papyri; A. T. Robertson, A Grammar of the Greek N.T.; Dalman, The Words of Jesus; Hayes, Greek Culture and the Greek Testament.

THE NEW TESTAMENT AND CRITICISM

By PROFESSOR ERNEST F. SCOTT

The New Testament a Result of Criticism. N.T. criticism received its name early last century, and is often viewed suspiciously as a modern innovation. But while the name is new, the thing itself goes back almost to the beginnings of Christian history. The N.T. as we now have it may be said, indeed, to owe its existence to criticism. In its earlier period the church possessed a large number of writings which all claimed to be fundamental to its teaching. Some of them were of quite inferior value; others had been fabricated, under revered apostolic names, in the interests of heretical doctrine. To this mass of documents the church applied various tests, in order to single out those which had a genuine right to acceptance, and in this manner our N.T. was formed. (See art., Formation of N.T., pp. 853-9.)

It is a striking fact that the books finally approved were precisely those which would be selected by a modern scholar. Occasionally he might give different reasons for his choice, but he would proceed on the same general principles. The church at the very outset had struck the true path of criticism. It was not till the third century, however, that the work of examining the N.T. was placed on a methodical basis. By that time a number of highly educated men had identified themselves with the church, and devoted to the Christian records the scholarly care which had hitherto been reserved for the classics of Greek literature. The chief center of culture at that time was Alexandria, and it was here, under the shadow of the famous library, that the foundations of N.T. criticism were laid. We owe it to Alexandrian scholars that the manuscripts of the N.T. were compared and edited, with a view to recovering the original text. They also did notable work in exegesis and in the study of literary problems. In not a few of their judgments they anticipated the conclusions of criticism in our own day. This might be illustrated by a remarkable passage in which the bishop Dionysius (about 250 A.D.) examines the book of Revelation, and argues that it cannot be by the same author as the fourth Gospel. Alexandrian criticism, however, was fatally hampered by its adoption of the so-called allegorical method. Recognizing the difficulties presented by much in the N.T., it fell back on a theory that the obvious meaning of the text was only a veil for some profounder spiritual meaning. It is very clear that an artificial method of this kind could lead to no solid results.

The Reformation and Criticism. For more than a thousand years after the time of the great Alexandrian scholars the work of criticism almost stood still. This was partly due to the arrest of all intellectual progress which followed the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, and partly to the stereotyping of belief by the Catholic Church. It was laid down as the duty of all Christians to accept everything that concerned religion without inquiry. The N.T. was now set apart as a sacred book, and the manner in which it had to be interpreted was fixed in the official creeds. Any attempt to raise a question about it, or even to dispute the authorized Latin translation, was at once put down as heresy. This attitude was changed by the Reformation. The bonds of ecclesiastical tradition were now broken, and the Bible was studied from fresh points of view—all the more eagerly because the Bible had now taken the place of the church as the final authority. (See also art., O.T. and Criticism, pp. 132-3). Luther himself, with all his boundless reverence for the N.T., was one of its most fearless critics. The commentaries of Calvin, in their clear and sane judgments and honest recognition of difficulties, are models of the true critical temper. From the time of the Reformation onward we can trace a steady progress toward that development which took definite shape in the last century.

The Motives of Modern Criticism. Before considering the nature of modern criticism it will be well to note the principal motives which lie behind it. (1) It arose primarily out of that great awakening of the human spirit of which the French Revolution was partly the cause and partly the consequence. All authorities to which men had submitted themselves out of mere habit were called on to vindicate their right, and the searchlights which had already been applied to political and scientific dogmas were inevitably turned on the Bible. For ages it had been a divine, authoritative book. If it was still to remain so, what were its credentials? (2) A more specific motive may be found in the new sense for history which had begun to manifest itself toward the end of the eighteenth century. Men learned to view the past in its right perspective. They realized that amidst the succession of events there had been a development, each age growing out of the one before it and giving birth to the one which followed. The N.T., whatever might be its permanent value, was a work of the first century. It cannot be rightly explained until it is put back among its surroundings. The key to its difficulties must be sought in the modes of thinking, in the social and political conditions, of that particular time. (3) Once more, the last hundred years have brought not only a new feeling toward the past but a vast increase of our historical knowledge. A wonderful series of discoveries have changed our whole conception of the life of antiquity. Buried cities have come to light; lost books have been recovered; the customs and ideas and beliefs of the ancient peoples have been illuminated from many sides. With all this additional knowledge, which grows in volume every year, scholars have gained a fresh insight into the N.T. They can now illustrate the Gospels and the Epistles of Paul from contemporary documents of which their predecessors knew nothing. They can reconstruct, in all its details, that world in which the N.T. was written. The change produced in criticism by the new knowledge now at our disposal may fairly be compared to that which came about in science through the invention of the microscope. (Cf. art., Backgrounds, pp. 843-50; also art., O.T. and Science, pp. 122-8.)

Characteristics of Modern Criticism. When we speak, then, of N.T. criticism we think of that mode of inquiry which has only become possible in our own times. "Criticism" means simply "examination," and the modern study of the N.T. is not essentially different from that which was bestowed on it by the ancient Fathers. In the one case, as in the other, the aim is to determine the true nature and message of writings which are confessedly difficult. Yet there are certain characteristics which belong peculiarly to modern criticism.

1. It sets itself to examine the N.T. as it is, without any preconceived ideas of what it ought to be. The ancient critics were bound by various dogmas, to which they tried to adjust everything that they found in the N.T. The object now is simply to discover the facts, and to consider their significance with an open mind. This does not mean that the modern critic cares nothing for the supreme religious message of the N.T. Its message is one of the facts, the grand fact, with which he is ultimately concerned. But he seeks, as far as possible, to allow the book to speak for itself. The official creeds, when all is said, were drawn up long afterward, and may have failed at times to represent the true meaning of the N.T. teachers. What do these teachers say when you look away from all later interpretations and carefully study their own testimony?

2. The N.T. writings are viewed in strict relation to the time and the special purpose for which they were intended. Their date and occasion were formerly treated as accidental. It was assumed that Paul's letters to Corinth or Galatia must be taken in a universal sense; that the Gospel of John dealt solely with the eternal truths of religion; that the book of Revelation embraced all history till the end of time. Modern criticism insists that the writings had all some immediate object. They were composed at a given time, for a given circle of readers, whose definite circumstances are always kept in view. A whole group of questions to which the earlier criticism was quite indifferent have thus become of primary importance. Who was the author of each of the documents? What was its precise date and place of origin? To whom was it addressed? What was the occasion which called it forth? Is it all of a single piece or was it written at different times and perhaps by several hands? On the answers to such questions the interpretation of each of the writings must depend.

3. In a larger sense the N.T. is to be understood historically. The church has always taken its stand on the great principle that the Word was made flesh, the Divine Life identified itself with humanity. But the implications of this truth used never to be fully grasped. It was assumed that the revelation broke in suddenly, and had nothing in common with anything that had gone before. We now recognize that although it was new it wove itself naturally into the existing life of the world. The forms in which it found expression had been prepared for it by an age-long process of development. Criticism, in its effort to explain the N.T., now takes full account of this historical preparation. It seeks at every point for connections and antecedents. How far did the early Christian customs grow out of similar practices in Jewish or pagan religion? What analogies to Christian doctrine can be discovered in apocalyptic and rabbinical literature, in the philosophies which the church encountered in the course of its early mission? This historical mode of inquiry is the distinctive feature of modern criticism, and in the hands of many writers it has certainly been pushed too far. Intentionally or not, they create the impression that the N.T. contains nothing which was not borrowed or adapted from some alien source. This pedantry, which is blind to the manifest originality of the gospel, has sometimes brought the historical method into disrepute, but the soundness of its main conception cannot reasonably be doubted. For centuries before Christ men had been "feeling after God if haply they might find him," and the new revelation attached itself to what was noblest and best in the world's earlier thought. At every step in our study of the N.T. we must estimate the influence of the prophets, of later Judaism, of the Greek philosophies, of contemporary religion. Only thus can we learn to appreciate what is distinctively new. (Cf. H. R. Mackintosh, The Originality of the Christian Message.)

4. Modern criticism has been strongly affected in its aims and methods by the example of the sciences. The chemists and physicists of our time have achieved marvelous results by patient and exact observation, by minute analysis, by the collection and comparison of all available facts. They deal, to be sure, with material data which are capable of this precise examination, and in things of the spirit no such exactitude is possible. Yet the N.T. critic tries to make use, as far as may be, of those processes which in other fields have proved so fruitful. He studies a Gospel or Epistle in every detail of its structure, as a botanist examines a plant. He is confident that every fact, however trivial, is worth attention, and may possibly afford a clue to far-reaching results. Some of the most notable of modern N.T. theories have been founded on the careful investigation of some single word or phrase. What is meant, for instance, by the title "Son of man"? Why is Christ called "the Lord"? What was implied in the baptismal formula "in the name of Jesus"? (Cf. pp. 840; 939a and 1093; 1098b.)

The Various Forms of Criticism. In our time, when all knowledge has become so highly specialized, N.T. criticism is a many-sided term. The problems which it deals with fall into a number of distinct classes, each of which requires a whole science for itself. A generation ago it was customary to make a twofold division into the "lower" and the "higher" criticism, i.e., the inquiry into matters of text and language, and the larger inquiry into the origin and meaning of the several books. Those terms "lower" and "higher" were unhappily chosen, and have led to much misunderstanding. They were also inappropriate, for the "lower" criticism often involves the wider questions, and vice versa. It is better to adopt a more natural division on some such lines as these. (See art., O.T. and Criticism, pp. 129-33.)

1. Textual criticism, which seeks to determine what the authors actually wrote. The N.T. has come down to us in more than two thousand manuscripts, all of them varying in greater or less degree from each other. Amidst this conflict of testimony how are we to restore the text to something like its original condition? (See art., Transmission of N.T., pp. 860-66.)

2. Exegesis, which investigates the precise meaning of each verse and paragraph. This work of exposition must be based on linguistic study, and it has been greatly furthered in recent years by the discovery, chiefly in Egypt, of great numbers of letters and other private documents. Hitherto we have known only the literary Greek of the first century, and the apostles wrote in the current language of the people. Those living turns of speech have now been illustrated and explained. (See Milligan, Here and There Among the Papyri.)

3. Literary criticism, which is concerned with all questions affecting the composition of the books. Their date and authorship, their style and purpose and sources, fall to be considered under this head.

4. Theological criticism, which takes up the results of all the other lines of inquiry and attempts, on the basis of them, to trace out the nature and development of N.T. thought.

It cannot be claimed that this broad division is in any sense exhaustive. The history of the canon, for instance (i.e., of the process by which the writings were selected and set apart as scripture; see p. 855), is a great subject by itself. The study of the life of Christ is perhaps the most important task of criticism, and yet it cannot be brought under any of the ordinary divisions. The rise of the church and the development of institutions are also to be assigned to special departments. Moreover, some of the subjects most vital for the understanding of the N.T. do not fall strictly within the N.T. field at all. The need for intimate acquaintance with O.T. scripture has always been evident. We are now aware that early Christian thought was also profoundly influenced by the teachings of later Judaism, and by the philosophical and religious conceptions which had grown up in the Greco-Roman world. No scholars are doing more at the present day to elucidate the N.T. than the experts in apocalyptic, in rabbinical literature, in Hellenistic philosophy and the mystery religions (see art., Backgrounds, p. 843; also art., Religious Development of the Intertestamental Period, p. 209). The N.T. is a small book which might be read from end to end in a few hours, but the study of it has expanded into a vast science, involving the skill and lifelong labor of a host of learned men. No one can now pretend to have a fully competent knowledge of anything but a little portion of the whole domain of N.T. criticism.

Special Problems in Criticism. In whatever department his work may lie the critic is confronted with a great number of special problems. Their very existence was hardly suspected a century ago, but it is now recognized that issues of the first magnitude are bound up with their solution. The nature of these problems will be best understood if we look at several of the outstanding examples.

1. Perhaps the most important of all is that which concerns the synoptic Gospels (see intro. to each). These Gospels to a great extent repeat each other, while at the same time they present many striking differences. On what theory of their origin can we explain at once their agreements and their variations? At first sight the problem may seem to be one of merely literary interest, but its significance is apparent when we reflect that these three Gospels are our primary records of the life of Christ. How and when did they originate? How far can we accept them as historical? Our faith as Christians must depend, in large measure, on the answer that can be given to these questions. Criticism endeavors to solve them by means of a detailed comparison of the three Gospels with each other. Endless patience and ingenuity have been spent on the inquiry, and it is still in process. Several points, however, may now be regarded as fully established: (1) The Gospels as we now have them were written in the latter part of the first century but they were compiled from earlier documents. (2) The oldest of our present Gospels is Mark. (3) Along with Mark there was a work now lost, which consisted mainly of Sayings of Jesus. (4) Matthew and Luke, independently of each other, combined the narrative of Mark with this lost work, each of them adding a considerable amount of extra material. The principal aims of more recent criticism are to determine the sources (probably in the Aramaic language) which lie behind Mark, and to ascertain the nature and extent of the lost document. (See art., The Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, p. 868.)

2. Only second in importance to the synoptic is the Johannine problem. Until a hundred years ago the fourth Gospel was universally accepted as the work of John, the personal disciple of Jesus, but critical examination has thrown doubt on this authorship. It is maintained (1) that the ancient evidence on the subject is by no means conclusive; (2) that the evangelist depends on the other three Gospels, as a firsthand witness would not require to do; (3) that some of the pervading ideas of the Gospel became current in the church at a comparatively late time, when John can have been no longer living. Some critics would assign the Gospel to a disciple of John; others to a later John, commonly called the Elder, who was a prominent figure in the Asian church; others conclude that the name of the author is now hopelessly lost, while a further theory, which has found considerable favor in recent years, would divide the work among several authors. It may be doubted whether the Johannine problem will ever be solved. The most diverse views are all tenable, and unless some entirely new evidence comes to light it seems impossible to choose between them (see intro. to Fourth Gospel, pp. 1060-6).

3. Outside of the Gospels there are a number of literary problems which are less cardinal, but still of the highest interest. How many of the Epistles which have come down to us under the name of Paul were actually written by him? Are the last four chapters of 2 Corinthians and the closing chapter of Romans to be taken as separate letters? Who wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews and to whom was it addressed? What is the relation of the Epistles of John to the fourth Gospel? What were the sources of the book of Acts? What was the origin of the book of Revelation, and how is it to be interpreted? Every writing of the N.T. has its own problem or cluster of problems, and all of them are still unsettled. (See individual discussions of these questions in connection with the several books.)

4. The relation of the N.T. to the apocalyptic literature gives rise to many crucial questions of a different character. Within the last century a whole series of writings have been recovered which date from about 160 B.C. to 100 A.D. and deal with the approach of the "new age" when God will establish his kingdom. Two books in the Bible, Daniel and Revelation, are typical of this class of literature. It cannot be denied that many of the apocalyptic conceptions (e.g., those which concern the Messiah, the kingdom of God, the resurrection, the judgment, the heavenly world) passed over into early Christianity (see art., The Religious Development of the Intertestamental Period, pp. 206-13). To what extent did Jesus himself adopt these conceptions? How far did he impress them with a new meaning? Are they to be considered an essential part of his message or merely a framework or scaffolding which can be easily removed? It is chiefly in the Gospels that the apocalyptic ideas are prominent, but they meet us everywhere in the N.T. To determine their precise nature and influence is one of the primary tasks of criticism. (See notes on Mk. 13.)

5. A still more important question has emerged within our own generation in consequence of our larger knowledge of the historical background of Christianity. We are now aware that the union of East and West under the Roman Empire had led to the wide diffusion of certain Oriental cults, which had customs and beliefs resembling, at least superficially, those of the church. They possessed sacraments not unlike baptism and the Lord's Supper. They turned on the worship of divinities who had died and been restored to life and whose experience was supposed to repeat itself in that of their votaries. How are these affinities to be explained? In what degree was the church influenced, in the expression of its beliefs, by the example of the rival cults? Many writers have undoubtedly made too much of the apparent similarities, but that there was some relation between Christian doctrine and the contemporary beliefs can hardly be questioned. A new and profoundly interesting field has been opened for N.T. investigation (see art., Backgrounds, pp. 851-2, and cf. notes on 1 Cor. 11).

These are only a few of the larger problems with which criticism has to deal at the present day. On all of them there is wide difference of opinion, and perhaps none of them will ever be completely settled. Criticism calls itself a science, but it must never be forgotten that the sifting of ideas and historical origins is not like the physical sciences, which work with tangible material. Any results that can be gained are tentative at the best, and are subject to constant modification. It is very noticeable that the tone of criticism is always becoming less dogmatic. The claim was often made a generation ago that certain theories had been definitely proved, but later research has in almost every instance thrown doubt on them or overturned them altogether. There is no reason to suppose that present-day conclusions will be any more stable. Competent scholars only adopt them provisionally. They are anxious, above all things, to preserve an open mind.

The Helpful Results of Criticism. What, then, has been the effect of criticism on our estimate of the N.T., and of the message contained in it? At first sight it might appear that the results have been largely negative. The N.T. was formerly accepted as a book which, being divinely inspired, imparted a revelation which in all its details was valid forever. In the light of criticism this view is no longer wholly tenable. We have learned to see the N.T. writers as men of their own time, working under many limitations. We realize that in the message they delivered there was an admixture of more or less transient elements. We are compelled to make distinctions between different books of the N.T., and sometimes between different portions of the same book. Later traditions or doctrines of secondary value are mingled with genuine history and with passages that breathe the authentic spirit of the gospel. In these respects and in others criticism has disturbed the traditional attitude to the N.T. Its work has appeared to many minds to be purely negative and destructive.

This judgment, however, is far from representing the whole truth. On a deeper view it can hardly be doubted that criticism, instead of destroying the N.T., has set it on a firmer foundation, and has given a new power and meaning to its message.

1. If it has broken down the older doctrine of inspiration, it has replaced it by a truer and more satisfying one. According to the old idea God employed the sacred writers as mere neutral vehicles for the expression of his will. They were often compared to the harp or lyre which answers mechanically to the touch of the musician. We now think of the message as coming to us through inspired personalities. The apostles, as Paul himself declared, were men of like passions with ourselves, but through their knowledge of Christ they had attained to a higher faith and insight. Limited as they were by the conditions of their time and their own shortcomings, they were striving to proclaim the truth which possessed them. We can feel as we read their words that they were led by the Spirit of God.

2. In like manner criticism has done a real service by teaching us to distinguish between the forms or accessories of the gospel and the substance. It followed from the old doctrine of inspiration that everything contained in the N.T. must stand on the same level. Church regulations or details of theology were to be regarded as no less vital than the parables or the Beatitudes. This attitude of mind could lead only to a confusion in religious thinking. The mischief wrought by it is abundantly illustrated by many dark chapters of Christian history. We now have learned to recognize that many things in the N.T. belong to the age in which it was written. Those traditions and philosophies which served as a clothing for the message must not be confounded with the message itself.

3. The very fact that the N.T. has been thrown open to the freest and most searching examination must be reckoned as a great gain. Out of motives of mistaken reverence it was formerly taken on trust, and for this reason Christian faith was liable to insecurity. A hundred years ago the most powerful argument against religion was always that it rested on mere authority. What was the guarantee for this divine book? Who could tell when or how it came to be written? What was the proof that all its teachings were not an arbitrary invention? Such arguments carry weight no longer. The N.T. has been examined more strictly than any other book. The main facts as to its origin have been verified on the fullest available evidence. No one can say that anything is being withheld, for every possible doubt has been put forward and magnified. As a result of all this sifting many of our old conceptions of the N.T. have been changed, but its claim has been established more surely than ever. It stands out, not on any dogmatic grounds but by its own intrinsic worth, as the chief spiritual possession of mankind. (See W. N. Clarke, Sixty Years with the Bible.)

4. We owe it to criticism that the life of Christ has been set on a firm historical basis. Our Gospels, it was always acknowledged, were written comparatively late, and on this account their value was often challenged. How was it possible that these records, composed after such a long interval, could give us anything more than vague memories and legends? Might it not be that they were wholly the work of pious imagination? Modern criticism has indeed distinguished various strata in the Gospels, some of them more primitive and trustworthy than others; but one fact it has clearly demonstrated—the evangelists, although they were men of a later generation, worked with materials which had come to them from the early days. Their records are compilations of briefer documents, some of which must go back to the time immediately following our Lord's death. We can feel certain that the facts are set before us with essential fidelity.

5. It is now possible to reconstruct the N.T. history, and to judge the true significance of the various characters and events. All the conceptions of early Christianity have hitherto suffered from a certain unreality. One has only to think of the familiar Bible pictures, many of them beautiful as works of art but designed, apparently, to illustrate some fairy book rather than a history of things which actually happened. It cannot be anything but a gain that this atmosphere of illusion has now been dispelled. We can place the apostles in their true environment. We can make out the process by which the church came into being, and follow the development of its worship and institutions and doctrines. In the light of this historical knowledge we are able to appreciate those elements of the gospel which secured its final victory.

6. It is due to criticism (and this, perhaps, has been its most valuable result) that we can now read the N.T. as a living book. There may be some truth in the argument that the Bible is no longer sacred when it is laid open to free inquiry. Men accepted it formerly as the literal Word of God: we now study it in the making, and discover that its writers were human beings, expressing themselves in the language and the forms of thought which their time afforded them. Something may be lost, but in return the N.T. has been brought far closer to our hearts and lives. We can see that it has everywhere a bearing on real needs and difficulties. Its writers had passed through the common experiences; they declared their message to a world that was strangely like our own, in spite of the two thousand years which separate it. Much of the indifference to religion in our time has grown out of the feeling that the Bible is an outworn book, which never had much relation to actual life and has now entirely lost its meaning. The most urgent task of the Christian teacher is to make the book living, and in this task he will find his best assistance in modern criticism. In recovering the lost links between these ancient writings and man's daily life, it has disclosed to us one of the chief sources of their power.

Criticism and the Spirit of Christ. It is a significant fact that the great periods of criticism have been just those when the Christian spirit was most vital. Whenever men have grown aware that the N.T. was no mere repository of old tradition but the vehicle of a life-giving message they have ceased to accept it out of pious custom. They have examined it eagerly, under the most searching light they had, in order to discover its true purpose and meaning. It was so in the early centuries when the church was engaged in its great conflict. It was so again at the Reformation. We have a right to believe that the critical movement of our own day has its ultimate spring in a new sense of the value of the gospel, and that it is preparing the way for some fuller revelation of Christ.

Literature: Cobern, The New Archaeological Discoveries and Their Bearing on the N.T.; Ramsay, The Bearing of Recent Discoveries on the Trustworthiness of the N.T.; McClymont, History and Results of N.T. Criticism; Robertson, Studies in the Text of the N.T.; Moffatt, The Approach to the N.T.; Deissmann, New Light on the N.T.; Bacon, The Making of the N.T.; Conybeare, The History of N.T. Criticism; Peake, Critical Introduction to the N.T.

THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST

BY PROFESSOR JOSEPH F. MCFADYEN

Sources. Practically all that we know of the earthly life of Jesus we learn from the four Gospels. All four Gospel writers agree that the movement of which the Baptist was the center formed the beginning of the story of Jesus as the Christ. Mark, indeed, draws a veil completely over all that precedes; but "Matthew" and Luke, writing later, narrate stories of the birth and infancy of Jesus. Those in Matthew seem to be intended to establish parallels between the infancy of Jesus and that of Israel, in particular of Moses. The child Jesus, "Matthew" tells us, under divine guidance was taken to Egypt, and only by the providence of God escaped premature destruction. The star that guided the Magi suggests to some the star prophesied in Num. 24¹⁷, the star which was to come forth out of Jacob.

[In this article the name "Matthew" appears sometimes with quotation marks, and sometimes without. When the name refers to the first Gospel, the marks are not used; they are used when it refers to the individual, to indicate that the author of the article questions the tradition that the author of the first Gospel was an individual named Matthew.]

Birth and Infancy. The very beautiful introduction to Luke's Gospel narrates the story of the birth of the Baptist as well as of Jesus. In these two chapters Luke gives us a background against which the subsequent story has to be read. The new religion, he seems to say, was born in a burst of song; Jesus and his forerunner the Baptist were born and cradled in song. Many, indeed, believe that the prominence of sacred lyrics in these chapters (like the Magnificat, the Benedictus, and the Nunc Dimittis) indicates the spirit in which they are to be read. In his introduction Luke implicitly reminds us that the men who hounded Jesus to his death did not represent the whole of Judaism. From these chapters we get a very different impression of the Temple, the priesthood, and the Jewish piety of the time from that which we get from the subsequent history. In the birth and infancy sections both of Matthew and Luke, we are struck by the prominent part played by angels and visions as a means by which God made his will known to his servants. While the records ascribe to Jesus himself a belief in angels, they played practically no part in his religious life. His communion with the Father God was so unhindered and direct that he was conscious of no gulf between them, and so felt no need of angels to act as intermediaries.

At a very early period in the history of the church the title Son of God was applied to Jesus. In their Gospels "Matthew" and Luke teach that Jesus was Son of God, not only in the sense that his will was one with God's will and that in him God had become incarnate, but in a physical sense also; that in his case the Holy Spirit took the place of a human father. The doctrine of the virgin birth, as it is called, has been asserted, doubted, and denied by men who all equally claim to be loyal followers of Jesus.

Those who hesitate to make belief in the virginity of Mary an essential of the Christian faith bring support for their position from various quarters. The virgin birth, they say, is clearly taught in Matthew, not quite so clearly in Luke; but apart from the introductions to these two Gospels, it is nowhere mentioned in the N.T. It was obviously not a theme of the first Christian preachers. If John does not deny it, neither does he affirm it. "Matthew" misunderstood Isaiah's prophecy from which he quotes; in Isaiah there is no reference to a virgin. Luke's only reference to the virgin birth is in the prophecy to Mary of the angel Gabriel in 13^{4f}. Mary's question in 13⁴ is not very intelligible as coming from a betrothed maiden. When Luke comes to describe the actual birth, he seems to make no further reference to anything miraculous in its nature.

Not only is Joseph called the father of Jesus (23³), but he and Mary are represented as being astonished at the message of Simeon (23³) and failing to understand the saying of Jesus that he must be in his Father's house—facts difficult to reconcile with the story in the first chapter. The theory of Mary's virginity seems to attach too much importance to a physical basis for holiness. In the judgment of many the true miracle is not the virgin body of Mary but the virgin soul of Jesus. If the Holy Spirit can cleanse from all taint of impurity the son of a woman, could not his influence be equally effective with the son of a woman and a man? (The Roman Catholics have been logical enough to note this weakness of the theory of the virgin birth. They evade the difficulty, since 1854, by teaching that the conception of Mary herself was immaculate.) Moreover, if Jesus did not enter the world as we do, then it is said he cannot be our High Priest and out of his own experience sympathize with us in our temptations. In any case, the claim is made that the incarnation and the virgin birth are not inseparably linked together; the divine is not limited to any one way of entering the human.

Those who accept the fact of the virgin birth point to such evidences as the following: The birth of Jesus from a virgin is clearly taught both in Mt. 1 and Lk. 1; moreover, these accounts come from independent sources, the former being given from Joseph's point of view, the latter from Mary's. "Matthew" (123) points out that the virgin birth was prophesied in Isa. 7¹⁴. With insignificant exceptions, the church since apostolic times has accepted the fact. The author of the fourth Gospel almost certainly knew the story of the virgin birth, and, at all events, he does not contradict it. Further, it is asked, If the story is not authentic, whence did it arise? Not on Jewish soil, for Jews honored marriage and attached no special sanctity to virginity. Nor yet on pagan soil, for the story of the birth of Jesus moves on an altogether different plane from the often gross pagan fables of children born of divine fathers and human mothers. Further, the incarnation seems to require a physical miracle; like the resurrection, the virgin birth is entirely consonant with all that we know of Jesus.

Both "Matthew" and Luke record that Jesus was born in Bethlehem, six miles southwest of Jerusalem. Luke thinks of Nazareth in Galilee as the home of Joseph and Mary (126 24). From the early life of Jesus, Luke alone lifts the veil for a moment. On a visit to the Temple, when he was twelve years old, he became so engrossed in discussion with the rabbis, who were astonished at his ripe intelligence, that he failed to join his family party on its return journey.

Connection with John the Baptist. All four Gospels describe a great crisis in the life of Jesus which took place during the Baptist movement. (The data in Lk. 3^{1f.} point to a date about 28 A.D. See art., Chronology of N.T., p. 874.) A prophet of priestly descent, John son of Zacharias, was the leading figure in a great religious revival. John is represented in the Gospels as a second Elijah. Like Elijah he wore a leather girdle and made his home for a time in the wilderness by the banks of the Jordan. Jesus found in him the fulfillment of Malachi's prophecy of the coming of Elijah as the forerunner of King Messiah. John was a Nazirite and an ascetic (Num. 6^{1f.}). The brackish waters of the sluggish Jordan were by Jewish theologians deemed unfit for purificatory purposes; but John called on the Jews to submit to baptism in the Jordan, hitherto used for sacramental purposes only by Elisha. His call was to individual repentance, not, as that of the prophets had so often been, to national and social repentance; nor, like the Essenes, did he invite men to leave their calling, but to practice moderation, justice, and mercy in their calling.

John's call to repentance, his proclamation that a crisis in the story of God's dealings with his people was at hand, and the baptismal symbol with which he accompanied his message, stirred the country profoundly. The influence of his movement was long-continued and widespread (Acts 18^{24f.} and 19^{1f.}); yet John worked within the Judaic system, with no recorded protest against its outworn ritual. Moreover, the note of doom was so prominent in his message that it could hardly be called a gospel.

Among the throngs that came to be baptized by John was Jesus of Nazareth in Galilee, thus abruptly introduced in Mark, our earliest Gospel, and as yet, so far as we know, unknown outside of his native town. The absence of reference to Joseph in the Gospel story suggests that he was long since dead, and that Jesus had been left with the care of his younger brothers and sisters. It is a tempting suggestion that his marvelous power of storytelling had been developed in the home circle. Like Joseph, he followed the trade of a carpenter (perhaps "artisan" or "builder" is a better translation). Eulogies on manual labor, based on this fact, are modern interpretations which had no interest for the primitive church. The fact that Jesus had been a manual worker is mentioned only once in the Gospels, and then only by his critics in order to depreciate his ministry (Mk. 63).

Mark quite simply relates that Jesus was baptized by John in the Jordan. Writing later, "Matthew" explains that John demurred at baptizing Jesus, and was reassured by Jesus' explanation that he must fulfill all the claims of righteousness. Immediately after his baptism Jesus had a strange sense of divine approval and consecration to a God-given ministry, an assurance of unique Sonship. As Mark tells the story, it may indicate only an inward and spiritual experience, though the later accounts give a more concrete form to the dove that symbolized the Spirit and to the divine voice.

Temptation. Alone with God in the wilderness after his baptism, Jesus spent weeks of intense meditation on the nature of the task that he now knew lay before him. Various alluring plans for discharging the trust committed to him presented themselves to his mind; but one who enjoyed the unbroken fellowship with God that Jesus knew, recognized that those suggestions did not come from God. The first bypath down which he was tempted to turn was the plan of concentrating on the effort to make life smoother and more comfortable for himself and his followers. There are indications that Jesus regarded even his healing ministry as in a measure but supplementary to his other work. Again, he was tempted to offer the people a "sign," such as that of leaping safely from a pinnacle of the Temple. But in his thought every gift with which he was equipped was meant to help men, not to dazzle them. Moreover, almost till the last day of his life Jesus is represented as taking steps to evade any danger that threatened to bring his work to a premature close.

The fact that Jesus was speaking figuratively in describing his temptations is made especially clear in the third narrative, which represents him as being offered, at the price of homage to Satan, the lordship over all earthly kingdoms which he viewed from a high mountain. The peculiar subtlety of this suggestion lay in this: that it might easily be made to appear that a long life of popularity and earthly power would provide far greater opportunity for beneficent work and lofty teaching than a short life largely spent in controversy and ending in a violent death. Jesus met all three temptations with one of the great texts of Scripture with which his mind was stored (Deut. 8:3 6:16 6:13).

Beginning of Public Ministry. John has much to tell of work of Jesus in Judæa before the Galilæan ministry began; indeed, he pays little attention to Galilee throughout the story. This is only one of many points on which the fourth Gospel leaves a somewhat different impression from the first three. Apparently John knew more than the other Gospel writers about Jesus' activity in Judæa, but there is also a deeper explanation. Writing long after the story had passed into history, John was anxious not only to record events and sayings but to interpret them; to show their significance on which the intervening history had shed much light. Throughout the story he sees Jesus, as it were, transfigured, and he is more deeply interested in spiritual truth than in questions of chronology or geography.

According to Mark, the ministry of Jesus began in Galilee, where he had been brought up. In four phrases Mark sums up the central points in his proclamation (1:5): "The time of waiting is over; God's reign is at hand; prepare for this reign by repenting, changing your manner of life; have faith in the good news." Every Jew would understand the phrase, "the Kingdom," or "reign of God." It might be paraphrased as "the world as God meant it to be." It was customary for the religious teachers of the time to wander, each with a small band of followers. The intimacy with Jesus of two pairs of fishermen brothers, Peter and Andrew, James and John, dated from the beginning of the ministry. Jesus, playing on the word, called them to become fishers of men, by patient skill to win men to the new life that would fit them for citizenship in the Kingdom. In a story which has often been compared with the resurrection episode in Jn. 21:1, Luke in 5:1-11 gives a fuller account of the call of Peter.

Aspects of Early Ministry. Next, Jesus made a tour of the cities and villages of Galilee, finding in the service of the synagogue or village church an excellent opportunity for delivering his message. He was often invited to translate the scripture passage for the day from the ancient Hebrew into the spoken Aramaic, and to expound it. The people were astonished at the note of authority in his teaching. Unlike their usual teachers, he made them hear the voice of the living God from the pages of the Book. At the very beginning of the story Mark introduces one more activity of Jesus—a healing ministry. Various attitudes toward disease are possible and have been actually taken. It may be regarded as the punishment of sin, or our own sin in this life or in a previous life, or the sin of our ancestors; as a chastening discipline from God; as a test of our loyalty to God; or even as a mark of God, a special favor. It was the judgment of Jesus that in the kingdom of God, in the world as God meant it to be, disease has no place. Pity for weakness and pain, the fight with disease, and the belief that in this fight we have God on our side, the church has inherited from Jesus. The healing ministry was not an addendum to his work of announcing the Kingdom, or simply a verification of his claims. It was an essential part of his message. To cure all kinds of physical disabilities was but one side of the Messiah's work, of which the other side was to preach the gospel to the poor (Mt. 11:5).

In his earlier chapters Mark has little explicit theology, but he clearly means to represent Jesus as always Master (or Lord, to use the title which the later church loved to give him). He begins by subduing Satan; when he calls men to follow him they come at his call; when he teaches he teaches with authority; at his word foul spirits come out, the bed-ridden resume their activities, the paralytic walks and the leper is restored to human fellowship. A form of disease which plays a prominent part in the story is that of demon possession. In the simple medical diagnosis of the time possession by a demon was the explanation given of many diseases, especially cases of mental aberration. Mark represents the demoniacs as knowing that Jesus was the Messiah. His conception is that the demons, who were believed to inspire the utterances of the demoniacs, being servants of Satan, recognized in Jesus their arch-enemy before men in general discovered in him the Messiah. Men of deranged mind readily adapt the outlook of any character with which in their delusion they identify themselves, and from the beginning these poor people must have heard all round them much speculation on the nature and mission of Jesus.

Jesus varied his methods according to the case. Demons he exorcised by a commanding word; Peter's mother-in-law he took by the hand and assisted to her feet. The most revealing instance is that of the leper, whom Jesus touched. A leper's touch brought defilement, and the consequent exclusion from human society must to the sufferers have been almost more terrible than the disease. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925a.)

Antipathy of Jewish Leaders: Its Causes. The next question to which Mark turns his attention is one which, in the early days of the church, attracted great attention both among Jews and among Christians. Why was Jesus rejected by the leaders of his own people, and why were the followers of Jesus persecuted by them, as the early chapters of Acts tell us they were? For the Christians it was a problem to be explained, as we see from the way in which Paul deals with the question in Romans.

(1) Claim to Forgive Sins. Mark's answer is that the indignation of the rulers against Jesus was aroused, in the first place, by his claim to forgive sins. At the time Mark wrote, the church put in the forefront of her creed that through faith in the name of Jesus men may have their sins forgiven. In the story of the paralytic brought to Jesus by four friends, Mark (21-12) tells us that the claims the Christians made for Jesus, Jesus had first made for himself. Forgiveness, the story implies, includes not only the cleansing of the conscience and the sense of reconciliation with God, but also, it may be in some way we cannot now understand, the cancelling even of the consequences of sin.

(2) Differing Views of Holiness. The antipathy of the Jewish leaders to Jesus was due, in the second place, to the irreconcilable opposition between his view of holiness and theirs. They differed vitally as to what was meant by holy people, holy conduct, holy food, holy days. The authorities were scandalized because Jesus not only invited a customhouse officer called Levi (in the first Gospel 99 identified with Matthew) to be one of his closest followers, but attended a reception given by Levi at which many of the guests were "publicans and sinners." These "publicans" were not the rich publicani who farmed out the taxes, but the actual collectors. They were social outcasts because in Judæa they were in the service of the hated Roman government and in Galilee in the service of Herod Antipas, who was the creature of Rome; also because by the nature of their occupation they were compelled to rub shoulders with Gentiles; while no doubt they would often find it difficult or impossible to observe the Sabbath or to visit Jerusalem at the time of the Passover.

Who were the "sinners"? A sinner was a transgressor of the Law; but the Jewish Law included much that we should now call ceremonial. Thieves and adulterers were "sinners"; but so also were Gentiles, however upright in character (Gal. 215) since they were altogether outside of the Law. So also would be Jews who, through indifference, neglected the requirements of the ceremonial Law, or, owing to the circumstances of their lives, could not fulfill them. Perhaps "non-churchgoer" is the nearest modern equivalent. The Pharisees were the Puritans among the Jews. Their movement began in a serious attempt to secure the purity of the Jewish race and the Jewish religion. But separation of any kind is apt to engender feelings of superiority, contempt and self-satisfaction. They were the popular party, nationalist within limits, representing the middle classes chiefly of the towns, as opposed to the aristocratic Sadducees on the one hand and the humble village folks on the other. In a sense they were liberals, who maintained that laws given for an earlier stage of civilization needed adaptation before being applied in a more complicated social environment. There were, however, two serious weaknesses in their position. They did not believe in allowing the people to use their own instructed common sense in solving their moral problems; and their goodness was of the kind that rubs off. The Pharisee thought the other man's impurity would infect him; Jesus hoped his purity would infect the other man (Mk. 27).

(3) Fasting. One of the disputes concerned

fasting (Mk. 218-22). In his teaching Jesus did not discourage fasting, but only ostentatious fasting (Mt. 616-18); but his own neglect of the fast-days observed by the strict Pharisees was made the subject of gibes (Mt. 1119). Fasting, he taught, a sign of mourning and humiliation, was out of place in the glad, new epoch that his mission was inaugurating; and the expansive power of a living religion can never be confined within the framework that sufficed for bygone days. New wine needs new wineskins.

(4) The Sabbath Question. Another frequent source of conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees was the Sabbath question. The subject must have occasioned great difficulty in the early church, since Gentile converts had never previously known a Sabbath day; and the question how far the Jewish Sabbath was binding on Christians was only part of the very difficult question of the relation of Christians to the Jewish Law. In justice to the Pharisees, we have to remember that in their eyes the very existence of their religion was bound up with the observance of the Sabbath. On more than one occasion the enemies of the Jews had successfully taken advantage of their known reluctance to fight on the Sabbath. (See notes on Neh. 1031 1315-22.)

But they looked only to the letter of the Law. Jesus looked in a broad way at the meaning of the institution of the Sabbath rest. In defending his hungry disciples for plucking and rubbing wheat-ears on the Sabbath (technically threshing) Jesus quoted the precedent of David, who with his followers in time of need ate the sacred loaves (Mk. 226). David put the claims of humanity before the claims of ritual. Churlishness is always objectionable; churlishness in the name of religion is doubly so. In particular, the Pharisees urged that, except in cases of desperate illness, medical attention should not be given on the Sabbath. Jesus laid down the principle on which the world, and even the church, have been so slow to act: that human beings, even our employees, deserve as much consideration as our livestock or our draught-animals (Lk. 1310-17 141-6). In healing on the Sabbath the man with the withered arm, in the face of the silent hostility of the authorities, Jesus uttered the pregnant saying that the Sabbath is a day for saving life, not for destroying it. On this Mark has the illuminating comment that, on this same Sabbath, those defenders of the Sabbath law began to plot the destruction of Jesus (Mk. 36).

In this plot they joined with the Herodians, who must have been supporters of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee; possibly a party that hoped to see Herod an independent monarch. This union of the political and the religious leaders foreshadowed the combination which finally brought Jesus to his death. So far as the records show, this marks practically the end of the synagogue ministry. In the next scene Jesus withdraws with his disciples to the Sea of Galilee. So great were the crowds that came to his ministrations from all parts of the country, even from Tyre and Sidon outside the limits of Palestine, that sometimes he had to take refuge in a small boat and address the multitudes from this strange pulpit. We note that Jesus' disputes with the Pharisees were not all concerned with the ritual side of the Law. In the beautiful story of the woman who anointed Jesus (Lk. 736f.) and in the passage at the beginning of Jn. 8 that has somehow wandered from its original context, the Gospels show that Jesus was no more afraid of moral than of ceremonial infection. It has taken even the Christian world a long time to develop Jesus' sense of chivalry in dealing with sexual sin. Though little is said on the subject in the Gospels, we gather that the harlots received his message with as much joy as the outcast tax-collectors (Mt. 2131). On this point the accredited defenders of social morality would feel doubly sure that their opposition to Jesus was God-inspired.

Choosing the Twelve. Next comes an event of great importance in the history of the church—the choosing of the twelve (Mk. 313-19 and parallels). Mark indicates three objects which were in the mind of Jesus when he selected them: (1) personal and close association with himself, a theological education by personal contact with the greatest of all teachers; (2) when their course was complete, a missionary tour; (3) equipment with the power of exorcising evil spirits. In modern language this would be described as a medical mission by faith healing; but it was then conceived as a campaign against Satan. Some of "the twelve" did work of far-reaching significance. That some of the others are almost unknown to us does not necessarily mean that they accomplished nothing. Some fishermen, a tax-collector, a politician or two, and one or two others who left hardly even a name behind them, nearly all of them Galileans, not one of them so far as we know with any pretensions to scholarship, formed a not very promising theological college. But Jesus had the same insight and the same disregard of convention in his selection of his assistants as he showed in the choice of an audience. They had the double advantage that they were not trained by a rabbi and that they were trained by Jesus. In addition to the men disciples, Luke (81-3) tells us that a number of women who were indebted to Jesus for relief from ill health or nervous or mental trouble traveled with the disciples and ministered to their material wants. Among these women was Mary of Magdala, a wealthy city south of Capernaum. Luke's remark that seven devils had gone out of her is often interpreted to mean that Mary had been rescued by Jesus from a life of shame. For this theory there is no evidence worth the name. She had been cured of some acute nervous disorder, possibly at times amounting to actual mental derangement.

His Mighty Works. Wherever Jesus went the excitement continued to be intense. A rumor began to spread that he was insane (Mk. 321). Jesus' relatives tried to seize and restrain him. They may have shared the common view that his mind was affected; and they may well have been afraid, both for themselves and for him, of the growing opposition of the authorities. For scribes now appear on the scene who have come all the way from Jerusalem (Mk. 322). The official verdict is that Jesus' wonderful power over the bodies and the minds of men is the result of a bargain he has made with the lord of the demons; in modern language, the price he has obtained for selling himself to the devil. The earnestness, almost fierceness, of Jesus' answer to this subtle explanation of his spiritual domination is explained in part by his recollection of the struggle he had with the tempter on this very point. All sins, he said, in which men consciously or unconsciously do evil instead of good, can win God's forgiveness; but to ascribe the work of God to Satan is to confound the whole moral order of the universe (Mk. 328f.).

After giving some specimens of Jesus' teaching, Mark records four examples of the overmastering impression which he made on the minds of his disciples, namely, the stilling of the storm on the Sea of Galilee; the healing of the Gadarene demoniac; the raising of Jairus' daughter; and the healing of the woman with the menstrual hemorrhage. Mark is still continuing to portray Jesus as "Lord," Lord of the storm-fiend, of demons, of disease and death. The episode of the storm was not meant to teach that Jesus could not die. Not long after this, he did die—a far more terrible death than drowning. His beneficent activities have been an undying inspiration to the world as well as to the church; but the picture of Jesus sleeping amid the storm brings no less reassurance to our faith. He saw nothing to be afraid of. In life or in death, in the storm as in the sunshine, he was safe in his Father's keeping.

The detail in which the incident of the Gadarene demoniac is told suggests that it was regarded as a test case: if Jesus could fail anywhere, he would fail here. Many religious workers will be reminded of cases in which they have been confronted with apparently helpless victims of some vile habit that, like a foul monster, held them in its grip. To such the story brings its message that though the name of the devils within the man be legion (a word that indicates the thousands of mail-clad warriors in the most powerful military engine of the time), yet when the voice of Jesus is heard, "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit," it will be obeyed. The story of Jairus' daughter is one that leaves unanswered many questions we would fain ask: e.g., when Jesus said, "The girl is not dead but sleeping," did he wish to be understood literally or figuratively? In any case, throughout the tale shines his serene confidence that God will call him to no task that is beyond the strength that God will give him.

One of the most beautiful stories in the Gospels is that of the woman who waylaid Jesus as he was going to the home of Jairus. Her illness was one that made her ceremonially unclean (Lev. 1525). Worn out with long years of weakness, social ostracism, and shame, with a strange mixture of superstition and faith she touched the tassel of Jesus' robe and knew that she had touched the fountain of life. All who have worked for others will understand Mark's remark that Jesus realized there had been a drain on his healing power (530), for the Master's work of saving others was a costly work. In this case, as in so many others, Jesus told the invalid that her salvation was due to her faith. By faith he meant the assurance that all around us rivers of healing, life-giving energy from God, are flowing, beating against the barriers that we erect round our lives, barriers of blindness and deafness, of want of hope and courage. To have faith is to throw down the barriers, to let the river of God flow over our souls and save us. (Cf. p. 922.)

Sending Forth the Twelve. Very possibly the Jewish authorities had not fully realized the consequences of Jesus' attaching to himself the twelve disciples. The potentialities of the band were revealed when he decided on what we should now call a whirlwind campaign in the villages of Galilee. As this was the beginning, in an organized form, of that missionary activity which, by the time the Gospels were written, had attained such dimensions and was raising difficult problems, the details of Jesus' instruction to the missionaries would be carefully remembered (Mt. 10; Lk. 10).

He evidently felt that a crisis was approaching; the evangelization of Galilee was a matter of extreme urgency. There was no time for salutations, nor would there be opportunity to enter Gentile or even Samaritan territory (Mt. 10^{5f.}). We would gladly know more of this mission than the Gospels have told us.

It is at this point Mark records the death of the Baptist, whose fate foreshadowed that of Jesus. As the first Elijah had rebuked Ahab and Jezebel, so the second Elijah rebuked Antipas and his illegal wife, Herodias, and paid the penalty with his life (though there is reason to think that fear of political trouble through John's great influence with the people was one of Herod's motives for this judicial murder). When the missionaries returned from their tour Jesus sought a quiet spot to give them rest. But the crowds would not leave them alone, and, in the words of Micaiah to King Ahab, they seemed to Jesus as sheep not having a shepherd (1 Kings 22¹⁷). Mark (6⁵²) speaks of the meal that followed Jesus' teaching as he speaks of the parables, i. e., as of a mystery with a hidden meaning that only the enlightened could understand. It is to this story that John attaches the sermon of Jesus on the Bread of Life (6²⁶⁻⁵⁸). The very language in which the Gospel writers tell how Jesus "took," "blest," "broke," and "gave" the bread is the language of the sacrament. When men are hungry for the bread of life, problems about material things will somehow solve themselves.

Attitude Toward Ceremonial Cleanness. A serious breach with the Pharisees took place over the question of the ceremonial washing of hands before meals (which has no relation to the sanitary washing of hands, Mk. 7^{1f.}). It was before the days of knives and forks, and any pollution that a man might even unconsciously contract in the course of a day's work was supposed to be conveyed through the stomach to the person. We know from Galatians and other N.T. references that the early church nearly split over the question whether Jewish Christians could sit at table with Gentile Christians who did not observe the Jewish food laws and other items in the Jewish Law. Jesus discussed various aspects of the matter, with the authorities, with the people, and in private with the disciples. The burden of his teaching was that, in the sight of God, cleanness means a clean life; uncleanness means a deceitful, proud or sensual character. His view of the supreme place of character in the religious life has triumphed so completely that in our day we have to go to Hinduism even to understand the conception of cleanness against which he was arguing. We note that while Jesus deepens and spiritualizes the Jewish Law, he nowhere denounces the Jewish Law as such, not even the ritual element in it; he does not formally abrogate even the sacrifices. It would have greatly simplified the task of the enemies of Jesus, and later of Paul, if it could have been proved that they were trying to undo the work of Moses. Apparently, both decided that this handle should not be given to their critics.

A Journey Beyond Palestine. About this time Jesus seems to have left Palestine for a period. Why he did so, and what exactly was the route he took, we are in large measure left to conjecture. Perhaps there was a real danger that a combination of influential Pharisees with the tetrarch Herod might bring his mission to a premature conclusion; but that does not seem to be the whole explanation. Is it irreverent to wonder whether Jesus himself had been disappointed? A visit to the synagogue in his home town of Nazareth had begun with rapt attention on the part of the people (Lk. 4^{16f.}) as he read the beautiful opening verses of Isa. 61; but when the people remembered that he was one of themselves, and noted that he implied that Isaiah's prophecy was fulfilled in himself, there was a revulsion of feeling which ended in his narrowly escaping from an attempt to fling him over a precipice. From Mt. 11²⁰⁻²⁴ and Lk. 10¹³⁻¹⁵ we learn that he had been rejected in the Galilean cities of Chorazin and Bethsaida, and even in Capernaum, which had been the scene of much of his work. It was not only the religious leaders but the whole generation that was described as turning a deaf ear to the message both of the Baptist and of Jesus (Mt. 11¹⁶⁻¹⁹). May it be that the lightning mission was expected to presage some startling interposition of God? When, instead of some manifest evidence of the coming of the Kingdom, opposition deepened among all classes, Jesus sought an opportunity such as he could never get in Palestine for meditation, for waiting on the will of God. At all events it was not to carry on his work that he toured the districts north of Galilee and east of the Jordan (Mk. 7²⁴). This too would help to explain his apparently harsh answer to the woman of Syrian Phœnicia (Mk. 7²⁷). It may be that she was voicing what was to Jesus at the time a very real temptation: to leave the work he believed God had given him to do among the Jews and start a mission among the Gentiles. There are indications that they would have been far more responsive than his own people.

Change in Teaching Following Peter's Confession. With a visit to Caesarea Philippi, far to the north, near Mount Hermon and the sources of the Jordan, we reach a new and all-important chapter in the history of Jesus. He began to speak about himself. This he does regularly in the fourth Gospel, but only to a minor extent in the earlier chapters of the first three. At this point also there enter the gospel story certain elements that became distinctive features of the early apostolic preaching. It is well known that the theology of the church as expressed in the creeds was reached only gradually, by stages that continued through centuries. It has been customary to think of Jesus as having from the beginning of his ministry that estimate of himself and his mission which the church afterward came to have. Students of our day have found it difficult to accept this mode of thought. It does not seem to be in accordance with God's way of working. Many Christians to-day see no irreverence in agreeing with the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews that even Jesus had to pass through a process of spiritual education (Heb. 5⁸). Moreover, the subsequent story, as recorded in the Gospels, is at least compatible with the theory that Jesus only gradually, sometimes by painful disillusionment, entered into the full understanding of his own relation to God, and of the task God had entrusted to him.

In the neighborhood of Cæsarea Jesus asked his disciples what were the popular theories about himself, and then what was their own theory. It was Peter who uttered the historic words, "Thou art the Christ" (Mk. 8²⁹). The word "Christ," or "Anointed One," was associated in the mind of Jews with the king, with the high priest, and with a figure that appeared in some of the Jewish pictures of the coming Kingdom, one of the lineage of David who would restore the splendors of David's reign. But for his conception of God's Anointed, Jesus pointed to Isa. 61, to the One who was anointed to proclaim good tidings, to deliver, and to heal. Moreover, there are indications that from a very early period of the ministry he had premonitions of the fate that awaited him, felt that one day the bridegroom would be taken from the disciples (Mk. 2²⁰). He knew, too, the prophecies of the Suffering Servant in the later chapters of Isaiah, and saw their significance as the Jews did not. Thus in the very moment of what seemed his triumph, Jesus began the new teaching: "I am the Christ indeed, anointed not to glory but to suffering; no second and greater David but a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." (See Excursus on the identification of the Suffering Servant, following Isa. 53, p. 664.) From this point we hear the watchwords that must have meant so much to the Roman readers of Mark's Gospel in the dark days of Nero's persecution: "bearing the cross" and "following Jesus" to martyrdom, "losing one's life to save it," "for my sake and the gospel's," "the coming of the Son of man." "Matthew" alone records that when Simon made his memorable declaration, Jesus, who had already given him the nickname "Petros," "the Rock-man," by a play on the word declared that the foundation stone had now been laid on which he would build the edifice of the great and sacred company of his followers (Mt. 16¹⁸).

The Transfiguration. With his passion now full in view, the very appearance of Jesus was transfigured. For a little while the veil was lifted (Mk. 9^{2f.}) and the three favored disciples—Peter, James, and John—saw him in the glory of his utter consecration to the will of God, that will that was leading him to Calvary. No hint is given us of the way to the Mount of Transfiguration, any more than to the Mount of Ambition (Mt. 4⁸). In several points the story recalls the transfiguration of Moses on the mount (Ex. 34²⁹⁻³⁵).

The disciples were enjoined to keep the transfiguration a secret (Mk. 9⁹), as they had been previously instructed to tell no man that he was the Christ (8³⁰). This is in line with his frequent injunction of secrecy about his healing miracles, and his silencing of the demoniacs when they would proclaim him as Messiah. Moreover, Jesus is frequently represented as giving private instruction to his disciples about his coming death and resurrection, instruction which the disciples could not understand. This element in the story has caused much difficulty. Sometimes, as in the case of Jairus' daughter, it is not easy to see how the instructions about secrecy could be carried out. Sometimes, as in the case of the deaf stammerer (Mk. 7³⁶), they were flagrantly disobeyed. Moreover, unless Mark means that it was some supernatural hardening of the heart that visited the apostles, it is not clear how they could so completely misunderstand the thrice-repeated predictions of the death and resurrection in Mk. 8³¹ 9³¹ and 10^{33f.} Jesus was clearly anxious to avoid being regarded as a mere wonder-worker. Sometimes a superficial popularity seriously interfered with his true work (Mk. 14⁵). But there is another element in the explanation. In later times the disciples, looking back from the vantage ground of the resurrection and the history of the early church, could see much in the story to which at the time they had been blind. Some think that this fact has in some degree influenced the form in which the Gospel records have been preserved.

The story of the epileptic (Mk. 9^{14f.}) is remarkable for the expression of Jesus' boundless faith (v. 23), and for the record of a failure of the disciples in an attempted healing (v. 18). Subsequently Jesus ascribed this failure to insufficient faith (Mt. 17²⁰), or, as Mark puts it, to want of prayer and fasting (9²⁹). Doubtless these explanations became traditional for any failures they experienced in their work of exorcism when their Master was taken from them.

Cost of Discipleship. Luke (9^{57f.}) gives three illustrations of the way in which Jesus selected and dealt with the men to whom his message was making its appeal. To offer them attractions or smooth the way for them was the last of his thoughts. The effervescent enthusiast was told to count the cost of following a nameless wanderer, as Jesus had now become. The man who wanted to wait till his father died was reminded that the king's business requires haste: there were enough men with dead souls to bury his father when he died. A third made the excuse that before joining the band he wished to pay a farewell visit to his people at home. Jesus remembered how his own home folks had tried to divert him from his God-given work (Mk. 3^{20f.}). There had been sad parting scenes too during the recent farewell visit to Capernaum (Mk. 9³³⁻³⁷), for not long after this we find Peter reminding Jesus of all they have given up to be with him (Mk. 10²⁸). So Jesus told the candidate that the plowman who would plow a straight furrow must plow with his eye on the mark.

Journey Toward Jerusalem, and Its Incidents. The direct road from Galilee to Jerusalem was through Samaria; but Jesus was turned aside from his intended route by Samaritan discourtesy (Lk. 9⁵¹⁻⁵⁶). No longer anxious to be hidden, he traveled to Jerusalem, partly through Peræa (east of the Jordan), partly through Judæa. Perhaps about this time, a reply of Jesus to a question about divorce did much to increase the hostility of the civil and religious authorities. It asserted that Moses' permission of divorce was only a temporary concession to the weakness of human nature; which must have seemed to the scribes a dangerous and far-reaching principle. Further, Jesus implicitly went beyond the Baptist in his condemnation of Herod, for his reply declared immoral Herod's divorce from his first wife that had given a semblance of legality to his marriage with Herodias, while it gave the ugly name of adulteress (Mk. 10¹²) to Herodias who had, under Roman law (she had been living in Rome), divorced her first husband to marry Herod.

With that dramatic appropriateness that sometimes characterizes the arrangement of the Gospel material, Mark introduces at this point the beautiful story of the parents who brought their children that the great Rabbi might lay his hands upon them in blessing (10¹³⁻¹⁶). Against the background of the unsophisticated children, Mark draws the picture of the rich man who came running to ask Jesus how to get eternal life. Jesus was strongly attracted to the earnest, upright man and would fain have added him to the disciple circle; but with his usual insight he imposed on him the condition of parting with his wealth. In a flash, for the first time the man saw himself and went crestfallen away.

As Jesus went on his way to Jerusalem—the Jerusalem that killed her prophets and stoned the messengers God sent her—he no longer walked with his disciples as of old in friendly intercourse. He walked in front of them, alone, the physical distance between them faintly shadowing forth the gulf that separated his thought from theirs (Mk. 10³²). Following after, the disciples were amazed and frightened at the changed mood of their Master. When he did speak to them, it was of the fate that awaited him in Jerusalem. So little did they picture it as he pictured it that, even on this last journey, James and John begged for the posts of honor on each side of the Messianic throne upon which already in imagination they saw Jesus seated. Could they have seen his throne upon Calvary, would they still have prayed this prayer?

In Jericho, Jesus gave further offense to the religious leaders by accepting hospitality from the rich little Jewish district superintendent of taxation, Zacchæus. Like the rich ruler he had come to Jesus running; but whereas the ruler could not, when asked, divest himself of his possessions, Zacchæus, unasked, disgorged his ill-gotten gains (Lk. 19⁸). As they left Jericho a blind beggar, Bartimæus, one of the few among those that Jesus helped whose names were remembered in after years, a man of that determined character that always appealed to Jesus, addressed him by the Messianic title, "Son of David"; the only occasion in Mark or Luke on which he is addressed by this title.

The Triumphal Entry. Jesus had apparently resolved that at the approaching feast he would declare himself as Messiah. Following a suggestion in Zech. 9⁹ Jesus approached Jerusalem riding upon an ass, which by previous arrangement he had borrowed from the village of Bethphage on the outskirts of Jerusalem. He followed the road along the Mount of Olives, from which the Messiah was expected to appear. In this way he half revealed and half concealed his claim to be the Messiah, and at the same time made clear that his kingdom was not of this world.

Events of Passion Week. The triumphal entry took place on the Monday of the last week of Jesus' life. Following the custom of every pious Jew, he went at once to the Temple, but that night, and each succeeding night, was spent in Bethany or in its neighborhood. At Festival time, accommodation in the city would be at famine prices. In any case, in the darkness of the night, one who had offended so many powerful interests as Jesus had was safer outside the city. When the time came, he was ready to be offered up as a living sacrifice, but his death must be one that had significance for God and man.

(1) The Barren Fig Tree. On the return journey from Bethany on Tuesday morning took place the puzzling incident known as the cursing of the fig-tree. Those whose views on inspiration permit them to think so, believe that at this point the tradition is inexact. The beautiful teaching of Jesus on utter trust in God (Mk. 11^{23f.}) hardly seems appropriate on such a text, and it is known that Jesus repeatedly took a tree, especially a fig-tree, as an illustration (Lk. 13⁶⁻⁹ 17⁶ Mk. 13²⁸).

(2) Cleansing the Temple. Also on the Tuesday took place the cleansing of the Temple. (Jn. 2¹³⁻¹⁷ puts this incident very early in the ministry, and some think it is more in keeping with the days of the first enthusiasm when Jesus still saw hope for Temple, priests, and people.) The priests had allowed the traffic in sacrificial animals and in the coins required to pay the Temple dues to invade the precincts of the Temple itself. Amid the varied sounds and smells of a cattle and bird market, and the chaffering and cheating of the dealers, prayer was impossible for Gentiles in the only court they were permitted to enter. When Jesus, by the sheer force of his personality, ended the traffic for the time, the chief priests, for the most part Sadducees, of whom hitherto we have heard little, became as zealous for the death of Jesus as the Pharisees. Not only had he struck a blow at their lucrative monopoly and humbled them in the eyes of the laity; he had endangered the public peace and so rendered insecure the authority which they held under Rome. (Cf. p. 1069.)

(3) "God or Cæsar." Wednesday finds Jesus again in the Temple. The chief priests, scribes, and elders (i.e., representatives of all three official classes) formally demanded from him a statement of the nature of the authority which justified him in his proceedings, especially for his temerity in usurping the functions of the Temple police. It was a demand the answer to which might have delivered him into their hands. The question is one of the most vital that men are asking to-day. In effect Jesus' answer was that his only authority lay in this, that, as in the case of the Baptist, men of clean sympathies and responsive heart recognized in him the bearer of a divine commission. Then a new trap was laid for him. Ever since Judæa was taken over by the Romans in 6 A.D. a poll tax had been imposed on adult Jews. The tax was intensely unpopular, partly as evidence of Jewish servitude to Rome, partly because the dinar (the tax coin) bore the head of Cæsar and so infringed the second commandment. Jesus' reply to the deputation that came for his opinion: "Cæsar's to Cæsar; God's to God," forms the basis of all Christian thought on the relation of church and state; but its immediate effect was to strengthen the position of his enemies. By hinting at the insignificance of the whole political question in comparison with the eternal issues that were hanging in the balance, he lost his last chance of winning the support of the loyalists. At the same time, as he was to find two days later, and as he doubtless knew at the time, his answer did nothing to win for him the protection of the Roman government.

(4) The Anointing at Bethany. As they were leaving the Temple his disciples called his attention to the magnificence of the Temple buildings, of which every Jew was justly proud. Jesus, however, knew that more of worldly policy and worldly wisdom than of piety had gone to the building of Herod's Temple, and saw that the whole system for which it stood was tottering to its fall (Mk. 13^{1f.}). Two days before the Passover, i.e., apparently, still on the Wednesday of Holy Week, the chief priests and scribes decided that the time to strike had almost come. A gleam of light is shed on the dark story by the insertion, between the account of the plot of the officials and of the treachery of Judas, of the ever-fragrant tale of the anointing of Jesus by a woman in the house of Simon the leper in Bethany, which was perhaps Jesus' home during the last nights of his life (Mk. 14³⁻⁷). It was in an exquisite form the greeting of host to honored guest; it was balm for the spirit that she saw daily bruised by the buffetings of an inappreciative world. She was one of those who saw in Jesus the Lord's Anointed, and felt it shameful that the end should come with no visible anointing. But Jesus recognized in it an even deeper significance. There loomed before his mind the death that might deprive his body of that respectful attention of friends that helps to rob death of its terror; and, when the bystanders grumbled at the woman's extravagance and forwardness, he told them she had prepared his body beforehand for its entombment. (Cf. p. 1039b.)

(5) Judas and His Bargain. At this time an unexpected stroke of luck befell the enemies of Jesus. Surrounded as he was by friendly crowds during the day and leaving the city each night, they did not see how to arrest him till one of the twelve came to them with a proposition—for a certain sum of money to lead them to his nightly resting place and point him out. The motive of Judas has been the subject of endless surmise. Apparently, he was bitterly disappointed in Jesus. He would have followed a "Son of David" Christ, but had no interest in a Messiah whose constant theme was suffering and death, who resisted every suggestion that he should put himself at the head of the loyalists, and who even advocated payment of the poll tax.

(6) The Last Supper. We have now reached Thursday. The Passover Feast had to be eaten within the city, and Jesus had looked forward with keen anticipation to the celebration with his disciples of this particular feast (Lk. 22¹⁵). The visit had to be made in secret. Jesus had previously arranged with a friend to lend a room for the occasion. When night fell they sat down to supper. As with so much else in the life of Jesus, the significance of that meal was only gradually revealed. Doubtless with Jesus present, every meal of the disciple band had become in some degree the festival of a brotherhood, just as with the early Christians every meal was a sacrament (Acts 2⁴², 46). Ever since the Master had set his face toward Jerusalem the disciples knew that he was marching on to some strange destiny. It is not quite clear whether the meal was the regular Passover Feast or not (cf. p. 1017a); in any case, the Passover was in the minds of all, with its remembrance of sacrifice and redemption from bondage. Jesus knew that the hour of his death had all but come; he knew also that his death would be the gateway of life, not only for himself but for his followers. He had found inspiration in Isaiah's prophecy of the Suffering Servant on whom Jehovah had laid the iniquity of us all. He had studied Jeremiah's prophecy of the New Covenant (31³¹) and was familiar, as was every Jew, with the idea of a covenant inaugurated with blood (Ex. 24⁸). Moreover, he felt assured that the parting was but for a season. In a little while he and his followers would share in the glad feast prepared by God for those who inherited the Kingdom (Lk. 22¹⁶). With some such thoughts in his mind Jesus blessed and gave to his disciples the bread that meant his body; offered thanks and gave to them the cup that meant his blood of the New Covenant.

(7) Gethsemane and the Arrest. Since Bethany was outside Jerusalem limits, and it was contrary to the Law (Deut. 16¹⁻⁷) to leave Jerusalem on the feast night, he went only to the Mount of Olives, stopping at an olive orchard called Gethsemane, one of his favorite resorts. There he endured that experience which Luke calls his Agony, which we can share only as we share his purity of soul and his divine love for the humanity he was trying to save. In trying to find its theological significance we sometimes forget the immediate circumstances. With a part of the mob he had a certain popularity, but his native city had turned against him; Capernaum had rejected him; he had been hounded out of his own Galilee. The priests and leaders of his people were but waiting their chance to slay him; he could not fully trust even the twelve; the three disciples of the inner circle could not remain awake in his hour of peril and agony of soul; one of the twelve even then was bringing his enemies to arrest him. Nor were these men monsters of iniquity; this was life; it is thus that God's children deal with God's messengers. Can we wonder that his soul was exceedingly sorrowful unto death?

Judas, who had slipped away from the company at some time during the evening, now arrived with a detachment of the Temple police and gave the Judas kiss, the prearranged signal for the arrest. None of the twelve were present at the trial of Jesus, and the details are not clear. It looks as if the treachery of Judas caused the authorities to change their plans. They had not meant to proceed with the arrest till after the days of unleavened bread were over. Now they saw their chance of getting rid of him before the Passover; but there were only about eighteen hours left. Utmost haste was necessary and they were not ready either with their formal charges or their witnesses, and it almost looked for a time as if they were going to be beaten. Apparently about this time the right of imposing the death penalty, at least in political cases, was taken from the Jews, but they had the right and the duty of conducting a preliminary investigation. In this, of course, the lead was taken by the Sadducaic priests, who had the political power. Apparently, after an unofficial examination during the night by Annas, an ex-high priest who still had great influence, the official investigation before Caiaphas, the actual high priest, began at daybreak. The only charge that could be seriously supported was one to the effect that Jesus had said he would destroy the Temple made by hands and in three days erect another not made by hands. Throughout the investigation Jesus held his peace until he was formally asked by the high priest, "Are you the Christ?" He replied, "I am." It was the moment up to which his whole life had been leading. It gave the priests the opportunity for which they were waiting; it was only necessary to translate the word "Christ" into the word "king," and they had a plausible charge on which to arraign Jesus before the Roman proconsul.

(8) The Trial and Crucifixion. Accordingly, he was now bound and handed over for official trial to Pilate. Luke, who alone gives the indictment, mentions three charges (23²): (1) Jesus is an agitator; (2) he has urged Jews not to pay the imperial taxes; (3) he claims to be Christ, i.e., a king. The first two charges were only meant to lead up to the third, which contained the real accusation. Pilate realized that there was more behind the case than appeared on the surface. Learning that Jesus belonged to the province of Galilee, he remitted the prisoner for examination and report to Herod. The trial and death of Jesus provided the humorists of the day with an abundant supply of material. Herod caught the prevailing spirit and gave his report by sending Jesus back to Pilate, dressed in mock royal array. This decision from a co-religionist of Jesus and the official head of his province greatly strengthened the hands of Pilate. For a moment Pilate saw a way out when a crowd of citizens, who had learned to expect the release of a popular prisoner at each Passover, came surging up demanding that Jesus be set free. It soon transpired, however, that the Jesus they wanted was Jesus Barabbas, who had achieved great popularity among the Jews by taking part in a serious anti-Roman riot. Therefore, shouted the crowd, "For Jesus Barabbas, liberty! for Jesus Christ, the cross!" Pilate doubtless more than suspected that there was involved in the case some religious question that did not interest him, one on which the Jewish priests might be supposed to know their business. Early in his term of office he had learned to dread the inflexible determination of the Jews where their religion was concerned. Little dreaming that he was earning for himself a shameful immortality, he pronounced the death sentence.

It is difficult for a man with any spark of humanity even to read a detailed account of what crucifixion meant. Suffice it to say that the unhappy victims of the torture were spared no circumstance of pain or shame, and that a more awful death it would hardly be possible to imagine. We are not surprised to read that the crucified used to curse and spit at their executioners. All this we must remember when we judge Peter for denying Jesus and the others for deserting him. As at the trial, so on the cross, Jesus for the most part preserved an unbroken silence. The cry from the cross that has most deeply impressed the church is given in all the first three Gospels: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" They are the opening words of Psa. 22, that psalm which begins as a despairing cry of dereliction and ends as a song of triumph. At three o'clock, unexpectedly, the end came.

Risen and Alive for Evermore. Thus ended Jesus of Nazareth; thus began Jesus, the Christ, the Lord of the Christian Church. To the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, the whole N.T., the Christian Church, the Christian Sabbath, and all Christian experience bear ample testimony. That the new faith of the disciples began with appearances of the risen Christ is certain; but when we begin to ask of what nature were these appearances, and when and where they took place, we raise questions to which the N.T. does not, in the judgment of many, return an unambiguous answer. Three questions in particular have been discussed. Did women see Jesus as well as men? Was it the physical body of Jesus that rose, leaving the grave empty? Did the appearances take place in Galilee or in Jerusalem, or in both?

In our earliest account of the resurrection (1 Cor. 15³⁻⁸) Paul says nothing of appearances to women, and gives no data of time or place. He seems to imply that the appearance of Jesus to himself was of the same nature as the others, and there is nothing to suggest that what appeared to Paul on the way to Damascus was the body of Jesus risen from the grave. On the other hand, Peter at Pentecost does seem to imply that the body of Jesus did not undergo corruption (Acts 2³¹). (We note he is practically quoting from Psa. 16¹⁰.) Unfortunately, our earliest Gospel, Mark, fails us here, for it is generally agreed that, for some unexplained reason, the Gospel as Mark wrote it ends at 16⁸. It seems clear that Mark was going on to record an appearance in Galilee to the disciples, especially Peter. In Mark the women disciples did not themselves see Jesus. In Matthew, but not in Luke, the women did see the risen Jesus. Both "Matthew" and Mark stress the fact that Galilee was the scene of the resurrection activity of Jesus. Luke insists that all the resurrection appearances took place in Jerusalem or in its neighborhood. John has his own set of resurrection stories, partly Jerusalem, partly Galilean, the most beautiful being that of the appearance to Mary of Magdala.

There are certain general considerations to be borne in mind. There is nothing astonishing in the difficulties we experience in trying to piece together a connected account of the resurrection history, when we remember the extraordinary nature of the occurrences, the deep emotions that were being stirred, and the absence of a distant future for the world from the contemplation of any Christian. If the evidence for appearances to women is less strong than might be desired, the reason may well be that the gospel tradition was shaped by men. As for the scene of the appearances, we need not suppose that all the disciples kept together in the days following the death of Jesus. Jesus had many followers in Galilee, who may well have had the same experience as those that remained in Jerusalem. The fact remains that it was not in Galilee but in Jerusalem that the church first came into being, and Galilee speedily all but drops out of the story.

The real difficulty is about the nature of the resurrection body. The N.T. accounts are not all written from the same point of view. In Paul's conversion vision, we hear only of a light and a voice. Luke's Gospel insists that the body of the risen Christ could be felt, had flesh and bones, and could enjoy a meal (24³⁹⁻⁴³). In the last chapter of John the Christ was evidently able to prepare a meal and to hold a prolonged conversation with the disciples. The attitude of Christians to these stories varies, and perhaps will always vary, according to their view of Scripture and of the meaning of immortality. Those who accept the verbal inerrancy of Scripture will resort to various contrivances for harmonizing the different accounts. Others, who believe that the later experiences of the church were to some extent read back into the gospel history, will believe that this influence has been at work on some of the later resurrection stories, and that the emphasis in Luke on the physical nature of the resurrection body is dictated by a desire to confute the "docetists," who denied the human reality of Jesus even during his ministry. All the Gospels speak of the empty grave, and evidently by the time the Gospels were written it was considered an important point in Christian tradition to maintain this. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 930.)

To many Christians it seems that an exaggerated importance has been attached to the question whether and in what sense the earthly body of Jesus rose from the grave. In any case the appearances continued for a few weeks at most. To all Christians ever since, the Lord Jesus has been not a body but a spirit. Even the risen body described in the Gospels—one that could pass through closed doors and appear or disappear at will—is so unlike any body we know that some consider it a misuse of language to call it the same body that the disciples had known. In 1 Cor. 15 (see notes there), in highly poetical language, Paul discusses the resurrection body. He says it is the same as the earthly body only in the sense in which the plant is the same as the seed. Yet by body he did not mean flesh; he knew that flesh and blood could not inherit the kingdom of God. He seems to have meant much what we mean to-day by personality. To Paul apparently the important question was not what happened to Jesus' flesh but what happened to Jesus. Jesus, he maintains, lives on, and the Christian lives on, not as a disembodied spirit, but as a spirit that can express itself, that can know and be known, that can enjoy fellowship with other spirits.

However this may be, it is the unanimous testimony of the N.T., a testimony the validity of which has been amply demonstrated in the subsequent history of the church, that after the death of Jesus his followers had with him a communion more continuous and more vital than they had had in the days of his flesh, that their personality, in all its powers and in all its aspects, was quickened to an unexampled vitality. Of this they had no explanation, they sought no explanation, save that the risen Christ had taken possession of them, and to know that was sufficient.

Literature: Stalker, The Life of Christ; Sanday, Outlines of the Life of Christ; David Smith, The Days of His Flesh; J. Paterson Smyth, A People's Life of Christ; Headlam, The Life and Teaching of Jesus the Christ; Moffatt, Everyman's Life of Jesus (the narrative in the words of the Gospels); Bosworth, The Life and Teaching of Jesus According to the First Three Gospels; Rush Rhees, The Life of Jesus of Nazareth; J. A. Robertson, The Spiritual Pilgrimage of Jesus; T. H. Robinson, St. Mark's Life of Jesus; A. W. Robinson, The Christ of the Gospels; Rall, The Life of Jesus. Studies which are not strictly "Lives" are Seeley, Ecce Homo (an old book, but by no means antiquated), and Glover, The Jesus of History. Of the older "Lives," those by Farrar, Edersheim, B. Weiss, and Geikie are still of great value. Such popular "Lives" as those by Papini and Middleton Murry need to be read with discrimination, and the same is true of the much more scholarly studies by Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth (written by an able Jewish scholar), Warschauer, The Historical Life of Christ, and S. J. Case, Jesus, a New Biography.

THE TEACHING OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL

The Sources. Our earliest information as to the life and teaching of Jesus comes from the letters of Paul, some of which were written less than a generation after the death of Jesus. But valuable as these references are, as, e.g., against those who would dispute the historicity of Jesus, they contribute little to our knowledge of Jesus' teaching. Paul was more interested in what Jesus did for men in his death than in what he said to them during his life. He is an interpreter of Jesus rather than a reporter. The same, on the whole, must be said of the fourth Gospel. The writer goes back constantly to the deeds of Jesus and his words, but the report and the interpretation are so merged one into the other that we cannot draw the line of division with any assurance. In common, therefore, with the custom of the great majority of scholars, this article will use the first three Gospels as its primary source. (See art., The Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, pp. 867-73.)

The first three Gospels, called the synoptic Gospels, may be accepted as substantially reliable sources for the teaching of Jesus. In their present form they may come from a period anywhere between 50 and 90 A.D. They go back, however, to sources earlier than themselves. Mark, perhaps in an earlier form, serves as a source for Matthew and Luke, and scholars are quite generally agreed that there is at least one other source common to the last two, known as Q, a collection of the teachings of Jesus just as Mark is primarily an account of Jesus' deeds. Both these sources take us back to the time when the generation that knew Jesus in the flesh was still living. But if there were no other reason, the impression which these teachings make would persuade us of their authenticity. Their beauty, their freshness, their insight and power, above all, their inner unity, indicate their source in one great teacher.

Yet this by no means justifies us in assuming that every word here reported is given as spoken by Jesus. The writers of these Gospels are not mere reporters; they are interpreters and teachers who are trying to present Jesus so that men may believe. They share a common faith while at the same time differing in interest and individual point of view. Back of them lies the early Christian community which did not always understand its Lord. We are not surprised, then, at occasional differences in the accounts given. These materials were used orally in preaching and teaching long before our Gospels were written; and the most honest effort to hand on Jesus' teaching would not prevent changes through the desire to make plain or interpret. Yet all this concerns the lesser matters after all. It warns us not to rest too much on a single word or passage, but it leaves unchanged the conviction that we have here the essential teaching of Jesus.

Jesus as Teacher. Jesus began his work as a teacher. That does not mean that he was a philosopher or a theologian with a system to give to people, or that his interest was primarily in ideas. His interest was in men and in life. His great task was to bring in the new day, the kingdom of God. But to that end he had to teach; he had to bring to men a new vision of God and God's purpose and man's life. The story of the temptation is significant here. Jesus knows himself as the Messiah, but he will not begin with claims to power, with wonderful deeds that will bring the people to his feet and prove his office, or with alliances with the great that will bring to him the kingdoms of the world (Mt. 4:1-11). He will follow the clear way of duty and trust the issue to God; and the clear way is to teach men and serve men. So he goes about in all Galilee, "teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom."

His teaching must be studied in the light of its purpose and consequent method. Jesus was not a lecturer in a classroom giving a course on the doctrines of religion. He believed that a new day was at hand, that a new world was waiting for men, and that men were to live a new life with God and their fellows. It was his task to proclaim this good news and to summon men to prepare for it. His call was, "Repent, believe the good news." And this purpose explains his method. In the end he talked with men about all the great questions of life, about God and his coming kingdom, about man and sin, about being lost and being saved, about how to live here, and about things to come. But it was all occasional as special questions arose; and it was always incidental to his great purpose to summon men to get ready for the new day and to begin the new life. And that was why he left to one side questions about state and industry and society in general about which we are so greatly concerned to-day.

Where did Jesus get his message, and what was his relation to the sacred writings of his people (cf. p. 853b) and to the religious leaders? The O.T. was the Bible of Jesus and the faith of his people was his faith. So he had been nurtured as a boy. So he began as a man, proclaiming the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob. The words of this Bible are with him in his temptation as they are upon the cross. In the hour when he turned at last from Galilee to Jerusalem and to the certainty of suffering and death, he seems to have been pondering the great passage of Isa. 53 with its picture of one who suffers and bears the sins of men. And yet this is not the source of his teaching. Certainly, his source was not that of the Jewish teachers with their constant appeal to tradition, to the authority of the great rabbis. Men listened and said, "What is the wisdom that is given unto this man?" He teaches with authority and not as the scribes, they declared. The teaching of Jesus did not rest upon precedent or even appeal to the Scriptures; he spoke from within and with the note of inner and immediate certainty. And the source was his own experience of God and his life with God. Some scholars have questioned whether Jesus ever spoke the great words of Mt. 11²⁵⁻³⁰. To the writer these words light up Jesus' method as a teacher and make plain the whole spirit of his life. He had a life that was one with God; in this life God had given him the knowledge of himself, and because he had that he could say in all humility and dependence upon his Father, "Come unto me; learn of me; I will give you rest." It was not a supernatural endowment of omniscience; it was a knowledge that came out of his life with the Father. But it gave him that independence, that insight, that quiet and sure confidence, that sense of authority, which he showed at all times.

Striking is this independence and insight of Jesus in relation to the O.T. He selects for his use with unerring insight the psalms, the prophets, Deuteronomy. He passes by Messianic passages like Ps. 2 and Isa. 114, and turns to Isa. 53. The O.T. knows nothing of a distinction between ceremonial and moral law, and the Jew thought of both as divine and eternal. Jesus strikes at the root of this whole ceremonial emphasis when he declares that only the spirit counts and mere things can never make a man unclean (Mk. 7¹⁴⁻²³; cf. Lev. 11-15). Again and again he revises or rejects (Mt. 5^{21, 22, 27, 28, 33, 39} Mk. 10²⁻¹²). If he showed this independence over against the Scriptures which he so revered, we need not wonder that this humble teacher from Nazareth should maintain his position when it brought conflict with the acknowledged and authoritative religious leaders and teachers of his people, the scribes whose life was given to the study and interpretation of the Law. Here, again, we are led back to the inner life of Jesus as the source of this certainty.

The study of Jesus' teaching because of all this can never be separated from the study of Jesus' own spirit and life. Never was there one in whom so truly life and teaching were one. His teaching is fragmentary and yet there is a wonderful unity because of this inner source. We must not, therefore, study it as a matter of separate ideas on many subjects, but constantly and only in relation to what he was and what he was seeking to do. Our supreme task, if we are to understand the teaching, is to understand Jesus himself.

Jesus' Conception of Himself and His Work. We need, then, to begin with the question, How did Jesus think of himself and his work? The two significant words here are "Sonship" and "Messiahship," and "Sonship" comes first. Striking is the reticence of Jesus in his speech concerning himself, and here the first three Gospels are in sharp contrast with the fourth. Yet the deep sense of Sonship, and of a unique Sonship, is plain. We see it in the glimpse of boyhood life (Lk. 241-52). It appears in the words that sounded in his soul at the time of baptism, "Thou art my beloved Son." His whole prayer in the garden, with its loyalty and trust, is summed up in the words, "Abba, Father," and he cries out "Father" from the agony of the cross. The supreme expression of this relation is found in Mt. 11²⁵⁻³⁰. Its lyric form matches the exaltation of spirit that is here manifest. Sonship here is not a definition in terms of substance and essence, as it became later in the creeds; it is a living relation, personal and ethical, in utter unity of spirit. He and the Father are one. He looks up in reverence to him, the Lord of heaven and earth. Yet humbly he rejoices in this union with his Father, and in what God has given to him. And that is why he can summon men to learn of him. Clearly, Jesus shows here that his sense of mission and of authority rests back upon this inner experience, this oneness of his life as a Son with the Father.

Out of this comes Jesus' sense of his calling. The early church expressed Jesus' meaning for its faith in various terms such as "Messiah" (Christ), "Saviour," and "Lord." These words are almost wholly absent from the speech of Jesus, but their substance is not wanting. Jesus thought of his work inevitably in terms of the great hope of his people which he shared. So soon as a man believes in a good God and sees the evil in the world, he will either lose his faith or gain a great hope. The Jews had that hope, the hope of deliverance from evil, of the coming of a new age. That hope Jesus shared and called it the kingdom of God. He saw the meaning of his life in the light of that hope: the new age was at hand and God had chosen him to bring it in. That meant that he was the Messiah.

In this work there were for Jesus a proximate task and an ultimate one. The Kingdom was near at hand, but it was not here. It would come in God's time and by his deed. How literally Jesus meant the picture we do not know, but to something like this he refers when he speaks of the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power and coming with the clouds of heaven (Mk. 14⁶²). That was the ultimate task of establishing the Kingdom, but the what and the how of that belonged to the future and to God; there was a definite work that lay for him near at hand. His own words indicate how he thought of this immediate task, his life still more. Men must get ready for this coming rule of God, for its privileges and its judgment. It was his to call them to repentance, to summon them to that life of sonship with God and good will toward fellow men which was to be the life of the Kingdom. So he came to preach and save. He calls sinners to repentance, and seeks out the lost (Mt. 9¹³ Lk. 19¹⁰). He is here to preach the good news (Mk. 1³⁸ Lk. 4¹⁸). But he realized too that he was here to love and serve and live the life of a son for his brothers and before them (Mt. 11²⁸, 29 Mk. 10⁴⁵ Lk. 22²⁷ Jn. 13¹⁵).

But there was something more than teaching and serving. He was to die for men. A great Jewish scholar has said of Jesus: "Service . . . is the special feature of his own conception of the Messiahship, and still more of that conception of it which has moved the world. His idea of Kingship was that of Plato; he only is the true King whose life is given for his people" (C. G. Montefiore, The Teaching of Jesus, p. 136). We cannot tell just when, but it became clear to Jesus that the service of men and loyalty to his Father were leading him to an inevitable end, death at the hand of his foes. The significant fact here is not that he saw that death as inevitable, but that he saw it as part of his work, indeed, as the crown of it. We find the references to his coming death in Mk. 8³¹ 9¹², 31 10³³, 34, and parallel passages. But of special significance are Mk. 10⁴⁵ and 14²⁴. He is "to give his life a ransom for many," and of the cup of wine at the Last Supper he says, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many." The second passage refers clearly to the great word of Jer. 31³¹. Through his death God is bringing in the new age, is establishing a new covenant with men that shall supersede the old. We have no warrant for reading later theories of the atonement into the first word, but this is plain: Jesus declares that he is dying for men, dying to ransom them, i.e., to redeem them from the power of evil. The death, then, that he faces is not an unmeaning tragedy; it is part of God's purpose and of his task as Messiah in establishing the Kingdom. Isa. 53, with its moving picture of the Servant of Jehovah, seems to be echoed in the speech and thought of most of these passages. The word from the cross given in Mk. 15³⁴ suggests that Psalms 22 was also in Jesus' mind. The Gethsemane prayer shows with what a struggle Jesus held to this conviction; but in this conviction he died. (Cf. p. 664.)

The Idea of God. Central in Jesus' thought about himself and his work and the coming Kingdom, as about all else, was his idea of God. Just as his experience of God shaped his whole life, so his thought of God shaped his whole teaching. What he brought was at no point wholly new. Jewish thought as well as the O.T. knew of God's mercy as well as his justice, and spoke of God as Father. What was new with Jesus was his emphasis, and in religion that is the vital matter. New also was the depth and vividness of his experience of God.

God is infinite mercy and good will; that is Jesus' central word. He is no mere distant ruler or creator of long ago, or giver of laws and stern judge. He is the Father whose very nature it is to be good and merciful. His loving care reaches each swiftly fading flower, each unnoticed bird, much more each child of man (Mt. 6²⁵⁻³⁰). Parents care for their children, God vastly more (Mt. 7⁹⁻¹¹). He is not the taskmaster, giving laborers just what they have earned; his rule is that of mercy. And he draws no lines; sunshine and showers go to good and evil alike, and not even their ingratitude or enmity changes his spirit (Mt. 5⁴⁵). Especially does the parable of the eleventh-hour laborers sweep away all religion of law and reward, of earning and getting (Mt. 20¹⁻¹⁶). And this loving regard for men is individual; each man is heard as he goes to God alone in prayer, each single life is watched over by God (Mt. 6⁶⁻⁸ 10²⁹⁻³¹). New and notable is the fact that this good will of God is no mere general attitude of kindness. It takes the initiative; it is eager, active, redemptive. The woman looks for the lost coin; the shepherd cannot be content with the ninety and nine that are safe; the father goes out to meet his son; and heaven rejoices over one sinner that repents (Lk. 15). More eloquent even than these parables, in which he defended his own conduct in relation to sinners, are the attitude and action of Jesus himself. In the spirit of such a father he seeks those who are lost, poor folk and rich, Samaritan and sinner, woman of the street, thief on the cross. And so the very gift of the Kingdom itself will be "not the product of calculating justice and retribution" but "the outflow of God's free and exuberant love" (Montefiore, Teaching of Jesus, pp. 97, 98).

The emphasis of the good will of God must not shut our eyes to the other side of Jesus' conception. The love of God does not mean sentimentalism or moral indifference or lack of majesty and power. Fatherhood for Jesus and for his day meant authority as well as goodness. Jesus' thought is given clearly and compactly in the opening words of the Lord's Prayer. The Father is the God in heaven, i.e., the God of all power and rule, the God who is infinitely above man. And man's attitude is to be not simply trust but reverence and awe. He is to pray, "hallowed be thy name." Nor does Jesus hesitate to say, "I will warn you whom ye shall fear" (Lk. 12:4, 5), the reference being clearly to that God who has all power over men. His own prayer is revealing, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth" (Mt. 11:25). But it is not fear in the common sense that we have here. Rather is it a reverence that engenders faith. This faith brings confidence and peace. These can come as men not only simply trust the goodness of God, but believe in his power. Lack of faith in God's power is as serious as lack of trust in his love. The Father is King. Jesus believed utterly in the power of God. The difference was that with him power was not alone and not first; good will was supreme and was in control of power.

Above all, Jesus emphasized the moral supremacy of God. The mercy of God is for him not a refuge for men who wish to sin and yet to feel secure; it becomes rather a challenge, the summons to lead a like life of good will and the standard by which in the end their life will be judged (Mt. 5:44, 45 25:31-46). This love is through and through ethical; we can have it in full measure only as we share it in our life. There is no forgiveness possible except to those who themselves forgive (Mt. 6:15). Moral demand and moral judgment are not lessened here but heightened (Mt. 18:21-35).

The Nature of Religion. Jesus' conception of religion, or of the religious life, flows naturally and inevitably from his idea of God, for it is the idea of God which always determines the idea of religion. Most commonly men have thought of God as Ruler, and their idea of religion has been institutionalistic. The great Ruler has determined upon those things which men must accept and do: laws to be kept, sacrifices to be performed, ritual to be followed, sacraments observed, doctrines believed, authority to be obeyed. Temple or church, system of law or set of doctrine or sum of sacred rites, there was a definite and prescribed institution which man was to accept and to which he was to submit. In Jesus' day the synagogue with its law and the Temple with its sacrifices were central. The rules concerning the Sabbath and the feast days, clean and unclean, tithe and offering, alms and prayers, covered the whole of life. (See art., Backgrounds of Early Christian Movement, pp. 839, 841-2, 849.)

Jesus makes no formal declarations against Jewish law and ceremonial and announces no abrogation of them. He attends the synagogue (but was finally excluded), goes to the Temple, observes the feasts, and bids the leper observe the appropriate law (Mk. 1:44). In the light of his teaching elsewhere, however, it is hard to believe that the words of Mt. 5:18, 19 came from Jesus. Jesus' attitude toward the Law was different from that of his fellows; the Jewish leaders clearly saw how deep that difference went, and we must believe they were as a group sincerely concerned with the defense of their faith whatever may have been the faults of individuals. For Jesus, forms and rules and institutions were here to serve men and to express life. Hence he put the law of the spirit above the law of the form in relation to fasting, e.g., and the Sabbath (Mk. 2:18-28). From this standpoint he criticizes the main forms of Jewish piety—prayer, fasting, almsgiving (Mt. 6). The form is so easily made an end instead of a means, and then the spirit suffers (Mt. 23:23-26). The inner spirit is supreme. His epoch-making word is that of Mk. 7:14-23; things can never defile, only the spirit is evil or good.

The position of Jesus is plain. He is in the line of the great prophets (see Isa. 1:10-17 Mic. 6:8 Hos. 6:6; the last quoted several times by him), and of all those who have seen in religion primarily that which is ethical and spiritual. He believed in a God of righteousness and utter good will, a personal God between whom and man there was kinship and therefore could be fellowship, whom men could call Father. With such a God religion was a personal relation of reverence and trust and obedience. At the same time it meant moral likeness with this God, the sharing of his spirit of good will and the showing of that spirit in the life with men. Father, son, brother, these are the three points that mark the perfect circle of religion which Jesus drew. This conception of religion is purely spiritual and utterly simple; but no conception has ever come to men that was so profound in its depth, so wide in its reach, so lofty in its ideal, so searching in its demand. Upon this simple way a child may enter, yet after all these years its goal lifts itself far above our human achievement. We may study this conception of religion more closely in three aspects, namely, religion as the life with God, as the life with men, and as the life from God.

The Life with God. At the heart of religion there is always the thought of God, the idea of some higher Power from whom we may get help, and to whom we owe something in turn. Temple and ritual, altars and sacrifices, endless rules and offerings—all these represent man's effort toward a right relation with God that will secure the divine aid. For Jesus, however, God is not first of all a Power to be propitiated or persuaded; he is the Spirit of righteousness and good will, the Father with whom men are to live as children. Sonship, then, will describe this life with God according to Jesus, and its nature is wholly determined by the nature of the Father.

The first mark of this life is a whole-hearted trust. In this Father there is absolute power and utter goodness. For him who really sees that as Jesus did there is no room for anxiety or fear. So we have his constant call to men: "Fear not . . . Be not anxious . . . Behold the birds . . . Your Father knoweth." And here, again, his own unshaken confidence in the midst of danger and defeat speaks more loudly than words. Such a trust demands, however, not only a lofty vision of God, but an utter surrender of self. The way of sonship is a very simple one; Jesus could say, "My burden is light." Yet his demand went beyond all the rules and sacrifices that others required. These asked for tithes of income and sacred days and hours of worship; he asked for the inmost life of a man and for all his life. It is true that we have no right to treat the individual sayings of Jesus to particular men as though they were general rules laid down by him. Such passages as Mk. 10:17-22 and Lk. 9:57-62 have to do with the special case of those whom Jesus summoned to join his intimate fellowship or who themselves sought this. Yet in these words and elsewhere Jesus makes plain his position. Religion is not a section of life; it is all of life and it demands all. It is the treasure in the field for which one sells all else. God does not represent one among many claims; he brings the supreme and sufficient good, he represents the absolute demand. So we hear the uncompromising words: "No man can serve two masters . . . Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness . . . Enter in by the narrow gate." With this devotion there go humility and reverence. That does not mean self-abasement or self-depreciation, as has so often been supposed. Jesus did not teach men to cringe and cower and call themselves worms of the dust. He summoned them, rather, to think of themselves as sons of the Father, and he had a wonderful way of infusing hope and confidence in the lowliest and most evil. The clue to the explanation of all this lies in the fact that he bade men look at God and not at themselves. It was God's mercy that summoned them to sonship and made this possible. And so men became wonderfully humble because they knew it was all from God, and deeply reverent in the thought of such a God of holiness and power, and joyously confident in the sense of his mercy. (Cf. notes on Jer. 31:31-34.)

Here too we must note how it is that the utter obedience and pure reverence which Jesus demands involve a religion of freedom and not of servitude. It is not bare submission that he asks for over against an inscrutable Power to which we bend because we cannot do otherwise. Nor is the devotion which he desires that of a subject to his Monarch, unquestioning and blind. It is rather the devotion of a son to his Father. It is the surrender of one who has found at last the meaning of his life and its highest good, and who finds life in that very surrender. The freedom of a son about which Paul writes is clearly apparent with Jesus. For Jesus the Father is not blind fate or the monarch with command; he is the Life to which we open our life, the Spirit that becomes our new self. In the last analysis, we are his children because we are like him (Mt. 5:45). Utter devotion and perfect freedom are here one in the religion of the spirit, and the life with God reaches its highest point—that of moral likeness.

If religion is fellowship with God, then we may say that prayer is this fellowship coming to conscious expression. The words of Jesus concerning prayer must be supplemented and illustrated by his own practice. It is the idea of God which again determines everything. If only you knew God better, Jesus said to men, then you would pray more and fear less and pray better. Is he not better than the best of fathers of earth? Why not go to him, then, in your need? And if he be such a Father, then why think it needful to clamor so loudly and so long? That goes with a pagan idea of God. It is God that counts, not our prayers.

Since prayer is the conscious expression of our fellowship with God, the nature of that fellowship will determine the nature of prayer. The heart of prayer, with Jesus, is therefore that pure trust and deep reverence and utter devotion which should mark our life with God. Because of this trust in God we will bring to him all our needs. Hence Jesus encourages us to ask (Mt. 77 Mk. 1124). But because of this trust and because of our reverence we will not prescribe to God but will leave all things with God. The focal point of prayer for Jesus is God and not man. Prayer is not a device for the easy securing of our ends. The hallowing of God's name, the coming of his rule, the doing of his will—these stand first in the "Lord's Prayer." Prayer with Jesus is neither clamorous petition nor passive submission, it has a pronounced moral aspect. It is man bringing all his life into the presence of God and then thinking first of the holiness of God and his will and his rule. In such praying man comes to see his life aright and to gain strength for it. All this is illustrated by the praying of Jesus. Luke marks the great crises in Jesus' life by special reference to his praying (Lk. 321 516 612 918, 28 2241). Add to these the temptation narrative and note that prayer was the means by which Jesus sought to know the way that he was to take and to gain strength for it.

The Life with Men. Religion, for Jesus, was a way of living with men as well as with God, and the one grew out of the other. With God men were to live as children, in trust, in devotion, in oneness of spirit. The mark of the child was the spirit of the Father in him. But this spirit of the Father must be shown and could only be shown by his children in relation to their brothers. So the dual command of love to God and man, to which Jesus had reduced all commands, becomes one rule, one spirit, by which man is to live.

To be a brother to men in the spirit of the common Father is a very simple rule of life, but its scope is wide and its standard is high. It includes all men, good and evil, black and white, near and far. At once the status of woman, of the child, of the slave, of the man of "inferior" race becomes altered. Jesus recognizes the differences between evil men and good, between Jew and Samaritan. Yet that is most significant which these have in common. Each is a man, with a value outweighing a whole world of things (Mk. 836, 37). Not one but is the object of God's love and care. Heaven rejoices when one wandering child of God comes back. Anger, scorn, contempt, the hard and unforgiving spirit—these are sins that call forth his strongest condemnation.

The demand of Jesus relative to man's life with men is plain. First of all, it is reverence for humanity in the person of every human being. Second, there must be the spirit of forgiveness, or there can be no forgiveness expected by us (Mt. 615). Then there must be good will, love not as a vague sentimentality but as the positive and active will desiring the good of others. And, finally, there is the demand of service and sacrifice. Here is the test of greatness in the kingdom of God, and Jesus offers himself as example (Mk. 1035-45).

Some questions call for answer here. Did not Jesus look for the speedy coming of a new and wholly different order, the kingdom of God, and was not his moral teaching therefore an ethic ad interim, a teaching for this short interval only? Leaving aside for the moment the doctrine of the Kingdom, it is plain that the principles of Jesus suggested above have no relation to changing conditions; they belong to all time because they rest back upon God himself. Moreover, Jesus was not a giver of rules which must always change with circumstance; his concern was with the inner spirit. Specific demands and applications, of course, would be affected by the immediate situation: the men whom he summons for permanent fellowship must leave their nets; the rich young ruler is faced with a special challenge that is not applied by Jesus to others.

What about non-resistance with Jesus (Mt. 538-48)? Again we must remember that Jesus is not a giver of rules but the prophet of a new spirit. He is dealing with a great principle here, though, as usual, put in concrete and vivid form. And here, as elsewhere, he is not negative or passive. He knows the evil of reliance upon brute force and of the spirit of retaliation and revenge, or of the mere hard give-and-take. And he proclaims not only the duty of forgiving good will, that, like the love of God, shall not draw back even from the evil; but he shows his faith in the power of this good will as a conquering force to overcome evil. That is God's answer to the sin of man; that shall be man's answer to evil in his fellows. In the end the cross, with its "Father, forgive them," is but another declaration of this same great faith. Here is something, not passive, but active, aggressive, conquering.

Is not Jesus' teaching deficient on the side of social ethics? The answer is, Yes, and No. Jesus has little to say about the social life of man on its institutional side, about state and industry, about family and divorce, about war and slavery. He has more to say about property, or wealth, but at no point is there any systematic discussion, and at every point the approach is from the side of the individual and the spiritual. Several considerations help to explain this. (See Moffatt, Theology of Gospels, pp. 49-62.) He was living in an order wholly different from ours, an autocratic order in which his disciples had to accept what was found as given. He himself expected a new order to come, but not through human revolution or reform. The immediate need was repentance, a new spirit; with that God would add all else. It was his special task to call men to repentance, to make clear what was this spirit.

Nevertheless, the teaching of Jesus is social in the deepest sense. He is considering how men are to live together in the new order. It is a social life that he constantly envisages. And the principles which he enunciates have the most direct and sweeping significance for all the associated life of men, including the institutions in which that life is bodied forth. His teaching has all the more of permanent significance just because he did not lay down rules for application. What was needed was simply that men should come to have his spirit and to see its implications. His teaching on divorce is not an effort to give rules for civil or ecclesiastical procedure, but to set forth a spiritual ideal. If he gives more time to the matter of wealth, it is because of the besetting peril that lies here, the peril of putting things above men. Sometimes covetousness appears as hardness and oppression toward one's fellows, sometimes as the folly which sells its own soul (Lk. 12¹⁶⁻²¹ 16¹⁹⁻²¹); the error is the same. But one has only to think of autocracy in government, of bond slavery and wage slavery, of nationalism and race prejudice and war, of modern economic rivalry and its practices of exploitation, to realize the revolutionary significance of the principles of Jesus on the social side. Reverence for all humanity, the acceptance of one Father, the obligation of brotherhood, the spirit of good will and co-operation and service—these may be decried as impossible ideals but not as socially unmeaning.

The Life from God. It has often seemed to men that the passage from Jesus to Paul was like moving into a wholly different world of religious ideas, that with Jesus religion was the simple life with God which anyone could undertake, while Paul brought to us an elaborate doctrine of salvation, with its theories of sin and atonement and the rest. (See art., Life and Work of Paul, pp. 931-2.) There is some difference here, and yet Jesus too has his definite teaching about what sin is and how men are to be saved. The simple speech of Jesus must not hide from us this fact. Religion is life, a wonderful life with God, the life which the son lives in devotion and trust, in strength and peace, in the spirit of love. But this life is for Jesus the gift of God; it is not only a life with God, but a life from God. And that is salvation. And there is something that stands in the way of this life and that is sin.

Jesus has nothing to say about sin in the abstract; the word is used by him very little as compared with Paul. But how keen was his sense of sin as a spirit and a power in men! We see his conception of sin as we note what he demanded and what he condemned. Sin was a matter of the inner spirit, of the attitude toward God and men. In relation to God it was the lack of trust and obedience, the attitude of men who said, "Lord, Lord," but did not do the will of God, of the son who said, "I go, sir," but went not. In relation to men it was the lack of love and forgiveness, it was the spirit of selfishness and hardness and scorn. Of the sins which root in the passions of the flesh he had not much to say, but he never condoned sin of any kind. It was the terrible thing that divided men from God; it was that which made men a stumbling-block and a curse to their fellows. So it comes that his very love for men moves him at times to terrific words of judgment and condemnation (Mk. 12³⁸⁻⁴⁰ Mt. 23⁴⁻¹³).

Salvation with Jesus was a very simple and personal matter. The lost man was the man out of place, out of right relations, like the coin in the dark corner, the sheep off in the hills, the son among strangers. He was in wrong relations with his world, with men, and with God. But the relation with God was fundamental; make that right and the rest would be right. To that end a man had first to see differently and feel differently; he had to come to himself, to repent (Lk. 15¹⁷). Repentance was more than feeling; it was a total change of mind and will. And there must be faith, the faith which trusted God and turned with heart and will toward him. When Jesus found these he said simply, "To-day is salvation come to this house" (Lk. 19⁹).

But all this was simply the response of man to God. The supreme matter was the "good news" with which Jesus called men to repentance and faith. The great fact was God with his loving purpose for men and his saving help. The good news was first of all that of the coming kingdom of God. But there was something more here, something personal and present. That was God's willingness to receive men who wished to get ready for this kingdom, to forgive them and take them into fellowship with himself, so that they too might be children with the spirit of their Father. The simplicity of this must not hide from us the elements of profound meaning and moral power. This is the way that God makes men over, not by some magic rite of sacramental nature, not by some mysterious and irresistible action of grace, but by this new personal fellowship, this life into which he lifts men.

The Kingdom of God. It is customary to begin the study of the teachings of Jesus with the subject of the kingdom of God. We have left that till the last. There are several reasons for this. It is true that this phrase was very often on the lips of Jesus. He was, like the Baptist, a proclaimer of the Kingdom that was at hand. But he was something more, and it is this more that is significant. What Jesus meant by the kingdom of God he nowhere systematically defines. That was his way; he took the words that everybody knew and he gave them gradually his own meaning. He did not define what was meant to him by Messiahship, but he transformed that concept. He accepted nominally the idea of the Law and its authority, but when he had finished, the old system was broken forever. So with the idea of the kingdom of God. The important matter is not his use of the term, nor any definitions of it, but what he put into it by his whole life and teaching, especially his teaching about God.

The idea of a new age, a new order, was an ancient one with Israel. They believed that Jehovah was Lord of all. Why, then, the victories of their enemies, and why this evil in the world? There was but one reply: all this is but for a time, and then the day of Jehovah will come; his enemies will be overcome and he will rule in all the earth. Such a hope would vary widely. It could be material and political, or moral and spiritual. It might be selfishly nationalistic and Jewish, or splendidly universal in its outlook. Usually, it had a measure of all these aspects. With many in Jesus' day it was fiercely national, joined with a deep hatred of Rome and the hope for the overthrow of the oppressor. (See pp. 188-9, 206-10; 768-74, 809-10.) It was the effort to force this end by human action that led at last to armed revolt against Rome and the terrible destruction of Jerusalem. Others in that day held this hope in what we call the apocalyptic form. Not by man's work was the end to come, they said, but by the glorious deed of God. World history was divided into two ages. The present was utterly evil, left by God, wholly hopeless. It could only grow worse as it neared a terrible end. Then God would come with his angels, evil men would be destroyed, the saints would be raised from the dead, a new heaven and a new earth would appear, and so the new age be ushered in.

How far did Jesus share these ideas? Certainly, his conception of the Kingdom was not political or national. In the Beatitudes and elsewhere he speaks of those to whom the kingdom of heaven will belong; but there is never a word to suggest that the Jew has an entrance which does not equally belong to any other. It is spirit and attitude that determine, never race. He turns away from the political, from all the old ideas of rule. The Jews thought that the Messiah's coming would turn the tables, making them rulers over their former masters. Jesus declared that this whole idea of rule was wrong. In his kingdom pre-eminence was to mean service (Mk. 10⁴²⁻⁴⁵).

In some ways he approached more the apocalyptic idea. He believed that the day of God's rule was near at hand. "This generation shall not pass away till all things be accomplished" (Lk. 21³²). And the kingdom was to be God's deed, God's gift (Lk. 12³²). But there are differences from apocalypticism that are even more significant. Jesus had none of the hopeless pessimism of the apocalyptists who could do nothing but bewail the evil of their age and wait for something to happen. True, it was God and not man that was to bring in the Kingdom; but man had something to do. He must repent. Here and now, without waiting for a future day, he was to become a child of God and live the new life of good will. And this age was not hopeless or God-deserted. The beginnings of the Kingdom were here. They were here in the healing deeds of Jesus, in the new life which he was already offering to men, in the forgiveness of sin; Satan's kingdom was already being overthrown (Lk. 11²⁰ 10¹⁸ Mt. 11⁴, 5, 25-30). God was not far off, passive till some future time of action. God was here, caring for bird and flower, here as the power that ruled, here in help and forgiving love. It was by the finger of God that Jesus cast out demons, it was God that forgave sinners through him. And one other difference: the apocalyptists were always anxiously scanning the heavens for signs, and calculating times and periods. Jesus left this all with God, giving himself to his great task, summoning men to his aid, declaring that "of that day and hour" he had no knowledge. The so-called apocalyptic discourses (Mk. 13 and parallels: Mt. 24, Lk. 21) seem to point another way. It is plain, however, that there have been changes and additions here. The elaborate depiction of signs does not fit with Jesus' reticence elsewhere (Mk. 13³²). References to different events are mingled in confusion: to the capture of Jerusalem, the destruction of the Temple, the persecution of the disciples, the coming of the Son of man. These passages represent the early church probably more than they do Jesus. (See art., Literature of the Intertestamental Period, pp. 188-9; art., Backgrounds, pp. 843-7; intro. to Revelation of John, pp. 1364a, 1366b.)

We may now note briefly Jesus' conception of the Kingdom, for what is significant in Jesus' teaching is not the matter of how the Kingdom is to come, about which we have very little, but what the Kingdom is. "Kingdom of God" means rule or reign of God; that is the common element in the many and diverse conceptions of the Kingdom. But our idea of the rule of God will naturally depend upon our idea of God. If one thinks primarily of God as a heavenly Potentate, a Monarch of the skies, after the manner of earthly rulers, then his kingdom will be political and external. So the coming kingdom was conceived in Jesus' day. Of course it was to be a rule of righteousness, but it was nevertheless to be an external rule. The God of Jesus is not lacking in majesty and power, but the emphasis of Jesus is upon the moral character of God. God's relations with men are primarily personal and ethical. Hence the rule with which Jesus is concerned is of another kind, the rule of the inner spirit. We do not read about the avenging God, therefore, destroying the enemies of Israel. There is no talk of thrones and scepters and armies. It is the overcoming of evil, the destruction of sin, the presence of faith and good will with which Jesus is concerned. This inner and ethical nature of the Kingdom is seen in what Jesus says about the children of the Kingdom, those to whom the Kingdom belongs. Here the Beatitudes are most suggestive. That men of peace and good will, of meekness and purity of spirit, should form the kingdom of heaven shows plainly the nature of that kingdom. So also the declaration that men must become as little children in order to enter, and that the humble and childlike will be greatest in the Kingdom (Mt. 18³, 4). What Jesus had in mind was a world in which the spirit of the Father God should rule the life of his children and in which all evil should be done away.

We shall understand Jesus' thought of the new age better if we realize that the phrase, kingdom of God, is a figure of speech, and that there is still another figure which Jesus employs, a figure more congenial to his thought, and better adapted to express his distinctive message. That is the figure not of king and subjects but of father and children. Fatherhood does not exclude authority, but it does express more adequately Jesus' thought of the character of God and of his relation to men. And the whole figure lends itself better to set forth Jesus' ideal of the new age. It is a new humanity to which he is looking forward. Men are to be children of their Father, i.e., they are to be like him in spirit. In his spirit they are to live with one another as brothers. And that will be the kingdom of God.

Did the kingdom of God, then, mean for Jesus simply something individual and subjective? That does not follow from the position taken above. True, the kingdom of God is the rule of the spirit of God in the life of men, but we must notice the nature of that spirit. The spirit is one of good will, expressed actively in service, and the final test of its presence is just this service (Mk. 9³⁵ 10⁴²⁻⁴⁵ Mt. 25³¹⁻⁴⁶). We are dealing here, then, not with mere inner emotion or mystical experience, but pre-eminently with a social spirit that can be expressed only in human relations. Other considerations lead to the same conclusion. There is the idea of brotherhood as a rule of life. There is the fact made plain in the Lord's Prayer that thy kingdom come means "thy will be done." The kingdom of God will mean man's putting into expression the will of God in every phase of human life. And, of course, no line can be drawn here between individual and social, between the personal and the institutional. The rule to which Jesus looks forward cannot be less than a rule over all human life and activity.

A final question remains. The modern man speaks constantly of working for the kingdom of God, of building it up, of bringing it in. Is this not contrary to Jesus' teaching? Was not the kingdom of God to be for him the gift of God and the deed of God? To the latter question we must certainly answer Yes. Jesus did not differ here from others. That is always the word of faith, the message of religion, to expect everything from God. It is trust in God, confidence in God's power and goodness. "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom" (Lk. 12³²). But this emphasis on the religious does not exclude the ethical. God's gift does not shut out our deed or our active response. The kingdom is God's gift, but everything depends upon the nature of that gift. If it be a matter of killing enemies and setting up thrones, then it can be done by irresistible divine power, and no response or aid of man is involved. But that is not what Jesus has in mind. The goods of the Kingdom which God gives are conquest of evil, forgiveness of sins, the vision of God, the gift of his Spirit—in a word, the gift of life (Lk. 11²⁰ 24⁴⁷ Mt. 5⁸ Mk. 10¹⁷). Such gifts cannot be passively received. They make searching demand. And that demand Jesus makes plain. He calls men to repentance, to utter change of heart and devotion of life. If they want the kingdom of God they must put it absolutely first in desire and allegiance. They must give themselves utterly to the life of love and service. The will of God becomes not something passively accepted, but actively practiced. The kingdom of God means life, but it is a life which men can have only as they live it. The kingdom of God is the gift of God, but it can come only as men give themselves with minds and heart and will to see the will of God and to do it.

Literature: Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus; Moffatt, The Theology of the Gospels; Rall, The Teachings of Jesus; Dickey, The Constructive Revolution of Jesus; Mathews, The Social Teachings of Jesus; Scott, The Ethical Teaching of Jesus; Burch, The Ethical Teaching of the Gospels.

THE PARABLES OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR H. G. WOOD

The Word "Parable" and Its Associations. The essential idea in the word "parable" is that of comparison. It means, literally, "placing something alongside something else," in order to throw light on the latter. "Parable" is, therefore, most properly applied to a story of some familiar or, at least, intelligible incident which serves by comparison or contrast to illustrate some truth less familiar or less readily understood and appreciated. But an effective comparison need not always be worked up into a story. A simile or a metaphor may be regarded as a parable. They are certainly parables in germ, and they are sometimes called "parables" in the Gospels. When Jesus rebutted the charge of casting out demons by Beelzebub with the similes that a house divided against itself cannot stand, and a strong man's goods cannot be plundered except the strong man be first bound, Mark says he was speaking in parables (Mk. 3:23f.). Similarly, Luke regards the sayings about the new patch and the old garment, the new wine and the old skins, and the blind leaders of the blind, as parables (Lk. 5:36-39). These and other such sayings are used to illustrate different truths by suggestive comparisons. The main idea of the word "parable" is thus here retained. But similes may be compressed into metaphors; and metaphorical sayings, and even paradoxical and enigmatic sayings, may then be included in the term "parable," not because they teach by comparisons, but because, in the case of the metaphors at least, they rest on comparisons. The use of the term "parable" in this broader sense may be seen in such passages as Mk. 7:17 (Mt. 15:15) and Lk. 4:23. The fourth Gospel uses a different word (Greek paroimia) in the same sense of "enigma" or "riddle" in 16:29. This wider reference may be due to the fact that in the LXX the two Greek words parabolē, paroimia, are used to translate the Hebrew māshāl, which has all the meanings we have so far discovered in the use of the word "parable" in the Gospels. The phrase from Psa. 78:2, "I will open my mouth in parables," which Matthew cites as fulfilled in our Lord's ministry (Mt. 13:35), clearly contemplates proverbial sayings rather than stories. Perhaps it would be safe to say that the Hebrew word māshāl meant primarily "sayings," and secondarily "stories," while the Greek word parabolē came to mean primarily "stories," and secondarily "sayings."

Parable Distinguished from Fable and Allegory. As a story the parable needs to be distinguished from both fable and allegory. The first distinction is simple, for the parable allows no such departure from nature as is characteristic of fable where animals and even inanimate objects may be endowed with human feelings and human speech. The relation of parable to allegory is not so easily determined. The popular tendency used to be to treat all parables as allegories, and so to find each detail significant. It was the great merit of Jülicher that he challenged this tendency and demonstrated that while in an allegory the comparison is detailed, every element in the description both of actors and action having a special meaning, in a parable the comparison is usually confined to some central point, so that we have as it were two pictures with one main feature in common but with no elaborate coincidence in detail. Thus many particulars may be inserted to complete the picture which have no significance for the comparison which is the point of the parable. This principle of Jülicher's is vigorously summed up in the saying that in the parable of the wise and foolish virgins nothing is meant by the oil. While this principle is a wholesome corrective of fanciful interpretations, it is a mistake to separate parable and allegory too rigidly, for a parable may easily include an allegorical element or shade off into allegory. Some details in the gospel-parables may properly receive allegorical interpretation. Thus in the parable of the sower, which might better be called the parable of the soils, the details are certainly significant. In some other parables in the synoptic Gospels, e.g., the parable of the wicked husbandmen, an allegorical element may be detected. In the fourth Gospel the parables of the door of the sheepfold, the good shepherd, and the vine and its branches, approach the class of allegory more nearly than is usual in the synoptics. (Cf. pp. 20-1.)

In one or two instances stories which are usually classed as parables are better described as examples or illustrations than as parables, since they directly illustrate some truth rather than illuminate it by comparison. Thus the story of the good Samaritan does not compare neighborly conduct to something else. It is a particular example of loving one's neighbor.

Use of Parables Among the Jews. Teachers of the East have long made use of the parable. A good modern example will be found in the similitudes in which Sadhu Sundar Singh abounds and delights. The Oriental mind, or, at any rate, the Jewish mind, prefers concrete illustration and suggestive parallel to abstract definition and logical argument. As a method of teaching, the use of parable has all the advantages of "truth embodied in a tale." The Jews both before and after Christ were familiar with it. There are well-known examples of the effective use of parables in the O.T. In this way the prophet Nathan convicted David of sin, and in this way also the wise woman from Tekoa induced the same king to recall Absalom (2 Sam. 12^{1f}. 14^{4f}.). The parable of the vineyard in Isa. 5 underlies the parable of the wicked husbandmen in the Gospels. In our Lord's own time parables were probably often used in interpreting the lessons from the Law and the Prophets which were read each Sabbath in the synagogues. Many such stories are to be found in the literature of Rabbinic Judaism. It is here that we find the nearest parallels to the parables of the Gospels. Many of these rabbinic parables are singularly beautiful, but, in general, they are in poorer literary form than those in the Gospels, and they are apt to be more conventional in character. They are traditional classroom illustrations rather than the outcome of fresh observation. It is noteworthy that while they do not neglect nature and the life of the common people the rabbis drew constantly on the life and conduct of kings for their similitudes. It is possible that the description of the man who gives a feast as a king in Mt. 22²¹ reflects the influence of Jewish usage. (Cf. also Mt. 18^{23f}.)

Reference Table for the Parables and Other Important Similes of Jesus. The following table is given to simplify the student's use of the present article, and to permit reader reference to the more detailed consideration of the parables in the commentaries on the Gospels.

Peculiar to Matthew:

- The tares, 1324-30
- The hidden treasure, 1344
- The pearl of great price, 1345, 46
- The dragnet, 1347-50
- The unmerciful servant, 1823-34
- The laborers in the vineyard, 201-16
- The father and two sons, 2128-32
- The marriage feast, 221-14 (cf. Lk. 1415-24).
- The ten virgins, 251-13
- The differing talents, 2514-30 (cf. Lk. 1912-27)
- The division of sheep and goats, 2531-46

Peculiar to Mark:

- The growing seed, 426-29

The watchful porter, 1334-36 (cf. Lk. 1235-40)

Peculiar to Luke:

- The two debtors, 741-47
- The good Samaritan, 1025-37
- The friend at midnight, 115-8
- The rich fool, 1216-21
- The watchful servants, 1235-40 (cf. Mk. 1334-36)
- The diligent steward, 1242-48
- The barren fig tree, 136-9
- The indifferent guests, 1415-24 (cf. Mt. 221-14)
- The unfinished tower, 1428-30
- The improvident king, 1431, 32
- The lost coin, 158-10
- The prodigal son, 1511-32
- The unjust but shrewd steward, 161-13
- The rich man and Lazarus, 1619-31
- The condescending master, 177-10
- The importunate widow, 181-8
- The Pharisee and the publican, 189-14
- The ten pounds, 1912-27 (cf. Mt. 2514-30)

Peculiar to John:

- The bread of life, 632-58
- The shepherd, fold, and door, 101-16
- The vine and the branches, 151-6
- (Not especially considered in the present article are the briefer similes in the fourth Gospel, such as—Christ's body as a temple, 219-22; "ye must be born again," 33; the serpent in the wilderness, 314, 15; the bridegroom, 329; the water of life, 413, 14; Jesus' "meat," 434; the fields white to harvest, 435-38; "rivers of living water," 738; the light of the world, 812 1235, 46; the grain, 1224.)

Common to Matthew and Luke:

- The foundations, Mt. 724-27 Lk. 647-49
- The leaven and meal, Mt. 1333 Lk. 1321
- The lost sheep, Mt. 1812, 13 Lk. 153-7
- (Compare Mt. 2514-30 with Lk. 1912-27; also Mt. 221-14 with Lk. 1415-24.)

Common to Matthew, Mark, and Luke:

- The lamp on the stand, Mt. 515, 16 Mk. 421 Lk. 816
- New cloth on old garments, Mt. 916 Mk. 221 Lk. 536
- New wine in old skins, Mt. 917 Mk. 222 Lk. 537-39
- The divided house, Mt. 1225-29 Mk. 323-27 Lk. 1117-22
- The sower, Mt. 131-23 Mk. 41-20 Lk. 84-15
- The mustard seed, Mt. 1331, 32 Mk. 430-32 Lk. 1318, 19
- The vineyard and the husbandmen, Mt. 2133-41 Mk. 121-12 Lk. 209-18
- The fig tree in tender leaf, Mt. 2432 Mk. 1328 Lk. 2129, 30.

Three questions concerning the parables fall to be considered here, namely, the general characteristics of the parables of Jesus, his motive and purpose in using the parables, and the various themes they were designed to illustrate.

General Characteristics of the Parables of Jesus. In the N.T. and in early Christian literature the parable is almost the monopoly of Jesus—as distinctively his own as the use of the term “Son of Man” as a self-designation. Paul, indeed, compares the Christian community with the body and its members—a similitude familiar to the ancient rhetoricians—and he essays one doubtful experiment in grafting (1 Cor. 12^{14f}. Rom. 11¹⁷), but he is no artist in parable. We can see from the similitudes of the Shepherd of Hermas, a Christian writing of the second century, the kind of capacity which the sub-apostolic Christians possessed in this direction. The parables in the Gospels clearly come, in the main, not from the church but from her Master.

The freshness and fidelity to nature which characterize the parables have often been noted. There are, indeed, occasionally present elements of exaggeration or hyperbole which are intentional. The unforgiving servant in Mt. 18²³ owes an impossibly large sum to his lord, six thousand talents being ten times the annual taxation of Judæa, Idumæa, and Samaria, while his fellow servant owes him one six hundred thousandth part of his own remitted debt. The contrast is designed and deliberately intensified, as in the somewhat parallel saying about the mote and the beam. The irony of Jesus is sometimes present in his parables. But the persuasiveness and cogency of the parables are due in part to their naturalness. The pictures are taken straight from nature and from life, and the details have not been strained or perverted to enforce a lesson. In consequence the lesson is the more effectively enforced. This characteristic of Christ's teaching, which is exemplified in the parables, is admirably brought out by T. T. Lynch:

“He spoke of grass and wind and rain,
And fig trees and fair weather;
And made it his delight to bring
Heaven and earth together.

“He spoke of lilies, corn, and vines,
The sparrow and the raven:
And words so natural yet so wise
Were on men's hearts engraven;

“And yeast and bread, and flax and cloth,
And eggs and fish and candles—
See how the whole familiar world
He most divinely handles.”

The social background of the life of Jesus is wonderfully reflected in the parables. They take us back to Galilee, and to Galilee in the first century A.D. We enter the home and watch the housewife making the bread or patching the old garment or looking for the lost coin. We see the life of the market place and watch the travelers on the high road. We traverse the fields with the sower or climb the hills with the shepherd or stand by the lakeside and pull the net ashore with the fisherman. We come to know also the local magnate with his large house, his capital, his vineyards, and his barns. We learn how he deals with his steward, his hired laborers, and his slaves, and we understand “the cares that press on the heart of worldliness.” Nothing of the life of the busy thriving province of Galilee seems to escape the Master. His greatest interest was in the common people. He stopped to speak to those whom other teachers had passed by. He did that because he saw them as with the eyes of God—who looks beyond the accidental to the essential. It is not an idle phrase, when a modern poet speaks of Jesus as “Dear intimate of little folk.”

Jesus' Motive and Purpose in Teaching by Parables. Mark suggests that Jesus adopted the method of teaching by parable when the ministry in Galilee had been in progress for some time. He seems to associate it with the period when, partly owing to the suspicion of the religious leaders and partly owing to the pressure of the crowds, Jesus began to withdraw from the cities and the synagogues and teach in the open air and in desert places. In connection with the use of parables the evangelist cites the passage from Isaiah about the people seeing and not perceiving, hearing and not understanding, and seems to suggest that the parables were intended to conceal the secret of the Kingdom from those who were outside (Mk. 4^{11, 12}). This suggestion conflicts apparently with the later passage (Mk. 4³³), where we read that Jesus taught the people with such parables as they were able to hear, and also with the normal purpose of a parable, which is to elucidate and not to obscure truth. This difficulty can be removed by recognizing that Mark, or that Jesus himself as reported in Mark, treats the actual consequence of the teaching by parables as the divinely intended result. This is in accord with Hebrew ways of thinking. The effect of the parables was to sift Christ's hearers. The story of the sower is the story of Christ himself. He spoke, and his words met with very different reception from different hearers. Some perceived and understood nothing of the deeper meaning of the stories to which they listened. In their case the prophecy of Isaiah was fulfilled, though Jesus taught them as long as they were willing and able to listen. Yet we can hardly doubt that Jesus adopted the method of parables in order to win a further hearing for truths about the Kingdom, which were not familiar or welcome to the common people. Just as Nathan brought home an unwelcome truth to David by means of a parable, so Jesus taught the people many things concerning the Kingdom which did not fit in with their preconceptions.

There would seem to be a good deal of force in the contention of A. B. Bruce that there is a parabolic mood—a state of mind in which one who is conscious of misunderstanding and opposition and “whose spirit is saddened by a sense of loneliness frames for his thoughts forms which half conceal, half reveal them—reveal them more perfectly to those who understand, hide them from those who do not.”

Subject Matter and Grouping of the Parables. When Jesus began to teach in parables, the main theme was the kingdom of God. Only four parables are recorded as such by all the synoptic Gospels—the sower, the mustard-seed, the wicked husbandmen and the fig-tree—but these four suggest two subjects with which the parabolic teaching of Jesus was mainly concerned. The sower and the mustard-seed stand at the head of that group of stories which deal with the nature and growth of the kingdom of God. The story of the vineyard and the wicked husbandmen is the most searching of those warnings of judgment awaiting the nation which our Lord addressed to Israel particularly in the closing period of his ministry. The fig-tree represents the associated warnings addressed to the disciples. (The synoptic Gospels contain in common, however, other suggestive brief similes: see the reference table above.)

In the first group we must place all the material collected in Mt. 13, together with Mark's parable of the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4:26-29). If we examine the parables in this group, we shall find that they bear out the contention that by means of them Jesus was striving to instill into the minds of the people a different idea of the Kingdom from that commonly entertained. The people were looking for a deliverer who should repeat and surpass the exploits of Judas Maccabæus. Jesus spoke of the Kingdom as God's gift, and he also spoke of it as something that should grow from within. He used imagery drawn in the main from agriculture and natural processes, and such pictures were intended and adapted to draw men's thoughts away from dreams of military conquest and empire. The parable of the sower suggests that the coming of the Kingdom depends on the response men make to the teaching of Jesus himself. Then we have two pairs of parables—the mustard-seed and the leaven, the hid treasure and the pearl-merchant—which set forth certain truths about the growth of the Kingdom and about the individual's discovery of the Kingdom. In the mustard-seed there is the contrast between the small beginning and the later development of the Kingdom. This is a picture of outward visible extension. The leaven, on the other hand, illustrates the way in which the life of the Kingdom is destined to permeate society, working from within until everything is transformed by it. The second pair of parables sets forth the Kingdom as man's highest good for which it is worth while joyfully to give up everything. A man may stumble on this treasure by accident, as in the case of the man who finds the treasure hid in the field, or he may find it as the result of long and conscious search; but however the Kingdom comes into a man's life, he will find the world well lost to attain it. It is tempting to associate Mark's parable of the seed growing secretly with the parable of the tares as the members of another pair. The first, then, may be directed to encourage those morbid, over-anxious souls who are forever pulling up the plants of goodness sown in their own hearts to see whether they are growing or not. The second is probably a warning to those eager patriots and impatient reformers who always suppose that methods of violent repression are the best means of advancing God's kingdom upon earth. But as it stands, the parable of the tares seems to be associated even more closely with the parable of the drag-net, and the lesson of both would seem to be the lesson which Paul commended to the Corinthians when he urged them to judge nothing before the time (1 Cor. 4:5).

To the second group, the parables of warning and judgment, will belong the barren fig-tree (Lk. 13:6-9), the great supper (Lk. 14:15-24), together with Matthew's feast of the king's son (Mt. 22:1-14), the section of the parable in Lk. 19:11^f which deals with the nobleman and his subjects, the parable of the two sons, Mt. 21:28^f, and the picture of the Last Judgment in Mt. 25:31^f. Associated with this group are a number of parables addressed to disciples and impressing on them the duties of watchfulness, of preparedness, of diligence and faithfulness in the tasks assigned to them. To this class we shall assign the reference to the watchful slaves in Lk. 12:35-46, since the evangelist regards this as a parable (12:41), the parable of the talents (Mt. 25:14^f.) and the parallel story of the nobleman and his servants in Lk. (19^{11f.}), the wise and foolish virgins (Mt. 25^{1f.}), and the lesson of the fig tree (Mk. 13^{28f.} Mt. 24^{32f.} Lk. 21^{29f.}).

It is impossible to determine the exact chronological order of the parables, but manifestly of these two main groups the first is characteristic of the Galilæan ministry, while the second belongs to the closing period of our Lord's life and is most naturally associated with Jerusalem.

The remaining parables are for the most part connected with the first group rather than the second. They are concerned with the character of the citizens of God's kingdom and with the defense and interpretation of the life of the Kingdom. They may be roughly classified as follows:

There are first stories told by Jesus in defense and explanation of his own conduct. Here we may place the two debtors, the story told in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk. 7^{41, 42}), and the parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son. In Luke all these stories are told to defend the action of Jesus in befriending sinners. The parable of the lost sheep is also related in Mt. 18¹² to enforce the warning against despising little ones. But these parables are more than defenses: they are appeals intended to transform foes to friends and to turn critics into disciples; they constitute the parables of grace and set forth the wonder of God's love.

We have, next, stories told to set forth the Christian character, and to commend more particularly the love of one's neighbor—charity in action and the forgiving spirit, charity in the heart and the humility of those who know themselves to be God's servants and God's debtors. This group will include the stories of the good Samaritan (Lk. 10³⁰⁻³⁷), and of the unforgiving servant (Mt. 18²³⁻³⁵). It may also include the parable from which Ruskin derived the phrase "Unto This Last" (Mt. 20¹⁻¹⁶). The advice to take the lower seats at a wedding feast (Lk. 14^{7f.}), and the reminder that when we have done all we are still servants who have but done what they ought to have done (Lk. 17^{7f.}), also belong here if we follow Luke in regarding them as parables. The picture of the Pharisee and the publican praying in the Temple should be included in this group.

Beyond this there are Luke's stories dealing with the subjects of prayer, and of the use and abuse of riches. To the first we assign the parable of the importunate friend (Lk. 11⁵⁻⁹) and the parable of the unjust judge and the widow (Lk. 18²⁻⁸). Perhaps the latter was originally intended to enforce the lesson of faith in Christ's ultimate triumph rather than persistence in prayer. In that case it would belong to the group of warnings addressed to the disciples as to their duties while waiting for the Lord's return. In the second group will stand the parables of the rich fool (Lk. 12¹⁶⁻²¹), the unjust steward (16¹⁻¹²), and Dives and Lazarus (16¹⁹⁻³¹).

The Transmission of the Parables of Jesus. Seeing that the parables are so characteristic a feature of the teaching of Jesus, it is somewhat strange that the synoptic Gospels have so few parables in common. As we have seen, the sower, the mustard-seed, the wicked husbandmen and the fig-tree are the only actual parables recorded by all the first three evangelists. If, however, we consider sayings which are treated as parables by one or other of the evangelists and which may be regarded as parables in germ, we can extend this list (see the reference table above, p. 915) by adding the sayings with which Jesus defended his disciples for their failure to observe the practice of fasting and with which he refuted the charge that he himself was in league with Beelzebub (Mk. 22^{1, 22 325}). But the evidence of the Triple Tradition (i.e., the common record of the first three Gospels) is always limited by the fact that Mark does not apparently set out to give any full account of the teaching of Jesus. The first three Gospels do, however, agree both as to the important place which parables took in the teaching of Jesus and as to their main subjects.

The Parables of the Earliest Gospel Record.

It is perhaps rather more strange that Matthew and Luke, who seem to have drawn on some earlier record of the teaching of Jesus, have, after all, so few parables in common. In addition to those they record along with Mark, both Matthew and Luke narrate the leaven, the lost sheep, the marriage feast and the talents or the pounds. So far as the marriage feast and the talents are concerned, there are considerable divergences between the two evangelists, and it is sometimes supposed that the parables are distinct. But probably these parables in some form or other belong to the common record of Christ's teaching on which Matthew and Luke drew. Then we have seen how often parables are associated in pairs, and the woman seeking her lost coin is so clearly a companion-picture to the shepherd seeking his lost sheep that we may fairly assume they come from the same source, though the former is found only in Luke. Moreover, Mark may also be indebted to this common source, and in that case the parables he records may belong to it, including the parable of the seed growing secretly. This would permit us to include in the earliest record of Christ's teaching probably eight and possibly ten parables, namely, the sower, the mustard-seed, the leaven (the seed growing secretly), the lost sheep (the lost coin), the marriage feast, the talents, the wicked husbandmen, the fig-tree. B. S. Easton in his commentary on Luke (1927) adds to this list the parables of the importunate friend (Lk. 11⁵⁻⁸) and the foolish rich man (Lk. 12¹³⁻²¹), and there is a great deal of force in his arguments. We might extend this list still further by adding the sayings about watchful servants (Lk. 12^{39f.} Mt. 24^{43f.}), and the similitude with which the Sermon on the Mount concludes. We know that besides several actual parables, this record of Christ's teaching was rich in shorter comparisons and parables in germ. Yet many of the most arresting parables are found either in Matthew alone or in Luke alone (see reference table, p. 915). The source which they used in common seems to have concentrated on the sayings of Jesus rather than on his parables.

The Parables Peculiar to Matthew and Luke. It is generally assumed that Matthew and Luke derived from separate sources the parables which each alone records. But not only may some of these parables peculiar to Matthew or Luke belong to the source they both used, but it is also possible that parables came to either evangelist as detached memories. These stories which Jesus told would easily become separated from any particular context, and yet the stories themselves would not easily be forgotten. It is natural to suppose that stories were remembered and repeated singly, and both the first and the third evangelists may be indebted to many informants. Yet there are certain features of the parables peculiar to each which support the general assumption that the evangelists drew on earlier and distinct collections.

The parables peculiar to Matthew will be found to fall mainly into the two great groups which we distinguished in an earlier section. He brought together parables concerning the Kingdom, and he was interested in parables of judgment and warning. The note of moral responsibility is underlined in Matthew. It sounds in the picture of the last judgment, in the wise and foolish virgins, in the unforgiving servant, and in the incident of the man without the wedding garment at the wedding feast. The parables of the two sons and of the laborers in the vineyard would seem to be directed to warning the Jews that in the kingdom of heaven they were being surpassed by the Gentiles. These parables anticipate or reinforce the lesson taught in the parable of the wicked husbandmen.

The parables peculiar to Luke, on the other hand, are more varied in character. If the parables of judgment belong to Matthew, the parables of mercy and hope belong to Luke. Yet he too has parables which warn men of dangers and punishments here and hereafter. Many of Luke's parables may be traced to his special source, which Canon Streeter and others now contend must be as early as Mark and the record of the teaching of Jesus which Matthew and Luke used. First among these we must note the prodigal son. This story, though only in Luke, we now trace to one of the earliest sources of our knowledge of the life of Christ. To this parable Easton would add the two debtors (Lk. 7⁴¹⁻⁴²), the good Samaritan, Dives and Lazarus, the Pharisee and the publican, and perhaps the unrighteous steward, the unjust judge, and the barren fig-tree.

We may here note two or three features of these parables peculiar to Luke. In the first place they illustrate many different sides of the teaching of Jesus, e.g., prayer, the need of persistence in prayer, the readiness of God to answer prayer, the need of sincere humility in prayer; riches, the poverty of the life which is taken up with the abundance of possessions (the rich fool), the sin of the selfishness which makes wealthy men ignore misery at their very doors (Dives and Lazarus), and the possibility of so using temporal wealth as to gain life eternal (if, indeed, that be the lesson of the original parable of the unrighteous steward); the love of one's neighbor overriding racial antagonisms (the good Samaritan); and the mercy of God in welcoming the penitent (the prodigal son) and postponing judgment on the barren fig-tree. Secondly, some of these parables in Luke strike the note of humor. This is manifest both in the story of the man who disturbs his neighbor at night with his ill-timed request for bread, and also in the story of the guests who made excuses for failing to come to the feast when it was ready. It must be remembered that this parable, according to Luke, was drawn from Jesus by the pious exclamation, "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God!" Jesus answers, that when the time comes, the invited guests will make any excuse to stay away! Third, it is in Luke's narrative that Jesus appeals to the action of bad men—the unjust judge and the unrighteous steward—to illustrate a truth about God or to point advice to disciples. These examples make quite clear the danger of treating the parables as allegories. God is not like the unjust judge, and Christians are not to be dishonest stewards, though they might well be as farsighted as the man whose shrewdness the Lord commends.

Literature: Of the older books, Bruce, The Parabolic Teaching of Jesus, and Trench, Notes on the Parables, are worth consulting. Jülicher's great book on Die Gleichnisreden Jesu has not been translated into English. It gave the deathblow to the older type of allegorical interpretation. (A good popular book along Jülicher's lines for readers of German is that by Weinel, Die Gleichnisse Jesu. Fiebig's two books on the Jewish Rabbinic material, Altjüdische Gleichnisse und die Gleichnisse Jesu, and Die Gleichnisreden Jesu im Lichte der Rabbinischen Gleichnisse des N.T. Zeitalters, broke new ground and established important qualifications to Jülicher's main thesis.) For English readers, the note on the Parables in Abraham's Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels, First Series, pp. 90-107, gives an admirable account of the Jewish parallels to the gospel-parables. Levison, The Parables, their Background and Local Setting, was written by one who was born and brought up in Palestine. A paper by Allen Menzies on The Art of the Parables, which appeared in the Expositor, July, 1915, and was reprinted in The Study of Calvin and Other Papers, is worth reading in this connection. Luccock, Studies in the Parables of Jesus, is a fresh and suggestive treatment. For the rest, good commentaries like McNeile or Allen or T. H. Robinson on Matthew and Easton or Plummer on Luke are as valuable as special works on the parables, and great sermons like those of F. W. Robertson on the Parable of the Sower should not be neglected.

THE MIRACLES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

BY PROFESSOR EDWIN LEWIS

The Approach to the Subject. The common custom of approaching the study of the N.T. miracles from the standpoint of a definition of the term "miracle" has not produced very satisfactory results. If it be defined in the popular way as "a violation or suspension of the laws of nature"—a definition not countenanced by any responsible Christian thinker to-day, and having no support in the great theologians of the past, such as Augustine, Anselm, and Thomas Aquinas—then those who believe that such violation or suspension is impossible will necessarily reject all the N.T. miracles. No evidence can substantiate what is already regarded as impossible. On the other hand, those who accept the definition will have no difficulty with the N.T. accounts, for they will regard the separate miracles as simply so many illustrations of the definition. They will, however, be in the unfortunate position of working with a definition which the modern view of the world has rendered utterly untenable. If there is not a "law" of miracle as there is of every other event then miracle will be surrendered by thinking men. This is why a convinced Christian like J. M. Thompson (in his Miracles of the N.T.) would entirely excise from the N.T. the miraculous element while still claiming to retain the supernatural: he considers the evidence in the light of the supposition that the alleged event, being "lawless," could not have happened. Wendland, however, having a much truer philosophical conception of the relation of God and the world, claims that miracle has its own proper law. (See his Miracles and Christianity, pp. 3-12.)

As a matter of fact, the definition of "miracle" is not particularly important for a N.T. study. The real question is, "Did Jesus do any or all of the unusual things he is said to have done?" If he did, then miracle, however we define the term, is clearly not impossible. What is at stake, therefore, fundamentally is the substantial accuracy of the record, and that cannot be settled by a philosophical definition of a term.

Miracles as Signs. The "mighty works" of Jesus were regarded both by himself (Mt. 112-6) and by others (Lk. 716) as "signs." In his sermon on the Day of Pentecost, Peter stated the case as follows: "Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God unto you by mighty works and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, even as ye yourselves know" (Acts 222). The Greek word translated "mighty works" is literally "powers," and in other connections could be rendered "capacities." Jesus—so we might paraphrase it—possessed a divinely given capacity whereby he wrought striking deeds, which were to be taken as signs. Wonders and signs are not separate events: the word "wonders" in the plural is never found in the N.T. except in association with the word "signs" in the plural, although "sign" and "signs" often stand alone. The wonders were in themselves signs.

The central feature of the miracle is therefore to be sought in its signification. Jesus "did many signs," as even his enemies admitted (Jn. 1147). But a sign does not stand by itself: it is always a sign of something. The miracles of Jesus signified his possession of capacities; they signified that these capacities were of such a character that they must be God-given in a peculiar sense; and they signified that one who possessed these God-given capacities was in himself different from all other men.

As we shall see later, the whole question of N.T. miracle and its credibility depends upon this element of "difference" in Christ himself. (See Garvie, Handbook of Apologetics, ch. 3, pt. iii; Illingworth, The Gospel Miracles, pp. 40, 41.) The miracles are a "sign" of that difference. But that very difference is also itself a sign. It is a sign of the God who sent him, of the God who indwelt him, of the God of whom his whole life was an increasing revelation. Thus he always made the testimony of his miracles secondary to the testimony of his own person. It was, he said, a greater thing to believe in him for his own sake than it was to believe in him because of his "works" (Jn. 1244-50 1410, 11). When the Pharisees asked for "a sign from heaven," he refused it, and in his ensuing conversation with his disciples he made it plain that neither they nor the Pharisees yet "understood" the truth of himself (Mk. 811-21). There is a similar allusion to himself and what he signifies in his statement that "a greater than Solomon" and "a greater than Jonah" is here (Lk. 1129-32). His great discourse on the Bread of Life grew out of his realizing how little the people or the disciples understood "the miracle of the loaves." We do not evade the force of the words, "I am the living bread which came down out of heaven: if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever," by simply saying that the words are put into Jesus' mouth by the fourth Evangelist at a late date, for the reason that the words "fit" all that we learn about Jesus in the earlier Gospels. Jesus Christ is the world's greatest miracle because he is the world's greatest "sign," and if we believe in the greatest sign, the lesser signs become at least credible. (See Lewis, Manual of Christian Beliefs, pp. 74-76.) The lesser finds its rationale in the fact of the greater. There have always been men who could do things that others could not. We do not minimize their deeds: instead, we call them "gifted" men, meaning that God has done something in them that he has not done in the rest of us. If, then, God was in Jesus Christ as he was in no other human life, then the deeds of Christ were as "natural" to him—he being as he was—as our deeds are to us—we being as we are.

Place of Miracle in the Gospel Records. Miracles filled a much larger place in the ministry of Jesus than the records at first sight suggest. The four Gospels give an account of some thirty-five miracles performed by Jesus. Some of these are described at length, e.g., the relief of the Gadarene demoniacs (Mt. 8:28-34; parallel references here and elsewhere are omitted, except when there are important differences in the account); the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mt. 9:18, 19, 23-26 Mk. 5:21-24, 35-43); the feeding of the five thousand (Mt. 14:13-21); and especially the four miracles peculiar to the fourth Gospel, namely, the miracle of the wine at Cana (2:1-11), the healing of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda (5:1-18), the healing of the blind man at Jerusalem (9:1-41), and the raising of Lazarus (11:17-44). In the case of other miracles there is often little more than the bare mention of the fact, e.g., the cure of Peter's mother-in-law (Mt. 8:14, 15), of the dumb man (Mt. 9:32, 33), of "certain women" (Lk. 8:2), and of one possessed, blind, and dumb (Mt. 12:22).

But there were also a great number of miracles of which we have no description at all. The significance of this fact may very easily be overlooked. Time and time again we meet a merely general statement that Jesus healed "all manner of disease and sickness," and that the people brought to him "all that were sick, holden with divers diseases and torments, possessed with devils, and epileptic, and palsied, and he healed them" (Mt. 4:23, 24); and that those who "had plagues pressed upon him" because already "he had healed many" (Mk.

3:10); and that, at Peter's house, "they brought unto him many possessed of devils; and he cast out the spirits with a word, and healed all that were sick" (Mt. 8:16 Mk. 1:32-34 Lk. 4:40, 41); and that "Jesus went about all the cities and villages teaching . . . and preaching . . . and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness" (Mt. 9:35); and that at Gennesaret they brought unto him "all that were sick" to be "made whole" (Mt. 14:35, 36 Mk. 6:53-56); and that he healed "the lame, blind, dumb, and many others" (Mt. 15:30); and that "a great number" came from Judæa and Jerusalem, and Tyre and Sidon, "to be healed of their diseases" (Lk. 6:17, 18). When two of John's disciples came to interview Jesus, we are told that "in that hour he cured many of diseases and plagues and evil spirits, and on many that were blind he bestowed sight" (Lk. 7:21); and a little later Luke tells us again that "them that had need of healing he healed" (9:11). John refers to "the signs which Jesus did on them that were sick" (6:2), and toward the end of his record declares that he has left untold "many other signs" (20:30).

Such a wealth of allusion would seem to make clear three facts, namely, that Jesus must have exercised himself in his healing ministry far more than a mere surface reading of the records would suggest; that the Evangelists practiced a remarkable reserve in their reports of the mighty works; and that the case for at least the miraculous cures does not rest upon the comparatively small number which are described, but upon what must have been literally hundreds wrought on people in all parts of Palestine.

This manifest reserve of the Evangelists indicates that they were not nearly the credulous men that rationalistic critics have been wont to allege. (See Strauss, Life of Jesus, and Renan, Life of Jesus, both in Eng. trans., and cf. notes in Hurst, History of Rationalism, pp. 259-267, 404-407.) Confronted as they were with an overwhelming abundance of material, they selected for description only the most meager amount. So far from letting their imagination run wild, they appear to have exercised a most remarkable restraint. Striking deeds naturally make a deeper impression on the mind than sayings and teachings, and are more easily remembered, yet the Evangelists give much less space to the former than to the latter. Think of all the possibilities of graphic description that lie latent in the bare statement, "He healed all that were sick" (Mt. 8:16). No wonder that John says that "the world itself would not contain the books" if all had been written that might have been (21:25).

A Record of Typical Cases. What the Evangelists have done for the most part is simply to record typical cases. The healing of the demoniac in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mk. 123-27) is but a specific example of the numerous deeds only alluded to in Mt. 816. According to Matthew, Jesus on his return from Tyre and Sidon "healed many" (1529-31), but he gives no details. Out of all that number Mark selects for description the cure of "one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech" (731-35). The Evangelists are fond of saying that healing came to many as they "touched" Jesus (see Mt. 1436 Mk. 656 Lk. 619). Yet there is only one detailed example of healing power going forth from Jesus as he was touched, namely, the woman with the hemorrhage (Mt. 920-23). He healed many who were blind, but there are described for us only the recovery of the two blind men in the neighborhood of Capernaum (Mt. 927-30), of the two blind men of Jericho (Mt. 2029-34, given as of one man, Bartimæus, in Mk. 1046-52 and Lk. 1835-43), of the blind man of Bethsaida (Mk. 822-26), and of the blind man of Jerusalem who was sent to wash in Siloam (Jn. 91-41). The Evangelists could easily be shown to have followed the same method with regard to the record of the cure of other forms of disease.

Some of the miracles of Jesus, however, were either unique or performed only rarely. Only once is he said to have walked on the sea (Mt. 1422-33 and parallels), and only once to have stilled the tempest (Mt. 823-27 and parallels). Only twice is he said to have fed the multitude in a miraculous way, first the five thousand, "besides women and children" (Mt. 1413-21 and parallels, this being the only miracle recorded in all four Gospels), and later the four thousand (Mk. 81-8; the addition, "besides women and children," being made in Mt. 1538). Some suppose that these are two different accounts of the same event, but Matthew and Mark could not have thought so, as each narrates them both, and each quotes Jesus as referring to them as two separate events (Mt. 169, 10 Mk. 819, 20). Only three times is Jesus reported to have raised the dead, namely, the daughter of Jairus (Mt. 918, 19, 23-26), the son of the widow of Nain (Lk. 711-16), and Lazarus (Jn. 11). It is true that he is said to have instructed his disciples to "raise the dead" (Mt. 108), and that he spoke of the raising of the dead to John's disciples (Mt. 114, 5), but the latter allusion may very well have been to Jairus' daughter or to the young man of Nain, both of which events are given as preceding the time of the visit from John's disciples.

Rationalistic Explanation and Its Limitations. The work of J. M. Thompson (op. cit.) is a good example of an attempt to find a rationalistic explanation of the record of each alleged miracle. But such attempts still leave us with the problem of the miracle that is left undescribed. Suppose that a given mighty work did not take place in exactly the way described, or suppose that the account involves an exaggeration or a misunderstanding of an event not unusual in itself (Thompson, op. cit., pp. 207-209; Pfeiderer, Early Christian Conception of Christ, ch. 3), that does not necessarily mean that the entire miraculous element in the gospel record is discredited. If Jesus performed mighty works at all, then exaggeration and misunderstanding here and there would be perfectly natural. To say, however, that everything is exaggerated or misunderstood when, as shown above, we are dealing with many hundreds of cases, is simply dogmatism.

It is undoubtedly possible to put an interrogation point after some of the accounts. Even scholars regarded as conservative feel compelled to do this. (Cf. Sanday, Outlines of the Life of Christ, §§39-44, and Life of Christ in Recent Research, pp. 102-104; Nolloth, Rise of the Christian Religion, p. 142, where he speaks of "disparities of evidence"; Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, second edit., pp. 144-146, who writes "there does seem something which is not only incongruous but repellent in the idea of the risen Lord eating"; Garvie, Christian Doctrine of the Godhead, pp. 69, 70; and Tillett, Paths That Lead to God, pp. 354, 355.) E.g., considering how suddenly storms arise and subside on the Sea of Galilee, the alleged stilling of the tempest may have been a mere coincidence. The walking on the water may have been in reality walking by the water or through the shoals. The recovery of the centurion's servant ("son" according to Jn. 446), Jesus being at a distance and not even seeing him, may have been due to a favorable crisis which would have occurred in any case. The story of the coin in the fish's mouth whereby Jesus paid the temple tax (Mt. 1724-27) may very easily have originated in a command (Garvie says "a playful command," op. cit., p. 69) to Peter to catch and sell some fish to obtain the necessary money. Many feel that the blasting of the fig-tree (Mt. 2118-22) is so out of keeping with Jesus' character and so irrelevant to the lesson he was said to teach thereby, that they are inclined to regard it either as originally a parable (cf. Lk. 136-9; David Smith says "an acted parable," Days of His Flesh, p. 395), or as the result of confusion with some other event (the view of Deissmann in The Religion of Jesus and the Faith of Paul, pp. 98-100). On the other hand, it may be said that Jesus, in keeping with his principle that a man was better than swine (Mk. 5¹⁻¹⁷) or sheep (Mt. 12¹²) or institutions (Mt. 12¹⁻⁸), may have felt that the destruction of a fig-tree was a small price to pay for making dramatic to his disciples the nature and the conditions of the fruitful life. (Cf. Dougall and Emmet, The Lord of Thought, ch. 11; Lewis, Jesus Christ and the Human Quest, pp. 111, 112; Glover, Jesus in the Experience of Men, pp. 217-220.) No miraculous element is needed in the case of the great draughts of fish, either when Jesus first called his disciples (Lk. 5⁴⁻¹⁰) or at the time of the closing interview (Jn. 21⁴⁻¹¹).

Some would like to feel that there was a "natural" explanation of the three stories of the raising of the dead. That neither of the persons concerned was actually dead is, of course, a possibility. Thus E. R. Micklem writes: "In the eyes of a twentieth-century practitioner a person who has been 'restored to life' eo ipso can never have died, and, however assured prior to the re-animation a doctor may have been that death had taken place, after that re-animation he would indubitably claim that he had been mistaken in his previous diagnosis" (Miracles and the New Psychology, pp. 128, 129, published by the Oxford University Press). In spite of Jairus' own fear (Mt. 9¹⁸) and the message of the servants (Mk. 5³⁵ Lk. 8⁴⁹), it may be that Jesus' words, "She is not dead, but sleepeth," are to be taken literally. In considering the case of Lazarus, we have to remember, first, that only John narrates the incident—as against three narrators for the incident of Jairus' daughter—and it is hard to see why the other Evangelists should have ignored so stupendous a deed; second, that John is writing some three quarters of a century at least after the event—an event of which we have no intimation in the intervening period; and third, that the fourth Gospel is admittedly highly symbolical and allegorical (see intro. there), which makes it not impossible that the terms "death" and "life" and "resurrection" in the account are to be understood in the spiritual sense so characteristic of the fourth Gospel. But even if this should be so, we still have the case of the young man of Nain, and there is nothing at all here to suggest any other than the obvious interpretation. If either of the three accounts is to be taken literally, then there is no reason why all should not be.

But the frankest recognition of all these facts and possibilities may be made and still the conviction remain that the evidence is overwhelming that Jesus wrought miracles.

It can hardly be said that Christian scholarship has definitely abandoned the miracles of the N.T. when they are more or less accepted by such outstanding scholars and thinkers as Sanday, Gore, Garvie, Tennant, Headlam, Wendland, Griffith-Jones, H. R. Mackintosh, Henry Bett, Herrmann, J. A. Faulkner, Bowne, Peake, Von Hügel, Ramsay, Ménégos, Sabatier, Streeter, R. Seeberg, W. R. Matthews, Galloway, Wobbermin, and Inge—and one could go on lengthening the list almost indefinitely. Few of these men would accept them all just as they stand, but it is the poorest kind of reasoning to say that if Jesus did not do all the mighty works he is said to have done therefore he did not do any of them. With much greater logical right we could say that if one single incident is authentic, then the miracle-principle is established, and we are justified in approaching all the other incidents at least without a bias against them. If we raise a question here and there, it will be either because of the uncertainty of the evidence, or because of some intrinsic difficulty felt to be in the alleged fact itself.

The Technique of the Miracles. Any discussion of the question of what might be called the technique of the miracles of Jesus must bear in mind that details of description are not to be pressed too hard; that the records of the same miracle sometimes differ as to its method; and that in such an event as that of the feeding of the five thousand the method throws no light whatever on the event itself.

The records show considerable variety in the technique or method of the miracles. Sometimes Jesus merely speaks the word, as when he "rebuked the winds and the sea" (Mt. 8²⁶ Lk. 8²⁴), saying, as Mark alone reports, "Peace, be still" (4³⁹); or, as when he said to the fig-tree (but cf. the discussion above), "No man eat fruit from thee henceforward forever" (Mk. 11¹⁴). Once he is reported simply to have touched the sufferer without addressing him at all, namely, the servant of the high-priest whose ear Peter cut off (Lk. 22⁵¹). The healing, however, is not reported by Matthew (26^{51f.}) or John (18^{10, 11}), only the attack. Sometimes it suffices that he be simply touched, as with the woman with the hemorrhage, who would but "touch the hem of his garment" (Mk. 5²⁸); and there were other occasions when "as many as touched him were made whole" (Mk. 6⁵⁶), and when "all the multitude sought to touch him: for power came forth from him, and healed them all" (Lk. 6¹⁹). Sometimes he both touches the sufferer and speaks some words—this, indeed, is quite common. Thus he "touched the hand" of Peter's mother-in-law, Luke alone adding that "he rebuked the fever" (439); Jairus' daughter he both touched and addressed (Mk. 541 Lk. 854; but cf. Mt. 925 where there is no mention of any words), and this was his method on both occasions with two blind men (Mt. 929 2032-34), as it was with the woman who was "bowed together" (Lk. 1311-13). In the case of the leper the touching was no doubt as deliberate as it was impressive. A leper was "untouchable," not only legally (Lev. 1346), but by a natural human revulsion. The leper upon whom Jesus laid his hands (Mt. 83) probably felt at that moment the first friendly human touch he had known in many years, and the effect on him must have been overwhelming. One feels here the force of the closing words in Micklem's little book on miracles: "In conclusion it should be observed that the performance of the most amazing marvels is not to be compared spiritually and morally with the act of one who, in a land where ritual uncleanness was held the direst of crimes, voluntarily touches a 'leper' and speaks with kindness in the presence of a crowd to an 'unclean' woman who publicly confesses to have touched him" (op. cit., p. 136). Again, there is sometimes a careful preparation of the sufferer for what is to come. This is so in the case of the man sick with the palsy (Lk. 518-26), blind Bartimæus near Jericho (Mk. 1046-52), and the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda (Jn. 52-9).

The most striking example of this latter method, however, is where Jesus makes a concession to popular belief as to how disease may be cured, apparently for the sake of arousing the expectation of the sufferer, and even of the bystander. Thus he "anointed" the eyes of one blind with clay made from spittle (Jn. 96); for another blind man he used spittle only, and "laid his hands upon him," and later "laid his hands upon his eyes" (Mk. 822-25); and when he cured one who was both deaf and a stutterer, "he took him aside privately, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spat, and touched his tongue; and looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. And his ears were opened, and the bond of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain" (Mk. 733-35). There was a popular belief that spittle had curative power (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, bk. iii, ch. 34, parag. 2). It is not likely that Jesus shared the belief, but he utilized it for his own purposes. In the same way he went through an elaborate process of exorcising demons, as when, at Capernaum, he directly addressed the "spirit of an unclean demon" with the words, "Hold thy peace, and come out of him" (Lk. 433-35); or as when he carried on a conversation with the "Legion" of demons and then sent them into the herd of swine (Mk. 55-13); or as when, after the Transfiguration, he "rebuked" (Mt. 1718) the demon in the epileptic boy, using, according to Mark, the words, "Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I command thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him" (925). The common phrase, "casting out demons," suggests the apparent use of effort. We need not inquire whether Jesus shared the popular belief in demon-possession: whether he did or not, the method had ample psychological justification, since the poor victim himself had no doubt at all that he was "possessed" and needed deliverance. (Cf. the chapter on "The War With the Demons," in Glover, Jesus in the Experience of Men.) This attempt to win the confidence and co-operation of the sufferer is, indeed, a general characteristic of Jesus' method. It is illustrated again when he said to the man with the withered hand, "Stretch forth thy hand" (Mt. 1213), Mark and Luke adding that he first of all told the man to "stand forth"; and when he pronounced forgiveness for the palsied man before healing him (Mt. 92); and when he asked the impotent man if he would be made whole, before saying to him, "Arise, take up thy bed, and walk" (Jn. 52-9); and when he told the ten lepers to go and show themselves to the priests, although the leprosy was still on them when they started (Lk. 1714).

Faith a Usual but not Invariable Condition. What Jesus was evidently trying to do in such cases as the foregoing was to induce an appropriate psychic state. This is usually called "faith," and the lack of it in the people of Nazareth is given as a reason why he could do there "no mighty work" (Mk. 65; see also Micklem, op. cit., pp. 132-134.) Power was with him to heal (Lk. 517), but he required both faith and expectancy in the sufferer: "According to your faith be it done unto you" (Mt. 929). But faith is not invariably present as a subjective condition. It was obviously impossible in the case of those who were raised from the dead (and this would still be true even though they were only "as dead"), or in the case of those who were healed at a distance, i.e., the centurion's servant, and the little daughter of the Syrophenician woman (Mk. 730). The healing was, indeed, a response to the centurion's faith and to the mother's faith, but that only complicates the problem psychologically: how can the faith of one avail for another?

Miracle not Explainable by Faith Alone. What has just been said about the place of faith has no bearing on the so-called nature-miracles. For this reason, some, like Arpold and Harnack, reject the nature-miracles entirely, although they are willing to accept the accounts of some of the healings. Even J. M. Thompson writes: "The evidence for works of healing is good evidence, but it is not evidence for miracles" (op. cit., p. 41). No hypothesis of the power of faith suffices to explain the feeding of the five thousand, or the restorations to life, or the walking on the water. Such incidents become intelligible to us only on the condition that we assign a unique character to Christ's own person. And when we do that, the healings also cease to be a problem.

For the supposition that we can reduce Jesus to a purely human figure and still retain the healing miracles because they are psychologically explainable, cannot be maintained. Nothing that we know yet about psychology justifies us in explaining by its help the cure of leprosy, or the granting of sight to one born blind, or the sudden straightening of a woman who had been "bowed together" for eighteen years. And even if some of the healing miracles are being duplicated to-day by the application of psychological laws, we have still to remember that Jesus lived some two thousand years ago, among a people simple and superstitious, and that his anticipation of modern psychic therapeutics—supposing it to be that—is itself a "miracle" needing to be explained.

But why, instead of so much theorizing about the matter, are we not willing to fall back upon the simple expedient of adopting Jesus' own explanation of his mighty works, namely, that he did them by virtue of a delegated power? He nowhere appears as merely a skilled psychiatrist. As we saw above, he occasionally "staged" a cure, but the general characteristic of his healing ministry is its perfect spontaneity. His miracles, one might say, were "natural" to him. There is nowhere the least hint of the long-drawn-out processes of the modern psychic healer. "He spake, and it was done." Luke says that "the power of the Lord was with him to heal" (517). When critics intimated that the power was from "Beelzebub," Jesus refuted them by the very nature of the case. How could good be done by evil? He declared it was blasphemy to ascribe to Satan what so manifestly was done "by the Spirit of God" (Mt. 1228; Luke in 1120 says, "by the finger of God"). We do well not to fall into a like condemnation by our sedulous efforts to bring all that Jesus did under our own limited naturalistic categories! We admit the force of the naïve logic of the man born blind—that he who had restored his sight must have come "from God" (Jn. 933; cf. 32).

Miracles of the Disciples. The Evangelists report Jesus as having given to his disciples a like power to that which he himself possessed—"authority over unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of disease, and all manner of sickness" (Mt. 101; and in 108 "Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out demons"). Mark, however, limits the power of the disciples to casting out demons (315 67, but cf. the commission in the appendix, 1617, 18). Both Mark (613) and Luke (1017) report the success of the disciples in casting out demons and healing the sick. There is, however, no statement in the Gospels that the disciples raised the dead. That Jesus gave them power for this is, in fact, reported only by Matthew.

Yet there is ample evidence that Jesus did not regard the power to work miracles as the most important part of the disciples' commission. "Howbeit in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rejoice that your names are written in heaven" (Lk. 1020). When the disciples would have called down fire from heaven upon the inhospitable Samaritans, Jesus "rebuked" them for mistaken zeal (Lk. 951-55). It is suggestive that in the three accounts we have of the Last Commission, only the least authentic of them—that in the appendix to Mark (1617, 18)—says anything about performing miracles, and this may be an echo of Lk. 1019. In both Matthew and Luke the emphasis is on "teaching" and "witnessing." Luke, however, gives a significant addition: the disciples are to tarry in Jerusalem until they are "clothed with power from on high" (2449). This is hardly the power they possessed already, but a new power, moral and spiritual, greater than was given them when they first went forth to preach (Mt. 101). It is suggestive that in his list of desirable "gifts," Paul puts miracles and healings in respectively the fourth and fifth places (1 Cor. 1228; cf. 1418, 19).

This implication of the incidental place of miracle in the future work of the disciples is supported by the fourth Gospel, with its great theme of "the abiding presence" (Mt. 2820). Of the thirty-five or more miracles described in the Gospels, John reports only seven. Three of these—walking on the water, feeding the multitude, and healing the centurion's son—are told by others. Four are peculiar to John, namely, the wine at Cana, the impotent man at Bethesda, the man born blind, and the raising of Lazarus (see above), and it is a striking fact that each of these four is susceptible of a symbolic and spiritualistic interpretation. However that may be, John, although he knows that there were plenty of "signs" (see 62 2030), does not emphasize the miracle feature of Christ's ministry. The clue to his attitude is in the reference to "greater works" (14¹²) to be done by the disciples than had been done even by their Lord. This can hardly mean "greater miracles," if we take miracle in the accustomed sense. It must mean, rather, all those triumphs of the disciples in the coming years which would be possible because of the new power that was to recompense the loss of their Lord's bodily presence (Jn. 14, 15, 16).

Miracles in the Acts of the Apostles. Taking as they stand the miracles recorded in Acts, we may classify them as follows: (1) Those which are obviously a continuation of the miracles ascribed to the disciples in the Gospels. (2) Those of which the apostles are themselves the subjects. (3) Those which belong purely in the realm of "spiritual experience"—the "greater works" of Jn. 14¹².

In the first group we include the healing of the lame man at the Gate Beautiful (31⁻¹⁰); the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira (51⁻¹¹); the healing of the palsied Æneas (9³²⁻³⁵); the raising of Dorcas (9³⁶⁻⁴²); the infliction of blindness on Elymas the sorcerer (13⁶⁻¹²); the healing of the cripple at Lystra (14⁸⁻¹⁰); the change wrought in the divining maid at Philippi (16¹⁶⁻¹⁸); and the healing of the father of Publius (28⁸). It should be observed that of the original Twelve only Peter is described as having wrought any of these miracles. James did nothing in Acts 3; Paul was not one of the Twelve; and the Philip of 86, 7 is not the disciple chosen by Jesus, but Philip the "deacon" (6⁵). Another of the deacons also "wrought signs" (6⁸). The miracles just referred to, however, are by no means exhaustive. We may count out the apparent raising of Eutychus on the ground that the fall had not actually killed him—"his life is in him," said Paul (20⁷⁻¹²)—as we may Paul's escape of ill effects from the viper on the ground that there is no clear evidence that the creature was venomous (28³⁻⁶). But we have in Acts what we have in the Gospels—references to a great many miracles of which we have no detailed description. Thus we read that "many wonders and signs were done by the apostles" (24³ 51²): "Sick folk and them that were vexed with unclean spirits" were brought to Peter, that "at least his shadow" might fall on them, and "they were healed every one" (6¹⁵, 16). In the city of Samaria, Philip released the possessed and "healed many that were palsied and that were lame" (8⁶, 7). At Corinth, "God wrought special miracles by the hand of Paul: inasmuch that unto the sick were carried away from his body handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out" (19¹¹, 12). It may be to this that Paul alludes in 2 Cor. 12¹². And after the healing of the father of Publius, "the rest also which had diseases in the island came, and were cured" (28⁹).

Undoubtedly, many of the apostolic miracles are susceptible of a "psychological" explanation, especially those involving the "shadow" and "handkerchiefs." The problem with the lame man at the Gate Beautiful may have been to induce him to do what already he was able to do, except that he either would not do it or did not believe it to be possible. But why should the man's sudden release from the domination of a "fixed idea" not be regarded as "a sign and wonder"? Many find a real difficulty in the story of Ananias and Sapphira. The narrative seems to imply on someone's part an almost brutal severity (cf. pp. 132b, 890). That the guilty pair should be excluded from the Christian community is credible, but not that they should have been "struck dead." For this was a community of brotherly love, and it is hard to believe that a member of it should suddenly have died and forthwith been buried, and that his wife, when she appeared, instead of being gently told of her husband's tragic death, should have been questioned, and so severely rebuked that she also died. This is not in keeping with Christ's counsel for such a case in Mt. 18¹⁵⁻¹⁷, or Paul's in Gal. 6¹. One would like to believe that what we have in this case was originally a moral discipline such as Christ commanded—"Let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican"—which through continued retelling underwent exaggeration. (On the Jewish custom of excommunication, or "casting out of the synagogue," which in severe cases took the form of treating the guilty person "like one dead," see Ederšheim, Life and Times of Jesus, bk. iv, ch. 9, pp. 183, 184.) The raising of Dorcas also presents a problem for many. It is the only detailed description in the N.T. of a disciple performing such a miracle (see above as to Paul and Eutychus). The narrative itself is, however, perfectly explicit. The real difficulty, of course, is with the nature of the fact itself, complicated as it is by being assigned to a purely human instrument. A person might feel that he could believe that Christ raised Lazarus without having to believe that Peter raised Dorcas. It must be largely a question of individual attitude, determined as that will be partly by the philosophical outlook and partly by the evaluation of the evidence. One may render an adverse judgment here, and still be convinced that "wonders and signs" characterized apostolic Christianity.

The second group of apostolic miracles comprise the deliverances from prison—incidents, that is, of which the apostles were themselves the subjects. We have no details as to the first deliverance, not even the names of those who were imprisoned (517-23). We are simply told that "an angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them out." The second imprisonment was of Peter alone, and there is a detailed account of his escape (125-11). In both cases, the instrument of deliverance is said to be an "angel." An angel is ordinarily supposed to be a supernatural being. The original of the word, however, in both Hebrew and Greek, means "messenger," and the supernatural connotation, while ordinarily present, is not invariably so. Thus, in the story of Abraham, the messengers who declared to him God's purpose concerning Sodom are called "men" (Gen. 182, 16) and also "angels" (191, 15), but all their actions are clearly those of human beings. So also in the accounts of the resurrection, Matthew and John say "angels" were there; Mark and Luke say men. It is, therefore, not impossible that the "angel" of the deliverances was a friend of the apostles, connected with the prisons, who was willing to risk his life for their sake. We are to remember that the source of the second account must have been Peter himself, and he was so dazed by what was going on that it was not until he was outside the prison, and alone, that he "came to himself" and then exclaimed, "It must have been an angel" (1211). The escape would be just as much a "sign" to Peter if it were made possible by human means as it would be if the instruments were purely supernatural—perhaps more so, considering the possibilities of detection and failure. Certainly it would be so on Wendland's principle that "striking events, of religious significance for our whole life, we may call miracles" (Miracles and Christianity, p. 163), and that "divine providences" may be likewise designated (p. 170). As to the experience of the apostles at Philippi, there is no suggestion in the record that "the great earthquake" which shook the prison and loosed the chains of Paul and Silas is to be regarded as of supernatural origin (1625f.). All the prisoners were similarly affected (v. 26), and there was no attempt on the part of Paul and Silas to escape. The experience did, indeed, result in the conversion of the jailer and "all his." In that sense it may be included, with the two earlier deliverances, in those "providential happenings" which, to quote Wendland again, befall the believer who has the "assured feeling that round about him are the everlasting arms" (p. 178).

In the third group of apostolic miracles are those "greater works" which involve unusual religious experience. Here we include such events as the descent of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost (21-21); the coincident visions of Cornelius and Peter (101-1118); the appearance of Christ to Saul of Tarsus (91-22); and all those other indications that the life of the young church was the special organ of the Spirit of God.

There are two phases to the Pentecost experience—the coming of the Spirit, and the gift of new speech. From the standpoint of the needs of the Christian cause, the first was much the more important, and it is certainly the more intelligible to us. As it now stands, the account of the differing tongues spoken simultaneously by unlettered men is utterly inexplicable to us. Any attempted explanation of what happened is, of course, open to the charge of rationalism. But we may at least surmise that the foreign-born Jews who were at Jerusalem for the Feast of Pentecost were all familiar with the Greek language, which was then practically universal (see art., Language of N.T., p. 881a); that Peter and the others spoke in Greek in their first outburst of enthusiasm; and that what amazed the listeners was just this fact that men who seemed to be unlettered Galilaean fishermen should discourse eloquently in Greek. The language of Palestine was Aramaic, and Angus, discussing this fact, infers from Acts 2140 and 222 that "even in Jerusalem the people understood Aramaic better than Greek" (Environment of Early Christianity, section in ch. 8 on "Greek in Palestine"), and he quotes Schürer to the effect that "the lower classes in Palestine had only a scant acquaintance with Greek" (p. 217). Inasmuch, however, as Palestine was, after all, though only to a limited extent, bilingual, it was not impossible that the disciples should know Greek. Certainly what happened was not "the gift of tongues" of which we read elsewhere in the N.T., for "tongues" required an interpretation, which was one reason for Paul's low estimate of the gift (1 Cor. 141-19), whereas those who heard the apostles at Pentecost understood what was said. In any event, it remains that the significant aspect of the experience was the empowerment of the apostles. This was "the promise of the Father." This is what made them into flaming evangelists. This is what added the final touch to their conviction, first engendered by the Resurrection, that "this Jesus, whom ye crucified, God hath made both Lord and Christ" (236). And this is the "sign" which may be duplicated in every age, and by which men may be made to hear and understand "the wonderful works of God."

There can be no good reason for not regarding the visions of Cornelius and Peter as true examples of divine leading, not to be brought under a purely naturalistic category, but "due to directly creative divine action" (Wendland, op. cit., p. 15). There was a real danger that Christianity would become a mere sect of Judaism. Cornelius the Gentile was made ready by his vision to become a Christian, and Peter the Jew was made ready by his to receive him. The preparation of both was equally necessary, and their common feeling that it was due to the Divine Spirit is one that any Christian ought to be glad to share. One of the vital tests of modern Christianity is whether it can carry out the spirit of these visions, especially of Peter's.

Similar reflections are justified by the conversion of Paul (Saul of Tarsus), and the method of it. The variations in the four or five accounts are incidental. What is important is that Paul's opposition to Christ was broken down, and Paul attributed this collapse to the direct action of Christ himself. Undoubtedly Paul's conversion had been prepared for. His fiery zeal against "this way" may have been but a cloak for a conviction which first seized him at the martyrdom of Stephen (see Stalker, Life of Paul, ch. 2, closing paragraphs). But Paul never doubted that Christ laid his hand upon him in a supernatural way at Damascus. It was a "sign" wrought by the risen and glorified Lord, and when one considers all that issued from it, no "sign" of the earthly Jesus is more impressive, or more truly illustrative of the action of the divine.

These are simply examples of the presence and activity in the world of a new power, the historical bases of which were the life and work of Jesus of Nazareth. "The Acts of the Apostles" is the story of how Christ through the Spirit entered more and more fully into the life of men. The breaking of the divine into the human is here set forth as historical fact, and the ongoing life of the church is but confirmatory evidence thereof. This fact has still to be faced by those who repudiate the thought of a "transcendent" God who can do a "new" thing in an "orderly" way. It is a "greater work" to remake human characters than to restore withered limbs, and the indubitable fact that Christ does the first makes it credible that he did the second.

The Miracle of Christ Himself. It was said before that Christ is himself a "sign" as much as any of his mighty works. The problem of the miracles of the N.T. is in the end the problem of who and what he was. If one sees in Jesus Christ simply a Galilean peasant of unusual religious insight, then one will naturally question the accounts of his miraculous deeds, except, perhaps, a few of the healings. It will be useless for those who accept this view of Christ to plead that they reject the miracles because of the inadequacy of the evidence—which was Hume's position. It is the thing itself, and not the evidence, which is the real stumbling-block of the skeptic. Miracles simply "do not happen," and that settles it. But if miracles do not happen, then there could not be such a person as Christ is represented to be, for he is himself the supreme miracle, beside which the greatest of his works appears as insignificant. The Christ of the N.T. cannot be explained on a purely naturalistic basis without doing violence not alone to the records but to historical Christian experience. Admit him, and the works ascribed to him take on verisimilitude, for they are just the kind of works that such a person may be expected to accomplish. (See Illingworth, Gospel Miracles, ch. 3.) If in Jesus Christ God made a manifestation of himself such as he has made nowhere else, then we may expect uniqueness of action to go with the uniqueness of personality. "For if," says Illingworth, "a new force entered human nature with the advent of Jesus Christ, we should antecedently expect that it would manifest itself in unfamiliar ways, ways which could not be judged by any criterion drawn merely from our experience of ordinary life" (p. 41). It is difficult to see anything unreasonable in such a statement.

Have we, then, this uniqueness of personality? The question whether we have or not is largely a question of his total significance for mankind's religious needs. That is something not to be settled merely by documentary assertions. It is true that we need the documents to begin with, but in the end they must be supported by personal experience. Did Jesus Christ bring into the world a new sense of God? Did there stream forth from him a new moral power? Did he teach men the secret of a transformed life? Did he make possible a faith in God's love which nothing could disturb? Did he act as a mediator between God and man to bring about their reconciliation? The N.T. says that to do this was why he came, and we have the confirmatory testimony of the intervening ages. He actually does what he is said to have come to do. The fact establishes him as the world's Saviour. The conclusion is irresistible that there is a divine quality to him such as we find in no other man. Granting that divine quality, and all we need for the miracles is sufficient evidence. The deeds of Christ are congruous with his character, his mission, and his religious significance. One who takes this position does not thereby surrender the right of documentary criticism, but his criticism will not be divorced from the main fact, namely, that "God was in Christ."

The Resurrection of Christ. The modern critical theory of the structure of the Gospels makes it impossible to settle the question of the Resurrection solely by the documentary evidence (see art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, p. 867). Precisely what happened during the days that followed the Crucifixion we shall probably never know. The one certain thing is the change—the radical change—that took place in the attitude of the disciples. They account for it by declaring that the Lord whom they had seen crucified and buried had since "appeared" to them, and convinced them that he was victor over even the grave. Is that credible? It is easy enough to make out a case against it by pointing out the discrepancies and inconsistencies in the narratives. In Matthew, Jesus appears to the two Marys near the tomb, and then later to the eleven in Galilee (28³⁻¹⁰, 16). In Mark, he appears to Mary Magdalene, to two disciples walking in the country, and to the eleven, and neither appearance is located (16⁹, 12, 14). In Luke he appears to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, to Peter, and to the eleven, the second and third appearances being in Jerusalem (24¹³⁻³⁶). In John he appears to Mary Magdalene near the tomb, to the disciples (excepting Thomas) the same day in, apparently, Jerusalem, to the eleven (including Thomas) eight days later at an unnamed place, and to seven by the Sea of Tiberias (20¹¹⁻²⁹, 21). There are other differences, e.g., the earthquake (given in Matthew only), the number of angels (Matthew one, John two; Mark one young man, Luke two men), and the number of women who were first at the tomb; and there is the "crudity" (Denney, see above) of the Risen Christ eating. Just what happened, and how, is largely a matter of inference, but unless something had happened, unusual, dramatic, overpowering, it is certain there would have been no Christian religion. "With what body he came"—where the line is which divides the "literal" from the "spiritual" in the narratives—in what sense there were conversations between disciples and Master—by what psychological processes the disciples "saw" the Lord—who shall say? We are moving here in the realm of the supernatural, and human language, forged out of contact with the natural, goes haltingly.

Perhaps we shall find our best clue in Paul. After stating the historic evidence of the Resurrection, Paul adds the significant words: "Last of all, as unto one born out of due time, he appeared to me also" (1 Cor. 15⁸). How did Christ appear to Paul near Damascus? Certainly not under a physical form, yet in such a way as to leave the erstwhile persecutor absolutely certain of the fact that Jesus was Risen and Glorified Lord. In respect of result, the appearance to Paul and to the earlier disciples was identical. It is therefore not impossible that it was also identical in respect of method. And it is still true that the significant thing for Christians at this point is not agreement as to the method, but certainty concerning the fact that Christ was not "holden of death," but still lives and works and forever shall. Such certainty properly involves the supernatural element.

Light on the Apostolic Miracles. This faith in Christ as Risen and Glorified Lord throws some light on the miracles in the Acts. The mighty works of the gospel accounts are made credible by being looked at in the light of Christ's own unique character. The apostolic mighty works may be made credible on the same basis. It is often objected to their authenticity, that they ceased with the apostles. That is true only as we greatly restrict the connotation of the term "miracle." Anyone who knows how quickly the sub-apostolic church settled down into a well-regulated organization is not surprised at the limitations on its power, but even then "the miracles of grace" at least did not cease. And there is more than a suspicion among certain earnest Christians to-day that the loss of the full power of the apostolic commission may yet be remedied. No one will question that it is the business of the church to encourage social and medical and psychological science to the utmost extent. But it is more than possible that its obligation goes even beyond this to the point of demonstrating afresh that there are aspects to reality that cannot be reduced to science, and reserves of power that cannot be tapped by bare reason. It is such aspects to which religion answers, and it is such reserves of power of which prayer and faith are the keys.

Literature: Wendland, Miracles and Christianity; Micklem, Miracles and the New Psychology; Illingworth, The Gospel Miracles; Bruce, The Miraculous Element in the Gospels; Tennant, Miracle and Its Philosophical Presuppositions; Abbot, The Kernel and the Husk; Thompson, Miracles in the N.T. (The last two titles are attempts to eliminate the miraculous and still retain Christianity.) On the Person of Christ, Lewis, Jesus Christ and the Human Quest. On the Resurrection, Shaw, The Resurrection of Christ; Sparrow, Resurrection and Modern Thought; Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, bk. ii, sect. 1.

THE LIFE AND WORK OF PAUL

By PROFESSOR J. VERNON BARTLET

The Possibility of Discovering the Real Paul. There is, it has been observed, no one in the far past who can be so fully known as Paul; and none, save his Master himself, who is so well worth knowing. Both these assertions will sound strange to many to-day. For the real Paul has been so long overlaid by a conventional and artificial view of him that he has lost for most that vivid and intense quality, that closeness to the very heart of human life, which marked him as he moved among his contemporaries. Paul the theologian, difficult to understand and to appreciate, has come to replace Paul the missionary, the daring pioneer of the Christian mission beyond its native Palestine, without whom Christendom would certainly have been other in its history, and less distinctively Christian in its religion than it has been and is to-day. This does not mean that the actual effect of his writings has been in all ways to the good. They were written for the immediate needs of groups of early mission converts, in terms of their own place and time, and they were thereby apt to be misread in later times and other lands, when the original conditions were forgotten. Further, the distinction between their letter and their spirit—a distinction which their author himself thought vital to the religion of Christ—came to be ignored, largely as a result of a certain theory of verbal inspiration, which, as applied to his own letters (wrung from him as they were by special occasions and often written in haste), would have surprised no one more than himself.

This very fact, however, that Paul is known to us mainly through occasional and profoundly personal letters, justifies our statement that he is so knowable only if we read his letters as letters, and not as something else. For letters are the least artificial, the most self-revealing form of writing; they are in terms of the writer's personality; and where that personality is a powerful one, with a wide range of conditions and sensibilities, letters form an unrivaled medium of vivid expression, through which heart can speak to heart across the centuries. So it has been with Paul and countless myriads of readers, in spite of all difficulties; and so it may be again, and more than ever, once we get the right point of view as readers of letters which embody "the life-blood of a noble spirit." Thus read, they reveal for the most part his deepest personal experience and convictions about what matters most for life, as consisting first and last in personal relations, divine and human, and in the values of things seen in that light. Indeed, Paul is now for the first time becoming fully known, and we owe the discovery to the historic sense, and to the ensuing method of approach to all past persons and events which is the great acquisition of the last century, and which enables us to see them as they were seen by contemporaries. Such research has replaced Paul in the light of his actual setting, both in the outward world and in that world of the soul which was, we now find, so different in many of its thought-forms from our own. It is when we realize and allow for this that we can get behind the letter to the abiding spirit of what he taught and was, and may then transpose the essential theme of his message into the setting of our own times and conditions. This is what these pages aim at assisting the reader to do.

I. THE ANTECEDENTS OF PAUL'S GOSPEL

The Gospel of an Historic Jesus. Paul calls himself a bond-servant and missionary (apostle) of Jesus Christ, and ever points beyond himself to Him who has called him and given him his message. And while it is true that he says nothing explicitly about the gospel his Master had proclaimed any more than about the life he had lived in Galilee, this was not because he was unaware of or indifferent to either. He simply saw both in a fresh perspective, as compared with any other witness and missionary of God's Messiah. He looked at them always in the light of their issues, namely, the cross, as that in which their essential meaning was summed up, and the resurrection, which showed God's mind in contrast to man's, touching the work and person of Jesus as Israel's true Messiah, God's regal son, the vicegerent of his own Lordship over men. This meant that the outer, bodily, or merely human aspects of Christ's ministry—his past deeds and words as of a Jew among Jews—profited none save insofar as their inner and spiritual meaning, the very spirit of Christ's personality, reached the soul through the historic facts as media.

But while knowledge "after the flesh" apart from spiritual insight was to him religiously of no value, even touching Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 5:16), there is good evidence that he prized alike the words of Jesus and the stories of his actions, such as are preserved in our synoptic Gospels, but were then current only as oral tradition. For latent in them lay authentic means of insight into the mind of Christ, upon which depended that divine life which for the Christian made all things new (cf. 1 Cor. 7:25 11:23 2 Cor. 10:1—"the meekness and gentleness of Christ"). None the less, the primary and all-inclusive manifestation of God "in the face of Jesus Christ" was the great act of the cross, where the inmost heart of God as gracious to the uttermost, transcending even human sin at its darkest, shone forth with incomparable splendor of self-sacrifice (1 Cor. 11:8, 23-25 15:3 2 Cor. 4:6 5:14, 15). This was the "piercing-point" of the gospel as Paul himself had experience of it and as he was wont to set it forth. Why this was so we shall yet see. But this must not blind us to the fact that it did not appear to him, nor was it proclaimed by him, in isolation from the historic "fact of Christ" as presented in the synoptic Gospels; for the very value of the act on the cross lay in the character and spirit of the Actor who achieved it; and this could not be realized apart from the life he had lived among men and the message touching God which he had himself delivered as his "Good News" in the name of God. But Paul felt "the word of the cross" to be especially his message, as regards emphasis and insight into its full implications, in comparison to that intrusted to his fellow apostles. For it was that which had been directly revealed to him by God, as the means of his own conversion after being his "stumblingblock" (or scandal), lying in the way to faith in Jesus as the Christ of God.

Another reason why Paul, with all his regard for the historic life and teaching of Jesus, makes so little reference to either lies in the very nature of his writings. They are addressed to those who, being already "in Christ," are conversant with the main facts of his ministry and moral teaching, which formed the tradition handed on to converts in close connection with baptism "into Christ." Hence, in letters dealing with special difficulties of theory or practice in this or that local church, it was needful to make only incidental allusion to such part of the tradition as bore on the point in question. And this is just what Paul does. In all things, however, he assumes that his own way of preaching the gospel is in continuity with his Lord's during the earthly ministry, and also in harmony with the form in which the other apostles, who were in Christ before himself, preached what had been intrusted to them by the Spirit of the self-same Lord.

The Gospel of the Older Apostles. Jewish religion in the time of Christ, as in the O.T. generally, rested on the idea of a covenant between God and his people (see art., Religion of Israel, p. 175). This special relation had its origin in a free, unmerited act of God, by which first Abraham and then his seed were chosen from among all mankind. Israel was "holy" or "devoted" to God's will and service in a unique sense; and it was only through his presence with it that "the nations" (the Gentiles) were destined to share the "blessing" which the covenant secured for Abraham's seed. That covenant had been further defined and made more explicit than in Abraham's day, assuming the shape of a code of God-given Law, "the Law of Moses." Under this the Jews now lived as a theocracy, their whole life, both corporate and individual, being regulated and made "holy," or devoted to God's will, by its prescriptions alike of worship and moral conduct; for there was no distinction in theory between ritual and moral "righteousness." Both meant conformity to the Law of the covenant or fundamental religious relation.

Further, for more than a century ere Christ came, a supplementary body of oral "traditions" of "the wise," or professional exponents of the Mosaic Law, had been current and more or less observed as giving fuller security for perfect rightness before God by obedience to his revealed will. Those who especially devoted themselves wholly to such piety, understood as loyalty to the Law, both written and oral (Torah or Divine Instruction generally), were the sect of the Pharisees. By such zeal they believed not only that they were securing for themselves special acceptance with God through personal merits, but also that they were bringing nearer God's final manifestation of his full presence and reign amid his holy People, with enhanced blessings for soul and body—in a word, the Messianic kingdom of God. For Moses himself had foretold that God would raise up a prophet comparable to himself, only greater, through whom the Law of God should become perfectly fulfilled in God's People. This hope had become blended with another, namely, the advent of a perfect King as God's vicegerent in Israel, and, through it, in the whole earth. With this latter conception was associated the promise of God's Messiah or Anointed One. This divinely given Deliverer would bring to an end that alien domination of Rome over God's holy People. This domination was a paradox shocking to Jewish sensibilities, one explicable only as divine judgment on imperfect fidelity to God's Law (see art., Backgrounds, p. 846a).

All these ideas were common to the whole Jewish people when Jesus came into Galilee proclaiming the "Good News" of God in the words, "The time is ripe; the kingdom of God has drawn near; repent and believe in the Good News." The "Good News" was none other than the nearness of God's real kingdom in and through his People, as redeemed by his more manifestly effective power from all its evils, both inward and outward. But the way in which this message was understood was different according to the relative stress laid in various circles upon different elements in the religion just described. The two greatest differences lay in the emphasis laid upon nationalism and on material rather than spiritual welfare, and on the Pharisaic conception of the Law as a means of acquiring religious merit, rather than on the covenant idea of God's attitude of gracious good will toward his People, and of trustful loyalty of heart in response thereto. There were various combinations of these several tendencies; and the coming of Jesus acted as a touchstone between them. Pure nationalists and legalists alike rejected him, fulfilling as he did the prophetic type of religion, a patriotism that was deeply spiritual, and so went down below the level of national exclusiveness to the essential humanity common to men of all races. For it, God and all moral goodness are causally related, and the idea of Heaven's favoritism gave place to that of the universality of divine grace.

Now, not only did Jesus himself proclaim the gospel as God's gracious fulfillment of his covenant relation with Israel, as pictured in Isa. 40-66, in contrast to a nationalism of vengeful and forcible domination over the Gentiles, and to the current Pharisaic ideal of legalism in religion. His personal disciples also, under the lead of the twelve apostles, had since his death caught the essential spirit of that gospel, and embodied it in their corporate life as his new Israel or church, called out from the People as a whole. The degree, however, to which they consciously realized what was involved was at first relatively small, even after the deeper insight into Jesus' fulfillment of the type of righteousness or holiness depicted as marking the Servant of the Lord in Isa. 40-66—above all through suffering, as in Isa. 53, which came to them with the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost. That experience not only meant confirmation of their faith in Jesus; it also brought their thoughts into closer touch with the real thought of Christ than had been the case in the days of his bodily presence with them (cf. Jn. 167).

Yet they were still thinking on traditional lines as regards two points of prime importance, namely, the relation of Messiah's gospel to the Mosaic Law, and the Jewish nation conceived as the exclusive sphere of the kingdom of God. Their Jewish faith, while teaching them to expect Messiah to enable his People to share his own perfect righteousness, had said nothing about his changing its relation to the Law of Moses, either in its ritual or moral form. Nor had Jesus taught anything explicitly about that Law being superseded. True, he had given them a new idea of the divine character, one more like that of a perfect Father than of a just Judge, so that behind all thought of God's justice was seen the purpose of love; and this had made Jesus free to interpret God's will differently in practice from the way in which the Pharisees did when its precepts clashed, as those of any law must, in the letter. Particularly was it so where ritual requirements competed with the law of mercy toward human need, as when he laid it down that the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath—a principle of far-reaching application. In so doing Jesus was acting as a prophet (such as Moses himself had foretold) superior to Moses in authority, with deeper knowledge of the inner purpose and so of the character of God. This, unlike the Pharisees, Jesus' personal disciples had recognized, and largely on that account had come to believe on him as Messiah. But that there was any need to carry further such a process of revision of the Mosaic Law and customs they did not imagine. Hence the beautiful picture of their life in Acts 2-5 is all in terms of devout Judaism, only with a new spirit of joy and love for God and each other, inspired by faith in God's love revealed in the Messiah and his patient love toward God's stiff-necked People, even to the death on the cross.

Thus the original apostolic gospel of God's reconciling love to his sinful People, even after Israel had made clear its unreadiness for his true Kingdom, included no new view of the Mosaic Law as a way of righteousness, or rightness with God. Israel had but to repent of its wrong attitude to God, implied in scornfully rejecting Him who was the incarnation of the Father's very Spirit, and then it would share in the new spirit of loving devotion and power for Christlike beneficence, due to the "Holy Spirit" or inspiration shed forth upon God's "chosen" ones, the true Israel within Israel, the heir of the yet greater blessings soon to be manifested in the fully consummated kingdom of "the coming age." But thus far there was no thought of the Law being superseded by the Person who had become its final interpretation and meaning in spirit, rather than letter, and therefore in truth or inner reality. And yet that Person had in their experience really replaced the Law itself as the medium of revealed relations between God and his People. In other words, Israel, so far as redeemed by Christ from its sins, and by him raised to a new level of covenant relations with God as holy Father, owed its salvation to Christ, a life-saving Person, rather than to the Law of Moses: so that Law could not henceforth be for Christ's People what it had been, especially for Pharisaic Judaism.

All this, however, had come about for the older apostles only in an instinctive and unreflective way, not as a matter of theoretic conviction, applicable to fresh cases of difficulty in practice. Such cases soon arose through the very vitality of the missionary impulse in the soul of the primitive fellowship, the Church of Jesus the Christ. So was it when the Samaritans, whose relation to Israel and its Law was an ambiguous one, began to believe on Jesus as the Prophet to whom Moses—whose five Law books they too acknowledged, as well as Abraham's covenant of circumcision—had pointed forward. Still more was it so when, as Peter preached about Christ to Cornelius and his friends—men who were in no sense incorporated into the People of the covenant by circumcision—the "holy inspiration" by which God's acceptance of men into the Messianic Community was recognized became visible in the case of even such men: "on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 10⁴⁵). Such a fact, for which even Peter had no explanation but God's sheer good pleasure, was an anomaly on the existing principles of the Jerusalem church. To the mind of one Christian only, thus far, was it obvious: that was Paul, the convert from Pharisaism. It was the manner of his approach to the gospel, through his experience as a Pharisee, which made him thus differ from his fellow Christians, and, indeed, in other features of the gospel as he viewed it.

Paul's Conversion. To Jesus, the Law of Moses was only a special form of God's covenant with Abraham on the basis of faith or confiding trust, a form not expressing God's full purpose of grace, but only so much of it as Israel was morally ready to receive at the time it was given through Moses (see Mt. 5²¹ and cf. 198). He read it ever in its spirit, in the light of its most general principles, which he saw in the great precept, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, . . . and thy neighbor as thyself": on these given principles "hang all the Law and the Prophets." Such discrimination of relative values in the Law struck at the legal principle in its use, which assumed that each clause was binding in itself. On this principle Pharisaism rested; and it was a true instinct which had led its sons to feel that it and the prophet of Nazareth could not live side by side. Hence the cross was a judgment between two radically contrasted principles and spirits in religion. For the moment it seemed that Jesus and his gospel of God's character and inner purpose of love, as the standard by which his Law was to be read, were condemned as blasphemous by God's own verdict through the highest authority in his holy People. But when it appeared that God's judgment had really vindicated Jesus, on the apostolic testimony to him as risen; and when the quality of the new life visible in the fellowship based on faith in him seemed to confirm that testimony, the problem of gospel versus Law, in the sense of Pharisaic legalism, pressed urgently for solution.

The simple minds of the disciples of Jesus, who had never been legalists at heart, though deferential to "the wise" or teachers of the Law, and whose consciences had responded instinctively to their Master's attitude toward it in practice, did not feel the problem acutely at first as a matter of theory. It was only when they were confronted by the cases already referred to, when the spirit of the Messianic kingdom was conferred apart from formal acceptance of the Law by circumcision—men being brought by divine act within the covenant simply by faith in Jesus as God's Messiah—that it came home to them practically, and demanded action which meant Yea or Nay to the divine leading manifest in such facts. "Who are we that we should resist God?" were the words in which they yielded to the logic of divine fact; though, as this course of events proved, with tacit reservations greater or less, according to degrees of prior sympathy with legalism in theory.

But it was otherwise with Paul, or Saul, as he is first called in the narrative of Acts. Though born outside Palestine, at Tarsus in Cilicia (northwest of Antioch, the great capital of the Roman province of Syria and Cilicia), and actually a Roman citizen by inheritance from his father, he had been reared in a Pharisaic home, and later was trained as a rabbi at the feet of the famous Gamaliel in Jerusalem. "As touching the righteousness (rectitude) which is in the Law, found blameless," is his own verdict on his life at that time.

But while such was the outer aspect of his state, his inner experience was one of profound dissatisfaction and unrest, owing to conflict between desire and outward conduct. The moving record of this division of soul, impulse, and conscience being at war stands written in Rom. 7 (see the commentary on this passage), a psychological picture not surpassed in power and insight by the similar and longer self-analysis in Augustine's Confessions. The gist of it is this: the divine Law, sounding "Thou shalt not" in his heart when desire prompted him toward indulgence of "the flesh" or sensual principle, in some form or other, brought "sin in the flesh" to conscious light; nay, more, it also aggravated it psychologically, by making more self-conscious sin's rebellion to the Law of God, which the reason of "the inner man" itself recognized and rejoiced in, as "holy" and "good." That was a terrible paradox; but its full misery lay in this, that the Law thereby proved in the sinner's experience not the means of deliverance or salvation which Pharisaism assumed it to be, but, rather, the means of deeper condemnation for his complicity with "the law of sin" in the flesh. That is, the holy Law, which ideally was given by God to be "unto life," did in fact, owing to the pathological condition of man as he is, work unto death. The result, then, of Saul's passionate effort to reach this peace of conscious harmony with God's will by the aid of God's Law was summed up in the despairing cry, "Who shall deliver me" out of this dreadful impasse due to the power of sin in the flesh? And the one answer he found in the end was this: "Thank God, Jesus Christ our Lord." But the struggle through which this was reached was a tragically acute one, both for himself and for the People or Church of Christ.

For Paul was not the sort of man to yield easily, even when he felt the inherited belief on which he stood giving way beneath him. He had leaned the whole weight of his soul's concern for acceptance with God upon the Law; and once he realized it was failing him he no doubt struggled hard to save the situation. It was probably at this point that the church's testimony to Jesus as "Saviour of his people from their sins" struck into the course of his soul's experience. We cannot be sure whether he had himself seen and heard Jesus in the flesh, though there is some reason to think that he had (2 Cor. 5¹⁶ may well imply this, and several modern critical scholars favor the view, e.g., C. A. Scott, in Christianity According to Paul, pp. 11f.). As a Pharisee he would in any case fiercely resent Jesus' attitude toward the Law; and he must have accepted Jesus' condemnation by its guardians as God's judgment on him as a blasphemer. The very form of his death would be to Saul a confirmation of this; for did not the Law declare, "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree"? Hence when the bold argument of Stephen, the cultured Hellenistic Jew, against his fellow Hellenists—some from Saul's synagogue (Acts 6⁹), if not Saul himself—brought him to martyrdom, Saul indirectly participated. Indeed, we can well imagine him finding vent to his own restlessness, due to the Law's effect on himself, in such zeal against one who treated it as only a transient phase of God's progressive dealings with his People—one who declared the time to be near when God should dwell with his People in another and more real way than in the Temple made with men's hands, with which much of the Law was bound up.

But if so, his zeal brought the young Pharisee no relief: rather, the memory of Stephen's peaceful death in the spirit of his Master did but add to the impression produced on his subconsciousness by the joyous and loving life of the fellowship of Jesus' disciples. Hence he plunged yet deeper into repressive acts against those who impugned the immutability of the Law given through Moses; for how could divine Law be other than absolute and final to the last jot and tittle? This assumption, that no relative element can exist in anything that has had divine sanction, excluding though it does room for the progressive revealing action by the Holy Spirit, as Stephen urged once for all, must be duly noted as that which underlay Paul's action. Paul's error, as he found it to be on this point, and an abiding problem in the philosophy of religion, may remind us from the first of the universal interest of his religious development. On the road to Damascus he was in fact agitated by the problem touching Jesus and the Law, as alternative forms of God's self-revelation. This was involved in Jesus' claim to be, after all, in spite of the cross, God's Messianic Son. Certain elements in Jesus' teaching and character as forced on Saul's attention by the confirmatory fact of the life of his followers, based on faith in him as approved of God by restoration to personal activity after death, kept plying his soul with pricks of conscience. This seems implied by the words, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the goad"—like an ox against the guiding hand of its master (Acts 26¹⁴).

With Paul too, as with the older apostles, the solution came by the logic of facts in the first instance: the knot was cut by the sword of the Spirit, rather than untied. The Lordship of Jesus as verily God's Messiah was brought home to his immediate spiritual intuition in a way that virtually settled this issue between two alternative forms of God's self-revelation, along with other vital issues then preoccupying his soul. By an experience, the outer and temporary form of which cannot and need not be defined, "it pleased God to reveal his Son" in the earnest and sincere Pharisee, with a self-evidence which he could never thereafter doubt. Jesus was seen on his own merits as "Son of God," the image with human form of the invisible God, and for that reason as possessed of an absolute spiritual authority over the conscience. So his filial type of devotion to the heavenly Father was the very essence of real obedience—that of the undivided will of the inner man—and became the standard by which the legal type of obedience, which did not unite the heart in complete loyalty, must be judged, not vice versa. In a word, Jesus' holiness was one in the spirit, even when not in the letter also; and he himself was the inspirer of the similar free loyalty in others, as a "life-giving spirit" (2 Cor. 36. 17 1 Cor. 1545).

II. PAUL'S GOSPEL

The Law and Christ Crucified. Such being Paul's line of approach to Jesus as the Christ, two things from the first marked his special apprehension of the gospel: a clear sense that it superseded the Law in principle, and, as bound up with this, a new emphasis on the cross. Hitherto, the cross had been regarded simply as due to Israel's sinful unreadiness to accept such a Messiah as Jesus, and as the means of bringing it to heartfelt repentance on this issue, and so to forgiveness of sins. But Paul saw it to have also a deeper meaning in relation to the kind of righteousness which was truly well-pleasing to God. Such righteousness was non-legal in quality, resting on a right attitude of soul toward God—the filial one—and not on merit acquired by human effort or "works," i.e., obedience to specific precepts. It was "the righteousness of God" as provided by God's grace in the gift of his Son and appropriated by the pure receptivity of faith, as personal trust or reliance upon God's grace in him. Such faith was akin to that of Abraham. By it he became "friend of God" and the recipient of the covenant of faith, to which the Law was added only later, in consequence of Israel's unreadiness to live on the level of its forefathers' more personal type of religion. "The righteousness in Christ" (i.e., union with Christ), as distinct from that in the Law of Moses, was thus continuous in principle with that enjoyed by Abraham.

What, then, of the authority of the Law? And how was transition from its jurisdiction, now seen to be an episode in the divine dispensation or plan for training the People of God, to come about without the Law seeming to be set aside arbitrarily or to be belittled even in its divine aspect? That the Law in its Mosaic or legal form as "letter" commanding from outside, rather than as "spirit" or internal inspiration to the will, had in fact proved unable to "make righteous," Paul himself had proved by his own experience. Only spiritual union with Christ had availed to free him "from the law of sin" working "in the flesh." "For what the Law could not do, in that it was weak (ineffective) through the flesh, God, sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as an offering for sin (or to deal with sin), condemned sin in the flesh: that the ordinance (or righteous intent) of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk . . . after the Spirit" (Rom. 83. 4). Such was Paul's joyous experience of the fact that Christ had proved strong where the Law had proved weak, namely, in bringing sin's usurping power to the judgment of death in his own person, in that he on the cross "died once for all to sin," and so proved its sway to be an illegitimate one (Rom. 67. 10). As a result, it was possible for those united with Christ as Lord to share his death to sin, which was practically one with its death as lord over the human will (Rom. 611).

But Paul goes further than this. He relates Christ's cross to the Law, not only along this line of profound religious experience, or moral mysticism, but also along another, in which it has been and is harder for most to follow his thought. To him, however, there was a link between the two, in the fact that the Law in one aspect, namely, its human or psychological effect, is closely bound up with the very quality of sin as conscious, and so the more sinful, being now rebellion against the will of God (Rom. 771.). That being so, it is needful in a sense to "die unto the Law" also—as having legal claims on one—by union with Christ, in order to be joined to him in his new life not only of freedom from sin's power to tempt into further sin toward God (Rom. 74-6; cf. 610f.), but also of emancipation from the realm of Law altogether, as the form in which God's will is done. "For I through the Law," writes Paul (Gal. 210f.), "died unto the Law, that I might live unto God"—on a new plane of motive and with a new type of obedience, i.e., the filial. "I have been crucified with Christ [unto the Law]; yet I live [unto God]; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me: and that life which I now live in the flesh [here on earth] I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself up for me"—and in so doing has inspired the believers with a new principle of obedience, namely, love as the motive power by which faith takes effect (Gal. 56). "For the whole Law is fulfilled in one word (or end), even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Gal. 5¹⁴).

The Christian Salvation and the Saviour. Here we have in germ Paul's whole gospel, which in emphasis and idea is a message of salvation, i.e., the making of life what it has in it, according to God's creative intention, to become ("life that is life indeed"). To this full positive idea, redemption and reconciliation are relative (see C. A. Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul, ch. 2); of these two, redemption is the more comprehensive, expressing the process by which all that stands between the soul and its inheritance of joint life with God, "eternal life," is done away with. Its first stage, sometimes called broadly and prophetically "redemption," is on its objective side Christ's worth par excellence. It roots in the cross, for redemption is "by his blood" (life poured forth in sacrifice for others). On its subjective side, it is reconciliation. Reconciliation is primarily of men to God, since God himself takes the initiative in giving his Son to produce this effect in men (2 Cor. 5^{19f}. Rom. 5¹⁰); yet, of course, there is a sense in which this actual relation of God to a man is affected for the time by the man's attitude toward him. A synonym for this first stage, in terms of righteousness as "rightness" with God, is justification, or God's own declaration that a man is in a right relation or attitude to himself by faith (of the type of Abraham's). This for Paul is fundamental and contains in germ, in promise, and potency all that follows in the unfolding experiences of redemption, to wit, sanctification and redemption (i.e., of the body; see 1 Cor. 13⁰ Rom. 8²³; cf. 8¹¹). Thus, justification contains sanctification implicitly; and sanctification means the progressively full realization in moral act and habit of the religious relation once for all assumed in justification, namely, the filial and Christ-centered, instead of the self-centered attitude, to which corresponds adoption on the part of God.

The Sphere of Salvation: the Church. We have seen how intimately related to his experience of the need and fact of salvation was Paul's view of Jesus as God's appointed Saviour. How, then, did he interpret to himself, and set forth for others, the nature of Christ's saving personality? Acts tells us that after his conversion Paul forthwith proclaimed in the synagogues at Damascus Jesus' divine Sonship, as revealed in his own experience (Gal. 1¹⁶). Jesus had done for the ex-Pharisee what bitter failure had taught him that no thing—not even God's Law—could do, but only the personal intervention of God in revealed form, namely, in one who could manifest God's grace in saving power, because he himself shared God's very nature. Jesus, then, the absolutely Spirit-anointed of God, was God's Son in the fullest and most absolute sense possible, consistently with the unity and ultimate sovereignty of God—which Paul, as a loyal Hebrew, always reserved for God the Father (see C. A. Scott, op. cit., pp. 270–279) as distinct even from the "one Lord" of men, Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 8^{5f}). "All that God had been expected or could be expected to do for man in the field of man's spiritual or moral experience had been done by Christ" (ibid., p. 278). Thus he was in the sphere of salvation, the specifically religious sphere, practically equivalent to God. It was in Jesus, as his vicegerent, that "God had wrought salvation for his People" in the absolute and final sense, and so had completely revealed himself "in the face of Jesus Christ." This was the personal form of "the Glory" (Shekinah), whereby in the O.T. theophanies God had appeared to men. All this Paul meant to express by calling Jesus the Son of God, one who stood to God in a uniquely close relation, as of a perfect Son to a Father whose nature and will he shared: and this relation Paul carried back into the pre-temporal order, ere the creation of the world.

In so thinking, Paul probably used certain conceptions in the rabbinic theology in which he had been trained, conceptions in which it was natural that he should see a new meaning in the light of his fresh experience in Christ. It is thus that we can best account for the fact that he nowhere explains or tries to establish such categories as he applies to Jesus, but takes them for granted, arguing that it is to him alone that they of right belong on his own merits, as he had lived and worked among men. Among such categories was the "Wisdom" of God, already described in personalized fashion in Prov. 8, which seems by Paul's day to have been identified with "the Image," or the self-expression in a form apprehensible to finite beings, of the invisible God, according to the largely symbolic story of man's creation in Gen. 1 (cf. Col. 1¹⁵⁻¹⁷). Such is surely the general impression produced by the passage in Phil. 2⁵⁻¹¹ (see notes), where Paul sets forth Christ as one who had originally stooped from a state in which he was "in the form of God"—a being to be classed with God as divine—to assume man's estate as one of relative self-humbling. But it was just because he had so acted, instead of ambitiously grasping by direct means at "equality with God" in outward glory, that God has "yet further exalted him" (i.e., beyond the former state) so as to give him as a free gift the Name that is above every name, that of universal Lordship, such as belongs to God the Father himself by his very nature. Yet this enhancement of the Son's pre-incarnate glory, gained as it was through such filial devotion to the sovereign Father's will, redounded also to that Father's greater glory (Phil. 29-31). This is a soaring speculation, but one rooted in profound insight into the nature of moral greatness, the glory of service in love, or the principle of noblesse oblige; it involves a distinctively Christian conception of greatness, which has changed the human moral standard for the noblest members of our race (see Mk. 10³⁵⁻⁴⁵). We have yet to see how in his own person and subsequent career Paul, the bond-servant, exemplified the supreme principle of self-forgetful love and service which had shone so bright in the Lord who had won his passionate allegiance. But before turning to this topic, we must describe yet another aspect of Paul's gospel which largely inspired his untiring ministry.

Thus far we have viewed Paul's gospel of salvation chiefly in its individual aspect, because that was the side on which it first found him and transformed him from foe to apostle. But while intensely individual in experience, as befitted this apostle of personality in contrast to law, his gospel was, in fact, nobly universal and corporate in its range, a message of fellowship in love. This comes out strikingly in the glorious psalm of love in 1 Cor. 13, which is strangely overlooked by those who regard Paul as the partisan of faith as compared with love. There is little doubt that Paul, who speaks with such contrition for having blindly persecuted the Church of God, had from the first been deeply impressed by the life of the church, the temple of God's Messiah, with its intense fellowship in brotherly love. Once, then, he had tasted its life within, as the very grace of Christ, as well as the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit of adoption shed abroad in it, it was he above all others who expounded the idea of the church in all its fullness of meaning, as the fulfillment of God's purpose of boundless good will toward mankind, brought out on a plan or "mystery" of surpassing wisdom. In so doing he sketches the first real philosophy of history, in virtue of his experience of standing at the very heart of things. He is united to God, the Creator of all, in Christ, his revealed mind (cf. 1 Cor. 1, 2, espec. 26, 11, 16 Rom. 11³³ Eph. 13-14 31). It was he who conceived and developed with great richness of application the idea of the church as the body of Christ, i.e., a social organism of persons unified by one animating spirit and directing mind, pictured as centered in its head, Christ its Lord. This unity of life he speaks of with wondering awe as the supreme "mystery," of which the unity of human marriage is another type (Eph. 523-32). And the unity is so intimate and reciprocal that the whole organism, made up of head and members, he even terms "the Christ" (1 Cor. 12¹²). It has, i.e., one principle of life, the divine Spirit, concentrated in the Head and flowing from him to all his members. "For in one Spirit were we all baptized into one body . . . and were all made to drink of one Spirit." It is, we observe, in closest connection with the church and its supernatural or truly divine life that Paul develops his thought about the Spirit of God, now revealed in new and fuller form as the Spirit of Christ. It is the source of the fresh grace—(gifts or charisms)—which mark the Church of Christ, as distinct from that of Moses "in the wilderness," and which was the basis of the organization of those ministerial functions, in the widest sense, by which it edifies or builds itself up in love under the headship of Christ. It is that Spirit which constitutes the spiritual body one in a more marvelous way than even the animal body, which is its visible analogy. Nay the personal Head, Jesus Christ, is himself not complete in his Christship, his life-giving function, until his potential fullness has found realized expression in the corporate life of the new humanity, the church, which is thus the complement alike of his nature and his historical experiences, particularly his saving sufferings (Eph. 122^f. 320^f. Col. 124 Phil. 310). In this noble and profoundly ethical mysticism—for it is the basis of his most practical exhortations to Christ-like living—we have the explanation of Paul's teaching on Christ as the Spirit or life-saving principle of the new form of the covenant, as distinct from the old form as Law or "letters," and of the new form of God's People as Christ's church or body. Jesus as the second Adam, "heavenly" or spiritual in nature, causes men to share his own Spirit-nature; and in the power of that dynamic inspiration enables them to will and to do after God's good-pleasure (Phil. 212^f). In "working out" or realizing the potential energy of the germ of salvation, as the Christ-life implanted in them by faith, or union with him as Head, they are but giving free course to the "mind" or Spirit of Christ (Phil. 25), which is "working in" the body and its members to ever fuller unfolding of its transforming possibilities of Christly character—"the fruit of the Spirit" (2 Cor. 317f. Rom. 121f. Gal. 516-24 Phil. 48f.). Here we have too the ground of Paul's wonderful hopefulness touching moral transformation in all those once really united to Christ in the Spirit. When actual persistence of habits and "fruits of the flesh" confronted him in his converts, as they often did in ways which to-day, amid standards of a Christian tradition of living, would awaken doubt as to those indulging them ever having been in Christ, Paul simply calls on them to awake to the inconsistency of their actions with the underlying impulse and trend of their soul as united to the Head, made "one spirit" with the Lord (1 Cor. 69-11 1719f. Gal. 513 66f.). He never doubts but that, with the aid of the other members of the Body (Gal. 61f.), the ailing member will be made whole again, or "saved" into healthful life by the power of Christ.

III. PAUL'S MISSIONARY ACTIVITIES AND HIS WRITINGS

Early Preparation. After the first days of enthusiastic proclamation to his Jewish compatriots at Damascus of the new light from heaven that had smitten so suddenly and transformingly on his spiritual vision, it seems that Paul—like his Master himself after his baptismal experience—felt the need of retirement into solitude, in order to ponder and assimilate more deeply the full meaning and practical implications of that divinely given vision. Christ had laid hold on him; but Paul had not yet adequately apprehended "the fact of Christ" and the range of the gospel. Indeed, Paul's whole life was to be a moral and mental "growing up in him" (Phil. 312 Eph. 117f. 316-21 415). So he "went away into Arabia" for meditation, and he returned to Damascus to resume his public testimony to Christ and his salvation (Gal. 117), with added power (Acts 922). This stirred up such resentment among the Jews that he had to flee for his life; and thereupon he seized the chance of going to Jerusalem to visit Peter, doubtless to learn more of the historic facts of Jesus' life and teaching. But again Jewish resentment, this time on the part of "Hellenists" like himself, as formerly in the case of Stephen, drove him ere long from the hearth alike of Judaism and the church (Gal. 118 Acts 926). And now he sought his native

Tarsus. There, and in the northern part of the Roman province of Syria-Cilicia, he carried on an apostolate of some ten years, a period often forgotten, but one which no doubt had a great influence in shaping and confirming his distinctive gospel by the lessons of experience, to which Paul, like the other apostles, gave due heed as to the leading of the Spirit working in and through them. Hence when Barnabas, who had already befriended him in Jerusalem (Acts 927), came to seek his assistance in the new mission which had arisen at Antioch, beyond the Holy Land altogether, through the spontaneous preaching of certain Hellenists of Stephen's type, and was now under Barnabas' supervision, Paul was fully mature in his principles and practice and prepared to co-operate (Acts 131f.).

First Missionary Journey: Admission of Gentiles. Into the exact sequence of Paul's activities, and of his relations with the older apostles in connection with his liberal views as regards the admission of non-Jews into the Church of Christ on equal terms with Jews, apart from circumcision—hitherto regarded as the condition of full standing within God's covenant—it is hardly needful here to enter. (See Hort, Judaistic Christianity, for an account of each of Paul's Epistles in its historic setting, particularly as regards Jewish Law and Christian gospel.) But the opinion may be expressed in passing, that Paul had already taken steps to safeguard his distinctive gospel against misunderstanding in the apostolic circle itself; and so against any danger of hindrance from that quarter (Gal. 211), even before he and Barnabas went on their great pioneering journey beyond Syria-Cilicia, first to Cyprus and then to the cities of South Galatia. But the agreement reached in private between them and the "pillars" of the mother church—Peter and John, along with James the Lord's brother, the permanent head of the local community—which meant a division of spheres of work, "the circumcision" and the Gentiles respectively (Gal. 22-10)—this agreement was not as yet publicly recognized by the generally conservative Jerusalem church. Thus even before the first missionary journey of Paul and Barnabas, as it seems, a difficulty arose in the relations of the two branches of the church, the Jewish and the Gentile, on the border-line question of intercourse at meals. This was an issue akin to that raised by caste in India, between those ritually "clean" and "unclean" or "untouchable," and became, a burning one, owing to the coming to Antioch of certain "from James" (Gal. 212). These brought the public opinion of the Jerusalem church to bear on the consciences of the local Jewish Christians and caused even Peter, then on a visit to Antioch, and after him Barnabas too, to change their more liberal practices of teaching Gentile believers as full brethren in Christ in the matter of table fellowship. It was a matter on which Jewish tradition and feeling were strong; and no doubt Peter and Barnabas felt it expedient to defer to Jerusalem feeling when the issue of habitual practice (in contrast to such an exceptional case as that in Acts 10¹-11¹⁷) was thus raised. But Paul stood firm as a rock and exposed the inconsistency of the line taken (Gal. 2¹¹-21). Most scholars, indeed, think this happened after the public concordat at Jerusalem in Acts 15, after the issues of the Gentiles' standing in the church and their intercourse with Jewish Christians had been explicitly dealt with. But this seems less likely, especially in view of Barnabas' action.

Second Missionary Journey. After that concordat, which referred primarily to Antioch and Syria-Cilicia, had been reached, Paul began his second missionary journey. He seems to have had Ephesus, the capital of the Roman province of Syria, already in view as a new advanced base for yet more world-wide missionary work. But after revisiting his converts in South Galatia, and in his zeal for unity in Christ's one church between those whom "the middle wall of partition," "the law of ordinances," had once divided, he was diverted by divine intimation to the road leading northwest toward Europe (Acts 16⁶-10). This was the foundation of churches in Philippi and Thessalonica in Macedonia; and his relations to the latter gave rise to the earliest of his extant pastoral letters, written from Corinth in the winter following (51-52 A.D.). These letters are simple applications of his gospel to certain practical problems which had arisen for his inexperienced converts in his own enforced absence, due partly to their belief that their Lord might return at any moment, so that some even neglected working for their daily bread; and partly to unenlightened views of conduct, especially in sexual purity, not befitting love to a holy heavenly Father and to men and women as his children.

Epistle to Galatians. To this same stay of eighteen months at Corinth may be assigned the circular letter to the Galatian churches. Judaizing Christians from outside, probably from Jerusalem, were undermining the loyalty of these churches to Paul's gospel of spiritual freedom from the Law through all-inclusive faith and obedience directed to Christ and his new law of love, under the inspiration of his Spirit in their hearts. The ostensible plea seems to have been that such was well enough to begin with, but that obedience to the Law, and the rite of circumcision as sign of incorporation into the People of the Law, were needful to a mature and normal Christianity (Gal. 3³). This virtually challenged Paul's form of gospel and so his apostolic authority, which the interlopers represented as derived from the older apostles, not co-ordinate with theirs. What added to Paul's indignation at this challenge was its speciousness, and its using against him his very magnanimity in commending the concordat—as though it meant his owning to a human authority over his gospel—and in circumcising Timothy, a half-Jew by birth; whereas, in fact, he had done it for the sake of the Jews whom his mission might bring him, lest they should say that Paul forbade the national covenant sign even to born Jews (Acts 16¹-3). Such disingenuous features of the attack explain the vehemence of his tone in this burning apology for his apostolate and sincerity all along. In it we have alike typical Jewish lines of argument to meet Jewish minds (Gal. 3¹⁰-22 42¹-31), hammer-like blows of appeal to sheer spiritual facts (3¹-5), and solemn asseverations of the authority of his gospel and his consistency in applying it in different circumstances (11-10 51-4, 11¹.). Running through all, too, is an affectionate, fatherly tone of yearning concern for the loyalty of his children to the gospel and to him as its direct witness. The appeal covers the whole gamut of human emotions. It shows the rich humanity of Paul, when we take the pains to read between the lines of the allusive, broken, and often ejaculatory pleading of what is emphatically a letter, in its changing but always personal modes of address. It reveals its writer, on certain sides, more than aught else.

Epistles to Corinthians. In Paul's next extant letters, those to the church at Corinth some four years later (56 A.D.), we meet, besides challenge of Paul's full apostolic authority stirred up by Judaizing interlopers, a whole range of new problems due to the non-Jewish and typically Greek mentality of a large section of the local converts. "The Greeks," says Paul, "seek after wisdom," in the sense of philosophy as the rationally understood; such was the main source of dissatisfaction with and deviation from Paul's own way of presenting the gospel at Corinth. Some who so felt contrasted with it the more idealistic way in which even Apollos, whom Paul generously recognizes as fellow worker, had followed in Paul's footsteps in the interval, using his Alexandrine culture of the Philonic type in his exposition of the same message which Paul had put more bluntly to the conscience, with its sense of moral failure and guilt, in terms of "Christ and him crucified" as the sum of personal salvation. Others, however, prided themselves on having struck out a fresh line of "wisdom" or superior insight (gnosis) into the true doctrine of Christ, which cut it away altogether from the moral genius of biblical religion. Stressing its intellectual suggestions, they threw it into a different perspective altogether, making it an ideology with little or no reference to the realism of the will and moral personality, in a world where the intimate relations of body and spirit must be harmonized and not ignored. This attitude led to egoistic individualism, divorced from love as the ruling principle of the gospel. Against it, as well as other abuses of the experiences and doctrine of the free Spirit of God, as the source of all spiritual gifts, Paul uttered his sublime prophetic outburst on love as the supreme spiritual reality, gathering up with itself its sister graces of faith and hope, and abiding throughout all partial and passing forms of human "knowledge" of things divine. "Knowledge puffeth up; love buildeth up," in the sphere of moral personality—the final reality in God or man.

Paul's Use of Terms. In expounding his thought to converts wont to use a terminology rather different from his own in its association and shades of meaning, Paul, with the tact of a great missionary, adopted certain words and phrases current among those to whom he wrote; and there are some who think that he took over also the special religious conceptions which they expressed in Hellenistic religion, particularly in the realm of sacramental ideas. Others, on the other hand, believe with the present writer that Paul, who held firmly that biblical religion had nothing to learn from the worship of "demons," adopted no positive conceptions, as distinct from illustrations, from such a source. (See C. A. Scott, op. cit., pp. 122-135, for a careful discussion of this whole matter.) Be this as it may, we shall find in his letters henceforth constant reminders of the problems of adaptation to the forms of a new and largely non-Jewish world of thought and training—problems which every missionary to-day, especially amid ancient civilizations like those of India and China, has to face and solve.

Epistle to Romans. The second of Paul's letters to Corinth is full of passages revealing the very heart of the man, in his profound and sensitive humanity, and of his personal religion. But we must hasten on to the last of the letters of his first period of missionary work as known to us, that in which he was engaged mainly in vindicating the gospel as God's final message for man as man, against all who would make it an appanage of Judaism and of religion as divine law. The Epistle to the Romans, written to a church with which he had had no personal relations, is not so much a letter as a comprehensive manifesto of his gospel in various relations. It is meant at once for Jew and Gentile, setting forth Paul's thought in broad outline, and striving particularly to justify God's providential dealings with both in history, on the basis of the sovereign freedom of divine grace, in his successive dispensations or methods of treating man in bulk rather than individually. Overlooking this fact has led to much misreading of its teaching on predestination and election, with grievous results for Christian doctrine. It embraces, however, almost every aspect of Paul's theology and religion in a wonderful synthesis, throwing light both backward and forward over the whole of his teaching. It illustrates too, by its very structure, the way in which he was wont to apply his theology to daily conduct, and to root even the most practical details of the latter in the former as inspiration and source of motive power. We have already noted how he deals with moral inconsistency in the daily "walk" of Christians, not by falling back on the legal principle for help, but by calling upon them to think again and realize their essential standing as united by faith with Christ himself, in the holy freedom from sin's thralldom, achieved by virtue of his Spirit's power working within. But in a central section of this Epistle (chs. 6-8), he sets forth the theory of this experience of personal unity between Christ and his members, in a way which shows that his profound moral mysticism had not been grasped in certain quarters, and that his doctrine of justification and sanctification as alike by faith (in Paul's sense of the word) had been travestied into a condoning of moral laxity, later known as antinomianism.

IV. LAST THINGS

Closing Experiences. Between this Epistle written to Rome and the second main group, written from Rome after an interval of some three years, came a series of dramatic experiences, illustrative of Paul's greatness of soul. His last visit to Jerusalem (57 A.D.), in the interests especially of cementing the unity in the one Church of Christ between Jew and Gentile by practical proof of love on the part of the latter in the form of relief for "the poor saints" at Jerusalem; his arrest through the enmity of Jews from Asia; his trials before Roman courts and detention in prison at Cæsarea; his appeal to the Supreme Court at Rome, and his heroic bearing on the voyage thither (all described in Acts 21¹⁵-27⁴⁴)—all these had no little effect upon the perspective in which he now looked out upon the world, and upon the gospel as God's plan of salvation for meeting its needs, alike in their diversity and essential oneness.

Epistles to Colossians and Philemon. As illustrating the sort of mental diversity through which men of varying traditions interpreted the salvation of which they had tasted in Christ, we have the letter to the Colossians, who lived on the border of the province of Asia, where ascetic scruples as to foods in relation to religious purity, and also belief in a hierarchy of angels able to obstruct free access to God even through Christ, possessed certain souls with nervous fears alien to the "liberty of the children of God." This gave occasion to Paul to unfold his high theory of the person of Christ and of his all-sufficiency more fully than before; while the beautiful personal note to a member of this church, Philemon, illustrates alike its writer's Christian courtesy and his wise handling of a pressing point in Christian ethics, namely, the all-pervasive fact of slavery, viewed in terms of actual conditions. For the lot of the church was obviously a difficult one. It found itself in the midst of social institutions which could not abruptly be denounced without precipitating a conflict on what was, after all, only a secondary issue—secondary because the world was not expected to continue in its existing order, but was to be suddenly transformed by the return of Christ.

Epistle to Ephesians. Closely related, in time and outlook, to Colossians was the second of Paul's great manifestos on his gospel generally, an open letter to all his churches in the province of Asia, known to us as Ephesians (named from the copy preserved in the church of Ephesus; see notes on Eph. 1¹; cf. p. 855b), and referred to in Col. 4¹⁶ as that which was to be passed on to them after being read by the neighboring church of Laodicea. Its theme is the universality in idea of the church as the body of Christ, and its transcendent destiny, namely, humanity as made new and filled with the divine fullness of God latent in its Head, Jesus Christ (11-10 31⁴-21). In it all artificial barriers of race and condition of sex are in principle done away, though the fruits of this can be realized only by a moral process of growing up into the Head in all things, as provided by divine gifts of ministry and self-edification through the Spirit (41-16); and this forms the incentive for zealous pressing on in the path of a Christly "walk" (41⁷).

Pastoral Epistles: 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus. And now we are nearing the end alike of Paul's earthly life and his vision of human salvation. The so-called Pastoral Epistles to Timothy and Titus add little to our impression of Paul's personality and work. The present writer still inclines to the view expressed by him elsewhere (see the art., "Paul," in the eleventh edition of The Encyclopedia Britannica), that they are genuine as a whole, and not only in a few fragments (incorporated from minor personal notes to Timothy, in 2 Tim. 4 in particular; see intro. to the Pastorals, p. 1275). On that assumption they show Paul continuing the correction of erroneous semi-Jewish, semi-ascetic fancies (as in Colossians), especially the denial of any kind of resurrection body, a denial due to a dualistic prejudice against matter as such. Against such claims to superior "knowledge" he sets a truly religious life of love, on the lines of the pattern of "wholesome" moral instruction already given in his own teaching and example.

Epistle to Philippians. But whatever view we take of Paul's relation to the Pastoral Epistles, the swan-song of his spirit is the intensely personal and spiritually gallant letter to his loved church at Philippi, the first fruits of his mission to Europe. "Rejoice in the Lord always": such is its note. He has but slight hope, humanly speaking, apart from what he feels may be best for his converts (122-24) of escaping "the lion's mouth" for long, so far as concerns his earthly life (cf. 2 Tim. 4⁶⁻⁸, 16-18): but what of that? He will only be the sooner with Christ, in more immediate fellowship, which is "far better." He feels himself in the act of being "offered as a libation" (21⁷; see mg. for the Greek) upon the sacrifice and service of his converts' faith; and the thought gives him joy, which he calls on them to share and not to cast down (21⁸; cf. 2 Tim. 4⁶). And so he passes from our view, a victim of Jewish enmity using Nero's appeal court as its tool. He died probably by beheading, as was his right as a Roman citizen, rather than by a more ignominious death such as befell Peter and many more a year or so later in 64 A.D., when they were made scapegoats for the public suspicions as to the source of a great fire in Rome that summer. Truly a triumphant end to a career of constant triumph in the train of Christ his Lord (2 Cor. 21⁴).

And what was the end of human history as Paul saw it stretching away into the mists that envelop all human knowledge of things in space and time? Sooner or later this: the kingdom of God fully realized among men, when the divine life, eternal in quality in the Redeemer and his Father, shall have cast out death and replaced it in all its forms. Then shall the vice-regency of Christ, the Son, be merged in the sole all-inclusive sway of the sovereign Father, "that God may be all in all" (1 Cor. 15²⁴⁻²⁸).

(For further discussion of Paul and his work and teaching, see the commentary on Acts and the introductions to the various letters of Paul in the present volume.)

Literature: Stalker, Life of St. Paul; Sabatier, The Apostle Paul (Eng. trans., 1891); A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity; G. B. Stevens, The Pauline Theology; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveler and the Roman Citizen (1896; marking a new epoch of historic realism in the study of Paul as a man in his actual environment); Deissmann, Paul (Eng. trans., 1912; new edition, 1927); Schweitzer, Paul and His Interpreters (Eng. trans.); Peabody, The Apostle Paul and the Modern World; C. H. Dodd, The Meaning of Paul for To-day (1923; one of the best of the recent brief studies); D. M. Ross, The Spiritual Genius of St. Paul; Glover, Paul of Tarsus; C. Anderson Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul (1927; exceedingly valuable); D. A. Hayes, Paul and His Writings; Foakes-Jackson, The Life of St. Paul.

THE NEW TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE

BY PROFESSOR EDWIN LEWIS

Doctrine and Dogma, and Their Use. Christian doctrine may be defined as that body of truth concerning God and man and their relations in Jesus Christ by the acceptance of which men make possible for themselves the life and experience recorded in the N.T. Christian dogma is the form in which a real or an alleged Christian doctrine is cast by a given ecclesiastical organization, which then requires the membership to accept the form. Some dogmas grow obviously out of doctrine, and are practically universal among Christian men, e.g., the Nicene and Chalcedonian dogma of the twofold nature of Christ. Other dogmas are indirect and inferential, and are not of universal acceptance, e.g., the Roman Catholic dogma of transubstantiation of the bread and wine in the mass, and the Calvinistic dogma of predestination by God's sovereign will.

The precondition of Christian experience is a knowledge of certain truths. That is why doctrine is necessary. A non-doctrinal Christianity is an impossibility. But Christianity is committed to a world-wide conquest; and that is why dogma is necessary. Truths must be spread in order that life may be engendered, and truth is spread more effectively in the degree in which it can be cast into precise forms (laying aside, for the time being, the power of personal testimony). Moreover, Christianity involves a certain view of the world and a certain philosophy of life, and it finds itself in conflict with other world-views of a radically different character. In opposing such views it must clearly state its own, and such statements must necessarily be, to some extent at least, dogmatic in character. But it is evident that the doctrine is more fundamental than the dogma. Doctrine—in the sense defined—may be regarded as something fixed and unchangeable, whereas dogma has a more purely relative character. It takes its color from its time and circumstances. It may undergo radical change. The dogma of one age may be surrendered by another age. The purpose of dogma is to spread that doctrine whence may issue the Christian life and experience, and it is to be judged entirely by its success in doing this. Dogma ceases to be justifiable the moment it obscures or hinders or perverts saving doctrine.

The Bible-Principle in Protestantism. The average Protestant takes it for granted that the Bible is "the sole and sufficient rule of Christian faith and practice," and that it was this principle which gave birth to the Reformation. As a matter of fact, however, the Lutheran Confessions say very little about the formal principle of Scripture, although they make plain enough the scriptural basis of Lutheranism. Thus the Augsburg Confession, one of the earliest Lutheran statements, drawn up in 1530, asserts in the preface that the doctrine of the Confession is "derived from the Holy Scriptures and pure Word of God." (See Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii, p. 4. The citations from the various creeds in the present article may be confirmed from this great work of Schaff, published in three volumes, which will henceforth be referred to as C.C.). The fifth article contains a long criticism of those "traditions" which Romanism had fastened on the church. The Articles of Smalcald (1537), also Lutheran, declare that "the Word of God, and no one else, not even an angel, can establish articles of faith" (C.C., i, pp. 253-257; cf. Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, ii, p. 232). The Formula of Concord, the last of the Lutheran Confessions (1580), was the result of an attempt to bring doctrinal unity to the Lutheran church. It begins thus: "We believe, confess, and teach that the only rule and norm, according to which all doctrines and all teachers ought to be esteemed and judged, is no other whatever than the prophetic and apostolic writings both of the O.T. and the N.T." It further asserts that "other writings, whether of the fathers or of the moderns, with whatever name they come, are in nowise to be equaled to the Holy Scriptures." (C.C., iii, pp. 93-97).

The Reformed Churches—those in which the influence of Calvin and Zwingli prevailed—show a more rigid adherence to the letter of Scripture than characterized Lutheranism, and a more radical departure from ecclesiastical tradition. The Reformed Churches "start from the absolute sovereignty of God and the supreme authority of his holy Word," whereas Lutheranism "starts from the wants of sinful men and the personal experience of justification by faith alone" (C.C., i, p. 216). Thus, as Hagenbach puts it, Luther himself reached his formal principle (the Scriptures as the only rule of faith) by means of his material principle (justification is by faith alone), and so argued at the Leipsic Disputation (op. cit., ii, pp. 229f.).

Zwingli made free use of the principle that Scripture and faith were co-operants: to understand Scripture one must have faith, and Scripture in its turn confirms faith. In his Sixty-seven Articles (1523) he affirms that the gospel does not depend upon the approbation of the church; that the gospel sets forth all necessary saving truth; and that the gospel makes the doctrines and traditions of men useless as respects salvation (C.C., iii, pp. 197f.; cf. i, p. 364). The Second Helvetic Confession (1566), which ranks next in importance to the Heidelberg Catechism among Continental Reformed symbols, holds that the Scriptures, being God-given, are their own sufficient authority, and contain all that is necessary to a saving faith and a holy life. Traditions which contradict Scripture, even though they claim to be apostolical, are to be rejected (C.C., iii, pp. 237f.; cf. i, pp. 396-397).

Calvin wrote in his Institutes as follows: "This, then, must be considered as a fixed principle, that, in order to enjoy the light of true religion, we ought to begin with the doctrine of heaven; and that no man can have the least knowledge of true and sound doctrine without having been a disciple of the Scripture" (vol. i., ch. 6, §2, p. 73). He further argues that since the church was built "upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles," of whose teaching Scripture is the record, it is impossible for the church to have authority over that teaching (ch. 8, §§1, 2). And he also argues that only as the reader is guided by the same Spirit as that which produced the books in the first place can their true meaning be known (ch. 8, §13).

The English Reformation was a slow process, beginning in 1527 with Henry VIII's abolition of the authority of Rome over England, and the dissolution of the monasteries; making real advance under Edward VI, Henry's only son; suffering a reaction under Mary Tudor, Henry's oldest daughter; and attaining permanence as the Established Church of England under Elizabeth (d. 1603). Its reaction from certain Roman extremes was not so violent as in the case of Lutheranism and Calvinism, but it held the characteristic Protestant position on the sufficiency and supremacy of Scripture. Indeed, one of the richest fruits of the English Reformation was the translations of the Bible, culminating in the King James Version, 1611 (see art., English Translations of the Bible, pp. 80-7). The sixth article of the 1571 edition of the Thirty-nine Articles reads: "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the faith, or be thought requisite [as] necessary to salvation." The O.T. apocryphal books (see pp. 191-2) are affirmed to be useful, "but yet doth it not apply to them to establish any doctrine." The eighth article accepts the three historic creeds; the twentieth denies the power of the church "to ordain anything that is contrary to God's written Word"; the twenty-first denies the authority of the pronouncements of General Councils except in so far as these agree with Scripture; and the thirty-fourth allows a certain authority to tradition, but makes tradition changeable according to the necessities of time and place (C.C., iii, pp. 487-516). The American Revision of the Thirty-nine Articles, made in 1801 for the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, leaves untouched the articles bearing on Scripture, except that it omits the twenty-first. The Twenty-five Articles of the Methodist Episcopal Church were prepared by John Wesley on the basis of the Thirty-nine. He left practically unchanged as to their sense articles six and thirty-four (respectively five and twenty-two in the Methodist articles).

The Westminster Confession (1647) opens with a vigorous assertion of the usual Protestant position. The Canonical Scriptures "are given by inspiration of God to be the rule of faith and life." One must be moved by the Holy Spirit if one would understand the word aright. "The whole council of God concerning all things necessary for his own glory, man's salvation, faith, and life, is either expressly set down in Scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture: unto which nothing at any time is to be added, whether by new revelations of the Spirit, or traditions of men" (C.C., iii, pp. 600-606). Discussing this Confession, Schaff says: "No other Protestant symbol has such a clear, judicious, concise, and exhaustive statement of this fundamental article of Protestantism. . . . The Confession plants itself exclusively on the Bible platform, without in the least depreciating the valuable aid of human learning . . . in its own proper place, as an aid in ascertaining the true sense of the mind of the Holy Spirit. . . . It is clear that Protestantism must sink or swim with this principle" (C.C., i, p. 781). The various other churches organized on a presbyterian or independent basis accept this general Protestant position.

The position of the Quakers, or the Society of Friends, is unique. In the Established Church of England we have an example of Protestantism which supplements the Bible-principle with the principle of tradition. In the Friends, we have an example of Protestantism which makes the Bible-principle secondary, and gives the supreme place to the inward testimony of the Spirit. The Friends reject all outward authority in religion—including the Bible itself—and all the “ordinances of man.” They therefore have no creed, as such, but they endeavor to exemplify the simplicity and devotion of the primitive Christians, and they hold the essentials of the evangelical faith. Their great theologian was Robert Barclay, who drew up in 1675 the Confession of the Society of Friends. Its main points for our purpose are as follows: (1) To know God in Christ is the height of human happiness. (2) The foundation of this knowledge is in the leading of the Spirit. He to whom God thus makes himself known is certain of the truth thereby learned, and will subject it for confirmation to nothing else, not even the written Word itself. (3) The Scriptures being a record of like revelations to other men, it follows that they are but “a declaration of the fountain, and not the fountain itself.” The Spirit is first. To receive the Scriptures because they proceed from the Spirit is necessarily to make the Spirit supreme (C.C., iii, pp. 789-791; cf. i, pp. 866-871). This is really the carrying to an extreme of the principle, present in all the Reformers, and, indeed, in the mystics of all ages, of the “testimony of the Spirit.”

The Sources of Doctrine in Catholic Bodies. The affirmation of the Protestant principle gave rise to counter-affirmations on the part of the two great Catholic bodies, the Roman and the Greek. There was nothing new in what they said, however; they simply restated their historic positions.

The Council of Trent, originally assembled in 1545 and continued off and on during the next twenty years, represented the effort of the Roman Catholic Church to grapple with the problems created by the rise and spread of Protestantism. The Council decreed that the divinely given saving truth and the associated moral discipline are contained in the books and unwritten traditions which were “received by the Apostles from the mouth of Christ himself, or from the Apostles themselves, the Holy Ghost dictating.” Hence both the books and the traditions are to be received and equally venerated. The Latin Vulgate (see p. 865b), which includes the O.T. Apocrypha, was declared to be the authentic translation (a pronouncement which greatly troubles modern Roman Catholic scholars). The decree denounces any interpretation “contrary to that sense which holy mother church—whose it is to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures—hath held and doth hold; or even contrary to the unanimous consent of the Fathers” (C.C., ii, pp. 79-83). This position was reaffirmed in practically the same language in the Dogmatic Decrees of the Vatican Council of 1870 (C.C., ii, pp. 240-242).

The position of the Greek Catholic or Orthodox Church was stated by Dositheus, Patriarch of Jerusalem and Palestine, as part of the Confession of the Synod of Jerusalem, 1672. The statement forbids private interpretation. It puts tradition on a level with the authority of the church itself. The church interpretation of Scripture and tradition is authoritative and infallible. (The Greek Catholic Church denies that there is a visible head of the church, a Pope, whose ex cathedra pronouncements on all questions of doctrine are infallible.) General and indiscriminate reading of Scripture is forbidden as tending to lead to error, since there are many things therein hard to be understood and only the authorized interpreter can make them plain. The position of Dositheus was reaffirmed in the Larger Catechism of the Orthodox, Catholic, Eastern Church, published at Moscow, 1839—“the most authoritative doctrinal standard of the orthodox Græco-Russian Church.” It puts Scripture and tradition on a level, although it also emphasizes the fact that there was apostolic tradition before there was apostolic writing.

The Procedure in the Primitive Church. Christianity did not begin with a body of writings. The writings which make up our N.T. were a late product of the Christian movement. There were Christian men, and therefore the Christian life and experience, long before there were written statements held to be authoritative. Christianity began in certain historic facts associated with the life and work of Jesus Christ, and in the testimony to those facts and their meaning offered by a small group of men—the “apostles”—whose testimony was based on first-hand experience. The characteristic of the early church was freedom and spontaneity. Those who composed it accepted the authority of “the words of the Lord” as these were repeated by the apostles, and in this same “Lord” they saw One whom they regarded as a divinely given Saviour from sin, but there was as yet no elaborate and closely articulated body of theological belief. To live a holy life in the Spirit through faith in Christ, and to bear themselves in love toward their brethren—this was the central demand. They were concerned rather to cultivate for themselves and to awaken in others a certain life and experience than to formulate intellectual beliefs. (See art., Formation of the N.T., p. 858b.)

But such life and experience necessarily implied a belief of some kind. To accept the apostolic testimony to Christ meant to believe something about him. This belief, in its simplest form, was expressed in the baptismal confession, i.e., the words required to be repeated by the candidate at his baptism. The original confession was probably a simple statement of belief in Jesus Christ as Messiah and risen Lord (Rom. 10⁹) but it was soon elaborated into belief in God the Father and in Jesus Christ his Son and in the Holy Spirit (see Mt. 28¹⁹). But even in the primitive church the range of belief was much wider than that, as is intimated in the details of "the mystery of godliness" given in 1 Tim. 3¹⁶ and in the statement of "the first principles of Christ" given in Heb. 6^{1, 2}. Among the "first things" which Paul said he had "received" were the death and resurrection of Christ (1 Cor. 15³), and he exhorts Timothy to "hold fast the form of sound words" which had been "committed" unto him (2 Tim. 1^{13, 14}). In a similar way Jude exhorts his readers to contend earnestly for "the faith once delivered" (v. 3).

The baptismal confession soon became longer. This was due, first, to the necessity of guarding against errors; and second, to the spread of Christianity among Gentiles, many of whom were quite ignorant not only of the Christian facts but also of the underlying O.T. teaching. The baptismal confession took its most widely used and authoritative form at Rome. Before the middle of the second century, the confession there had taken the following form: "I believe in God, Father Almighty, and in Jesus Christ his Son, our Lord, born of the Holy Spirit and of Mary the virgin, crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried, on the third day rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, sitteth at the right hand of the Father, from whence he cometh to judge both quick and dead. And I believe in the Holy Spirit, the Holy Church, the remission of sins, and the resurrection of the flesh." The student must be referred to the authorities for the story of how this confession was developed, clause by clause, as the necessity arose of combating heresy, especially that of Marcion and the Gnostics, and of how it eventually became "The Apostles' Creed." (Cf. Harnack, History of Dogma, English translation, vol. i; Sabatier, Religions of Authority, English translation, pp. 44-55; McGiffert, Apostles' Creed.)

This confession, then, was held to be authoritative. But why authoritative? Because it had apostolic sanction. The answer calls attention to another feature of the early church, namely, the tendency gradually to centralize authority in the bishops, regarded as the divinely appointed successors of the apostles. This authority extended not only to ecclesiastical matters but also to questions of belief, until eventually obedience to the bishop was made a fundamental requirement of orthodoxy (cf. Harnack, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 85). It was only a step from this to the contention, first stated clearly and explicitly by Cyprian, that "outside the church was no salvation." His theory was that the apostles were ordained of God; that the bishops were their successors in both office and power; that the church having been originally dependent on the apostles was therefore permanently dependent on their episcopal successors; and that therefore the bishops, on whom the church was founded, and by whom it was represented, and in whom was its bond of unity, had all authority in both faith and practice. (Cf. Sabatier, op. cit., pp. 98-100; Harnack, op. cit., ii, pp. 70-90.)

The bishops, then, before the middle of the third century, were the authoritative interpreters of the faith. But where was this faith (more strictly, body of belief) found? It was found in apostolic tradition and in apostolic writings, and these had already become, of course, integral parts of the life of the church. What was fluid and elastic in the common mind, and what was officially crystallized in the various baptismal confessions and other statements, was regarded as identical with the original apostolic faith. But by the middle of the second century there was also going on in the church a good deal of theological activity. Men like Clement of Rome, and Papias, and Hermas, and Irenæus, and Justin, and Tertullian, and Origen were passing through the crucible of their mind the apostolic inheritance and attempting to ally it with a prevailing philosophy—in the case of some of them, especially the Greek "Apologists," the so-called Logos-philosophy. The result was that there entered into the increasing body of "tradition" a certain amount of theological speculation. Not only so, but there was also an increasing stress on matters ecclesiastical. What Harnack calls the "secularizing" of Christianity arose not simply from the tendency to transform the original gospel of reconciliation into an imposing philosophy of religion, but also from the gradual surrender by the church of its "other-worldly" character as the kingdom of heaven temporarily on earth, and the conscious adoption of a purpose to make itself at home in the present world. All that went with this in the way of externalities of the life of the church conceived now as a visible organization of world-wide scope likewise entered into the body of "tradition" held to be apostolic. Cyprian's third-century conception of the function of the bishops, therefore (see above), seemed likely to fasten on the church, as essentials of Christianity and conditions of salvation, both a non-apostolic system of theology, and a non-apostolic system of ecclesiastical procedure—non-apostolic, that is, in the sense that it could not be directly traced to the original Christian brotherhood.

For our purpose, the ecclesiastical procedure is less important than the theology, although historically the two belonged together. It is impossible to give a complete statement here of the theological development of the second and early part of the third centuries. But such statements as those of Irenæus (Against Heresies, bk. i, ch. 10, §1), of Tertullian (On the Præscription of Heretics, ch. 13) and of Origen (On First Principles, bk. i, preface, §§4-6) show a general conformity to the long Roman baptismal confession given above. (All may be read at length in Schaff, C.C., ii, pp. 13-23 or in the translations in various volumes of The Ante-Nicene Fathers.) There are, indeed, radical departures from this, as when Tertullian includes, as part of original Christianity, the belief that the world was created out of nothing, and that the creative agent of the world, the "Logos," was "made flesh" in the womb of Mary; or as when Origen includes in it the belief that the devil is a fallen angel, and that the writings of prophets and apostles have a secret meaning open only to those who are especially illuminated. Even with such debatable additions as these, however, it is still possible to claim that the statements by these men of "the rule of faith" are comparatively simple and primitive, and if this were all we had to deal with the problem would be easy. But in actual fact, a great deal more than this was held by these men to be of the essence of Christianity. They have left us a very considerable body of literature, and it reveals how great was the theological activity of the second and third centuries. Much that was written was in the nature of a defense of the apostolic faith, but much of it was also a theological elaboration of that faith, and the tendency was to transfer the authority of the apostolic faith to the later theological elaboration. With the corresponding theory of episcopal authority already strongly developed, and with the bishops inclined to regard all tradition as binding, it is easy to see that Christianity was in danger of traveling further and further away from the simplicity of the original gospel.

The Saving Influence of the New Testament in the Early Church. That danger was by no means altogether escaped, but that it was escaped to some extent was due to the fact that there had come to be included in the total apostolic tradition that part of the tradition which was in writing. What was written necessarily shared the authority of the total tradition, but just because it was written, and therefore in a sense static, it served as a check upon the unwritten tradition with its tendency to go on increasing. The story of how these writings were gradually collected and given their commanding position must be read elsewhere. (See art., Formation of the N.T., pp. 853-8.) To read that story in connection with the changing emphases that were characterizing the church of the time, and not to see in the story the hand of God, is to be blind indeed. It is no exaggeration, but sober historical truth, to say that the collecting of a few documents from the first century and assigning to them a position of authority respecting Christian faith and practice saved Christianity. There was, it is true, a certain loss due to the fact that the faith became more or less standardized. Men ceased to look for new revelations, and more and more emphasized the revelation that had already been given. The recognition of the authority of the unwritten tradition also tended to obscure certain things in what was written. The rite of baptism, e.g., is hardly a conspicuous feature of the N.T., yet it had become so in the practice of the church, and continued to be so even after the settling of the N.T. canon. The N.T. nowhere makes assent to propositions more important than a man's being "a new creation in Christ Jesus," but it was just this assent to propositions rather than a life of love in the Spirit which the church—due, it must be said, to certain historical conditions—had more and more come to emphasize, and which Harnack calls "the most fatal turning-point in the history of Christianity" (op. cit., ii, p. 31). Yet although Harnack gives this adverse judgment on the exaltation of mere belief, he agrees with the majority of scholars in regarding the formation of the N.T. canon as the greatest creative act in the history of the church (ibid., p. 62, footnote). Among its beneficial results he specifies the following: (1) By modifying many prevailing views, it prevented the total secularization of Christianity; (2) it kept before the church the early Christian ideal; (3) on matters that were specifically Christian, it forced the O.T. somewhat into the background; and (4) by assigning so much importance to the writings of Paul, it kept before the church his keen redemptional consciousness.

Dangers of the Protestant Principle. This brief historical survey makes it evident that the Protestant principle has convincing support in early Christian history. The support is admittedly indirect, but it is not the less valuable on that account. It was the wholesome influence of the N.T. which held in check the dangerous principles of tradition and of episcopal authority in the third and fourth centuries. As time went on, however, that influence grew weaker, and the practically unlimited application of the opposing principles issued in that depraved state of the church which it required the Protestant Reformation, with its uncompromising appeal to Scripture, to remedy.

In the extreme form, however, which the Protestant principle came to have in the seventeenth century and later, it produced a brood of ills just as serious in their way as those which resulted from the more complex Roman Catholic principle. The authority of Scripture was made just as tyrannical in Protestantism as the authority of the church itself had ever been in Romanism. The sound principle of the original reformers, that "the Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation" (see above, article six of the Church of England, article five of the Methodist Episcopal Church, etc.), was transformed—more exactly was perverted—into the principle that the belief of the whole of Scripture was necessary to salvation. It has taken a century of devoted scholarship to save Protestantism from this perversion of its own principle.

This danger of perversion, however, should only make us the more determined to hold fast to the Protestant principle in its true form. We shall still listen with respect to tradition; we shall still be willing to listen to the collective judgment of Christian men according to the rule of Vincent of Lerins (d. 450), namely, that truth is established by the tests of antiquity, universality, and unanimity (quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est); but we shall still retain the privilege of appeal to the N.T. under the illumination of that same Spirit which produced the N.T. in the first place.

The Rule of What Faith? The claim that the N.T. is the rule of faith and the main source of Christian doctrine is, however, a claim that has its own problems, and these have been frankly faced by modern Protestant scholars, e.g., Ritschl, A. Sabatier, Sanday, W. N. Clarke, and W. P. Paterson. Thus Paterson (whose Rule of Faith, the Baird Lecture for 1905, published in 1912, is one of the best discussions of the subject) shows with great clarity that we cannot use the Scriptures as a rule of faith until we have discovered what that faith is of which they are to be the rule. We are confronted with a twofold fact: there is, first, what might be called the essence of Christianity, and this is the real subject of revelation and is verifiable in experience; and there is, second, a body of theological utterance which radiates from that living essence and is intended to explain and defend it. Now, if recent study has made one thing more clear than another, it is that this distinction between living essence, revealed and experiential, and theological expansion, relative and instrumental, characterizes the N.T. itself. It follows that not all things in the N.T. are of equal value for the purposes of the Christian life and experience, and therefore not all things are of equal authority.

Then have we no certainty at all? Is the lament of John Henry Newman justifiable—that certainty was to be found only in Rome? This is by no means the conclusion. It ought to be apparent that Jesus Christ came into the world to make Christian people, and that what sufficed to make Christian people in the first place will suffice to make them still. Our historical survey has shown that the more complicated the requirements the church of the early centuries laid upon its members, the more the original meaning of the Christian gospel became submerged. The virtue of the Protestant Reformation was that it called the church—or a part of it—back to the central fact. That central fact was that the church originated in a life and an experience. That life and experience grew out of the attitude of faith and love directed toward Jesus Christ conceived as the divinely sent Saviour from sin. The earliest Christian community was a group of men and women who had that faith and love. There has never been a more profoundly Christian group since, or a group that more nearly approximated the mind of Christ. By them Christianity began its conquest of the world. By them the N.T. was produced. But that of which the N.T. was the product existed before the product itself. What was that? A faith and a love, a life and an experience, centering around Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour. The final significance of the N.T., therefore, is not in the book itself, but in that to which it bears testimony. It is there that we find the authority and the certainty, because it is there that we find something which may be validated in our own experience. What lies beyond the range of that experience, e.g., speculations on the relation of Christ to God, on the precise nature of the Holy Spirit, on the logical steps in the order of salvation, on the method of resurrection and judgment—these speculations, both within and without the N.T., will still have their proper place and value, but they will be secondary and not primary. On such questions Christian men will continue to differ. But in the nature of the case they cannot differ on that out of which such questions naturally arise, namely, utter surrender to the control of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, both in one's relations to God and in one's relations to others. It is through the N.T. that we learn best of all what that Spirit is and what it means to submit to its control.

That is why the N.T. is indispensable for Christian doctrine as defined at the beginning of this article; but the authority resides less in the book itself than in the life and experience and associated facts which existed prior to the N.T. and of which the N.T. is both a product and a witness. (Cf. pp. 889-90, 1092-3.)

Literature: W. P. Paterson, The Rule of Faith; A. Sabatier, Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion, pts. ii and iii, and Religions of Authority and of the Spirit (both in Eng. trans.); Sanday, Form and Content of the Christian Tradition; Harnack, History of Dogma, vol. ii, chs. 1, 2, 3 (Eng. trans.); W. N. Clarke, The Use of the Scriptures in Theology; Deissmann, The Religion of Jesus and the Faith of Paul; H. R. Mackintosh, Originality of the Christian Message; Gore, The Holy Spirit and the Church; Scott, The First Age of Christianity.

V. COMMENTARY ON THE BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

MATTHEW

BY PROFESSOR J. NEWTON DAVIES

INTRODUCTION

The Charm of Matthew's Gospel. The author of this most widely read Gospel in the early church, and one which has had such a profound influence in determining men's ideas of Christ, has been appropriately styled the architect among the Gospel writers. His finished work resembles a massive cathedral, representing the toil of various periods and hands, but withal so deftly harmonized and unified that it gives the impression of a living whole over the portals of which one could fittingly write the words "to the glory of the Most High God and the praise of his Son Jesus Christ." Within the sacred precincts of this building we meet with all sorts and conditions of men, shepherds, magi, centurions, fishermen, taxgatherers, farmers, vine-dressers, blind beggars, generous women, scribes and Pharisees, children and aged men, representatives of every class in the social order and of every type conceivable in the moral order, suggestive of the wide appeal which the personality of Jesus made to men. The all-commanding figure that arrests our attention, however, and captures our imagination wherever we look is that of Jesus of Nazareth, the incomparable teacher of divine truth, the wonderful healer of disease and sickness, whose radiant life was completely dedicated to the service of men, whom the common people heard with gladness but whom the religious leaders, with tragic blindness, crucified. No one can walk in the sacred precincts of this Gospel without being moved to praise and prompted to worship in spirit and in truth.

Divisions of the Gospel. Like many Jewish books, e.g., the Psalms, this Gospel is divided into five sections, the dividing line being clearly discernible in the formula "and it came to pass when he had ended these sayings," which is found in 7²⁸ 11¹ 13⁵³ 19¹ 26¹. Each of the five sections again is divided into two parts, one consisting of narrative and the other of discourse, as follows: (1) Narrative, chs. 3, 4; discourse, chs. 5-7. (2) Narrative, chs. 8, 9; discourse, ch. 10. (3) Narrative, chs. 11, 12; discourse, ch. 13. (4) Narrative, chs. 14-17; discourse, ch. 18. (5) Narrative, chs. 19-22; discourse, chs. 23-25. To these five sections the author provides a prologue (chs. 1, 2) and an epilogue (chs. 26-28), the former heralding the coming of the King, the latter proclaiming his passing, and his entrance into glory. This architectonic tendency of the author is shown also in his love of arranging incidents and sayings in groups of three, five and seven (see Allen, Matthew, p. 65).

Structure of the Gospel: Relation of Narrative Sections to Mark. One of the assured results of devout criticism is that almost the whole of Mark is incorporated in "Matthew" (see art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, p. 868). This conclusion can be verified by any student who cares to examine in a synopsis a parable or incident which is found in both Matthew and Mark. This discovery indicates that the author was not one of the twelve, for one who had been an eyewitness himself would not resort to the work of a secondary witness. The incorporation of the material by the compiler of Matthew has not been done in a slavish, mechanical way but in a manner which reveals distinctly the compiler's own individual prepossessions and ideas; he does not hesitate to change, omit, tone down, and otherwise adapt the material in his source for his purpose, showing clearly that he did not consider that Mark's account was complete. (For a full survey of this whole question see the introduction to Allen's commentary on Matthew.)

Matthew's Omissions of Marcan Material. These are of several kinds: (1) Complete parables or incidents like the parable in Mk. 4²⁶⁻²⁹; the healings in 7³²⁻³⁷; the widow and her alms, 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴. (2) Mark's references to the strong human emotions of Jesus are invariably left out. Cf. Mk. 3⁵ Mt. 12¹⁻³; Mk. 14¹⁻⁴³, Mt. 8^{3, 4}; Mk. 10¹⁴ Mt. 19¹⁴. (3) Statements of inability on the part of Jesus, e.g., Mk. 14⁵ 6⁵ 7²⁴ 14⁵⁸ are omitted in Matthew. (4) The asking of questions on the part of Jesus is omitted. Mk. 5^{9, 30} 6³⁸ 8¹², 23 9¹². These omissions are due to the growing feeling that anything which might be interpreted as disparaging to Jesus must be toned down or ignored.

Differences from Mark. The changes which Matthew has made vary in character. (1) Mark's uncommon words, like skizomenos ("rent asunder") in 11⁰ and enankalizo ("taking into the arms") in 9³⁶ are changed to more ordinary ones. Many of Mark's vivid historic presents are converted into past tenses; repetitions and redundancies are condensed. (2) Perhaps with a desire to prevent possible misunderstanding of the character of Jesus, the question in Mk. 10¹⁸, "Why callest thou me good?" is given in Mt. 19¹⁷ as "Why askest thou me concerning that which is good?" and the statement in Mk. 6³, "Is not this the carpenter?" becomes in Mt. 13⁵⁵, "Is not this the carpenter's son?" (3) Matthew makes several changes also in matters affecting the disciples. Cf. Mk. 4¹³ Mt. 13¹⁶, 17; Mk. 4⁴⁰ Mt. 8²⁶; Mk. 6⁵² Mt. 14³³. In Mk. 10³⁵ James and John make the request to sit at the right hand and the left in the Kingdom; in Mt. 20²⁰ it is their mother who does it for them. (4) In reference to the miraculous, Matthew's tendency is to dwell more fully on its striking features (cf. Mk. 13², 33 and Mt. 8¹⁶). The numbers in both the feeding miracles are increased by the natural addition of women and children, 14²¹ 15³⁸. Cures are by physical means and gradual in Mk. 7³¹ 8²²; in Mt. 8⁸⁻¹⁶ a word suffices. The difference, of course, is simply in the account, without implying any misunderstanding of the event itself. See also the description of the convulsive struggle of the epileptic boy, Mk. 9²⁰⁻²⁶ Mt. 17¹⁴⁻¹⁸. In the parable of the cursing of the fig tree the withering takes place immediately in Matthew (21¹⁹; but cf. Mk. 11¹⁴, 20). (5) Another group of changes is in the form of additions, e.g., to Mark's story of the walking on the water by Jesus, Matthew adds the incident of Peter doing the same until fear possesses him. In the passion narrative, Matthew adds the statement about the earthquake and the rending of the rocks and the opening of the tombs of a number of saints, who then appeared in the city. Here again it must be said that the changes (more strictly, the differences) do not involve contradictions. There are also interesting examples of changes in which Matthew adds qualifying and explanatory statements; e.g., he adds in 16⁴ the words "but the sign of Jonah" to Mark's words in 8¹¹, 12. Mt. 12⁴⁰ has all the appearance of a piece of scribal ingenuity. The words about divorce in Mk. 10¹¹ and Mt. 19⁹ show interesting differences. Mk. 11¹, "Thou art my beloved Son," becomes in Mt. 3¹⁷ "This is my beloved Son."

All these examples indicate that Mark may be regarded as the primary source, and that as far as the narrative sections are concerned Matthew represents a later stage in the evolution of the Gospel tradition. As to the real significance of this fact, see section below on "The Historical Value of Matthew."

Relation of Discourse Sections to the Source Q. When the contents of Mark are abstracted from Matthew we find large sections of discourse like the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7), the preaching of the Baptist (31-12), the denunciation of the Pharisees (ch. 23), a long missionary charge (ch. 10), some of which is found in Mark, a discourse about the Baptist (ch. 11), and several parables (chs. 13, 22, 25). A great deal of this material is found in Luke. Varying views are held concerning the nature and origin of this extensive teaching material which forms so very important a part of this Gospel. Many think that Luke and Matthew have drawn from a common Aramaic source and that the variations in the two are due to the different ways in which the document has been translated. Others, and they represent by far the larger group, think that Matthew and Luke have derived their material from two different Greek sources of the sayings of Jesus current possibly at Antioch and Caesarea, while there are some who think that both depended on oral tradition, there being considerable evidence that the Jews of the time could retain large masses of teachings in their memories. Josephus, e.g., in his Apion says, "If anybody asks our people about our laws he will more readily tell them all than he will tell his own name." A few have thought that Luke in compiling his Gospel borrowed directly from Matthew.

The second conjecture, that of a common source, is the most probable. The four great centers of the early church, Jerusalem, Antioch, Caesarea, Ephesus, had each its own compilation of the sayings of Jesus, which would account for the variations in some of the sayings of the Master as we find them in our Gospels. Scholars usually refer to this teaching source by the letter Q, the first letter of the German word quelle, which means source. (For further discussions of Q see art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, pp. 871-2, and the chapter on "The Reconstruction of Q" in Streeter, The Four Gospels.)

Streeter thinks that Luke has preserved Q in a purer form than Matthew because Luke as a rule did not conflate his sources as Matthew did. About 272 verses in Luke represent, in his considered judgment, the contents of this old Gospel of the pro-Gentile church in Antioch. In determining its contents he seems to have worked on the following principles: (1) When similarity in statement is very striking, as in Mt. 31-12 and Lk. 31-17, this points conclusively to a common written document. (2) If what is apparently the same saying is expressed in a very different form in Matthew and Luke, it shows that Matthew has found his material in another document, the M document, which we will refer to in our next paragraph, or else in some way he has blended the two accounts; the documents Q and M in some way overlapped. Q did not contain, in his judgment, the Lord's Prayer; for the account in Matthew is embedded in material drawn from M, and in Luke from a section of the L document—the document standing to Luke as M to Matthew. (3) The document contained occasional narrative to explain some piece of teaching, the emphasis on the Baptist being due to the fact that the document was composed in a place where the prestige of the Baptist was strong; it did not, however, contain the Passion narrative, on account of the fact that this could be taught in oral tradition. It is ethical teaching that sooner or later needs a written document. Q was written to supplement oral tradition. (4) Matthew omitted the two Q passages, Lk. 9⁵¹⁻⁵⁶ (the Samaritan village) and 17^{20, 21} ("The kingdom of God is within you"), perhaps because one involves a rebuke to the apostles, and because the other emphasizes a view of the Kingdom which does not stress the objective catastrophic aspect which in Matthew is so conspicuous.

The Judaistic Element in Matthew. When both Mark and the material which scholars think formed the contents of this missing document Q are deducted from Matthew, there is left some material which is very Judaistic and particularistic in tone and feeling, representing, in the view of Streeter, the material Matthew derived from the church at Jerusalem. The following are some of the sections which have emanated from this source: 10^{5, 6}, which contains our Lord's command to the disciples not to preach the gospel to the Gentiles but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; 10²³, which contains the statement, "Ye shall not have gone through the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come"; 17²⁰⁻²¹, the paragraph in the Sermon on the Mount which lays stress on the value and validity of every jot and tittle of the Law; 23^{2, 3}, which enjoins not only obedience to the Law but even to the scribal interpretations; 18¹⁵⁻²², the passage in which the word "church" occurs, which in all probability refers to the Christian group in Jerusalem, and where we find the words "Let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican"—a statement not easy to harmonize with the portrayal of Jesus' spirit as a whole. Streeter is of the opinion that Matthew has supplemented the narrative on the problem of divorce in 19³⁻¹² from this source, as well as the narrative in 12⁹⁻¹³. When the story of the Syrophenician woman in Mk. 7²⁴⁻³⁰ is compared with the account in Mt. 15²¹⁻²⁸, the latter is seen to be much more Judaistic; one sometimes wonders whether even the account in Mark has not been somewhat colored by this Judaistic emphasis. Streeter thinks it is not difficult to suspect the influence of the desire of the followers of James (see Acts 15) to find a justification for their disapprobation of the followers of Paul by taking sayings of Jesus out of the context in which they were originally spoken, and thereby giving to them a different meaning. To this source belong too the apocalyptic discourse and the parables which are of an apocalyptic and eschatological character (e.g., chs. 24, 25).

Other Sources. There are other sources which have been employed in the Gospel; e.g., Peter, who gives his own reminiscences in Mark, is a little different in the sources in which he figures in Matthew—the halo which the early church placed about his head is beginning to appear. Matthew must have stood in the main stream of oral tradition, from which he derived many of the details in the Passion story and in the infancy and resurrection narrative. While this does not seem to have been critically sifted and valued, it does not follow that it is not on the whole historical, or that the large element of the symbolical and poetic which it contains is to be ruled out as of no value. There are other ways of conveying truth than by statements which are coldly exact. For the detailed discussion see the commentary.

The Problem of Authorship. The author of this Gospel must remain unknown. The reason why Matthew's name has been linked with it is because of a saying of Papias quoted in Eusebius: "So then Matthew composed the oracles (logia) in the Hebrew language and each one interpreted them as he could." This statement refers in all probability to a collection of proof texts for the use of the catechists of the Christian Church, or it may refer to a collection of the sayings of Jesus which the apostle Matthew was instrumental in gathering together. The compiler of the Gospel was evidently a Jew of the Dispersion who lived outside Palestine, probably in Antioch, a man well versed in the Hebrew Scriptures, and who was profoundly impressed by the correspondence between the incidents in the life of Christ and the prophecies and Psalms of the O.T. To what extent the O.T. has influenced his narrative in the N.T. is a question of very real significance; e.g., in the story of the triumphal entry Matthew introduces two beasts whereas in the other Gospels there is only one, and he quotes Zech. 9⁹ accordingly.

But the inference sometimes drawn that there were not two beasts is not at all necessary. There is nothing improbable in an ass having a colt by her side. The incident may just as well have called Matthew's attention to the prophecy as that the prophecy determined his telling of the incident. (See below on "The Historical Value of Matthew.") The incident concerning Jonah is seriously considered to be a type of the resurrection (1240). So in the Passion narrative—details in the experience seem to have reminded Matthew of Psa. 22 and 69, and he took care to point these out. He may, indeed, have overdone this. Many feel that such a cry of despair as Mt. 27⁴⁶ sounds strange on Jesus' lips, and that the version of Mark, which represents Jesus as absolutely silent on the cross with the exception of the final cry, seems more in keeping with the perfect confidence in God which he taught and exemplified throughout his life.

The Historical Value of Matthew. These critical insights into the composition of the first Gospel may be and, indeed, have been used to discredit its historical value. But such a use of them shows a complete misapprehension of the significance of criticism. (See art., N.T. and Criticism, p. 885.) It is true that there are differences between Matthew and the other Gospels. If there were not these differences, we should have only one Gospel instead of four, and therefore only one witness instead of four. The differences indicate not unreliability in the accounts, but, rather, richness and variety in the total gospel tradition, the respect of the guiding Divine Spirit for the individuality and especial purpose of the respective writers and compilers, and the place which experience necessarily came to have in the understanding of certain events in the life of Jesus and of the relation he bore to human salvation. Because Mark stands nearer in point of time to the historical Jesus than do those parts of Matthew which are not found in Mark does not mean that Matthew's additions are without value. We want to know not merely how Jesus appeared to his contemporaries, or to his disciples in the first days of their acquaintance, but how he appeared to a sympathetic observer of a later day who had grasped his connection with the O.T. and the Jewish religion, and wrote of him from that standpoint. This need is supplied by Matthew, just as Luke and John supply our need to see Jesus under still other aspects and in still other relations. No one Gospel tells us everything. Indeed, even the four Gospels together do not do that (see Jn. 20^{30, 31}), and we supplement their testimony to the historical Jesus by other N.T. writings which are more especially concerned with the activity of the glorified Christ and his gradual embodiment in the life of the church. Something of this interpretative significance attaches to the parts peculiar to Matthew's Gospel. That he reports some things differently from the other writers is unquestionable. Equally unquestionable is his purpose to link up the life and work of Jesus Christ with the O.T. But far more important than the degree to which here and there a verse from a prophet may have influenced the telling of an event is the fact that Matthew is absolutely right in the conviction that controls his entire account, namely, that Jesus of Nazareth is the long-expected Messiah of his people, at once David's son and David's Lord (Mt. 11. 6, 16 2241-45), in whom alone the Israel of flesh and blood can become the true "Israel of God" (cf. Paul in Rom. 9-8 Gal. 6¹⁶). Our critical study of the first Gospel would be so much waste of time if it did not, both directly and indirectly, reveal more clearly these divine-human features in the portrait of the Central Figure.

Literature: Commentaries by Box (Century Bible), Micklethwait (Westminster Commentary), T. H. Robinson (Moffatt N.T. Commentary), Allen (International Critical Commentary), McNeile (the last two use the Greek). Montefiore, The Synoptic Gospels; Streeter, The Four Gospels.

CHAPTER I

1-17. The Genealogy of Jesus. (Lk. 323-38.) Two important questions are dealt with in this opening chapter—the descent of Jesus from David and his fatherless birth. To the Jews, no Messianic claims could be considered valid unless they included descent from David, hence the emphasis on this in such N.T. passages as Acts 230f. 1323 Rom. 13 2 Tim. 28 Rev. 22¹⁶. Jesus himself, as we see from Mt. 2243-45, lays no stress at all on the question of his Davidic descent. It is strange that the genealogy and the virgin birth should occur in the same chapter, for many argue that they cancel one another. If Jesus is descended from David—so the argument runs—it must be through Joseph, for this is Joseph's genealogy. It must follow therefore that if the claims of Davidic descent are to have any validity, the blood of these ancestors must flow in the veins of Jesus, which was not the case in view of the story of vv. 18-25. The Sinaitic Syriac version of v. 16 reads as follows: "And Joseph, to whom was betrothed the virgin Mary, begat Jesus called the Christ." According to that ancient version (see art., Transmission of N.T., p. 864b), the purpose of the genealogy was to demonstrate the Davidic descent of Jesus and that he was born of human parents. Jesus' own indifference to Davidic descent, however (22⁴³⁻⁴⁵), may weigh on the other side.

The genealogy. (1) It is divided artificially into three divisions—Abraham to David (vv. 2-6a), David to the Babylonian captivity (vv. 6b-11), the Babylonian captivity to Joseph the husband of Mary (vv. 11-16). Each section has fourteen names, Mary and Joseph being counted as two generations. In order to make this mechanical division of an equal number of names (due, according to Canon Box, to the desire to make an acrostic on the numerical equivalents of the Hebrew letters of the name "David"), the names of many generations have had to be omitted. (2) A large number of the names is to be found in Ruth 4¹³, 17, 18-22, and in 1 Chr. 310-16. (3) The genealogy contains the names of women (an unusual factor in Jewish genealogies), to show perhaps that Jesus was to minister to women on whose lives there rested a moral stain, as on the women of the genealogy. (4) This genealogy strikingly suggests that all history prior to Jesus converges on him; the fallen fortunes of his own nation are to be restored through him; the dreams and hopes of the checkered story of the past are to be realized through his life and ministry; he is to usher in a new kingdom in which all that is noblest and finest in men will come to fruition. (5) It is impossible to reconcile this genealogy with that of Luke. Many attempts have been made to do so, but modern scholars tend to the opinion that both tables are incomplete, and that in the absence of fuller knowledge we can do nothing but let them stand as they are.

16. On begat, see note below.

18-25. The Fatherless Birth of Jesus. (Lk. 126-56 21-20.) This story is told with great delicacy and is free from that coarseness so often characteristic of the myths and sagas that tell of the birth of great heroes from gods and goddesses. It is told also in the terms of a lofty monotheism and not in those of a crass polytheism. To give the story a greater degree of credence the evangelist reports that Joseph received a communication from God in a dream by means of an angel. He was told to take Mary as his wife and that the miraculous birth of the Child to be was a fulfillment of the prophetic statement in Isa. 71⁴. The value and point of this quotation were perceptible only to those who read the LXX, for the Hebrew word translated "virgin" in the LXX means a young woman of marriageable age, whether virgin or not, and there is no evidence that Isa. 71⁴ was ever understood in the sense given to it by Matthew till it was so applied by Christians. The evangelist must have been writing to Jewish Christians who lived in the Hellenistic world. Hence many scholars suggest that the expectation prevalent in that world that saviours and great deliverers must be born in a miraculous way has influenced the evangelist in the telling of this story. (See Pfeiderer, Early Christian Conception of Christ, ch. 1.) Others contend that the story has been influenced by the statement of Isaiah. (See further, art., Life of Christ, p. 892a.) The congruity of the idea, however, with the whole character and significance of Jesus is an undeniable fact, and this, for many, gives Matthew's story the required verisimilitude.

In the N.T., three presentations of the unique personality of Jesus are to be found: the Markan, which sets forth the conception that it was at the baptism that the manhood of Jesus became a vehicle for the full expression of the Spirit of God; the Matthean, propounded here, which claims that Jesus was born of a virgin by direct interposition of the Spirit of God; the Johannine and Pauline, which emphasize the pre-existence of Jesus (Jn. 11-18 Phil. 25-8). Perhaps it is because of the difficulty of reconciling the idea of pre-existence and that of a virgin birth that John and Paul have left out of their writings all reference to the latter (but cf. R. J. Cooke, Did Paul Know of the Virgin Birth?). It is admitted by all that the story of the miraculous birth appeared late in the preaching of Christianity.

Begat. It is often claimed that the Greek verb rendered beget denotes legal but not necessarily physical descent. The evidence for this, however, is of a very meager kind. In the other passages of the N.T. where the word occurs it means "to give being to," "to beget" or "to procreate."

18. In Jewish law not only an actual betrothal, but the mere possibility that one party believed himself or herself to be betrothed prevented marriage to any other party. A betrothed girl became a widow if her fiancé died. After betrothal therefore, but before marriage, the man was legally husband—an informal canceling of betrothal was impossible. Strack and Billerbeck claim that cohabitation was customary in Galilee but not in Judæa during betrothal (but cf. Edersheim, Jewish Social Life in the Days of Christ, pp. 148f.).—Holy Spirit. The narrative breathes the atmosphere of the O.T. and the word "Spirit" here is used in its O.T. sense, i.e., the power of God in active exercise (see Swete, Holy Spirit in the N.T., pp. 27–31).

CHAPTER II

In this chapter the curtain is lifted for us on five moving scenes: the coming of the Wise Men to Jerusalem; their arrival at Bethlehem; the massacre of the innocents; the flight to Egypt; and the return of Joseph and Mary to Nazareth.

1–12. The Wise Men. Burne Jones, the artist, said that this story was too beautiful not to be true, and he has depicted the scene in a lovely tapestry. It really amounts to sacrilege to apply the cold implements of historical criticism to a narrative which breathes the spirit of such pure poetry. Wise men is the rendering of the word Magoi (Magi), a technical term for a Persian priest versed in magic and astrology. The Jews through their exile may very well have influenced Babylonian and Persian thought, and there are evidences that the people of the East were expecting a world deliverer to appear in the West who would usher in a golden era of world peace. We know also that a deputation from Parthia came to pay homage to Nero in 66 A.D. as Mithras incarnate; that deputation returned by a different route from the one by which it came. It is true also that the Parsees believed that the coming of a great hero was heralded by the appearance of a striking star, as was the birth of Alexander the Great. Whatever may have been the nature of the original event here described, the narrative has an abiding value which we must not overlook. It suggests the truth that the Babe of Bethlehem is to be a magnetic power to draw the Gentiles as well as the Jews, and that those men are deservedly called wise who in small beginnings see great possibilities, and who realize that life reaches its zenith in the adoration of Him who deserves the homage of our hearts and the choicest gifts that we can bestow. They also are wise who shun that spirit of worldliness whose purpose it is, as illustrated in the spirit of Herod, to destroy all that Bethlehem represents in life.

13–15. The Flight to Egypt. There is no mention of the flight to Egypt in the Lucan narrative, for there we gather that about two months or so after the birth the parents of Jesus left for Nazareth to settle there. The O.T. quotation (Hos. 11¹) is not very apt, for the prophet in his statement refers to the past history of the nation and of how God called it out of bondage, and there is really nothing at all prophetic there. However, it is not impossible that the journey was made, and that, as so often in Matthew, it is narrated just because it can be connected with an O.T. passage.

16–18. The Massacre of the Innocents. Herod was quite capable of this act of cruelty, but no mention of it is made by any contemporary historian nor can we fit the incident very well into the Lucan chronology. The story of the infancy of Moses contains an interesting parallel to it.

17. Jer. 31¹⁵. Ramah was some distance to the north of Jerusalem while Bethlehem was to the south. Not Rachel but Leah was the ancestral mother of Judah. The purport of the quotation is hard to explain unless it be to create a mood and atmosphere appropriate to the present story.

19–23. The Return to Nazareth. Herod's realm was divided into four parts after his death. Archelaus was tetrarch of Judæa and Antipas was ruler in Galilee. The parents, according to the story, choose Nazareth because of their fear of Archelaus, and this may very well be the case, but we must also remember that they are going back to a town of which they have been long residents.

23. Nazarene. The Greek word is Nazōraios, which is a quite different word from Nazarenos. Some derive the word from the Hebrew word Nezer in Isa. 11¹, which means a "branch" or "shoot," and later came to have a Messianic significance. Others connect it with the Hebrew word Nezorai used in Isa. 49⁶ to describe Him who shall both restore Israel and be a light to the Gentiles. Canon Box thinks that the word "Nazarene" was an early designation applied to Jesus and his disciples which in time acquired a contemptuous meaning (cf. Jn. 14⁶). Jewish Christians changed it to Nazaraean, a title of honor, which suggested that he was the "branch" of Messianic prophecy (cf. Isa. 11¹). For a similar play on a word, see the note on Isa. 62⁴.

CHAPTER III

1–12. The Forerunner of Jesus. See notes on Mk. 12–8, and cf. Lk. 31–20 Jn. 16–36. There is a long interval of time between chs. 2 and 3. Without a preamble of any kind we are ushered into the wilderness of Judæa and are introduced to the ascetic, austere figure of the Baptist clad in his rude robe of camel's hair, bound with a leathern girdle. The description of the movement inaugurated by him and of the message he proclaimed has probably been colored by later Christian influences. The evangelists (especially the fourth) see John in the light of what happened afterward. If he held the Christian views attributed to him in the fourth Gospel (see 127), it is impossible to understand why he did not identify himself with the disciples of Jesus (cf. 113).

In this paragraph we learn several important things about John. (1) His message (v. 2) is exactly the same as that of Jesus in Mk. 114, 15. The Greek word translated repent must not be interpreted exclusively from its etymological meaning, "change of mind." It includes also sorrow for sins and failures as well as moral conversion. (2) John is essentially a pathfinder (Isa. 403). His special task it is to awaken in men the slumbering moral and religious emotions preparatory to the coming of Christ. (3) He challenges Pharisees and Sadducees—the former for choking religion with the bonds of ceremonialism, the latter for starving religion with the husks of materialism and worldly conduct. Both are compared by him to vipers (v. 7) because of their subtle poisonous influence on society and their tempting of men to evil courses. One of their worst faults (v. 9) was that of relying on good done by others in the past to excuse their own present sins. (4) He proclaims an imminent judgment (v. 10). The Jews believed in a judgment, but not on themselves; the heathen only were to experience its severity. The judgment announced by the Baptist will include those who lead lives that are useless and without fruit. (5) He employs apocalyptic imagery. The ministry of the coming Messiah is conceived of in terms of strength and fire; to this is added the emphasis on "Spirit" (in the Holy Ghost), for the ministry of the new Messiah is to be creative, soul-renewing and constructive. The figure of the winnowing fan means that Jesus will be concerned only with reality, and with those things that will sustain life. There is much that we regard as important which from Jesus' standpoint is nothing but "chaff for the burning."

13-17. The Baptism of Jesus. See notes on Mk. 19-11 and cf. Lk. 321, 22. We now arrive at one of the great impressive moments in the career of Jesus. Luke informs us that at the baptism Jesus was engaged in prayer, and those prayer experiences of the Master were often the occasions of mystic visions. The Transfiguration, e.g., came upon Jesus "as he was praying" (Lk. 929). It is while in the midst of this exalted spiritual mood that he receives a deep conviction of the transcendent majesty and power of God expressed symbolically in the words, the heavens were opened; to this there is added a new sense of the immanent working of God in the soul, expressed as the Spirit of God descending as a dove. The dove to the Jews was a symbol of gentleness, peace, and new-creating life: so the Spirit quietly broods (cf. Gen. 12).

The question is often asked why Jesus came to a baptism which is described as a baptism for the remission of sins. The answer given in two recent popular lives of Jesus is because he was conscious of sin, a reason which the context does not justify. John's words to Jesus imply that he was previously aware of the moral ascendancy of Christ, and the important statement of Jesus to the Baptist implies that he felt that baptism was not necessary as far as he was concerned, but he submits to the rite because, in his words, it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness. By the word "us" he means all the people, and by "righteousness," their duty and obligation to God. In the thought of Jesus, baptism was a symbolical way of dedicating oneself to the ideals and demands of a new life of righteousness. He availed himself of this significant moment in the history of his nation to identify himself with its aspirations for a better and holier life, and to dedicate himself publicly to his great life task. In doing this he felt that he was fulfilling a divine demand and obligation.

CHAPTER IV

1-11. The Temptation of Jesus. See notes on Mk. 112, 13, and cf. Lk. 41-13. The Greek word translated "temptation" in the LXX and N.T. denotes all those experiences in life such as pain, sorrow, disappointment, solicitation to sin, and conflict of duties, by which a man is tried or proved; the idea of solicitation to sin in the modern sense of temptation is found only in a very few passages in the N.T. This wilderness experience of Jesus, occurring as it does immediately after the baptism, and prior to the public ministry, is essentially a testing of him to ascertain what methods he is going to adopt to realize his ideals. To reach the real meaning of this incident we must get behind its symbolic phraseology. All the early Christians believed in a personal devil whose chief business it was to accuse and slander men: hence the name Diabolos, "the slanderer." The evangelist himself conceived of this incident as objectively enacted, but we must regard it as a profound spiritual experience of Jesus expressed in symbolic language. What was essentially inward is described as being outward as well. Incitement to evil may come from without, but the real struggle always takes place within. The narrative clearly shows that Jesus could not conform to the current Messianic ideals of the Jews, for it was just these Messianic ideals which constituted his temptation (cf. pp. 209-10).

The first temptation (vv. 3, 4) consists in the attempt to induce Jesus to give a prominent place to purely material ends. There is borne in on him the suggestion that the world's crying need is a new social and economic order. If only he would dedicate his God-given powers to this end, the world would be at his feet in a very short time. The answer of Jesus shows how well he knows that the heart of man is made for God. Bread alone will never satisfy the deep hunger pangs of the soul. He himself is sustained by that assuring word of God spoken to him at the baptism. The supreme task of Jesus is so to influence the hearts of men that they too will be able to hear the sustaining voice of God, not only as it speaks out of the pages of the ancient records, but as it speaks out of the transforming experiences of life. His great errand is a religious one in the widest meaning of the word.

The second temptation (vv. 5-7) takes us in imagination to the high roof of the Temple house where Roman soldiers were posted to overlook the crowds at the feast. The suggestion is made to Jesus that though he fling himself from this great height to the pavement below angels would bear him up in their hands according to the psalmist's promise, and in consequence men would flock to his banners and enthusiastically embrace his cause. By his answer Jesus shows that we are not to put God to the test by resorting to expedencies and ways that are direct violations of his laws. Jesus shows very conclusively that he is not going to resort to spectacular methods in his ministry among men. The fact gives us a criterion for judging certain events in the record.

The third temptation (vv. 7-9) is a very real one. The Jews expected their Messiah to be a great political leader leading his people to war against the oppressors and enemies of their race. Jesus absolutely repudiates the use of force to advance his cause; his help comes from God, and it is only as he conforms to his will that he can carry out his spiritual purposes among men.

12-17. Jesus Begins His Ministry at Capernaum. See notes on Mk. 114, 15. Matthew sees in the Galilean ministry of Jesus a striking fulfillment of the two prophecies in Isa. 91, 2.

16. The symbol of darkness fittingly hits off the moral plight and confusion of the society of Jesus' day, while the figure of light which we meet here for the first time in the N.T. admirably sets forth the essential character of the ministry of our Lord. The ministry of Jesus was a veritable dayspring from on high whose aim it was to bring beauty and loveliness to the gray, drab lives of men, to call forth the latent powers of the soul, to inspire in the hearts of men the psalm of praise and to prompt men with a desire to minister to others.

18-22. The Call of the Four Disciples. See notes on Mk. 116-20 Lk. 51-11.

23-25. Early Ministry of Jesus. See notes on Mk. 121-39 Lk. 431-44. A resumé of the ministry of Jesus, the main elements of which were teaching, preaching, and healing. Its popular far-reaching character is emphasized in v. 25. The new movement influenced the whole of Palestine.

CHAPTER V

The Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7). Scholars differ among themselves as to whether Matthew or Luke gives us the sermon in its more original form. Wellhausen and J. Weiss think that the briefer, terser forms in Lk. 617-49 preserve for us more accurately than Matthew the actual words of Jesus, while Harnack argues strongly for the early character of the Matthean account. It is not improbable that Luke is the earlier, but when we remember that our Lord spoke these words in Aramaic and that in translating them explanatory phrases are often necessary to make plain the true significance of his words, the longer forms in Matthew may be supposed to bring us often nearer to the mind of our Lord. In the work of interpreting this great sermon three things must be determined: (a) its significance for the disciples to whom it was first spoken; (b) its meaning for the church to whom the Gospel was written; (c) its application to the complex needs of modern life. (See further the notes on Luke's report).

1-12. The Beatitudes. The sermon opens with the moving lyrical strains of the beatitudes, which have inspired the hearts of multitudes through the ages, a sure sign of their genuineness and originality. Moffatt and others rearrange their order by bringing the third into second place.

3. Blessed. Some modern translators prefer the word "happy." The Semitic word does convey more the idea of happiness: it suggests success or prosperity, and is a formula of congratulation meaning "Oh the happiness of"; but to Greek-speaking Christians this did not exhaust the meaning of the word. Ignatius and Polycarp give the word a deep religious meaning when they use it to describe outstanding Christians, especially martyrs. Poor in spirit. Moffatt translates "who feel poor in spirit." To understand aright the type of character represented by this phrase we must remember that the term "poor" in the O.T. (Isa. 611mg. Ps. 912mg. 102mg.) was frequently applied to those men and women who, often wanting in worldly goods and persecuted for their loyalty to God, still remained stanch and true. Such men had learned to place complete confidence in God as the only true source of strength. There were such people in the days of Jesus, often disdained and despised by the official classes (cf. Jn. 7⁴⁹), who called them the am-haaretz—the people of the land. It is difficult to realize how venomous and bitter was the hate of the rabbis toward this ostracized and outcast class of people. Paul admirably described the poor in spirit in 2 Cor. 6¹⁰ (where read a pauper, yet a means of blessing to many; without a penny, yet possessing all things). Kingdom of heaven. Matthew prefers this expression to "kingdom of God" because Jews preferred not to use the sacred name. Realm (as in Moffatt) or Sovereignty is better than kingdom, being less static and local, and expresses better the idea of the present manifestation of God's power as well as its full climactic manifestation in the future. The poor in spirit are the people whom God desires as his subjects and loyal followers; through such men he will manifest his authority and extend his power in the world.

4. Mourn. J. Weiss claims that the word includes the thought of loud lament such as is common in Oriental lands. This lays too much stress on the external signs of grief. The beatitude could be paraphrased in these words, "Oh the happiness of those who are peculiarly sensitive to sin in themselves and in society, and who feel deeply all the distress caused by the greed and covetousness, the selfish ambitions and cruelty of men." Comforted. The N.T. lays special emphasis on the ministry of comfort. The Greek word literally means "to call to the side of." Jesus comforts men by bringing them through his gospel to the presence of a God of compassion and a friend of sinners, and into a kingdom whose foundations are justice and truth, and to a life that is immortal.

5. The meek. The modern associations of the word "meek" unfit it to translate the Greek here (prais). The word (an adjective) occurs only twice more in the N.T., in Mt. 11²⁹ 1 Pet. 3⁴; but the corresponding noun (prautes) is frequent in the Pauline Epistles (2 Cor. 10¹ Gal. 6¹ Col. 3¹²). In Mt. 11²⁹ Jesus emphasizes this beautiful grace as one that is outstanding in his own character, associating it with lowliness of heart; while Paul in 2 Cor. 10¹ appeals to the Corinthians by the gentleness and consideration of Christ. The word "gentle" conveys much better the idea underlying the Greek word, though it does not bring out the thought which is present in the O.T. idea of meekness, of reverence and humility before God. Inherit the earth. In the O.T. this expression is a symbolic expression for the good things which were to come with the Messianic kingdom. Here it conveys the daring thought of the Master that the world will be ultimately peopled by men and women who exemplify his Spirit in their lives. The possession of the earth by any other spirit leads to war, hate, and oppression. Since pride is considered by Jesus as one of the cardinal sins, it is no wonder that in his ethical teaching he enthrones its opposite.

6. Hunger and thirst is in the O.T. (Isa. 49¹⁰ 55^{1, 2}) an expression for intense spiritual longing. The compiler of the first Gospel is surely correct when he adds the words after righteousness; which are not in Lk. 6²¹. The word "righteousness" is found only ten times in the Gospels. Mark does not have it at all; Luke uses it once (17⁵); the fourth Gospel twice (Jn. 16⁸⁻¹⁰); the remaining occurrences are in Matthew's Gospel, and in all these occurrences Moffatt prefers to translate it by the word "goodness." The word has something of the O.T. meaning of the pervading of life by the principles of equity and humanity which is the immediate effect of the true religion of Jehovah. J. Weiss thinks that since this Gospel was written after Paul, the Pauline use of the word—righteousness before God as a ground of acceptance with him—is decisive for its meaning here. It has been well observed that blessedness is pronounced in this beatitude on unfulfilled aspiration. It is the intent and aim of our lives that is the all-important thing in the sight of God.

7. Merciful. The adjective is found again in Heb. 2¹⁷ only, where Christ is termed "a merciful and faithful high priest," but the verb, to obtain mercy, is quite common in the N.T. The merciful are the men and women who banish all feelings of revenge and ill will out of their hearts and who seek to cultivate an attitude of love and sympathy toward all mankind, especially toward the disfranchised and dispossessed. To Aristotle the emotion of pity was a troublesome one, and the function of tragedy, he said, was to evoke pity so that an outlet might be found for the perilous stuff. To Jesus, on the contrary, it is a divinely beneficial emotion which must be harnessed to practical and redemptive actions. What a contrast there was between the attitude of Jesus and Buddha in the presence of misery and wretchedness! The latter sought to escape from them while the former enters the haunts of wretchedness and woe to grapple with them and alleviate the sufferings of those who are their victims.

8. Pure in heart. H. Wheeler Robinson points out that out of eight hundred and fifty-one occurrences of the word heart in the O.T. one third denote personality as a whole—the inner life, character. A proportion of the remaining two thirds denote the emotional aspects of personality, but in a very large number the intellectual and volitional functions of conscious life are stressed. The word “heart” in this beatitude is the equivalent of personality. The idea of purity in Psa. 51 is coupled with a right spirit, and the purity of the N.T. always includes the ideas of integrity, singleness of purpose, the absence of low aims. To such is given Heaven’s richest reward—the capacity to see God wherever he reveals himself.

9. Peacemakers. This beatitude is placed last because the qualities described in the first seven are the essential prerequisites of the peacemaker. Its presence in the list shows the importance Christ placed on the ideals of peace, for he is pre-eminently God’s ambassador of reconciliation among men. The establishing of good will and harmony in home and in church, in community and in international relations calls for peace makers—men who can organize and carry into practice the ideals which they hold. To such is given open access to the glorious privileges of sonship in the blameless family of God. For the N.T. conditions of sonship, cf. the following: 2 Cor. 6:16-18 Gal. 3:26 4:1 Jn. 3:10 Mt. 25:34-40.

10-12. Some commentators regard these verses as additions of the compiler because they reflect a later period when the followers of Jesus suffered a great deal of persecution for their faith (cf. 1 Pet. 3:14-17). On the other hand, Jesus may have anticipated the persecution of his followers; for he would well know that the man who in a pagan, worldly, materialistic society incorporated in his life the graces of the beatitudes would surely have to face scorn, obloquy, and severe persecution. The experience of the church when the Gospel was written may have led the compiler to see deeper meanings in the original language of Jesus. Luke (6:22) in his account of these verses carries the interpretative principle still further, and applies it to include excommunication.

12. Reward. To the O.T. and Jewish ideas of reward Jesus adds new elements. See especially Mt. 20:1-16 25:21-23, where the reward becomes a free undeserved grace and is out of all proportion to the character and extent of the service rendered.

13-16. Four Sayings. Four distinct sayings are grouped together here to illustrate the Christian character. Four metaphors are used—salt, light, a city on a hill, a lamp on a lamp-stand.

13. See notes on Mk. 9:49 Lk. 14:34. Salt was used in Palestine for many purposes, such as to give brightness to lamps by sprinkling it in the oil, to purify and preserve from decay, and to sprinkle with the sacrifices. The metaphor stresses the distinctive elements of Christian character, the prime function of which is to give brightness to life, to preserve society from the forces of putrefaction and decay, and to give to the routine of life, which often becomes insipid and dull, zest and vital interest. Christian character bleached of its distinctive qualities is an utterly worthless thing.

14a. Light of the world. The distinctive graces illustrated in the beatitudes are for world service. Jesus with an ever-increasing wonder must often have watched the slow breaking of the light of dawn on the lovely hills of Palestine, awaking the flowers from their sleep, evoking the morning song of the birds, calling man from his home to enter the fields of labor. In the same way he sees the bright influence of his gospel, as it spreads over the world, helping to unfold the beauty latent in all human hearts, to call forth the song of praise and gladness, and to lead men forth to deeds of service and usefulness. (Jn. 8:12.)

14b. A city on a hill. The character of the Christian must stand out in prominence and give to men who behold it the impression that it is built on firm rocklike foundations, inspiring confidence in others and providing them with a shelter and a refuge.

15. Some interpreters compare Jesus to the lamp and the Christian to the stand, whose chief duty it is to reveal Christ as the light of men. Paul in his letters re-echoes the light metaphors of Jesus, as when he speaks of the armor of light (Rom. 13:12), sons of light (1 Thess. 5:5), fruit of light (Eph. 5:9). In John we have light of the world (8:12), and sons of light, 12:36 (cf. 1 Jn. 15:8).

16. Good works. This expression in the N.T. as used in Rev. 22, 19 includes not only practical deeds of kindness but also sterling qualities of character.

17-20. The Relation of Jesus to the Law. If vv. 18, 19 are genuine sayings of Jesus he definitely asserts that every minute requirement of the Law is valid and will be fulfilled, and that any violation of any one of the most insignificant of these requirements involves the infringement of the whole Law. Such teaching does not represent the mind of Jesus as it is revealed for us in the Gospels as a whole. Some of the sources used by the compiler of the Gospel were evidently influenced by the controversy between Paul and the Jewish-Christian section of the church in Jerusalem (see intro., p. 995a). This source Streeter designates by the letter M, and he thinks that in the heat of the controversy certain sayings of Jesus were interpreted by one or other of the contending parties, especially the Judaistic. The following verses are illustrative of the influence of this section of the church on Matthew's record: 10⁵⁻²³ 18¹⁵⁻¹⁷ 23^{2, 3, 8} 24²⁰.

17. Fulfill. Jesus fulfilled the Law by showing that religion in its essence was a different thing from law, and that a man who has been inwardly changed becomes a law to himself, seeing that he is guided by the Spirit of the Lord—for where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty (2 Cor. 3¹⁷). In his fulfillment of the Law Jesus distinguished between the moral and the ceremonial, and at the same time summarized the moral law in the two great commands of love to God and love to man (see 22³⁴⁻⁴⁰).

18. Verily. The Hebrews used the equivalent of this word, namely, Amen, after prayer and praise to corroborate and indorse, while Jesus gives the word a new use by prefixing it to his statements to give them weight and solemnity. This does not seem to have been done by the rabbis. Jot represents probably the Greek name for the letter i, which is similar in sound to the Hebrew letter yodh, which was also very small in size. Titile (a little horn) represents probably the point or extremity which distinguishes some Hebrew letters from others.

20. The Pharisees and Scribes were pre-eminently the two classes who claimed to be models in their exemplification of the Law and tradition of their nation. (See art., Backgrounds, pp. 840-2.) J. Weiss, commenting on the phrase "kingdom of God," claims that the Sermon provides no program for the improvement of the world and its affairs: it is only concerned with the question, What must I do to be a blessed one? This verse alone would suffice to show how very one-sided this judgment of Weiss is.

21-26. Concerning Murder. By inserting the second half of v. 22 after v. 21 we have a much more natural sequence. V. 22b will then represent a rabbinic comment on v. 21 and not the words of Jesus. This penetration beneath the overt act into the hidden springs of action reveals the true greatness and originality of Jesus as a teacher. Jesus here utters his protest against the whole spirit of the Judaism of his day, with its overemphasis on law and conformity to external codes. Since all improvement of character must begin from within, Jesus turns his searchlight upon the heart and shows men what are the lurking forces within that arrest all growth and possibility of reform. Mastery over anger is only possible to those who feel themselves responsible to God. An ethic without religion cannot do this.

21, 22. The judgment. It is best to take the word in both clauses as referring to the tribunal of God. Raca is an Aramaic word meaning "empty" and was an expression of contempt. Council—probably meaning the local Jewish "Sanhedrin" which existed in every small town. Hell of fire. A valley west and south of the city of Jerusalem, called Gehenna (see mg.), was the dumping ground for the refuse of the city; it became the symbol for the place of future punishment.—Zahn thinks that the whole of v. 22 is an utterance of Jesus, and that by it he is really satirizing the scribal methods of exegesis; but it is much better to regard it as a sample of current scribal interpretation which in course of tradition was without good reason attributed to Jesus.

23-26. Two illustrations are added to the comment of Jesus on the law concerning murder, both stressing the all-importance of good will and the fostering of right relations with men. In the first (vv. 23, 24) harmonious relations between ourselves and our fellows are emphasized; otherwise worship and communion with God are nullified. In the second (vv. 25, 26) the importance of paying one's debts at the right time is stressed to secure the welfare of society. Everything that occasions ill will, anger, misunderstanding, must be avoided because they are inimical to the best interests of the religious and social life as well as to the highest development of our own personality. Farthing (Greek kodrantes) was one fourth of an as, and an as was one sixteenth of a denarius, which was equal to about twenty cents (see art., Time, Money, p. 79).

27-30. Adultery. (Ex. 20¹⁴ Deut. 5¹⁸.) Jesus combines the seventh commandment and the tenth. This moral law was enacted to secure the peace and the purity of the home. Jesus goes beyond the O.T. Law by condemning all wrong thoughts and desires. Impurity is one of the great evils against which the followers of Christ must make truceless war. Purity is an equal obligation on men and women, married and unmarried. The relation of vv. 29, 30 and the preceding verses is not very close. They are quoted again in Mt. 18^{8, 9} Mk. 9⁴³⁻⁴⁸ (see notes) to show that the costliest sacrifice is essential to enter into life, while the words are quoted here to stress the fact that no sacrifice is too great to attain the priceless gift of purity.

31, 32. Divorce. The N.T. teaching on divorce is to be found in the following passages: Mk. 10¹¹, 12 Mt. 19³⁻⁹ Lk. 16¹⁸ 1 Cor. 7 (see notes). The exceptive clause except for fornication is found only in the Matthew version of the saying (cf. 19⁹). Among the Jews there were two schools, one led by Shammai, which granted divorce on the ground of adultery alone, and the more lax school of Hillel, which permitted divorce on any pretext which the husband might offer (p. 841). So in the early church there were two schools, one which made the words of Jesus absolute and the other which permitted the exception. Mark and Luke represent the first, while Matthew supports the second. A similar division is found among modern scholars. Wellhausen, R. H. Charles, and H. G. Wood, while they regard the exceptive clause as an interpolation, claim that it nevertheless interprets our Lord's meaning because he was addressing himself to the question of divorce on inadequate grounds. Gore and Box, on the other hand, claim that the exceptive clause was introduced by the early Palestinian church to secure divorce for proved adultery and the remarriage of the innocent party. There seems no doubt that the original words of Jesus expressed the prohibition of divorce in its absolute form, but whether this high ideal can be embodied in the civil codes of nations is a matter of debate. (Streeter, Adventure, ch. 3.)

33-37. Truthfulness in Speech. (Cf. on 23¹⁶.) In the judgment of Jesus, truthfulness and the ability to depend on the simple assertions of men were indispensable for the maintenance of communal life. Pre-eminently was it essential when men appeared before God that language should be stripped bare of all unreality and pretense. V. 37 is found in purer form in Jas. 5¹², "Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay." Jesus has in mind the casuistical distinctions made by the Jews between different formulas and especially of the way in which they abused the Corban oath (see on Mk. 7¹¹). To swear by the head (v. 36) means to set one's life in pawn. Jesus is not thinking of the use of oaths in civil courts—a procedure which civilized communities have found useful in the administration of justice.

38-42. The Law of Revenge. (Ex. 21²⁴ Lev. 24²⁰ Deut. 19¹⁻¹¹ Lk. 6²⁹.) J. Weiss thinks that Jesus is here laying down a principle for a particular period in the life of the church, and that in consequence the command is only of temporary educative value. The phrase non-resistance or passive resistance which is often applied to this passage is decidedly a misnomer. Jesus is giving illustrations of the principle, "Overcome evil with good," and in so doing is registering his firm belief in the victorious power of goodness and benevolence. To meet by a revengeful spirit injury or insult done to oneself is only to multiply the evil and increase it a hundredfold. (Cf. the discussion in art., Bible Manners and Customs, p. 75a.)

39. Evil. The Greek word can mean the devil or any maliciously disposed person. Right cheek. To strike a person on the right cheek one must ordinarily use the back of the right hand: such a blow was considered among the Jews a very real insult.

40. The picture here is that of a law court where a cruel client exacts the severest penalty of the law by taking a man's shirt. The defendant is urged to part with his upper garment as well, and so make his adversary feel utterly embarrassed. The language is hyperbolic.

41. Compel. The Greek word is of Persian origin and was originally used of compelling men to undertake postal services for the government.

43-48. Love of Enemies. This law is surely one of the highest and most difficult which Jesus has given to us. He himself perfectly and beautifully fulfilled it in his own triumphant life. The measure in which we carry it out in our daily life depends on the degree in which we possess his Spirit. In true love there are three elements: admiration, the desire to possess, and the will to benefit; but all three are not emphasized wherever we find the word. In love to one's enemies it is the third element that is stressed. The follower of Jesus who can attain to this high ideal of loving his enemies will discover as his reward that he is approximating to the character of God, since one of the most glorious features in his character is his impartial kindness. He will also gain an entrance into the ranks of the sons of God (v. 45); his conduct will have the hall-mark of what in Lk. 6³² is called charis (gracious adornment) and here in Matthew perisson (worthy of note), a word which Loisy translates by the French word extraordinaire; lastly, he will find himself on the road to moral perfection.

48. Perfect. Luke (6³⁶) has "merciful," which shows that the special aspect of perfection in this verse is not moral perfection so much as perfection in kindness, sympathy, and generosity. The other must not be excluded, however, for the teleios or perfect man, according to Epictetus, was the man who had set his feet on the true path and was still advancing—"going on unto perfection."

CHAPTER VI

The religious life must express itself in benevolence, devotion and worship, self-discipline and self-examination, and in self-possession and calmness of spirit. Jesus in this chapter sharply criticizes the outward forms in which the religious people of his day gave expression to their piety.

True Righteousness Illustrated. This is the theme of the chapter, and the illustrations concern almsgiving (vv. 1-4), prayer (vv. 5-15), fasting (vv. 16-18), and quiet trust and confidence (vv. 19-34).

1-4. Almsgiving. V.1 is the text; the rest of the chapter supplies illustrations. The Greek word ordinarily translated righteousness, Moffatt renders by the word "charity"; J. Weiss uses the German word which means "piety" the Twentieth Century N.T. has "religious duties." No one English word can convey the full meaning of this Greek word, which embraces the idea of piety as it expresses itself in various religious duties. Our Lord puts his finger on the weak place in the religion of his day in the phrase to be seen of men. As with so many Oriental cults, Judaism in his day lacked greatly the elements of inwardness and conscience. The Pharisee considered that he had been amply rewarded when he had gained a reputation among the people for devoutness of spirit. The men who aspire in religion after reputation and popularity miss altogether the highest rewards of the religious life—fellowship with God and the consciousness of his favor (cf. note on 5⁶).

2, 3. The giving of alms was not a religious duty required by the Law; for that reason special merit was attached to it. Ample opportunities presented themselves for ostentatious giving, for, as we read in Acts 33-10, beggars posted themselves near the Temple precincts, and during the great pilgrimages near the city gateways. What a contrast there was between the unostentatious almsgiving of a Cornelius and that of the Pharisees! His alms, we are told, went up as a memorial before God (Acts 104, 31). His almsgiving illustrates perfectly that striking expression of Jesus, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. Sound a trumpet is a figurative expression for noisy ostentatious giving. Usually the sounding of trumpets was only resorted to on the occasions of public fasting and in times of drought. Hypocrites. This is the first instance of this word in the Gospel, where it occurs no less than ten times. In the Greek of the period the word denoted an actor or stage player; hence its use in the N.T. of a pretender or dissembler whose religion is a mask behind which there hides a great deal of unreality and treachery. They have received their reward. The Greek word to receive (apecho) is frequently found on the Egyptian ostraca used as receipts for money paid. Jesus intimates that the Pharisees have in the plaudits and approval of men received all the reward they are likely to get. They can now even give a receipt for the same.

4. The A.V. adds the word openly, which is not found in the best MSS. Its omission gives a meaning in complete harmony with the message of Jesus.

5-8. Prayer. Prayer formed a very important element in the religious life of the Jew; wherever he chanced to be the true Israelite lifted up his heart to God at dawn, noon, and sunset. It formed an important element in the life of the home and in the services of the synagogue and the Temple. At the great feast days special prayers appropriate for the season were offered by the people. Jesus singles out three elements for criticism in the prayer life of his day: (1) Its ostentatiousness. The Pharisees contrived to be in the most crowded thoroughfares at the appointed hours so that they might gain an audience. (2) Its formality. The Greek word translated vain repetitions (battalogia) means to babble or speak words without thought or meaning. A senseless heaping together of words and phrases was characteristic of many cults and of certain religious circles in Palestine. The well-known prayer of eighteen petitions which every Israelite prayed three times daily is ten times longer than the Lord's prayer. (3) Its lack of filial trust and confidence. This long, tedious repetition of all one's needs and desires showed, in the judgment of Jesus, a lack of trust in their heavenly Father who knew all their needs.

9-15. The Lord's Prayer. (See Lk. 112-4.) A comparison of this prayer in Matthew and Luke shows that the form in Matthew is longer. Most scholars are of the opinion that the prayer in Luke is the original one and that the additions in Matthew were made for liturgical purposes in the early church. The prayer is conspicuous for its brevity and for the revelation it gives us of the dominant concerns of Jesus in his earthly life.

9. After this manner pray ye. The Greek says literally "so pray ye," and the so—used in the emphatic sense—governs every petition of the prayer and indicates the fact that it is a model and type of what a liturgical prayer should be, for Jesus by giving this model prayer is showing how the church should imitate his method and fashion new prayers for the changing and growing needs of life. The compilers of the collects in the Common Prayer book learned their lesson admirably. Many church services would be greatly enriched by the use of some modern collects.

Our Father which [who] art in heaven. Luke has simply the word "Father," but we find Matthew's phrase in Mk. 11²⁵, 26, so it is quite possible that Jesus was accustomed to address God by this longer expression. The word our emphasizes the intimate loving relationship between father and son, while the words in heaven serve to bring out the majesty and power of God. Thy name is a periphrasis for God. To hallow is to regard a person or thing with reverence; the opposite of hallowing in the O.T. is "profaning," and men were guilty of that when they gave to God a divided allegiance and persisted in holding imperfect conceptions of him. We reverence him when our devotion to him is pure and when our thoughts of him are high.

10. Thy kingdom come. Modern translators prefer the word "rule" or "dominion" to the word "kingdom," the latter being too local and giving the idea that it was used by the Master in an exclusively eschatological sense—which is not the case, since Jesus referred to the exercise of God's power in nature and in the affairs of men, while in Mt. 21⁴³ he speaks of the Kingdom being taken from the Jews and given to some other people. Jesus appreciated to the full the manifestations in the life of his day of the beginnings of a lordship of God, but his followers are to pray constantly for a fuller manifestation of the sovereignty of God in the affairs of men. Thy will be done. This petition is a further unfolding of the preceding request, for it is only when the will of God is done by all in every section of society and when all that opposes that will is removed that the kingdom of God will come in all its power and influence.

11. As in heaven. Heaven is the place of perfection. There all is ideal because all embodies and expresses the will of God. The kingdom of God is therefore the kingdom of heaven realized on earth, i.e., the will of God expressed in all human life. Daily bread. The Greek word translated daily (epiousios) is a very rare word and is in consequence variously rendered. Origen and Jerome suggested "necessary for existence"; Loisy prefers "sufficient for the day"; Moffatt and many others think that the word means "for the following day." We can pray for the morrow but we are not to worry about it. Marcion's reading, Thy bread give unto us, was very widespread in the early church and may have reference to Mt. 44 and Jn. 432.

12. Forgive us our debts. For debt Luke has "sins"; the word "transgression" (trespass) has come into the prayer from the Common Prayer book. "Debt" is more comprehensive than "sin"; it includes sins of omission and commission. We are to ask God to forgive us the non-fulfillment of our obligations to him and to society and to the moral discipline of our own personality. In order to receive his forgiveness we must continually exercise a forgiving spirit to those who have wronged us (cf. Mk. 11²⁵).

13. Bring us not into temptation. The preceding petition pleaded for the forgiveness of sins that were past; this petition pleads for protection from sins in the future. Without our Lord's original words it is impossible for us to explain the real significance of this difficult request. The best light upon it is to be found in our Lord's experience in the garden of Gethsemane, when he enjoins his disciples to pray that they enter not into temptation. Cause us not to be led unto temptation would perhaps better convey the meaning of this prayer, for Jesus knew that in hours of great trial the soul was exposed to very insidious perils and moral dangers. Deliver us from [the] evil [one]. The word evil in the N.T. refers sometimes to Satan, in whose power the world lay, according to the belief of some in the days of Jesus (see art., Backgrounds, p. 846b; cf. p. 206a); but in other places the word means evil in the abstract. Here the first meaning is the probable one, for to the early Christians the sovereignty of the devil was opposed to that of God (see Rev. 12, note). From this malign influence the disciples are to pray for deliverance.

Thine is the kingdom, etc. The familiar doxology with which the Lord's Prayer usually concludes does not have the best MS. support. See v. 13 mg.

14, 15. Matthew adds to the prayer a further statement on the importance of forgiving one another as a pre-condition for receiving divine forgiveness.

16-18. Fasting. Jesus takes for granted the prevailing custom of fasting. It is not forbidden by him (Mk. 218-22, note), but he does severely condemn the practice of some in his time who wore the hair long and disfigured the face to make themselves unrecognizable. Jesus would have men anoint their heads and wash their faces and live normal lives and yet at the same time practice the most rigid self-discipline and self-control (cf. 2323, note).

19-34. Piety as it Expresses Itself in a Life of Complete Trust and Freedom from Care. In this beautiful paragraph Jesus gives his answer to the all-important question of how a man can live a life free from distracting care and worry. The answer may be classified by verses as follows: 19, 20; 21-23; 24; 25-32; 33-34. Cf. notes on Lk. 1213-34.

19, 20. We are to realize the uncertain character of material possessions—expensive clothes easily spoiled by moths and worms, and silver and gold which thieves could steal in spite of the strongest barriers.

21–23. Cf. notes on 12^{38–42} Lk. 11^{29–36}. The heart is made for the light of divine knowledge which alone can illumine it and prevent sin from gaining possession of our lives. Single eye (v. 22). The Greek word translated single (haplous), according to Souter, means directing the eye to one definite object, and is a symbolic expression for singleness of purpose; others conjecture that since the word single is contrasted with evil eye, and as the latter is used in Proverbs for niggardliness, so the single eye is a metaphorical expression for generosity. In Mk. 7²² the expression “evil eye” means envy, so possibly the single eye is one that is trustful and entirely free from envy.

24. Personality is incapable of a dual allegiance; it is so richly and wonderfully made that only God can fill the deep voids of the heart. If earthly treasures are made the chief ends of our human quest, we are doomed to failure and bitter disappointment, for the heavenly Maker of souls has so made us that we cannot find abiding peace outside himself. Mammon. The word occurs elsewhere in the N.T. three times, namely, Lk. 16^{9, 11, 13}. The Aramaic word mammon is the equivalent of money, riches, worldly goods, and is derived by Dalman from aman, meaning “that on which one puts one’s trust.”

25–32. We are to realize the insignificance of things like food and clothing and to remember that there are some things beyond our control. To the Jew, man was a unity made up of a number of parts, all drawing their life from a breath soul which has no existence apart from the body. The body contains heart, liver, kidneys, eyes, ears, hands, and mouth, each capable not only of physical activity, but also of psychological functions (see art., Interestamental Religion, pp. 202–4). Is the body consisting of such wonderful capacities to be occupied merely with questions of food and clothing? Stature (Greek helikia, v. 27). The word is sometimes rendered “age,” but stature better fits the context. Jesus shows the futility of anxious care concerning one’s physical size or the span of one’s years.

33, 34. We are to overcome the evil of care by filling the mind and heart with the concerns of the kingdom of God, a great soul-filling and mind-absorbing end; and we are to struggle after his righteousness—the victory of good in the world, and also personal perfection. We do this by taking each day as it comes from the hands of a gracious God, permitting only the duties of the day to claim our thought. Such a frame of mind is an inexhaustible source of strength for a successful struggle for existence.

CHAPTER VII

1–5. Warning Against Censorious Criticism. (Lk. 6^{37^{f.}}.) To arrogate to oneself the function of a censor of other people’s conduct, especially when one’s own life is far from blameless, has a demoralizing influence on character. It breeds arrogance and a sense of superiority—the deadly enemies of humility and self-examination and the sworn foes of tolerance and kindly sympathy. This perversity of character was far too widespread to be confined to the Pharisees: all classes provided examples of it. While the words must not be interpreted as meaning that we must close our eyes to the moral faults of our age, yet the beautiful example of Jesus, who said to those who brought the woman taken in adultery, “He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her” (Jn. 8⁷, notes), should be our guide. Inability to realize one’s own weaknesses leads to an unsympathetic judgment of others.

1, 2. In exercising the sacred function of judgment we must ever remember that we are to appear before the august and holy tribunal of God. This saying is expanded in Lk. 6^{37, 38} by a beautiful statement illustrative of God’s generous treatment of men. The measuring is a further illustration of the judgment, but in Luke it refers more to the exercise of good will and kindness, while in Mk. 4²⁴ it applies to the degree of moral and intellectual application given to the parables of Jesus.

3–5. This hyperbolic saying may have been an Oriental proverb of the time; the mote is any small piece of straw or splinter of wood, and the beam a large plank, figurative for a conspicuous moral fault. Even a small fault makes it hard for us to arrive at a true knowledge of others.

6. Guarding the Holy from Profane Use. F. Perles has tried to reconstruct the Aramaic of this expression, and he makes the claim that the saying originally ran, “Hang no rings on dogs and put no pearls on the snouts of pigs,” which was probably a proverbial saying of the time, meaning that one should not present beautiful and noble things to those who have no capacity to appreciate them. In the form in which we have it, it is doubtful whether it correctly reports Jesus, since it seems to contradict violently the injunction of vv. 1–5. The words are probably the reflection of the Christian church in Jerusalem, which was much concerned that the word of God and especially the sacraments should not be given to unworthy men.

7-11. Importunity in Prayer. See notes on Lk. 119-13. The imperatives used in this paragraph could be translated, Keep on asking; make a regular practice of seeking; continue knocking. Perseverance in prayer is greatly emphasized in the teaching of Jesus and in the N.T. generally. It is the inwrought or heart-felt prayer that availeth much (Jas. 5:16). Importunity implies that the thing desired is a deeply felt want which we consider indispensable for our moral development. The other element in prayer which is stressed in these verses is that of trust in a heavenly Father. Jesus is probably giving us here a glimpse into his home life at Nazareth: he still carries the memory of the kindness of Joseph, who loved to give the boy an egg or fish for his morning meal. The Jews were fond of arguing from a lesser example to a greater. What were the good things (v. 11) that Jesus was thinking God would give us? Was he thinking of the precious gifts of aspiration, reverence, hope, love, and humility, which God freely grants to his loved ones? Luke (11:13) has "Holy Spirit," which reveals a later stage in the history of Christ's words.

12. The Golden Rule. The positive form of this noble rule, admirably described as golden, was first expressed by Jesus. Hillel gave expression to it in its negative form: "What is hateful to thee, do not to thy neighbor: this is the whole law, all else is comment." Israel Abrahams vainly tries to prove that the rule in its negative form is of deeper significance and wider application than the positive form of Jesus.

A Series of Practical Applications. (Vv. 13-27.) The discourse closes with a number of exhortations drawn from several sources, in which the contrast is drawn between the narrow and the broad way, the good and the worthless tree, and the sensible and the foolish builder.

13, 14. The Narrow Door and the Confined Way. Was this the pessimistic estimate of Jesus, or do the words reflect the insularity of the church in Jerusalem? In the saying in Luke (13:23, 24), the contrast between the narrow and the broad way is not made. The truth that Jesus stated there is that many will lack the moral stamina of the prophets to press on in the way of righteousness with all its hindrances.

15-20. Warning Against False Prophets and the Unfruitful Life. (Mk. 13:5, 6, 22, note.) Luke omits the saying about the false prophets, and as false Christian prophets did not appear till after the Lord's death, when the struggles with Judaizing Christians began (cf. Jn. 4:1), this saying probably reflects the judgment of the early church against those who made loud profession of their faith, but whose lives were completely out of harmony with it. By their fruits. Actions betray the condition of the soul. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is surely one of the most distinctive and oft-quoted sayings of the Master. The manner of the everyday life of the followers of Jesus should be one of the infallible tests by which they can be distinguished from others. Christian character is very fittingly compared to fruit: (a) Fruit is that for which the whole tree exerts itself and in which it finds its end. (b) Fruit distinguishes the tree. The infinite variety of fruits is one of the most wonderful provisions of a bountiful nature. Christian character need not be uniform and stereotyped but must express itself in ever fresh and varying forms. (c) Fruit has its own beauty. In the Greek of v. 17, two different words are used for good. The tree is agathon; the fruit is kalos. Hort defines kalos as that kind of goodness which is at once seen to be good, goodness as a definite object of contemplation, beauty being the obvious characteristic of such goodness. (d) Fruit takes time to mature and ripen. So the higher reaches of character are not attained except by long patience and resolute perseverance.

21-23. Warning Against Self-deception. When we compare these words, especially the reference to prophecy, casting out devils, and doing mighty works, with Lk. 6:46 13:25, it looks as if the form in Matthew has been developed from the simpler one in Luke. Miracle workers and exorcists, as we know from Acts, did their work in the name of Jesus, using it as a successful means of exorcism (cf. Mk. 9:38 Acts 19:13-19). Though the saying has suffered in Matthew yet it preserves a solemn warning of the Master—that it is possible to be engaged in the outward forms of Christian service, and even to gain apparently reliable results, without doing the will of God and truly serving his kingdom. Some commentators think that the words contain the condemnation of the early church against the overemphasis on exorcism and ecstatic gifts, to the neglect of the more inward and spiritual graces of Christianity (cf. notes on 1 Cor. 14:1-19).

24-27. The Parables of the Builders. It is very instructive that the Sermon on the Mount, a great architect's blue print for the building of the house of character, should close with these two contrasting parables. Jesus as a village carpenter would often be employed to do the wood work of synagogues, barns, and houses of varying kinds. From his experience he derives some most helpful counsel on the all-important business of building the house of life. Note especially the additions in Lk. 647-49. (1) The choice of architect. According to Luke, the parable begins with the words "Everyone that cometh unto me." Christ is the peerless architect of character. His knowledge of the essential harmony between the beautiful and the useful, his understanding of the laws of strain and stress to which the building must be subjected, the unique building he himself has raised, the applicability of his designs for all classes and races, make him unequalled as a designer of the house of character. (2) The house must have a permanent and dependable foundation. If one can secure a rock foundation, the building can be lofty and spacious. The only worthy foundation for the house of life is the teaching of Jesus (1 Cor. 3^{10f.} note). To reach its permanent principles three things are necessary: We must hear the words, dig deep into their abiding significance, and carry them out into practical life. (3) Luke tells that the house withstood the tempest because it had been well builded (648). In the sermon Jesus shows us the lovely stones which we must build into the structure of our character—purity, gentleness, courage, sincerity, benevolence, trust, a passion for righteousness. The plan of Jesus makes special provision for two rooms—the inner chamber of prayer, which is the soul's sanctuary; and the living room, with its lamps of good works and its windows looking out on the glories of nature, and on life with all its sins and problems.

28, 29. The Impression Made by Jesus' Words. Even if it be true that Matthew has collected into one long discourse the teachings that were scattered throughout the ministry, this does not weaken the force of this closing tribute. The "common people," who "heard Jesus gladly" (Mk. 1237, note), recognized in his words an authority which they did not find in the professional teachers. Those teachers were forever concerned with tradition and its interpretation. In what Jesus said there was a freshness and a power, enforced by his own personality, which even the most unlettered could appreciate.

CHAPTER VIII

Just as in chs. 5-7 Matthew collects the sayings of Jesus, so in chs. 8, 9 he describes for us ten typical mighty works. Nine of them are "healing" miracles, and one is a "nature" miracle. This is about the proportion in which the two kinds of miracle stand to each other throughout the Gospel record. (See further the art., N.T. Miracles, pp. 923-4).

1-4. The Healing of a Leper. See notes on Mk. 140-45 Lk. 512-16. This miracle is reproduced by Matthew almost verbatim from Mark, with the characteristic omission (intro. p. 953b) of Mark's strongly emotional words "moved with compassion" (v. 41) and the words "strictly charged" (v. 43). Matthew also omits v. 45.

5-13. The Nobleman of Capernaum. See notes on Lk. 71-10. Mark does not tell this incident in his narrative. It is one of the few incidents related in the Q document (intro., p. 954). This centurion was probably in the service of Herod Antipas. As Jews were exempt from military service he would be a Gentile, though there is no reason to infer that he was a proselyte. For a Jew to enter the house of a Gentile was pollution; consequently, some scholars make v. 7 read as a question, Am I to come and heal him? But surely Jesus had shaken off entirely the incubus of the law of ceremonial cleanness, and it is much more in harmony with his character to take the words as a direct statement. It is interesting to observe that the only two miracles in which the healing occurs without Jesus seeing the patient are in the cases of two Gentiles—here and in the story of the daughter of the Syrophenician woman. According to Matthew the nobleman comes himself; in Luke elders of the Jews act as envoys. It is not improbable that the extreme Judaism of certain early evangelists sought to place a barrier between Jesus and the Gentiles. Some think that this incident teaches symbolically that Jesus helped the heathen without entering into their world, and that the centurion is the first fruit of the gathering of the Gentiles into the kingdom of God.

6. Lord here is simply a respectful form of address.

9. The contrast is with under authority, for Jesus was under no human authority in his work.

10. Jesus often spoke of the faith of those who appealed to him (cf. 922-29 1528). This incident is important to the evangelist because in its revelation of faith it forms a notable exception in the ministry of Jesus.

11, 12. Matthew regards this as a fitting place to insert two significant sayings of Jesus. They occur in Lk. 1329 in a different context, and later in the ministry of our Lord, after he had become convinced that those who were so peculiarly fitted by training and tradition for the kingdom of God would be rejected and the Gentiles from east and west would be drawn by the splendor of its ideals and the unusual magnetic power of the Lord of the Kingdom. This universalism of Jesus is wonderfully anticipated in Isa. 22-4 49¹². Jesus is fond of comparing the Kingdom to a banquet hall (Mt. 22¹⁻¹³, note, Lk. 22³⁰). The graphic description of those in outer darkness (v. 12) must not be taken as a description of hell, for nothing is said definitely about the final fate of those who are thrust out.

14-17. Peter's Wife's Mother. See notes on Mk. 129-31 Lk. 431-44. Matthew sees in the healing ministry of Jesus a striking fulfillment of Isa. 53⁴, one of his happiest O.T. quotations. Matthew does not quote the LXX here but translates freely from the original text. The Greek writer Galen uses Matthew's word bastazo (to carry) of bearing away sickness. Cf. 1 Pet. 2²⁴, where a different Greek word is used, but still in the sense of bearing away.

18-22. Two Candidates for Discipleship. See notes on Lk. 957-62. Both are followers of Jesus, though Matthew describes the first as a scribe who impulsively offers himself for permanent companionship, and the second delays to accept a call that has already been given.

20. Son of man. This is the first occurrence of the phrase in Matthew. There seems to be no doubt that Jesus used the title of himself, because it best expressed what he was, not only as a periphrasis for "I" but as a periphrasis for Messiah, and because it gave such little support to the political and nationalistic hopes which the Jews attached to the person of the Messiah. There is quite a distinct group of passages in the Gospels where the title Son of man is used in reference to the anticipated sufferings and death of Jesus (cf. Mk. 831 99, 12, 31 1421; also p. 846).

22. This saying of Jesus has perplexed many, because it was probably an Aramaic proverb which has been spoiled in translation. Some interpret the proverb to mean Let the dead past bury its dead; others reconstruct the Aramaic to read Leave the dead to him who buries dead bodies. Wendt thinks that the man's father was alive and that his request is only an excuse for delay. The first dead in the sentence can be interpreted as spiritually dead, for as such Jesus considers all those who have not responded to his appeal and who remain outside his circle. The saying may have been occasioned by some peculiar circumstance of the disciple unknown to us. Perhaps it was uttered by Jesus in a moment of tense emotion, after his experiencing in the example of others how the ties of family and home were proving an insuperable obstacle to the highest and best form of discipleship.

23-27. The Storm on the Lake. See notes on Mk. 435-41 Lk. 822-25. Matthew abbreviates by omitting several of the picturesque details of the narrative in Mark and by toning down the distressed cry of the disciples when they realize their plight (see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 923b).

28-34. The Gadarene Demoniac. See notes on Mk. 51-20 Lk. 826-37.

CHAPTER IX

See note at beginning of ch. 8.

1-8. Healing of the Paralytic. See notes on Mk. 21-12 Lk. 518-26.

9-13. Call of Matthew and Intercourse with Taxgatherers. See notes on Mk. 213-17 Lk. 527-38. Jesus quoted the saying in v. 13 from Hos. 66, I desire goodness [kindness, mg.] and not sacrifice, because it expressed so concisely his own mind concerning the elaborate ceremonial and ritual observances of the religion of his day which so often blinded the people to the paramount claims of social service and benevolent ministry.

14-17. See notes on Mk. 218-22 Lk. 533-39.

18-26. Healing of Jairus' Daughter and the Woman with the Flow of Blood. See notes on Mk. 521-43 Lk. 840f.

27-31. Healing of Two Blind Men. This incident looks uncommonly like a duplicate of Mt. 2029-34, which corresponds to Mark's account of the healing of Bartimæus, the blind beggar at Jericho (1046-52, notes). In the tradition as it reached Matthew there were two blind beggars, which might easily have been the case; though it is interesting to see how Matthew often increases the numbers of Mark (cf. Mk. 644 Mt. 1421).

32-34. Healing of a Dumb Demoniac. Dumbness, like other physical maladies, was in the popular mind attributed to demon possession, and could be healed by exorcism on the part of Jesus. Here, as in Mt. 1222f. Mk. 322f. Lk. 1114f., the power possessed by Jesus over demons is said to be due to his alliance with the ruler of the demons. Such a charge, which in Mk. 320f. (see notes) Jesus very effectively deals with, was, we may rest assured, made more than once during the ministry of Jesus.

35-38. Jesus Prepares to Appoint the Twelve. (Cf. Mk. 66f. Lk. 101f. and see notes on 101-16.) The commission of Jesus to his disciples is prefaced by a general statement of how he went through cities and villages preaching the gospel of the Kingdom in the synagogues and healing all manner of sickness and disease, and how the sight of the crowd stirred in him the deepest emotions of pity and compassion. The sight of the crowd called forth two very different pictures in his mind. (1) The first is that of a flock of sheep (v. 36) which is described as distressed and scattered. The word distressed is used of a hunted stag. It suggests that the flock was harried by dogs and wolves, and that to add to its plight it had no shepherd to act as its protector (Acts 20:28-30). The masses, Jesus knows, are harried by false hopes and darkening superstitions and are preyed upon by vain fears and anxieties; they are at the same time leaderless—without a strong dominating personality to lead them to safety. Christ confidently regards himself as the Shepherd of his people. (2) The other picture is of a more hopeful character and represents an earlier stage of his ministry. It is that of a ripening golden harvest (v. 37). The grain is only waiting for the sickle of the harvester. Work among men promises rich results, Jesus claims, and for that reason prayer should be continually made to the Lord of the harvest (what a beautiful description of God!) that he thrust forth workers.

CHAPTER X

The Commission of the Twelve. (Vv. 1-16.)

See notes on 9:35-38 Lk. 9:1-6.

1. General Injunction. The disciples are to be specially endowed with authority to cast out evil spirits and to heal every kind of infirmity. The omission of any reference to teaching and preaching is very singular. The gift of exorcism and physical healing was possessed by the disciples in an extraordinary degree (see art., N.T. Miracles, pp. 926-7).

2-4. The Names of the Twelve. See notes on Mk. 13:19 and cf. Lk. 6:13-16. Matthew and Luke agree against Mark and Acts in making Peter and Andrew brothers; Andrew occupies fourth place in Mark. Matthew omits the word Boanerges as a description of James and John, and for Mark's Thaddæus he has Lebbæus.

5, 6. Their Parish. (Lk. 10:3-16.) The disciples are to avoid going to any Gentile or Samaritan town and are to confine themselves to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. To Jesus, a person is lost who either separates himself from God, and by so doing fails to realize the best that is in him, or who isolates himself from the service of his fellows, or who lives a life of aimless drift. This severe limitation of the sphere of the disciples' ministry is in complete opposition to the command of 28:19 (note) and many question whether it really represents the mind of the Master. He may well have emphasized the great need of ministering to the abandoned of his own race, but the prohibition not to enter Samaritan or Gentile territory—which Jesus himself certainly did not observe (cf. Mk. 7:24f. Jn. 4:4f.)—seems to be due to the influence of the Jewish Christian church (see intro., p. 955a).

7, 8. Their Task. They are to do everything which the Master himself did—proclaim the near approach of the Kingdom, heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse lepers, cast out demons. Matthew has understood the words literally, and Paul in 1 Cor. 12:28-30 has emphasized the gifts of healing, but it is not unlikely that Jesus meant these words (in part at least) metaphorically of the weak-willed, the impure, and those who were insensible to spiritual influence. The spirit in which this task should be carried on was to be one of glad devotion—freely—since they themselves had been the recipients of the free grace of God. Cf. notes on Mk. 11:4-34.

9-16. Rules of the Road. Cf. Mk. 6:7-13.

(1) They are not to take any money in their girdles, nor must they do anything for gain—a precaution of Jesus lest they might be tempted to take gold for any exorcism or act of healing. The principle that missionaries had a claim to support from the churches prevailed in apostolic times (cf. 1 Cor. 9:6-14). Possibly the experiences of the early church with certain evangelists led to an even greater strictness than the original words of Jesus implied. (2) They are not to have a wallet or provide themselves with two coats or with sandals, and are even to dispense with a staff. The word translated wallet (Greek pēra) was used of a priest's begging basket. Mark permits sandals and a staff (6:8, 9), both of which were indispensable for long journeys. Every true workman is deserving of his support. Jesus' rules emphasize the importance of extreme simplicity, and while the details will doubtless differ according to circumstances, time and place, the principle is of universal application. (3) On entering a village and inquiring who is worthy, they are to salute (or greet) the house. By saluting is meant presenting their claims for aid, and a person's worthiness consists in his willingness to show hospitality. They are not to change their quarters in a city by showing preference for the homes of the better classes (v. 11). On all hospitable homes the blessing of peace is to be invoked (v. 13), for apostolic blessings have potent power. (4) They are to retire from all inhospitable towns by shaking the dust from off their feet—a truly Oriental way of expressing disapproval. Some would question whether the severe words of v. 15 are the words of the Master, for they are not in harmony with his large and patient heart of love. (5) Since they are to be as sheep in the midst of wolves,

i.e., in a world full of antipathy to their ideals, facing constantly the fierce cruelty of heartless men, they are to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves. The Greek word translated wise is used in 7²⁴ (note) and means sensible, exercising common sense, having sound judgment. In thinking of the serpent Jesus forgets all its bad qualities and singles out the one good one which the disciples are to cultivate (Lk. 16¹⁻¹³, note). They are also to cultivate perfect sincerity and simplicity of spirit, like the dove—which is a symbol of the Spirit of God (3¹⁶, note) in contrast to the spirit of evil, which tempts to sin.

17-23. Persecution. See notes on Mk. 13⁹⁻¹³, where the words form a section of the "Little Apocalypse." V. 23 is found only in Matthew and should form part of the great speech, vv. 1-16. Here for the first time the title Son of man is used of the Messiah as one to come down from heaven (Dan. 7¹³; see also art., Backgrounds, p. 846, and cf. p. 209). The words express the thoughts of Mt. 24. See notes on Mk. 13 Lk. 12¹⁻¹².

24, 25. The Disciple as the Teacher. (Cf. Lk. 6⁴⁰.) One cannot claim more from a pupil than his teacher can give to him—but one can claim as much. Hence we may read here a gracious promise of Jesus to his disciples that as they pass through the various stages of the school of life they shall become more and more like him. But the words also mean that what the Master encounters in the form of suffering, obloquy, and shame shall be the fate of his followers. The basest motives will be attributed to them, even to the extent of accusing them of being in league with the chief leader of the forces of darkness. Beelzebub (see mg.), originally "lord of flies," but by this time meant Satan, as lord of the house of demons. See notes on Mk. 3²⁰⁻³⁰.

26-33. Jesus Demands Fearless Confession. See notes on Lk. 12²⁻⁹. These words anticipate trials of the severest order for the disciples; even martyrdom itself is hinted at. The thrice repeated Fear not (vv. 26, 28, 31) shows us that Jesus would have his followers composed and calm in the presence of the most heartrending ordeals. He states what are to be the grounds for their confidence, as follows: (1) The words of vv. 26, 27 may be taken to mean—in addition to their obvious sense—that those who are to deliver the message of Christ in the glare of publicity or in prominent places will be prepared for their task according as they commune much with God in the silence of the quiet places to hear his faintest whispers. (2) There is in the possession of all of Jesus' disciples something eternal and inviolable which only God can destroy (v. 28).

Loyalty to the interests of the soul is to be the chief consideration. (3) They should be courageous in their confession because God takes cognizance of their lives (vv. 29-31). Should they fall in the fight, he who takes note of the fallen sparrow will surely be aware of them and will care for them. (4) Loyalty to Christ in word and deed secures for us his advocacy and mediatorship (vv. 32, 33).

34-37. Division in Homes. In Lk. 12⁵¹ instead of sword is the word "division." Jesus intimates that what he had experienced in his own home would be a common experience wherever his message was proclaimed (Mk. 3²¹, 31-35 6¹⁻⁶, notes). Acceptance of Christianity will often involve bitter, implacable enmity on the part of parents and loved ones. Jesus quotes a saying from Mic. 7⁶ where the prophet anticipates a condition of things similar to those Jesus discloses will be the fate of many of his followers. See under vv. 38-42.

38-40. Some Further Conditions of Discipleship. Matthew in v. 37, by changing the word "hate" to love, has moderated what seems to us so harsh in this saying as contained in Lk. 14²⁶. In cases, Jesus asserts, where the ties of home enter into conflict with the claims of the Kingdom, then the true disciple should not be in doubt. The absoluteness of his claims upon all our powers is strongly set forth in the saying in v. 38. To take up the cross and follow after has the technical meaning of undergoing martyrdom, the fate of countless numbers of brave followers of Christ in the closing decades of the first century. Some have thought that v. 39 has been worked over for the use of the later Christian Church. Self-denial and self-sacrifice are the only ways to self-discovery. Cf. 17²⁴⁻²⁶ Lk. 9²³.

40. As Lk. 10¹⁶ shows, this verse should come at the close of the commission given to the Twelve at their sending out. In going among men they were to feel that they were ambassadors of Christ and of God; their persons were sacred, and as ambassadors they must be true to their sender, love the people to whom they are sent, and seek in every possible way to effect a reconciliation between them and God.

41, 42. The Duty of Hospitable Reception. Three types of Christians are referred to in these verses. By the prophet is meant probably the apostolic missionary; the righteous is the Christian who is outstanding in piety; and the little ones refer to the ordinary rank and file Christians. To receive in the name of means in the full conviction that they are unusual personalities and should receive honor accordingly, for the most insignificant act of charity and kindness will be amply compensated by God. The whole chapter gives a very definite impression of the fearful struggle which had begun before the death of Jesus, as well as the conflict which the evangelist experienced during his residence either at Cæsarea or at Antioch (see intro., p. 955b).

CHAPTER XI

The first verse indicates a break in Matthew's record. In the words and it came to pass, etc., we have the technical formula with which the compiler of the Gospel concludes the five long teaching sections (see intro., section on "Divisions," p. 953a).

1-6. The Questions of the Baptist. Josephus says that John was confined in the fastness of Machærus, east of the Dead Sea. For the death of the Baptist and its causes see notes on 143-12. Lk. 97-9 omits any reference to John's captivity but the tenses employed show that he considered the activity of John had ceased. (See notes on Luke's long section on John in 718-35.) The imprisonment shows that John had lost none of his moral courage. He had not become a follower of Jesus because he was not completely satisfied with his Messianic claims. Origen and others sought to explain this by saying that John himself knew the truth but sent his disciples in order that they might be convinced.

2, 3. Except in Mt. 117 none of the evangelists employs the title "Christ" by itself in his narrative. The phrase in v. 2 expresses the conviction of the evangelist and not of John.

For he that cometh read The Coming One (cf. Jn. 115, 23, 30). So far as is known this was not a Messianic title. It refers to a Personality who might be considered either as Messiah or as forerunner of the Kingdom. Some regard it, however, as a Messianic title from Psa. 11826.

4, 5. The answer of Jesus recalls Isa. 2918f. 355f. 611f. Many commentators claim that these words must be spiritually interpreted. If we interpret them so, it is hard to explain how the report of them could have reached the distant prison of Machærus (141-12, notes). Preaching to the poor was a sign of the Messianic age (Lk. 416f., notes) and the enumeration follows the record of the miracles of Jesus in chs. 8, 9. To the early church the resurrection of Jesus was the conclusive proof of his Messiahship; for that reason John—who died before Jesus—is not said to have accepted the Messiahship of Jesus.

6. Is Jesus thinking of the Baptist when he gives expression to these words? What the stumbling-block was in the case of John we are not told. To others the attitude of Jesus toward the Law and tradition of the elders, the story of his descent, and the absence of any political and nationalistic elements in his Messianic claims, proved a real hindrance. Blessed is the man who has found the fulfillment of all his most cherished ideals and hopes in the Saviour of men and who can say with Paul, "In him is Yea" (2 Cor. 119).

7-15. Jesus' Estimate of John the Baptist. (Cf. Lk. 718-35.) In these words of Jesus we see that the character of John had made a profound impression on him. He was deeply impressed by his rugged, fearless moral strength and his perfect self-discipline and love of simplicity. It is possible to interpret v. 9 as implying that when disciples went to see John they really expected to see one who was more than a prophet, i.e., the Messiah himself; but while Jesus concedes that John was a prophet, he qualifies his estimate by applying an O.T. quotation (Mal. 31). Or this may be the work of the evangelist, to show that John was only a forerunner of the Messiah, whose special task it was to prepare the way. Jesus concedes (v. 11) that among the noblest men of his race John in virtue of the momentous character of his announcement is without peer, and he grants him a place in the Kingdom; nevertheless, because of the superior insight into the significance of the personality of Jesus and the greater loyalty and steadfastness shown by others, John's place will be only a minor and unimportant one.

12. This has been variously explained: some assert that the verse means that the Kingdom is violently treated in the person of its members; others that there is a reference here to those who thought of the Messianic blessings as political, which must be reached by rebellion and war; while there are some, and possibly the evangelist among them, who think that the portals of the Kingdom will be opened only to the enthusiastic souls like the reclaimed taxgatherers and harlots whom the orthodox excluded from it. The second explanation seems to be the probable one. Was this the cause, one wonders, of the doubt assailing John, and the cause of the obstacles he found in Jesus? The Kingdom will be brought in by those who, like Jesus, have the self-discipline, patience, and piety to wait on God.

13-15. It was part of the popular belief that Messiah's coming should be heralded by the return of Elijah. The early church held tenaciously that John had fulfilled the rôle of Elijah, and this Jesus believes also. Jesus infers (v. 15) that this fulfillment of prophecy was not accepted by some, and that for its full acceptance appeal is to be made not only to the events of history but to the faith and insight of men. (See further notes on 14¹⁻¹².)

16-19. A Parable Drawn from Children at Play. In this beautiful and apt illustration drawn from his own experience as a child, Jesus compares his own generation to a group of willful, capricious children, who, when asked by their companions to play "a game of wedding," refuse to do so, as later they refuse to go to the other extreme and play at "a funeral game." Jesus compares himself to the group in whom the element of joy and gladness is uppermost, in contrast to John, who is by nature ascetic and aloof, yet both of them are found fault with by the same persons. This parable has varied applications: (1) It emphasizes the confused and bewildered state of mind of the contemporaries of Jesus, and especially their willful, mulish, stubborn character, blinding them to the true values of life. (2) It illustrates that fatal tendency in human nature to dislike the unusual and unconventional, and so to drag down all men to a mediocre average uniform level. The only liberty allowed is the liberty to fall in line with the majority. (3) It reveals a fatal tendency also to besmirch the character of distinguished public men. (4) It shows finally that what the contemporaries of Jesus considered to be a flaw in Jesus—his love of humanity and his befriending of the outcast and hated—posterity has considered to be his crowning glory.

The parable fittingly closes with a saying which has been best preserved in Luke, "Wisdom is justified of all her children" (7³⁵). Wisdom has been defined as the power to see the world, ourselves, and our concerns as God sees them and to order our lives in the light of that vision. Jesus, supremely, and John, to a measure, were real children of wisdom, and admirably demonstrated their parentage to one who had eyes to see. Wisdom loves manifoldness (cf. Eph. 3¹⁰). It sets itself against the conventional in food and dress. It teaches that the Son of man would not exclude anything human from the sphere of his saving and soul-renewing activity.

20-24. The Doomed Cities. (Lk. 10¹³⁻¹⁵.) The parable illustrating the rejecting of both John and Jesus leads the evangelist to introduce into this context a group of stern sayings against the cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, which also rejected the mighty words of Jesus. The sayings indicate how fragmentary are our records of the ministry of Jesus, for we know nothing of his visits to Chorazin, a town situated on a steep hill a few miles northwest of Capernaum, nor do we know much of his activity at Bethsaida, i.e., Bethsaida Julias, situated at the point where the Jordan enters the lake. Capernaum is singled out because it was the headquarters of the Galilaean ministry (Mk. 12¹, note), and in consequence was so privileged that it ought to have been elevated to the topmost peak of blessedness. Heaven in v. 23 expresses the highest renown and Hades the lowest shame. Even Tyre, and Sidon, and Sodom itself, those great centers of wealth, license, pride, and idolatry, would have been more deeply moved to repentance and righteous living.

23. The first clause should be a question and the second a direct statement (as in R.V.; cf. A.V.), to show that the city had already been covered with disgrace and ignominy. The passage suggests Jesus' familiarity with the language of Isa. 14¹²⁻¹⁵, where the thrusting of the king of Babylon into the realm of the dead is described.

25-30. The Great Invitation. This unique paragraph, which reveals Jesus in an unusually exalted mood, is built up of two sections. The first, vv. 25-27, occurs in Luke also (10^{21, 22}); the second, vv. 28-30, is found here alone. Some conclude from this that they belong to separate occasions. However that may be, it shows unique insight and understanding on the part of the evangelist that he should have welded them together, for the worth and glory of the invitation in vv. 28-30 depend on the position and character of the person who gives it. The familiar invitation contains three main elements, as follows:

(1) A Self-delineation of the Master who Invites. Two features are singled out—the elements of authority, since he stands in a unique relation to God and possesses a unique revelation of him, and the element of gentleness and lowliness of heart. These two outstanding elements are always found in every portrait of Jesus in the N.T.—the Petrine, Pauline, and Johannine (see Coffin, Portraits of Jesus in N.T.). Ritschl claims that the word translated "gentle" means in Aramaic "pious." In this self-portraiture of the Master, the following elements are stressed: (a) The content of his message and the truth he declares are all from God. The Scribes prided themselves on the tradition of the elders and human teaching. Jesus claims that his message comes from the true source of all wisdom and light. (b) The full understanding of this revelation is given by the Spirit of God to those who are open-minded, humble, and expectant; minds marked by intellectual arrogance and blinded by pride cannot receive these things. (c) The chief element in this revelation is the unique relationship of Jesus to God. He is his Son and in consequence his gospel is a gospel of God. To unveil before men the ineffable glory of the Divine Fatherhood is the glad and holy privilege intrusted to Jesus. (d) Though rejected in Capernaum and Chorazin, doubted by the Baptist, and misinterpreted by the Pharisees, he is known of God, who alone perceives the true inner wealth that is in Christ.

(2) A Description of the Invited. The wise and prudent are excluded. Such are the Pharisees and their like, who think that all revelation of God is complete in the Law and the Prophets, and in consequence no new light can be expected. This incapacity is attributed in true Hebrew fashion to divine interposition. Ultimately it is due to God, but more directly the incapacity is due to our willfulness and the disregard of his laws which determine the nature of our receptivity. The Greek word nēpioi means literally babes, but it may be taken here in the metaphorical sense of "simple" or "open-minded." To such Jesus unfolds the treasures of his mind and heart. All commentators without exception say that the words labor and heavy-laden describe those who are crushed in spirit because of the weighty burdens imposed on them by Pharisaic demands. The am-haaretz, "the people of the land" who knew not the Law, were despised by the Pharisees; they cared little for the Law and its interpretations. Aristotle applies to the common people, the proletariat of his day, the adjective phortikos, a word much like the Greek participle translated "heavy-laden." It is interesting to note that the word translated "weary" is always used in the N.T. either of those who are tired and spent because of hard manual work, or of those who labor and toil in spiritual ministry. The appeal of Jesus is therefore general and universal; he is calling to him all who need encouragement, sympathy, quickening of spirit, whatever be the nature and cause of the depression and weariness.

(3) The Character of the Invitation. Here we are to emphasize the yoke-bearing; the learning; and the ensuing rest. (a) Take my yoke upon you. The symbol of the yoke was used, e.g., of the Law. Thus if one takes upon him the yoke of the Torah, the yoke of civil government and of worldly care will fall from him. Jesus probably means by yoke the cardinal elements of his message, the adoption of which by men will enable them to perform useful services; for while the yoke is a symbol of slavery, more often it is a symbol of work and duty. The word translated easy (Greek chrēstos) means "benevolent," "kind," "useful." "Useful" would be a better rendering here than "easy." Sustained by faith, love, hope and patience, every burden becomes really light. One may wonder whether the original translators have conveyed correctly the Aramaic words of Jesus; for just as "easy" gives an erroneous interpretation of chrēstos, so the word translated light may not be a real equivalent of the word used by Jesus. The words "easy" and "light" seem to be incongruous in the N.T., and this is the only passage in the Gospels where they occur. (b) Learn of me. The Greek preposition shows that we are to learn not simply from the words of Jesus, but from his whole life and conduct among men. (c) I will give you rest. "Refreshment" is a better translation. Paul used the word of the inspiring influence upon him of noble personalities (Rom. 15³² 2 Tim. 1¹⁶). In the school of Christ hearts are encouraged because there they enter into intimate fellowship with Him who is the peerless Teacher of men.

CHAPTER XII

1-8. Jesus and the Sabbath. See notes on Mk. 223-28 Lk. 61-5.

9-14. Healing on the Sabbath. See notes on Mk. 31-6 Lk. 66-11.

15-21. Summary of Jesus' Activity. See notes on Mk. 37-12. Mark does not give the long quotation from Isa. 421-4. The quotation is characteristic of Matthew's desire to link up the work of Jesus with the O.T. Its wonderful aptitude, however, is more clearly seen when the words are viewed in relation to the passage in Mark, which is more detailed than Matthew's.

22-24. The Charge of Alliance with Beelzebub. See notes on 932-34 Mk. 320-22 Lk. 1114-16.

25-32. Jesus' Reply to the Charge. See notes on Mk. 323-30 Lk. 1117-23.

33. The Tree and Its Fruit. See notes on 716, and cf. Lk. 643, 44.

34-37. Words a Revelation of Character. (Lk. 645.) The words a man habitually uses are an important key to his character. By the use of the metaphors of a fruit tree (v. 33) and of treasure, Jesus clearly teaches that the quality of our inward life determines the character of our speech and the worth of our actions. From a tree of inferior quality one cannot expect a high-grade fruit, and out of a treasury into which counterfeit base coins are being continually deposited one can only withdraw currency of a like nature. The great significance of "the subconscious self" is anticipated by Jesus. The reader should carefully study the passage in Jas. 31-12 on the same subject. Cf. notes on Mt. 715-20.

37. Idle. The Greek word ordinarily means "useless" or "worthless." O. Holtzmann thinks that here it has the meaning of bad or evil.

38-42. The Demand for a Sign. (Cf. 161-4 Lk. 1129-36 1254-56 and see notes on 161-4 Mk. 811-13.) The early church naturally saw in the story of Jonah a prophecy of the resurrection of Jesus. According to Mark, Jesus refuses to grant any sign, while Luke states that the only sign will be "the sign of Jonah." It is quite evident from the two illustrations of the repentant Ninevites and the queen of Sheba that the significance of the answer of Jesus to his contemporaries is that his prophetic words of wisdom are the real proof and guarantee of his divine mission. If men fail to appreciate and to respond to that great message, no other sign will be given. Though Jesus surpasses Jonah in every way as a prophet, and though his wisdom is infinitely superior to that of Solomon, what a striking contrast there is between the attitude of the Ninevites and of the queen and the stubborn obstinacy and blindness of his own generation!

40. Probably a gloss. It is absent from both Mark and Luke. The statement made is inaccurate, for Jesus was in the grave only from Friday evening to Sunday dawn.

43-45. The Parable of a Great Relapse. (Lk. 1124-26.) By means of the symbolism of this sad little parable drawn from the demonology of his day, Jesus teaches the great truth of the persistence of evil, and the possibility of increasing degeneration. Some words of Mark Rutherford in Catherine Furze are suggestive here: "If soldiers be slain on the battlefield there is an end of them. New armies may be raised, but the enemy is weaker at any rate by those who are killed. It is not the same with our ghostly foes, for they rise into life after we think they are buried and often with greater strength; day after day, night after night, and perhaps year after year, the wretched citadel is environed and the pressure of the attack is unrelenting, while the force that resists has to be summoned by a direct effort of the will; and the moment that effort relaxes the force fails and the besiegers swarm upon the fortifications." To meet the persistent power of evil a neutral passivity will not suffice. A life swept and garnished and yet empty of resolute courage and force of character cannot hope to defeat the evil that continually besieges it. The ideals of the kingdom of God must take full possession of the house of life if the powers of darkness are to be kept under control.

46-50. Jesus' New Family. See notes on Mk. 331-35.

CHAPTER XIII

A Group of Parables. (See note at beginning of ch. 8.) The evangelist in this chapter groups together seven typical parables of Jesus, or eight if the saying about the householder in v. 52 is reckoned as a parable. In addition we have here the interpretations of two parables—the soils and the tares, and a statement of the reason for teaching by parables. All modern scholars seem agreed that the interpretation of the tares is not Jesus' own. There are many also who hold that the interpretation of the sower has not been handed down as Jesus originally gave it (see notes on vv. 18-23), but that during its oral transmission it has been considerably changed and adapted to different circumstances. (Cf. p. 916b.)

1-9. The Parable of the Sower and the Soils. (Mk. 41-12, notes on Lk. 84-18.) Many think that this parable reflects the experience of Jesus as a preacher, and that he delivered it especially to his disciples so that they might be prepared to know what to expect as missionaries of the gospel. Among their hearers, as there were among his, would be those for whom the gospel would prove utterly futile to produce any changes in life and character. On the other hand, he assures them, for their encouragement, that they would meet with receptive souls in whom the truths of the gospel would be appropriated and result in remarkable changes. The teaching of the parable may be itemized as follows: (1) Jesus and his followers have in the gospel that which is able to produce surprising and unexpected results in character. Jeremiah compares the word of God to wheat (23²⁸); so Jesus here regards the truths of the gospel as necessary elements for the sustaining and building up of the moral life and character. (2) Just as in the seed, small as it is, there are locked up vital energies and living forces which given a receptive soil produce striking transformations, so the words of Jesus, his ideas and thoughts, are "living words," compact of dynamic energy, and capable when assimilated by men of producing incalculable results. (3) The followers of Jesus must sow the seed wherever they go. It is impossible for them to judge the nature of the soil entirely, but for the best results there must be complete co-operation between seed and soil. Our hearts and minds must appropriate the living word if there is to be fruitfulness. (4) Different types of soil are enumerated. There is the soil of the wayside that is trampled on, and which has become a path on which every passer-by walks, typifying the character that has lost all sensitiveness and sympathy with spiritual things; in this the seed cannot find lodgment of any kind. There is the shallow soil—the superficial nature that lives on the surface of things. Because there is no depth of soil the seed cannot produce adequate roots to sustain the life of the plant in the face of the hot sun. This shallow soil is typical of large numbers—the “temporary Christians” (v. 6) as they are styled in the interpretation. Then we have the unclean soil, typical of the men and women in whose hearts the multitudinous interests of life crowd out the ideals of the gospel and prevent them from growing. Lastly, there are the good soils, which vary in their yielding capacity. Jesus recognizes distinctions in men; just as there are men of five, two, and one talents respectively, so in the quality of the good soils all are not exactly alike, but each one produces according to the native capacity. (See Jesus’ interpretation, vv. 18-23.)

10-17. The Aim of Teaching by Parables. (See discussion in art., Parables of Jesus, p. 916.) Many of the followers of Jesus were greatly perplexed by his apparent failure to win men, and in the question, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? there seems to be implied, judging by the answer, a perplexity on the part of his followers why the parable teaching was not completely successful. In his answer Jesus implies (vv. 11, 12) that the reason why men have not attained unto the knowledge of the mysteries, i.e., the revealed truths of the gospel, is because they themselves have not brought to the gospel the indispensable elements of reverence and receptiveness. The quotation from Isa. 69, 10 seems to have been made to show that, just as worldliness and materialism blinded the minds of the people of the prophet’s day to his great spiritual message, so Jesus is face to face with a generation dull of hearing, and blinded by worldly ambitions. Cf. on Mk. 4:10-12.

16, 17. (Lk. 10:23, 24.) Taken with the passage from Isaiah these words can be nothing but the plainest revelation of Jesus’ Messianic consciousness, as in 12:41, 42.

18-23. The Interpretation of the Parable of the Sower. (Lk. 8:9-15.) The arguments brought forward against the authenticity of this interpretation are (1) that it treats the parable as an allegory, whereas Jesus confined himself to parables and illustrations whose meaning was apparent on the surface; (2) that the meaning is so plain that an explanation is not necessary; and (3) that a later period in the life of the church is reflected in the interpretation. It must be remembered, however, that nearly all explanations of the parables involve treating them as allegories, though, of course, it is foolish to find meanings for all details. It would be entirely natural for Jesus to give a model interpretation which would later serve as a guide for the disciples. On the other hand, it is not like Jesus to make the birds, which he loved so much, typify the devil. For the most part, however, the interpretations of the shallow soil in vv. 20, 21 and the unclean soil in v. 22 are consonant with the mind of Jesus and have all the marks of being genuine sayings of his.

24-30. The Parable of the Wheat and Tares. (See also vv. 36-43.) This parable and its interpretation are found only in Matthew. All scholars reject the genuineness of the explanation in vv. 36-43 on the ground of its stilted style, and because the interpretations of successive details are mechanical; moreover, the presence of popular and conventional apocalyptic expressions, and the title Son of man, used of the earthly life of Jesus in v. 37 and then of his Messianic glory in v. 41, stamp it as secondary in character. Many cannot accept the parable itself as a genuine utterance, on the ground that it is entirely unlike Jesus to allow sins to go on unchecked and unchallenged. Would it not have been better to uproot the tares rather than have permitted them to grow as fodder for the furnaces of Gehenna? It is probable that the parable reflects a certain condition in the life of the early church when it was too timid to tackle various definite evils that had revealed themselves in its midst, and this interpretation represents an effort to justify the acquiescence. Those who accept the parable as genuine interpret it as meaning that we should exercise tolerance toward men and leave God to act as Judge; while others interpret it as meaning that we should not hold ourselves aloof from sinners.

31, 32. The Parable of the Mustard Seed. (Mk. 4:30-32.) In this simple parable Jesus is encouraging his disciples with the thought that from very insignificant beginnings great results are to be expected in the sphere of the kingdom. Who would have dreamed as they saw Jesus and his disciples on the highways of Palestine that from that small band of men would have issued the Christian Church with all its world-wide activities? The great difference between cause and consequence suggests also that there are other forces at work besides those we observe—forces which take our small human efforts and through them attain results for which those efforts alone are unable to account.

33. The Parable of the Leaven teaches the same lesson as vv. 31, 32. It emphasizes the fact that the ideals of the Kingdom work from within as a dynamic potent force. When placed under the microscope the working of leaven in the meal looks like a veritable battlefield: there is assault and penetration in the face of determined resistance until peace descends after the whole has been conquered.

34, 35. Teaching in Parables. The first statement is hyperbole, as is seen from chs. 5-7. The quotation in v. 35 is not from any prophet but is from Psa. 78². The evangelist finds support for the use of the parable in teaching in some of the methods used by the teachers of O.T. times. Cf. vv. 10-17, notes.

36-43. Interpretation of the Parable of the Wheat and the Tares. See notes on vv. 24-30.

44-46. Parables of the Treasure and the Pearl. Both these parables emphasize the fact that the kingdom of heaven stands for the highest values and ideals, to obtain and secure which absolute devotion and dedication are demanded. If a distinction is to be found, it is not, as some suggest, that in the one case the Kingdom is reached by accident and in the other only after a long search; but rather that the word treasure (money, in all probability) suggests that the ideals of the Kingdom must serve practical ends, while the pearl, being a thing of beauty, suggests that the possession of the Kingdom ideals contributes to the glory and the adornment of personality (cf. Job 28¹⁵⁻¹⁹ Prov. 31³⁻¹⁶ 8¹¹ Rev. 21¹⁰⁻²¹). In these parables the morality of the transaction is not taken into account.

47-50. Parable of the Fish Net. Here again we have parable and interpretation. The original parable probably ended at v. 48 and has been given a questionable interpretation by the same hand that is responsible for the interpretation of the tares. The fish caught by the dragnet do not represent men but, rather, ideals and ways of life. The church has to sit down and carefully consider what are those things in life which are noble and lofty. The Greek word used for good is kalos, an unusual word to use to describe fish (see notes on 7¹⁵⁻²⁰). The followers of Jesus must always approve the things that are excellent (cf. Jer. 15¹⁹ Phil. 4⁸).

51, 52. Preaching New and Old Truth. A beautiful saying of Jesus in which he emphasizes the importance and value of Christian learning and in which he gives sanction to the disciples as well as old. The Greek word translated old (palaios) can mean "timehonored," and many think that Jesus refers to the permanent truths of the O.T. and the great principles of his own message, but that each disciplined apostle must also bring forth from the treasury of his own vital experience fresh living truths for men.

53-58. Jesus at Nazareth. See notes on Mk. 6¹⁻⁶.

CHAPTER XIV

1-12. Herod's Judgment of Jesus; Death of John Baptist. (Mk. 6¹⁴⁻²⁹; notes on 11¹⁻¹⁵ Lk. 7¹⁸⁻³⁵ 9⁷⁻⁹.) It is not strange that reports of the ministry of Jesus should have reached Herod (cf. 3¹⁶⁻²²) and that he, stung by remorse, should have thought that the Baptist had come to life again. The narrative presents us with a very interesting psychological study of the workings of conscience. Herod is not all black, for he was much perplexed after his conversations with John and used to hear him gladly. John apparently recognized in him a man of considerable religious feeling. But Herod was a man with a questionable past: he had recently married the wife of his brother Philip, who was still living, and this brought upon him severe moral censure from the Baptist—a censure deeply resented by Herodias, who plotted for John's life. With the determined will of a Jezebel, she ultimately prevailed upon Herod to give orders for the imprisonment of John at the remote fortress of Machærus (11²¹, note), and finally for his beheading. The reports of the noble work of Jesus and the impressions made by him on the multitude stirred into activity the almost moribund conscience of the Tetrarch and created in him, according to the account in Lk. 9⁷⁻⁹, a desire to see Jesus. The historical character of vv. 3-12 has been challenged by some interpreters on the ground that it would be unlikely for a princess to perform in the presence of a group of courtiers an Oriental solo dance to which her mother was forbidden to come. According to Josephus, John was imprisoned at Machærus, a fortress four days distant from Tiberias (Antiquities, bk. xviii, ch. 5: 1). How could the head have been brought so quickly? it is asked. Again it is considered unlikely that the head of a murdered man should have been brought in during a banquet. Salome, Herodias' daughter by her first husband Herod Boethos, married Philip the Tetrarch, who died in 33 or 34 A.D.; she was, therefore, hardly a young girl when this incident took place. Possibly the court was in residence at Machærus, and anyone who knows anything about Oriental courts of the time knows that they were capable of any infamous deeds. Beneath the literary freedom and embellishments of the narrative, we note the outraged public conscience at the adulterous marriage of Herod and the resentment caused by his execution of the great ascetic prophet John, as well as the interest roused in the ministry of Jesus in court circles.

13-21. Feeding the Multitudes. (Includes 1532-39; cf. Mk. 6^{30f.} and notes on Mk. 8¹⁻¹⁰ Jn. 6¹⁻¹⁴.) Many interpreters suppose that the second miracle (that of the four thousand) is only a variant version of the first (but see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 923a). This incident presents us with admitted difficulties and the exact historical situation can be recovered, if at all, only by conjecture. The fact that in v. 19 we have the words took, looked up, blessed, brake, gave—words which we find again in the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper in Lk. 22¹⁷⁻²⁰ and 1 Cor. 11²³⁻²⁵ as well as in the Emmaus story (Lk. 24³⁰)—would suggest that the incident had a sacramental, symbolical significance for the evangelist. This is confirmed by the fact that the incident as recorded in Jn. 6 is made the text for a discourse on the spiritual significance of the body and blood of Christ (but see notes there). Most modern interpreters call attention to the story in 2 Kings 4⁴²⁻⁴⁴, where the prophet is said to have fed a hundred men with twenty loaves of barley. Not only were they all satisfied but a quantity of food was left over. So far, therefore, the miracle recorded here of Jesus means only that he possessed power similar to that of the prophet, but in an enhanced degree. Again we have to remember that the breaking of bread or of a loaf into small pieces before the meal proper was an essential part of the simple ritual of table worship at a social meal among God's covenant people. This could hardly have been done for five thousand with five loaves and two fishes; possibly an original round number has been exaggerated. It is astonishing to find in the Synoptic record no reference to the impression the incident made on the people; and very soon afterward, when short of bread, the disciples act as though in complete ignorance of what has happened (16⁵⁻¹²). The gravest objection that can be urged against the historicity of the story is not any inherent incredibility but the fact that it runs counter to the fundamental principle of the ministry of Jesus, who persistently refused to give a sign of an astounding character (12^{38f.} note) and who sought to bring home gradually to men the conviction of his divine commission and Messiahship. Even that objection, however, cannot be regarded as insuperable by one who admits the miracle-principle.

The view set forth by Menzies and Bartlet, that others besides the disciples had brought their provisions with them, and that what Jesus achieved was to get a mixed multitude to pool its resources and those who had food to share with those who lacked, is a naturalistic view that appeals to many. The converting of a self-regarding mass of men into an altruistic other-regarding group was, after all, a miracle of no mean order. In any event, the incident has great value in the light it throws on the belief of the early church in Jesus. It reveals (1) his deep compassion and sympathy with the multitude, whose shepherd and leader he yearned to be; (2) his ability to satisfy the deepest needs of men—although for this work he needs helpers; (3) the place of fellowship, orderliness and thrift in the work of the kingdom; (4) the ability of Jesus to kindle in men's hearts altruistic impulses; and (5) the duty of the church to concern itself about the economic and material needs of humanity if its ministry is to be a full-orbed one. Attempts to "explain" the miracles, however, by surmising what the "historical nucleus" must have been are necessarily only tentative. Due weight should be given to the fact that this is the only miracle described in all four Gospels. Cf. art., N.T. Miracles, p. 923b.

22-33. Walking on the Sea. Matthew and Mark (64⁵, note) assert that Jesus compelled his disciples to enter a boat while he was dismissing the crowd, after which he went up into the mountain to pray (cf. Jn. 6¹⁵). This compulsion on Jesus' part was prompted by the fact that he did not want his disciples to share the worldly views of the crowd about his Messiahship. The fourth Gospel states that they wished to make him king (6¹⁵). During the night a storm arose and the wind became very contrary, so that the disciples made little progress. In the fourth watch (between 3 and 6 a.m.), when the light must have been very dim, Jesus saw they were in difficulties. The fourth Gospel account would seem to mean that Jesus walked over four miles on the lake. The explanation suggested by the rationalists of the last century was that Jesus was really walking by the edge of the lake (the Greek for upon could be rendered by) but seemed to the men in the boat to be walking on the sea; the storm drove the boat almost to the shore, so that Jesus waded to them through the water and calmed their fears. Like the miracle that precedes, this one had a great fascination for the early church. The church at Rome, passing through the Neronian persecution (cf. intro. to Revelation, p. 1365), must have derived great comfort from the story. Behind its symbolism we see these great facts: (1) that without Christ his church is in danger of being overwhelmed by the dark and stormy experiences through which she passes; (2) that in the hour of deepest need and distress Christ will come; (3) that his presence is a real presence, not a phantom; and (4) that his presence brings peace and composure; courage returns, and a forward movement is possible.

The story about Peter, which is found only in Matthew, is possibly a Christian midrash or an acted parable, in which the apostle's character is illustrated—his proud impulsiveness, full repentance, and restoration. It illustrates also the important truth that trust and valor accomplish great things, while lack of faith and cowardice result in downfall.

33. Son of God should not be taken here in its late theological sense, but, rather, as a Messianic title (Psa. 27, 8).

34-36. Acts of Healing. Gennesaret ("harp-shaped")—another name for the Sea of Galilee, but occurring in the N.T. only here and in the parallels. The land referred to was west of the Sea, since the miracle of the loaves had taken place, apparently, on the east side (cf. v. 13). The phrases, all that were sick and as many as touched, suggest how much more extensive the healing ministry of Jesus was than would be supposed from the small numbers of miracles described in detail (see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 922).

CHAPTER XV

1-20. Tradition That Destroys the Law of God. See notes on Mk. 7:1-23.

21-28. The Greek Woman of Syro-Phœnicia. See notes on Mk. 7:24-30.

29-31. A Period of Healing Activity. See notes on 14:34-36 Mk. 7:31-37.

32-39. Feeding the Multitudes. See notes on 14:13-21 Mk. 8:1-10.

CHAPTER XVI

1-4. The Demand for a Sign. See notes on 12:38-42 Mk. 8:11-13.

5-12. Lessons from the Miracles of the Loaves. See notes on 14:13-21 Mk. 8:14-21.

13-20. Peter's Great Confession. See notes on Mk. 8:27-30 and cf. Lk. 9:18-21. This paragraph has presented unusual difficulties to scholars and widely divergent views are held both concerning its genuineness and its real meaning. The crux of the passage, vv. 17-19, is not included in the reports of the incident in Mark and Luke; in consequence there are many who regard it as a later addition inserted by the evangelist to give sanction to the claim of priority made for Peter by the early church; others regard it as a section taken from the document Q (intro., p. 954). McNeile is of the opinion that vv. 16-18 contain the nucleus of a genuine saying of Jesus because the language is so natural, intimate, and original, but that v. 19 is certainly a later addition. This judgment appears to be sound, for if the words bind and loose mean "to give moral and intellectual judgments based on the knowledge of the teaching of Jesus," there is nothing in the life and ministry of Peter to show that this important function was exercised in any unusual degree. Moreover, such a sanction would be in strange conflict with the special ministry of the Spirit of God, whose prerogative it is to inspire men in every age with a knowledge of the message of Jesus, so that they may interpret it according to the growing needs of life.

This scene takes place at a critical turning point in the life of Jesus. The disciples are taken by him to the region of Cæsarea Philippi. While there they are asked by the Master the important question, Who do men say that I am? (so Mark, Luke) or Who do men say that the Son of man is? (so Matthew). In answer they affirm that popular estimates lean toward John, Elijah, and Jeremiah as the prophets to whom he is most like. This shows in an interesting way the impression made by Jesus on his contemporaries, for the three stalwarts mentioned above were men of fearless courage, singular devotion, unflinching loyalty to high ideals, and men of great simplicity and stern self-discipline. Dissatisfied with the answers, Jesus asks a further question, Who say ye that I am? All three synoptists throw strong emphasis on the You, and Peter, as the representative of the group, in a moment of real divine illumination, answers, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. This reply affirms two great truths concerning Jesus—his divine Sonship and his Messiahship. Even Peter, however, did not realize the full import of this confession, as is evidenced by the severe rebuke of v. 23; but the answer of Jesus, with the play on the word petros (rock), implies that he regarded this confession of his divine Sonship and Messiahship as the foundation on which the new Israel of God was to be built. The moral and spiritual content of the confession is more important than the intellectual. The second may change; the first is permanent.

21-28. Jesus Foretells His Sufferings, Death, and Glory. This is the first definite intimation Jesus makes to his disciples that he will seem to be a Victim rather than a Victor—or if a Victor, then only in a quite unusual sense. He had, indeed, told them before that discipleship would be a costly thing (10^{9f.}), and they had already seen him rejected in his own village (13:53-58), but his mighty works and his affirmations about his kingdom had kept alive their hopes of worldly power. The recent confession of Peter and its approval by Jesus (vv. 16, 17) must have greatly strengthened those hopes. Perhaps he realized that fact and desired to set them right. More likely, however, he felt that the confession provided an appropriate background for announcing what he had himself long known to be the truth—that he was, indeed, the Christ, but the Suffering Christ (cf. Isa. 53). In any case, from this time Jesus never lets the disciples lose sight of the fact that he is to suffer a violent death (17⁹, 12, 22, 23 2017-19, and cf. Mk. 9⁹⁻¹³, 30-32 Lk. 17²⁵ 1831-34). One who until now has been to them a teacher and wonder-worker endeavors from henceforth to have them see in him a Redeemer—one who must suffer to save. How little Peter understood v. 18 is evident from vv. 22, 23. He who had just been called a rock to build on is now a stone to stumble over!

24-26. See notes on 10³⁴⁻³⁹. The solemn words properly follow on Jesus' announcement of his Passion. The paradox of his own life must be the paradox of the life of his followers. Self-discovery through self-surrender—this was the law he laid upon them because he had himself learned its everlasting validity. It is not impossible to live selfishly—but what an impossible life it is. To give up life is only to lose a lower and find a higher.

27, 28. The verses belong to the "apocalyptic" features of the Gospel record. To take the words literally is to make them meaningless. To regard them as current language which Jesus employed as a vehicle of his self-consciousness as Messiah is to make them intelligible. See on chs. 24, 25.

CHAPTER XVII

1-13. The Transfiguration. See notes on Mk. 9²⁻¹³. Schweitzer (in The Quest for the Historical Jesus) suggests that this incident may be out of its chronological order. He would have it precede Peter's confession at Cæsarea-Philippi. This alone, he says, makes intelligible the confession and Jesus' reply that the truth was revealed to Peter not by flesh and blood, but by God. That is, it was revealed to him at the transfiguration. Coming from the mountain, Jesus charged the three to keep silence; but Peter, with characteristic impulsiveness, blurted out the truth in answer to Jesus' general question to the Twelve. Schweitzer's suggestion has some attractiveness, but it requires a forced interpretation of Jesus' response to the confession. As the record reads now, Jesus was trying to evoke a confession; on Schweitzer's theory, Jesus was embarrassed by his very success.

14-21. Healing of the Epileptic Boy. See notes on Mk. 9¹⁴⁻²⁹, and cf. art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925b.

22, 23. Jesus' Announcement of His Violent Death. See notes on 16²¹⁻²³ Mk. 9³⁰⁻³².

24-27. The Temple Tax and the Fish with the Stater. This incident is narrated by Matthew only. According to Ex. 30¹³ every adult Israelite had to pay a half-shekel annually toward the upkeep of the Temple. After the fall of the Temple, the Romans continued to levy this tax for the support of the temple Jupiter Capitolanus in Rome. Whether Christians were required to pay it is uncertain, but it was a burning question at the time the first Gospel was written. McNeile claims that the argument underlying the words of Jesus (vv. 25, 26) is that, as earthly kings do not tax their own families or kin, so neither does God; hence the Jews are aliens and pay taxes to Cæsar, but Jesus and his disciples are sons who have a right to exemption. But if that is what the words mean, then they are so anti-Jewish that great doubt must be felt as to their genuineness. The more probable interpretation is that Jesus believed that the cause he and his disciples represented was so much greater than any temple that he felt no moral obligation to pay the annual tax; but, as no vital principle of conduct was involved, it would be best for him and his followers to conform to the custom of the time (cf. 3¹⁵ 22¹⁵⁻²², notes).

27. The story of the finding of the shekel (Greek stater; see art., Time, Money, etc., p. 78b) has been made unnecessarily difficult by the evangelist's literal-mindedness. As the record stands, it has a touch of magic for which there is elsewhere no warrant in anything Jesus did. It is highly probable that what was originally nothing but playful humor on Jesus' part, as he bade Peter get the money by fishing, gradually lost its true character, and was given the form appearing in the text. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 923b.)

CHAPTER XVIII

1-14. The Little Child as Object Lesson in Christian Character. See notes on Mk. 9³³⁻³⁷ and cf. Lk. 9⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸. We have here an "acted parable," the use of which marks Jesus as the skillful teacher. He drew from it the following lessons: (1) To obtain the child spirit involves a very radical and complete change of attitude and life, which shows itself in freshness of outlook, responsiveness to truth, the spirit of eagerness and wonder (vv. 1-4). Such are some of the open sesame into the kingdom of God. (2) The followers of Jesus must ever welcome into their ranks the children of their people (v. 5); or possibly the phrase one of these little ones may mean men and women of humble and lowly station in life; to all such the hand of welcome must be outstretched and the welcome must always be in his name, i.e., either offered by them as his representatives or his blessing invoked as the act is performed. (3) Jesus lays down a stringent rule to govern the attitude of his disciples toward the lowly of his followers (v. 6). The arrogance of the Pharisees toward the Am-haaretz—"the people of the land," or the peasant classes—was one of the reasons why they were so disliked. On no account must the followers of Jesus offend (cause to stumble), i.e., present any impediment or obstacle which makes it hard for others to live an upright life. Such obstacles as pride, arrogance, intolerance, coldness of demeanor, inconsistency in conduct, are insurmountable barriers preventing the weak from entering the Kingdom. It would be far better for a privileged, gifted man to meet a violent death than for him to lead a life that made it hard for others to find purity and goodness. (4) The disciple of Jesus must exercise rigid self-discipline and self-denial (vv. 8, 9). Similar words occur in the Sermon on the Mount in a paragraph in which Jesus deals with the question of purity (527-30). Low and unworthy ideals and practices present a real hindrance to conduct of the highest and worthiest kind. The appeal is strengthened by the reference to angels and their function (v. 10). The belief in angels was very prevalent in the days of Jesus; sometimes they acted as God's ambassadors (Lk. 119, 26), sometimes as simple messengers (Lk. 28-13). Nations and churches had their angels (Rev. 120). The Persians believed that every person had his counterpart in heaven, traces of which belief seem to appear here (cf. p. 757b). J. Weiss thinks that if the little ones include all who are little in age, worldly importance, or religious development, the access of their angels to the presence of God is a beautiful expression of his unceasing knowledge and care. (5) The disciple must in the Spirit of God seek earnestly for those who have wandered from the fold (vv. 11-14; cf. mg.). The parable of the sheep is put in another context in Lk. 1534. (note). In the sight of God, every individual, however obscure and lowly, is of value. He does not desire any man to live an aimless, lonely, purposeless life; in the judgment of Jesus to do that is to be lost. Men must dwell together in a community of believing souls, all possessed by common aims and ideals (see notes on Eph. 211f.).

15-20. Some Further Brotherly Duties. In this section we have expansions of original sayings of Jesus when the church had already become an organized body. It is the most distinctly ecclesiastical passage in Matthew. Jesus dealt in the Sermon on the Mount (538-48, notes) with the question of reconciliation and the forgiving spirit as it affected the individual; here it is dealt with in its importance as affecting the life of the brotherhood. Some think that the word church is used here in a local sense equivalent to synagogue. Wellhausen takes it (as also in 1618) as a reference to the mother congregation of Jerusalem. The word, he thinks, denotes a small body of the Lord's followers.

17. Klausner, the Jewish scholar, in his estimate of the character of Jesus (in his Jesus of Nazareth) considers the words as the Gentile and the publican exceedingly strong terms of contempt. They are certainly out of harmony with all we know of Jesus and probably reflect a period when Jewish hostility was met by Christians in a spirit entirely unlike that of the Master.

18. Billerbeck and Strack claim that in Aramaic the expression to bind and loose was used of the verdict of a teacher of the Law who, on the strength of his expert knowledge of the oral tradition, declared some action "bound," i.e., forbidden, some "loosed," i.e., permitted; later the expression was employed to describe the function of the church in excommunicating members from its midst. It is not likely that the words describe an authority to absolve from sins.

19, 20. Harmony and good will are indispensable in the life of the church, because a church united in prayer accomplishes great things and continually receives new gifts from God's hands. This is true even when the group is very small. Jesus did not suffer from the illusion of numbers. The "little" church is as much his as is the "big" church. Frederick Heiler (in his Spirit of Worship) claims that all Christian forms of worship are based upon and dominated by the belief in the living Christ. This saying, however, could not mean to those who first heard it all that it meant to Christians at a later time—the Universal Presence of Jesus expressing itself in the church.

21-35. Forgiveness and the Parable of the Unfaithful Servant. The duty of forgiveness occupied a large place in the teaching of Jesus. The spirit of revenge had cast a dark shadow upon the life of his own race and upon that of primitive society in general. Unlimited forgiveness was to be the dominant spirit of the New Society. Evil of every kind, personal, social, international, was to be "overcome by good," especially in the form of good will and a conciliatory spirit. Seventy times seven (cf. mg.) is a hyperbolical way of expressing an unlimited number. Among the Jews the number of times one should exercise forgiveness varied, three being the fixed number in one statement in the Mishnah, in other statements seven.

This parable, as Jülicher notes, is one of the simplest and clearest we have from the lips of Jesus. The one truth which it illustrates is expressed in the final verse (35). To foster the spirit of pity and forgiveness in our hearts we must ever realize what God has had to pardon in us. Sins against God are symbolized by talents (v. 24, mg.), sins against men by denarii (v. 28, mg.). Jesus here emphasizes the great truth that mercy is enthroned in the heart of God and that forgiveness should shine like a jewel on the breasts of his followers. To forgive is to be Godlike. Ill-will and a revengeful, grudging spirit involve others in the consequences of our sins. The parable beautifully illustrates 57, and presents in a new light a truth proclaimed in the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, "Forgive thy neighbor the hurt that he hath done thee; and then thy sins shall be pardoned when thou prayest" (28¹).

24. Talent—six thousand denarii, about twelve hundred dollars (see art., Time, Money, etc., p. 78b). Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa paid to the Imperial treasury six hundred talents a year; Galilee and Peræa paid two hundred.

25. Canaanitish slaves were sold by written contract as though they had been goods or cattle. They were often marked by a seal or stamp, or bells were hung round their necks. Their subjugation was complete and their treatment cruel in the extreme. The system in Israel as in every other land was a horrible plague corrupting the national life. A creditor could take the debtor forcibly before the authorities.

35. The fact that it is the heavenly Father who at the close is represented as punishing shows that the doctrine of God's Fatherhood does not mean that men can impose on his good nature. A father may be stern in the very interests of his fatherhood. Jesus nowhere says that God treats lightly the unfilial and unfraternal spirit—which, in the gospel, is the essence of sinfulness.

CHAPTER XIX

1, 2. Jesus Begins His Journey to Jerusalem. These verses mark an important break in the ministry of Jesus. He is beginning to fulfill his own prediction as to his fate (16²¹ 17²²). He turns his back on Galilee, the home of all his disciples except Judas Iscariot, where he could have been sure of a measure of popularity and even of safety, and "sets his face" toward Jerusalem. His journey thither is a leisurely one, and it is not direct. He goes by way of Peræa, the territory east of Jordan, and thereby avoids Samaria (cf. Lk. 9^{51f}. Jn. 4¹⁻⁴). John intimates that he visited Jerusalem twice (7², 3 10^{22f}.) before the final visit, which according to the Synoptic record falls some six months after this final leaving of Galilee. Luke devotes considerable attention to this ministry in Peræa, and to him we owe our knowledge of many of its incidents (see Lk. 9⁵¹—19²⁸).

3-12. The Question of Divorce. (Mk. 10²⁻¹²; cf. Mt. 5³¹, 32 Lk. 16¹⁸ 1 Cor. 7.) It seems beyond doubt that Matthew derived his account from Mark, but that he reflects the mind of the early church at a later period than Mark. The order in Mark is (1) the question; (2) quotations from Deut. 24¹⁻³; (3) the answer of Jesus, in which he quotes freely Gen. 2²⁴; (4) the argument clinched by v. 9. The order in Matthew is (1) the question, with the significant addition of the words for every cause; (2) the quotation from Genesis; (3) the retort by listeners quoting Deut. 24¹; (4) the reply of Jesus, stating that the Mosaic command was a concession to the people. (Note that in Matthew the questioners appeal to Deuteronomy against Genesis, in Mark, Jesus appeals to Genesis against Deuteronomy.) Then (5) the argument is clinched by a saying in which Matthew introduces the exceptive clause (v. 9; he also introduces it in 5³²). It is only in the first Gospel that we find the exceptive clause, and the whole context shows that it is contrary to the spirit of the passage and was made when divorce for adultery had already grown up. Mark in v. 12 has what looks like a later addition, since the statement about a woman being able to divorce her husband was a Greek and Roman, not a Jewish custom. Many modern scholars (e.g., H. G. Wood and Klostermann), though they regard the exceptive clauses in Matthew as an interpolation, yet claim that it reflects the mind of Jesus, since the case of adultery would be dealt with as in Deut. 22^{13f}. by the death penalty. It is very doubtful, however, if this penalty was inflicted in the days of Jesus (but cf. Jn. 8¹⁻¹¹). It is clear that Jesus is laying down an ideal for his followers. To what extent this ideal, which, like many others, we owe to Jesus, is applicable for modern society is a problem. (See Streeter, Adventure, ch. 3; Temple, Essays in Christian Politics, pp. 105f.)

Before the ideal can be reached it is very evident not only that modifications must be introduced into the legislation of nations, but also that a drastic change must take place in the attitude of many individuals. V. 12 seems to be an interpolation by the evangelist. The deliberate choice of celibacy for the Kingdom's sake has sometimes been justified, but many ills have gone with it also.

13-15. Jesus Blesses the Children. (Mk. 10¹³⁻¹⁶, and see notes on 18¹⁻¹⁴.) Matthew characteristically omits the strong word "indignation" which Mark has in v. 14 as well as Mark's lovely word (Greek enankalizo) which means "to place a little one's head to rest on the bend of one's arm." The child nature is presented by Jesus as the ideal for his kingdom, not because it is either humble or innocent, but because of its dependence on others, its receptiveness, its capacity to develop, and its freedom from self-consciousness and worry. As the child rests its head on the strong arm of the Lord, so the soul of man must learn to lean and rest on the strength of the strong Son of God. Some scholars think that the phrase kingdom of heaven is here a synonym for Christian salvation in a general sense, hence they read to such belongeth salvation.

16-22. The Great Refusal. (Mk. 10¹⁷⁻²² Lk. 18¹⁸⁻²³.) The rich man's salute of Jesus as good (see mg.) is not in any way ironical nor is it a meaningless compliment, nor is it a recognition of the perfect teaching capacity of Jesus or of his moral perfection. The Greek word translated "good" (agathos) on the lips of this suppliant is used more in the sense of gracious, benevolent, kindly disposed. The answer of Jesus as reported in Mark (10¹⁸) occasioned difficulty to the author of the first Gospel, who changed it to why askest thou me concerning that which is good? (Cf. mg.) The statement seems most incongruous on the lips of Jesus, who was the very one to consult on all questions of moral goodness. The answer of Jesus, whether Mark or Matthew is correct, is nevertheless a mark of his profound humility and in harmony with such statements as Jn. 14²⁸, "My Father is greater than I." The source of all benevolence is in God himself. Some recent writers on the life of Jesus have fastened on these words and have tried to prove that they indicate on Jesus' part a consciousness of sin, an interpretation which only goes to show to what straits men are put to discover a flaw in the character of Jesus.

The inquirer is a Jew, in whose heart riches are slowly dethroning God, and the words of Jesus may have been purposely spoken to bring him to think of his relations to God. The commandments enumerated by Jesus are those of the second table, which emphasize social obligations and human responsibilities. The apocryphal Gospel to the Nazarenes asserts that to the young man's claim the Lord replied: "How sayest thou, 'I have kept the law and the prophets'? How does it stand written in the Law? 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself'; and see, many of thy brethren are covered with filth and dying of hunger while thy house is full of good things, and nothing at all goes out from it to them." This rich man makes an astounding claim when he asserts that he has fulfilled all these moral obligations, but despite such palpable self-righteousness, Jesus sees in his nature some lovable qualities, so much so that he endeavors to get him to join the inner circle. But the way is hard; in his case it must be for him to cut himself entirely free from his great wealth and live the simple life of a humble follower of Jesus. Great crises call for drastic demands. But the demand here was too great, and the young man sorrowfully turns away and misses the great opportunity of his life. It does not follow from this that Jesus meant that no Christian could hold property. Cf. Joseph of Arimathea. The law of the Kingdom is undivided allegiance: what hinders that must be given up.

23-26. Riches a Soul Peril. (Mk. 10²³⁻²⁷ Lk. 18^{24, 25}.) Jesus, by his contacts with men in Capernaum, Jericho, the Decapolis, and Jerusalem, was made to realize how wealth influenced the character of certain publicans, courtiers, and Roman officials. Then as now it often deadened spiritual aspirations and desires and acted as a great deterrent to discipleship. By means of a popular hyperbolic proverbial expression about a camel and a needle's eye, he boldly states that from a human standpoint for a rich man to enter the Kingdom is well-nigh impossible. According to some important MSS., Mk. 10²⁴ should read how difficult a thing it is to enter the kingdom of God, implying that entrance into the Kingdom is difficult not only for the rich but for all. To the consternation and questioning of the disciples Jesus gives the reassuring word that the salvation of men and the bringing of men into the kingdom of God is something that only the grace and power of God himself can accomplish, and this is always at the disposal of men.

27-30. Reward for Self-renunciation. (Mk. 10²⁸⁻³¹ Lk. 18²⁸⁻³⁰.) Peter is anxious to know what compensations the disciples are to receive for having left all. The answer of Jesus seems to be best preserved in Matthew and Luke, who represent Jesus as saying simply that the compensations shall be manifold (v. 29, mg.), and who leave out the detailed enumerations of Mk. 10³⁰, a passage which we may suppose was added later when the communistic experiment was made in the church and the disciples held all things in common (Acts 24^{3f.}). But the rich compensations of service in the Kingdom are attended by persecutions (Mk. 10³⁰), and when the Gospel was written these were of a very severe order. (See intro. to Revelation, p. 1365, a book reflecting the persecutions of this same period.)

CHAPTER XX

1-16. The Parable of Equal Pay for Unequal Work. We should be as grateful to Matthew for preserving this matchless parable as to Luke (15¹¹⁻³²) for treasuring its twin companion, that of the prodigal son, with which it has the closest affinities, and which is, in fact, the best commentary on this parable. In both parables it is the grace and loving-kindness of God toward those who enter the Kingdom late that are extolled and magnified. The germ ideas from which have flowered the teaching of Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, on the grace of God are found embedded in these two parables, Jesus presenting the ideas in a highly imaginative and colorful way and Paul presenting them more abstractly. The originality of Jesus is seen when we compare this parable with similar ones recorded in the Talmud. One such parable tells of a man entering the vineyard late, but because of his industry receiving much more than those who began earlier; in the same way, a certain rabbi did more for the Law in twenty-eight years than many other scholars in one hundred years. The grace of God strives to make men equal as regards what they receive in the kingdom of God from the Father. The blessings of the Kingdom are spiritual and intangible; the joy of the Lord is the same for all; but the parable does not mean that the man who has borne the heat and burden of the day may not be able to appreciate and use more fully an identical gift. While the main emphasis of the parable is on the grace of God, his justice and righteousness in dealing fairly with those who came first are also stressed.

Day (v. 2) was reckoned from dawn to sunset, roughly speaking from 6 A.M. to 6 P.M., and it was divided into four equal parts. The eleventh hour (v. 6) is chosen to make the apparent injustice as conspicuous as possible. The expression evil eye (v. 15) is found in the O.T. as the equivalent of a mean and niggardly spirit (cf. Deut. 28⁵⁴), and good is used here in the sense of kind, bountiful. We may paraphrase: "Does my friendliness produce in thee the unfriendly feeling of a disgruntled man?" The verse is important for the interpretation of the parable. (Cf. on 6²¹⁻²³.)

16. J. Weiss interprets the verse as meaning that every distinction between first and last vanishes in the kingdom of God. The words themselves, however, are either misplaced or they show that Matthew has misunderstood the meaning of the parable. The first, who have borne the heat and burden of the day, are not disparaged. That those hired last receive pay first is only part of the furnishing of the parable. It is not the reversal of positions that is stressed but the equalizing of privileges.

17-19. The Third Prediction of Suffering. See notes on Mk. 10³²⁻³⁴. These words should be linked with 16^{21f.} 17^{22, 23} 19^{1, 2}, notes. The shadow of the cross falls consistently across the path of the Saviour.

20-28. The Ambition of the Sons of Zebedee. See notes on Mk. 10³⁵⁻⁴⁵. On v. 28, cf. 18¹¹ A.V., and 18¹⁰ R.V. mg.

29-34. Healing Two Blind Men. See notes on Mk. 10⁴⁶⁻⁵².

CHAPTER XXI

1-11. The Triumphal Entry. (Mk. 11¹⁻¹⁰ Lk. 19²⁹⁻³⁸.) Rawlinson thinks the purpose of the story is clearly to represent Jesus' entry into Jerusalem as the coming of Zion's king. Matthew narrates the incident as though it were a direct fulfillment of the prophecy in Zech. 9⁹ and he bears the O.T. passage in mind in narrating the details of the story, for he mentions two animals (but cf. intro., p. 955b). Only Matthew of the three evangelists quotes the prophecy. Scholars like Weiss, Bacon, and others think that the Messianic coloring was an after-thought and that the multitudes greeted Jesus simply as a prophet. But may not Jesus have chosen to manifest his Messiahship at this juncture in his ministry in a way that would show that it was a spiritual and non-political one? (Cf. Jn. 12¹⁶.) The authorities surely could not charge anyone entering in this lowly fashion with having political aspirations.

1. The Mount of Olives, a hill of moderate height, was a Sabbath journey westward from Jerusalem. Popular belief expected the Messiah to appear on Olivet. Bethphage ("house of unripe figs") was probably an estate on the western slope of the hill.

2, 3. The indications are that Jesus had already made a private arrangement with the owner of the ass. The Lord here, Allen thinks, is the equivalent of God. Zahn suggests that the owner was of the inner circle. In Greek-speaking usage "Lord" is the normal title for Jesus as Divine Head of the Christian Community (cf. Acts 19⁵, 10, 13, 17, 20 2 Cor. 3¹⁷).

9. Hosanna reminds us of the Hallel Psalms sung at the Passover (Psa. 113-118). The original Hebrew verb expresses a cry for help; it is addressed to a king (2 Kings 16⁷), and also to God in favor of the king (Psa. 20⁹) and of the people as a whole (Psa. 118²⁵). In Christian liturgy it is simply a cry for help. The phrase he who cometh refers in the psalm quoted (118²⁶) to any pilgrim, but is used here perhaps in a special Messianic sense of Jesus. Hosanna in the highest is probably an abbreviated form of expression meaning, "Give salvation, O Thou who dwellest in the height," or "Hosanna is called to Thee who dwellest on the height."

12-17. Jesus Cleanses the Temple. (Mk. 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸ Lk. 19⁴⁵, 46; cf. Jn. 2¹³⁻¹⁶.) Some scholars prefer the Johannine position of this incident in the ministry of Jesus (but on the possibility that there were two cleansings, see notes on Jn. 2¹³⁻¹⁶). Matthew gives the account of the cleansing of the Temple before the cursing of the fig-tree; Mark reverses this order. The selling of doves and the exchanging of money was permissible in the outer courts of the Temple; the reason why Jesus protested was because the traders were in the habit of defrauding the pilgrims who came to the city from all lands. A den of robbers aptly describes the methods of these men. Just as the pilgrims at Mecca to-day are outrageously fleeced, so they were in Jerusalem in the days of Jesus. Israel Abrahams, referring to the stalls of vendors outside the Christian Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem to-day, where sacred relics, painted beads, colored candles, gilded crucifixes, and bottles of Jordan water are sold, exclaims: "Would that Jesus were come again to overthrow those false servants of his as he overthrew those false servants of his in Israel long ago." Nothing so lowers Christianity in the thoughts of men like using it as a cloak for corruption in business.

13. There are two quotations from the O.T. here, Isa. 56⁷ and Jer. 7¹¹. The first is cited fully only by Mark; Matthew and Luke omit for all the nations, possibly because the Temple had been destroyed when they wrote. The emphasis on prayer shows that Jesus thinks of the Temple as a place for worship and not as a place for sacrifices.

14-17. Matthew alone adds this statement about Jesus healing blind men and cripples in the Temple precincts and the children crying out "Hosanna." The cry of the children may very well belong to the story of the triumphal entry, but v. 14 suggests the hand of an editor who has transposed this statement from another place.

18-22. The Cursing of the Fig Tree. (Mk. 11¹²⁻¹⁴, 19-26.) Figs ripe enough to eat could not possibly be found on a fig tree before June in either Galilee or Jerusalem. The tree bears two crops; in Palestine, the real fruit is not ripe till August; but fruit of a sort ripens much earlier. Lagrange thinks we have here a symbolic miracle to teach the insufficiency of religious profession without fruitfulness. J. Weiss regards it as a legend whose origin we cannot explain. It has been suggested that there was a withered fig-tree on the road from Bethlehem to Jerusalem with which popular fancy busied itself, the withering of which was in course of time attributed to a curse by Jesus. Deissmann has treated the incident in a touching and convincing way in his Religion of Jesus and Faith of Paul, pp. 98-100.

The most probable interpretation is that the parable of the fig-tree in Lk. 13⁶⁻⁹, which is a parable dealing with the faithlessness of the Jews, has in course of time developed into this miracle which, suggestively enough, is recorded for us in Matthew and Mark but not in Luke. Klausner and Middleton Murry lay stress on the historicity of the incident and deduce from it that Jesus really lost his temper and was afterward sorry for it! (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 923b.)

Whatever the real nature of the incident, it provided the basis for a conversation between Jesus and the disciples on the question of prayer and what marvelous things can be wrought by its aid. Pointing to the old withered fig-tree, and to the mountain on whose slopes they are sitting, Jesus used the former as a symbol of a small, trifling thing and the latter as a symbol of a difficult thing. Not only is prayer a real help to accomplish the hard, big things of life, but its inspiration is essential also to fulfill the smaller, lesser duties. Jesus was facing the greatest task of his career in the full confidence that this great weapon of prayer would not fail him. Matthew stresses only the need of faith, while Mark elaborates the conversation and emphasizes the importance of persistence as well as the need of forgiving others, if our prayers are to be all-availing.

23-27. The Source of Jesus' Authority. (Mk. 11²⁷⁻³³, notes on Lk. 20¹⁻⁸.) The words and deeds of Jesus in Jerusalem impress the rulers with his moral and intellectual authority (cf. 7²⁹). Some of their number had once gone so far as to accuse him of being in collusion with Beelzebub (12²⁴). Jesus loved to answer his opponents by a counter question (22¹⁵⁻²¹), so he asked them to state their opinion about the authority of the Baptist. To give it a purely human origin would have displeased the people, but to attribute it to God would have been foolish, for they never acknowledged John as a divinely sent messenger. Though Jesus does not answer directly, the answer is self-evident. His conviction that he is the divinely appointed Messiah attains the clearness and distinctness of noon, and well do his opponents know it in their heart of hearts. Throughout these scenes at Jerusalem the Messianic claim is steadily maintained and put forward by implication, though it is not until the actual trial scene, in answer to the high priest's question, that the claim becomes explicit (26^{63, 64}).

28-32. Parable of the Two Sons. The Greek MSS. vary in the order of the two sons. The R.V. gives the right order. The first son represents the publicans and sinners who refused the offer of the gospel but afterward repented and accepted, while the second son typifies the scribes who pretend to concur with the claims of the gospel but whose life clearly shows their concurrence to be but lip-service. Montefiore regards this parable as a deadly but most accurate satire on the morality of the scribes, who keep the letter and neglect the spirit of the law.

32. Some scholars reverse v. 32 and v. 31b, which gives greater clearness to the parable. While the parable speaks of relations with God, this verse deals with attitudes toward the Baptist; in consequence many regard the verse as not a part of the parable proper.

33-46. The Parable of the Wicked Vine-dressers. (Mk. 12¹⁻¹², notes on Lk. 20⁹⁻¹⁹.) This parable contains a philosophy of the history of Jesus' people. The meaning is so clear that he who runs may read. It should be compared with Isa. 51-7. The Jews as a whole represent the tenant farmers. It is clear that Jesus anticipated his death and regarded himself as occupying a position higher than the prophets. Burkitt defends the authenticity of the parable, affirming that an allegory would have contained some allusion to the resurrection. Lagrange thinks that it would have been a reflection on our Lord's moral character if he had not set clearly before his adversaries the blackness of the crime which they were plotting against him. The parable is his attempt to save them from their own folly. Jesus is careful not to involve the crowd in the crime.

34. The vine bore in the third year; the fourth year produce was sacred; that of the fifth year became the possession of the owners.

37. Sent his son. The words represent Jesus in his twofold relation of servant and Son. 41. The other husbandmen are, Lagrange thinks, the Twelve, as the new judges of the spiritual Israel (cf. v. 43). 42. Psa. 118^{22, 23}. This was a favorite proof text of early Christian apologetic (cf. Acts 4¹¹ 1 Pet. 24-7 Rom. 9^{32, 33} Eph. 2²⁰). Some think the quotation is an afterthought of early Christian exegesis, while others are of the opinion that the application goes back to our Lord himself. This is the more probable in view of the evident purpose of the parable to express Jesus' conviction of his own significance. 44. See mg. If genuine, the verse expresses the dreadful cost of rejecting God's truth. 46. A prophet. Cf. 21¹¹. The word suggests that the triumphal entry, though Messianic for Jesus, was not so for the people. Schweitzer, e.g., thinks that the people regarded Jesus as "Elijah," the forerunner of Messiah, and that the later popular demand for Jesus' death was due to a revulsion of feeling when they were told of his Messianic claim.

CHAPTER XXII

1-14. The Parable of the Wedding Feast. The parable occurs in Lk. 14¹⁶⁻²⁴ (notes) in what appears a purer and more original form. Its main lesson is to teach that those for whom the Kingdom was intended would lose their high privileges because they did not value them and the privileges which they had scorned would be granted to the despised outsider. The parable also stresses the truth that God's purpose would not know final defeat—guests would be found for the supper of the King. The deep universal note of the gospel sounds forth clearly in this parable. Note the character of the excuses; they are the normal, everyday concerns of life, things not sinful in themselves but when allowed to absorb all our thoughts and energy they can very effectively stand between us and the full acceptance of the joys of the Kingdom. The comparison with a wedding banquet serves to emphasize the joy and gladness of the Kingdom's life.

6, 7. These verses are not in Luke. While they show that Matthew had grasped the point that the Jews were to lose the privileges of the Kingdom, the representation of God as venting his anger on Jerusalem is not due to Jesus, but is probably a later addition to the parable.

8. The rejection of God by the people necessarily leads to the rejection of the people by God. This principle is embedded in the origin of Christianity, which was originally intended as the consummation of Judaism, but finally became a separate movement (cf. Acts 186).

11-13. The man without the wedding garment. People brought in from the byways and streets would have neither time nor means to procure a wedding garment. The little parable nevertheless may properly emphasize the fact that one must appear at the kingly feast with that pure garment which means righteousness, and that the day will come when the King will appear to sift the worthy from the unworthy. The note of divine severity appears often in the teaching of Jesus (520 723 1120f. 1834, 35, note).

14. This is a detached saying. By it Jesus could only have meant that while many hear the word calling to repentance it is only a few who respond to the call. Matthew represents Jesus in places as entertaining a very pessimistic outlook for the future, such as is not the case in the other Gospels. This emphasis may be due to the fact that the persecution and difficulty which characterized the period when Matthew was compiled naturally led the author to select from the total available tradition those elements which seemed to bear on the immediate situation.

15-22. The Question of Tribute. (Mk. 1213-17, notes on Lk. 2020-26.) Rome, since 6 A.D., had imposed a head tax of about twenty-five cents a person on the population of Judæa. It was regarded as a badge of servitude to Rome. Jesus was no political revolutionary (cf. 1724f.), and by his own example he showed his countrymen that the way to change the oppression and tyranny of Rome was by gentleness, good will, and religious leadership. The disaster that befell the Jews (see it described in Josephus, Wars of the Jews, especially bks. v and vi, and ch. 1 of bk. vii) was ultimately due to their ignoring of this solution offered by Jesus. In ancient times the authority of a ruler was co-extensive with the circulation of his coinage, and coins bearing his image were ultimately regarded as his private property. Jesus' words in v. 21, as Lord Acton said, gave to the civil power, under the protection of conscience, a sacredness it had never enjoyed and bounds it had never acknowledged; they were the repudiation of absolutism and the inauguration of freedom.

16. A beautiful tribute to Christ, though given in flattery, emphasizing his perfect freedom from deference to the great and powerful. Way of God here means religion.

23-33. The Sadducees' Question Concerning Resurrection. (Mk. 1218-27 Lk. 2027-40 cf. Acts 236-8.) The Sadducees were the ecclesiastical political party, who sought the well-being of the people through political means and the appropriation of the culture of the Roman Empire. They were not in sympathy with the Messianic hopes of the nation. By this facetious question arising from the practice of the Levirate marriage among the Jews (see Deut. 255-10), the Sadducees wished to throw ridicule upon the truth of the resurrection, in which they did not believe. The popular belief was that he who died without offspring had no one to care for the ancestor cult of the family, and this serves to explain this question (see notes on Ruth, p. 378b). Jesus intimates that the conditions of the resurrection life will be totally different from this. All will be as the angels, for whom, as an old saying has it, God has created no wives. This use of Scripture is rabbinic in character. Because God is styled God of Abraham, etc., long after the death of the patriarchs, it follows that the patriarchs still live. For defensive purposes Matthew and his readers considered this argument convincing; whether Jesus intended exactly this deduction may be questioned.

34-40. The Greatest Commandment. See notes on Mk. 1228-34 Lk. 1025-37. The glory of Jesus is that he welded indissolubly together these two great fundamental commands which had long been held apart. The first is found in Deut. 64 (notes) and is known by the Jews as the Shema (Hebrew for the first word, Hear), which every Jew repeats at his prayers daily; the second is found in Lev. 1918 (notes), but it was not given a place of much prominence. To Jesus they are the pivotal points of the new religion. He stands unique among men not only as the one who linked the two together, but as the first who incorporated them into his life, making them the primal laws of his every action. When love is analyzed we find it contains the elements of admiration, reverence, the desire to possess, and the will to benefit. These elements are not always present in the same degree or at the same time. But in all genuine love to God there is true reverence and awe, in which all the faculties of personality unite together; there is also a yearning to possess more of the Spirit of God, and a strong desire to be at his service. To the Jew the word neighbor usually meant fellow Jew. Jesus, as in the parable of the good Samaritan, expanded the word and lifted its portals so that it came to include any child of the human race, however lowly and despised. For him, neighbor is anyone who needs our help. Likewise, he who renders the help is "neighborly."

[The so-called pericope (Jn. 753-811, notes) follows here—the story of the woman taken in adultery. The later church thought that Jesus' intense love for sinners would injure his reputation. It therefore cut out this story, which fortunately has been treasured for us in some of the MSS. of the fourth Gospel.]

41-46. Son of David. See notes on Mk. 1235-37 Lk. 2041-44. Jesus here seems to disparage his Davidic descent, the fact which his followers make so much of. He is far greater than a son of David—he is the Lord from above. Middleton Murry characteristically thinks (Jesus, Man of Genius, p. 300) that Jesus by this manifestly authentic saying "shatters the legend of his birth in Bethlehem." He was not of David's house. This paragraph, however, may very easily be explained as preserved by the early church just because of its value as a protest against the all too earthly Jewish interpretation of the Messiah. If so, the effort had no very striking success, for the belief in the Davidic descent of Jesus continued to be very persistent, as evidenced in the early chapters of Matthew and Luke (cf. Rom. 13).

44. Psa. 110, quoted here, of which David was regarded as the author, played a large part in early Christian theology (see Acts 234, 35 1 Cor. 1525 Heb. 113). The glorious music of Psa. 110 and 118—songs of victory out of defeat—echoed in Jesus' soul as he stood in the midst of his enemies. He felt that they had been sung of him centuries ago.

46. Questions. The chapter which concludes with this word describes three questions put to Jesus, and his answers. It is probable that we have here a characteristic Matthean grouping of material illustrative of a certain aspect of Jesus' teaching. But Jesus also could ask questions, and vv. 41-45 show how effectively he did it. Note that Mark (1234) and Luke (2040) have both put this verse in what seems to be a more logical position.

CHAPTER XXIII

Chs. 23-25 represent the fifth block of teaching in Matthew's Gospel (intro., section on "Division," p. 953). In ch. 23 we have a large collection of the utterances of Jesus directed against the scribes and Pharisees, the one word occurring like a fugue through the chapter being hypocrisy (see 62, note), a word which hit off to perfection the outstanding characteristic of many of these religious leaders. Even when we take into consideration that the massing of many sayings uttered on different occasions unduly darkens the picture, and when, further, we remember that the sayings, as they passed through minds in the early church filled with bitter animus toward the Jews and the part they had in the crucifixion of Jesus took on harsher tones, it nevertheless remains that we have in this chapter a very dark but, on the whole, a true picture of many Pharisees of the day (but cf. p. 841). Against this somber background the sincerity and truthfulness of Jesus stand out in striking contrast.

1-12. Warnings Against Pride of Place and Power. (Mk. 1238-40, notes on Lk. 2045-47.) Many feel that vv. 2, 3 present a genuine difficulty. As they stand, Jesus seems to say that the disciples are to pay heed to the Pharisaic interpretations of the Mosaic Law but are on no account to copy the Pharisees in the way they translate those interpretations into practice, whereas he is elsewhere represented as regarding the Pharisaic interpretations as "burdens." It is not impossible that a saying of Jesus that bore upon Pharisaism in a less friendly fashion has been manipulated by aggressive members of the anti-Pauline section of the Jewish Christian church in Jerusalem from whence the compiler of this Gospel derived a large part of the material that is peculiar to him (intro., section on "The Judaistic Element," p. 955a). Jesus certainly did not himself comply with the Pharisaic interpretations of the Law.

4, 5. Instead of interpreting the Law and helping the ordinary man to fulfill its requirements, the Pharisees added to the Law a number of interpretations which only increased the difficulty of fulfilling it. They themselves were meticulous in keeping those parts of the Law which served to bring them into prominence, such as making broad the phylacteries. Phylactery is the transliteration of a Greek word meaning "safe-guard." According to the Pharisaic interpretation every true Jew was to wear at the morning prayer, fastened on his wrist and bound round his forehead, a small leathern case—the phylactery—with four compartments containing four portions of Scriptures, Ex. 131-10 1311-16 Deut. 64-9 1113-21. It was possible by enlarging the bands to make these look very imposing. In addition the Law required that four blue tassels—the borders—should be worn at the four corners of the outer robe. Jesus seems to have worn them (cf. Mt. 920), but evidently some Pharisees wore them large and long in conformity with that strong craving of theirs to do everything with a view to winning self-glory.

8-12. In contrast to the Pharisees, the followers of Jesus are not to be governed by the passion for popularity and love of place and power, since true brotherhood cannot live in such an atmosphere, and the service of humanity alone is the true pathway to greatness and real enlargement of personality. The titles father, and master (or leader), and Christ are sometimes regarded as showing the influence of a later time in adapting the words of Jesus to the existing situation (cf. Jn. 1426 1613). To search for honor for honor's sake is to lower one's position in the kingdom of God.

13-32. The Seven Great Woes. (Cf. Lk. 1137-52.) Some MSS. add v. 14 (see mg.), but most modern editors leave it out; it is introduced from Mk. 1240. Luke has six woes, three against the Pharisees and three against the scribes (lawyers).

13. The first woe. Luke (1152) expresses this saying in more original form; it is placed last by him as though he deemed it of surpassing importance. The "power of the key" is symbolic of the teaching power of the Pharisees—a wonderfully precious instrument to be kept bright and oiled and well used in unlocking the gateways leading into the broad expanses of the kingdom of God (see Lk. 1152). But they are so preoccupied with outward appearances and are so lost in the unimportant things of the Law that they are now in the deplorable position of not being able either to enter in themselves or to help others.

15. The second woe. While the proselytizing zeal of the Jews waned somewhat before and after the fall of Jerusalem, the letters of Paul (cf. Rom. 217f.), the Acts of the Apostles, and the writings of Josephus (see Antiquities, bk. xxii, ch. 2: 3, 4, 5) bear testimony to the missionary zeal of the Jews of the Diaspora in the first half of the first century. This woe is not in Luke, and many scholars think that when originally uttered it was not so harsh, and that the latter part ran thus—doubly worse than he was. Jesus is not condemning the missionary movement so much as the missionary who leads it. (Cf. pp. 847-9.)

16-22. The third woe. Because the word "hypocrisy" is left out of the address, some think that this woe deals more with a religious and moral error than with a definite act of hypocrisy; and yet what worse form of hypocrisy could we think of than the endeavor to free oneself from some solemn oath by resorting to casuistry and evasion such as we find illustrated here (see notes on Corban, Mk. 78-13). The Pharisees wanted to claim that an oath by the Temple and altar should include reference to the gold in the Temple and the sacrifice at the altar, otherwise the oath is not complete (cf. 534).

23, 24. The fourth woe. (Lk. 1142.) Tithing according to Lev. 2730 was confined to the fruits of seed and tree. According to Deut. 1423 it included corn, new wine, and oil. Rabbis extended it to all cooking vegetables, while the Talmud claimed that everything one eats and drinks and which has its growth from the earth—even the herbs from the kitchen garden—is tithable. The Pharisees were careful to observe these requirements, but the great moral demands of (a) justice, a passion to establish righteousness in all the relationships of life, involving as it does a constant crusade against wrong, oppression and injustice; (b) mercy, that great quality which is mightiest in the mightiest, which reveals itself in loving sympathy and a helpful ministry of the needy; and (c) faith, which here means fidelity, stanch devotion to principle at all costs, loyalty to truth and to one's friends—these were ignored by them. The last clause of v. 23 may not be part of the original saying; it is omitted from Lk. 1142 in the Codex Bezae (see p. 863a). An illustration of the happy half-whimsical way Jesus possessed of expressing truth occurs in v. 24; the gnat corresponds to the mint and dill, and the camel corresponds to the weightier matters. Note the strain out of R.V. for the erroneous strain at of A.V.

25, 26. The fifth woe. The cleansing of cups and of hands before eating was an important ceremonial with the Jews, not on grounds of hygiene or physical cleanliness, but because of the danger of Levitical (ceremonial) impurity. If you were only as careful, Jesus suggests, to see that the contents of the vessels are derived in honorable and just ways you would not have to worry very much about the ceremonial cleanliness of the outside of your cups (cf. 151-20, notes on Mk. 71-8, 14-23).

27, 28. The sixth woe. To walk over a grave caused pollution, and in order to enter the Temple this must be avoided; hence before Passover graves were chalked off lest pilgrims to the city might inadvertently walk over them. Lk. 1144 is perhaps the original form of the saying. McNeile rightly thinks that whitewashed graves do not form a good simile of hypocrisy, since they proclaim to all the inward pollution instead of concealing the contrast as between the outward appearance and the bones and uncleanness concealed within. The reference, however, may be to the ornamental plastering of the walls of sepulchers, for the purpose of making them look attractive. Jesus claims that the Pharisees—judged by the standard of inwardness—are as bad as the lawless libertines and heathen whom they so severely condemn.

29-32. The seventh woe. (Lk. 1147, 48.) This deals with the spirit of self-righteousness. "How much better are we than our fathers," men were saying; "they slew the special messengers of God, we honor those messengers by raising memorials to their greatness." The Pharisees are the sons of their fathers, because this spirit of self-righteousness is the sworn enemy of all that is great and noble; those who have it are like those whom they denounce; indeed, before many days shall have elapsed these model sons will be howling, "Crucify him," "Crucify him," at the greatest prophet of their race. They are engaged in filling to the brim the measure which their fathers began (cf. 1 Thess. 2¹⁶). Jesus may also be suggesting in these words that tomb-raising is a very superficial way of showing respect. True honor is shown by living in the spirit of the prophets and carrying into practice their precepts.

33. This is reminiscent of the words of the Baptist and may have strayed here inadvertently. Judgment of hell (mg. Gehenna; see note on 5²²) means the judgment which can inflict Gehenna, the place of punishment, upon one.

34-36. A Solemn Warning. (Lk. 1149-51.) The neglect of privileges proffered by God ends in utter desolation and ruin. The words are in Luke attributed to "the wisdom of God." Some have thought that Jesus was here quoting from an apocryphal book; others have thought that if the wisdom of God is God in action, then the expression is the equivalent of "Thus saith the Lord"; in that case, the passage refers to the whole of God's gracious dealings with his people, who, however, have spurned and insulted God's prophets, killing and crucifying them. His knowledge that Jesus was himself crucified must have given this saying a poignant meaning for Matthew. Abel was not strictly a Jew, yet from a religious standpoint all early O.T. generations are ancestors of the Jews. Zachariah is in all probability the Zechariah mentioned in 2 Chr. 24²⁰⁻²²; the added statement that he was slain between the Temple and altar is due to popular tradition, not to the O.T.

37-39. The Lament Over Jerusalem. (Lk. 13^{34, 35}.) Schmiedel and Harnack regard the lament as part of some quotation, but the words are too personal and intimate to be only that. Jesus is deeply moved as he thinks of the impending doom coming swiftly on his nation. To the last he is ready to help at any personal cost the people whom he loves. In this tense moment, the simple figure of a hen in some farmyard protecting her brood from an unexpected peril is taken by him as a sublime and fitting symbol of all he desires to be to men.

39. The words have an eschatological significance, and they form a fitting prelude to the solemn discourses that follow in chs.

24-26. Jesus is anticipating his return to earth as the heavenly Messiah, and he clearly says that on his return he will be accepted. Taking the words in that sense, they have not yet been fulfilled. Taking them in a less rigid sense, namely, that when men, even the Jews, properly understand Jesus they will recognize him as their Lord, their progressive fulfillment is being seen in all Christian history and experience (cf. note on 21⁹).

CHAPTER XXIV

The parallels are Mk. 13 Lk. 21 (cf. Lk. 1720-37). For the nature of the discourse, see the introductory statement to Mk. 13. The notes on Mk. 13 cover the various sections of the discourse as given here in Matthew. On the general nature of apocalyptic discourse, see the articles on that subject, pp. 187, 200, the article on Backgrounds, pp. 843-7, and the introduction to Revelation.

The important differences between Matthew and Mark are as follows: (1) Mt. 24⁷⁻¹⁴; cf. Mk. 13⁹⁻¹³. Matthew writes from the standpoint of actual experience of persecution, and therefore adds some features, but he modifies in v. 10 the tragic note in Mark, v. 12. (2) In v. 22, Matthew has a future tense, which is past tense in v. 20 in Mark. (3) In Matthew, vv. 26-28 are an elaboration which is wanting in Mark. The elaboration is important for its emphatic denial of the supposition, still held by some, that Christ is to appear at some definitely located spot on the earth. Rather is his coming like the lightning—appearing everywhere at once. (4) The simple warning to watch in Mark, v. 33, is in Matthew the climax of a series of graphic illustrations (vv. 37-42) which appear to be Matthean expansions of various phrases in Mark. (5) In Matthew, vv. 43-51, the short parable and warning of Mark, vv. 34-36, are more fully worked out, the one important change being that in Mark the porter is sleeping on his lord's return, in Matthew he is rioting. Or v. 43 of Matthew may be regarded as the parallel to Mark, and vv. 45f. of Matthew as a second parable with a similar theme, a suggestion which seems to be supported by Lk. 1235-40, 41-48.

CHAPTER XXV

1-13. Parable of the Ten Virgins. See notes on Lk. 1235 1325-28. One can well see how this parable would be cherished by the early church for its bearing on the prolonged delay of the return of Christ—a question which was keenly discussed in the church in the period between 45-65 B.C. (cf. 2 Pet. 3^{8f.}, notes). The implication of the parable is that the Lord taught his disciples about the Second Coming—the Parousia—but it has a permanent lesson apart from that. One of the supreme needs of his followers—so Jesus is saying—is foresight; the word translated wise (Greek phronimos; used in Mt. 7²⁴) implies that prudence and that acute insight into life which prompt men and women to build up reserves so that periods of delay which put hope and loyalty to the test will be tided over. In the parable of the foundations in 7²⁴ this quality of character was displayed by the man who, knowing that life would present periods of storm and stress, took the precaution of building on the rock; the hurricane, therefore, left him unshaken. In the life of the Kingdom there will be inevitable delays when men long for the visible manifestation of the Spirit of Christ; how invaluable in the church at such crises are the men whose cruses are full to the brim with the oil of patience, hope, and truth, and whose lamps on the darkest night are bright and incandescent! The all-important lesson is inculcated that the Christian must learn to build up reserves of strength and fortitude, so that in all circumstances, favorable or unfavorable, he may cause his light to shine, and thus find the joy of the Lord (cf. Mk. 13³⁴⁻³⁷). According to the judgment of many scholars, the parable in its original form ended with v. 10.

14-30. Parable of the Talents. See notes on Lk. 19¹¹⁻²⁷. The eschatological element in this parable may be regarded as secondary. Its main purpose is clearly enough to impress on the followers of Jesus the importance of the consecration of the gifts God has intrusted to us, and to show that though we vary in our several capacities the spirit of faithfulness and dependability in the performance of our trust is equally required of all. Such a quality of character enriches our endowments and qualifies us for larger trusts, while neglect and laziness result in loss and deterioration of our original endowments. Modern psychology has amply verified this teaching. The unused capacity, mental and moral as well as physical, becomes the lost capacity. The sluggard loses even that which he hath. The parable seems also to lay emphasis on the truth that in the church it is the indifference of the moderately endowed men, who form the majority, that is to be deplored.

31-46. The Judgment of the Son of Man. This is less a parable than a prophetic description of a future Judgment. It is found only in Matthew (cf. Lk. 21²⁷). Burney has called attention to the artistic construction of this moving portrayal by pointing out the Hebrew parallelisms. The details of the picture must not be pressed; the main purpose of the description is to give men counsel for the direction of their lives in the present rather than to emphasize what is to take place in the future. The real dividing line between men is whether or not they have the spirit of humanity expressing itself in kindly helpfulness wherever there is need and distress. The presence of Jewish apocalyptic elements, whether they come from Jesus or the evangelist, only serves to heighten the dramatic power of the description. Christian kindness is to know no limits of race or class but is to flow out unceasingly and naturally from a heart in complete harmony with the will of God. The bearing of the parable on the various accidental elements that divide men from each other—race, caste, creed—is obvious. Equally obvious is its teaching that salvation is finally “of the heart,” not “of the head.” Montefiore’s comment on the parable is interesting. He says in effect that it would be foolish not to recognize the force and grandeur of the motive, “for his sake,” in a religion, because as the religion is not one’s own one cannot be stimulated by a personal motive. In v. 45 there is a wonderful anticipation of Paul’s doctrine in Ephesians and Colossians of the mystical oneness of an immanent Christ with humanity.

CHAPTER XXVI

The Beginning of the End. The parallels are Mk. 14 and Lk. 22, on which see notes. The resemblances with Mark are exceedingly close. In some cases, Matthew has elaborated on Mark, e.g., cf. vv. 1-5 of Matthew with vv. 1, 2 of Mark; vv. 24, 25 of Matthew with v. 21 of Mark; v. 42 of Matthew with v. 39 of Mark; vv. 51-54 of Matthew with v. 47 of Mark. In a few cases, Matthew has shortened Mark, e.g., cf. v. 9 of Matthew with v. 5 of Mark; vv. 17-19 of Matthew with vv. 12-16 of Mark; vv. 60, 61 of Matthew with vv. 57-59 of Mark. Two striking omissions from Matthew are vv. 51, 52 of Mark, the story of “a certain young man” who escaped capture by leaving his garment in the soldiers’ hands and fleeing (the presence of the story in Mark has led to the suggestion that the young man was Mark himself); and v. 67 of Mark, the line on Peter’s “warming himself” (the presence of the line in Mark is one of those little touches which supports the tradition that the reminiscences of Peter were a main source for Mark’s Gospel).

The differences in Luke are more considerable. A notable omission is the anointing in the house of Simon (but cf. Lk. 7³⁷⁻⁵⁰); the description of the experience in Gethsemane is shorter, and there is a difference in the process of the trial. Peculiar to Luke is the difficult passage, vv. 35-38, in which, in what purports to be a final instruction to the disciples, Jesus radically changes some of the instructions he gave when he sent them out the first time (Mt. 10^{9, 10}). Vv. 24-30 of Luke are evidently Jesus' comments—here out of their setting—on the request of the sons of Zebedee for a high place in the Kingdom (cf. Mt. 20²⁰⁻²⁸ 19²⁸ Mk. 10³⁵⁻⁴⁵).

CHAPTER XXVII

The Trial, Crucifixion, and Burial of Jesus.

The parallels are Mk. 15 and Lk. 23 (cf. Jn. 18, 19); see notes. As in the case of ch. 26, the resemblances are closer with Mark than with Luke. A notable omission by Mark and Luke is the account of the death of Judas and the purchase of the field of blood (Mt. 27³⁻¹⁰). Mark and Luke also omit the incident of Pilate's wife's dream and of the handwashing as a sign of innocency (Mt. 27^{19, 24, 25}). Matthew alone describes the earthquake.

Luke alone tells of the trial before Herod (23⁶⁻¹⁶), of Jesus' words to the women who followed him to Golgotha (vv. 28-31), and of the conversion of one of the two thieves (vv. 40-43). He gives a much shorter account of the Barabbas incident (vv. 18, 19), omits the description of the mocking and scourging of Jesus by the soldiers, and shortens the account of the crucifixion, a notable omission here being that of the cry, "Why hast thou forsaken me?"

1, 2. Jesus Taken to Pilate. See notes on Mk. 15¹⁻¹⁵.

3-10. Judas and the Field of Blood. Herein is fulfilled Jesus' saying about Judas in 26²⁴. Judas, the only Judæan of the Twelve, may have joined the group in the first place from political motives, and the betrayal may have been due to personal disappointment. But this in nowise excuses Judas. For weeks and months he lived in the presence of Jesus and had the greatest opportunity ever offered to any man to come to a proper understanding of the true nature of the kingdom of God. So far was Judas from being a victim of divine predestination that the utmost God could do to save a man—show him Jesus Christ—was done for him. Judas destroyed himself physically because he came to realize that he had already destroyed himself morally. His real betrayal was less the betrayal of Jesus than the betrayal of his own soul. The idea that he was a necessary step in God's plan to save the world is utterly false. Jesus was not crucified because Judas betrayed him.

He went to Jerusalem expressly to suffer death, and he made no effort to escape it once he was convinced it was the Father's will. Had Judas remained loyal, Jesus would still have died for the sins of the world.

The use by the priests of the returned money is a striking illustration of moral subterfuge. It was not—so they argued—wrong to take from the Temple treasury the money for corrupting Judas, but it was wrong to put it back! They did not see that no inherent "taint" attaches to money. The "taint" is in the user—in his motives and purposes. The action of the priests strikingly resembles Pilate's handwashing.

9, 10. This way of using the O.T. is characteristic of Matthew. The words quoted are from Zech. 11^{12, 13}, not from Jeremiah (although cf. Jer. 32⁶⁻¹⁵). The original words had no such meaning as is here ascribed to them. The change of name from the potter's field to the field of blood, a name still in use when Matthew wrote, serves to prove the historicity of the transaction between Judas and the priests.

11-31. The Trial of Jesus. See notes on Mk. 15¹⁻²⁰ Lk. 23¹⁻²⁵. Pilate tried to evade the responsibility of condemning Jesus. His first effort was the offer to release Barabbas—an offer that takes on a certain dramatic character from the tradition that the name of Barabbas was also Jesus. The choice was between Jesus the Robber and Jesus the Redeemer. Then, as now, right and wrong were balanced against each other; men were asked to choose between them; and the choice, once made, involved irrevocable results.

Pilate's second effort to evade responsibility was much less commendable than the first. The offer to release a prisoner was an attempt to prevent the doing of a wrong. The handwashing (v. 24) was an attempt to disclaim responsibility for a wrong which, although demanded by others, could not have been done without his consent. The clause in the Apostles' Creed perpetuates forever the Roman governor's moral weakness—"Crucified under Pontius Pilate." The dream of his wife may be construed as a divine effort to strengthen his will to do the right. Here again, as with Judas (see on vv. 3-10), there was no question of God's purpose to save men being conditioned on Pilate's doing wrong. The death of Christ had its final ground and reason not in the will of men but in the will of God.

32. Simon of Cyrene. See notes on Mk. 15²¹.

33-44. The Crucifixion. See notes on Mk. 15²²⁻³².

45-56. The Death and Its Accompanying Signs. See notes on Mk. 15³³⁻⁴¹. The assertion that earthquake and resurrection accompanied the death of Jesus may best be understood as a later interpretation as literal of what in the original tradition was symbolic. Lk. 23⁴⁴, ⁴⁵ seems to represent the process of change from Mark to Matthew. It is evident that a violent storm took place during the crucifixion, and this storm came to be understood as nature's sympathetic travail with her suffering Lord. Symbolically the description is entirely true. The meaning of the past, as represented in the Temple with its "holy of holies" and in the great religious leaders, became clear in the light of the suffering Christ. This, indeed, is the burden of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

57-61. The Burial. See notes on Mk. 15 42-47.

62-66. The Sealed Tomb. This account of the care of the authorities to guard against the removal of Jesus' body is peculiar to Matthew. Some connect it with 28¹¹⁻¹⁵, as an attempt on the part of Matthew to make the resurrection both more wonderful and more credible. But there is nothing essentially improbable about such precautions being taken. It is certain that Jesus had foretold his resurrection, and it is apparent that the disappearance of his body, by whatever means, would be regarded by many as a fulfillment of the prediction. What the enemies of Christianity did not realize was that the resurrection of Jesus was a much bigger question than the disappearance of his body (cf. 1 Cor. 15 and notes there). As a matter of fact, it was not the discovery that the tomb was empty that convinced the disciples that their Lord had conquered death, for the discovery dismayed them (Lk. 24³, 4, 11, 12); rather it was their actual experience of his living presence.

CHAPTER XXVIII

1-10. The Visit of the Women to the Tomb. See notes on Mk. 16¹⁻⁸ Lk. 24¹⁻¹² Jn. 20¹⁻¹⁸. Burial in artificial tombs, many of which have been found near centers of population in Palestine, was reserved for the rich; the poor were buried in the ground or in natural caves. The rock-hewn tombs in natural caves were so close to one another that identification of the bodies was very difficult, especially when inscriptions were lacking. Isolated rocks often had a tomb chamber quarried in them. A very common plan for single cave tombs was to have nine shaft tombs running horizontally into the walls of the chamber, three in each wall (excluding the wall which contained the entrance). The bones after decay were placed in an ossuary, so that many more than nine bodies could be buried in one tomb.

This story of the visit of the women to the tomb in Matthew is evidently derived from the account in Mk. 16¹⁻⁸, but Matthew has added new elements to the story. According to him, the purpose of the visit was to see the tomb, while Mark states that it was to anoint the body of Jesus. The "young man" in Mark has become an angel, who assists in the resurrection by rolling away the stone. Matthew informs us also that an earthquake took place (cf. 27⁵¹) and that the tomb was specially guarded. The message of the angel is practically the same in both Gospels, but Mark adds that the women went out from the tomb because astonishment had come upon them, and they said nothing to anyone, for they were afraid. Matthew, on the contrary, says that they ran to make known the news to the disciples (v. 8). Gardner Smith, in his recent study of the resurrection narratives, suggests that the words in v. 6, He is risen, were not originally part of the story, and that v. 7 has been subsequently added. This verse, he claims, is inconsistent with the statement in Mk. 15⁸. If the young man had spoken, as Mark reports, the fear of the women would have been turned to joy. It is incredible that any women possessed of the greatest news ever intrusted to human beings would keep silence for any length of time. Smith further suggests that the women came to the wrong place and mistook an empty tomb for the one they were seeking, and that a young man, of whose identity we know nothing, sought to correct the mistake, pointing to another tomb as the place where they laid him. Terrified at the unexpected apparition and covered with confusion at the failure of their plans, the women ran away and told not a word of their adventure to any man. This story—so the suggestion runs—was quickly expanded and interpreted and has assumed different forms in our synoptic Gospels. The difficulty with the suggestion is that it overemphasizes the importance of the empty tomb (see note on 27⁶²⁻⁶⁶; cf. p. 930).

For if, as is probable, the disciples had left for Galilee before the return of the women from the tomb, then it follows that they became convinced of the reality of the resurrection on account of the appearance of the risen Christ and not because of any report of an empty tomb. As Montefiore puts it, no story of the empty tomb had reached the disciples when the resurrection faith was born in them. Belief in the risen Jesus on the part of the disciples was independent of a belief in an empty tomb, and care must be taken not to confuse the fact of the resurrection with the stories to which it naturally gave rise in an unscientific and uncritical age.

9, 10. An appearance of Jesus to the women is recorded only in Matthew, and many modern interpreters regard it as a late addition, since the narrative seems to be a doublet; cf. vv. 5-7, which considered the "young man" as the Lord himself. Matthew represents the first appearance of Jesus as made to the women on the morning of the third day. The Jews identified personal survival with bodily life, which accounts for the presence of many materialistic elements in the resurrection narratives. To-day, we can think of life surviving independently of the physical organism. (See art., Religion of Israel, p. 173; art., Inter-testamental Religion, p. 210; cf. note following 1 Cor. 15.)

11-15. Bribery of the Soldiers. This is found in Matthew only, but this does not mean that it has no historical value, since it is exactly what we should expect in the circumstances. The extreme critical view, that it is a late tradition introduced into the gospel narrative in support of the teaching of the early church about the empty tomb, is based on pure subjectivism (see note on 27⁶²⁻⁶⁶).

16, 17. The Appearance to the Eleven in Galilee. (Cf. 1 Cor. 15⁵.) This incident seems to rest on stronger historical foundations than any of the resurrection appearances of Jesus. There are some who think that those who doubted were not of the eleven but belonged to the larger group of people who were with them on the mountain. On the other hand, the doubt may not mean more than that they were uncertain about the identity of the Lord (Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, bk. ii, sect. 1).

18-20. The Last Words of Jesus. Similar farewell words, although with differences, are reported by both Mark (16^{15f.}) and Luke (24^{44f.}). They are in perfect keeping with the cherished convictions of the early church. The divine claims of Christ in vv. 18b and 20b need cause no difficulty. Many feel, however, that v. 19 forms a real crux, and they prefer to regard it as an expression of a truth which the church had learned as a result of the resurrection and on which it still rests its faith. Even if this be allowed, it must still be insisted that there is nothing in the words as they stand which is inconsistent with the gospel portrayal of the self-consciousness of Jesus.

18. Authority. Cf. 729 1127 2123 Phil. 29-11.

19. Make disciples. This describes a comprehensive duty of which baptizing and teaching form a part. All the nations (cf. 24¹⁴). In the light of this last command of Jesus, the action of the disciples as described in Gal. 21-9 and Acts 11¹⁻³ is inexplicable. The universality of the Christian message is inherent in all the teaching of Jesus, but it was due largely to the spiritual experiences of Paul that this universality received definite expression. It is impossible to maintain that everything which goes to constitute even the essentials of Christianity must necessarily be traceable to explicit words of Jesus. There is a progressive element in the Christian revelation. Baptizing into the name of means baptizing them so that they are entered as the possession of the Father. Eusebius quotes this verse with the words "into my name," instead of the Trinitarian formula, which represents the earliest baptismal formula. The baptismal rite of the early church must ultimately rest on an explicit command of Christ.

MARK

By PROFESSOR J. NEWTON DAVIES

INTRODUCTION

The Earliest Gospel. One of the assured results of gospel criticism is that Mark is the earliest of our four Gospels. Many scholars like Allen, Rawlinson, Bartlet, and Stanton date the Gospel sometime before the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. Bacon and J. Weiss date it after 70 A.D. on the ground that the references to wars and rumors of wars in ch. 13 are to the clash between the Romans and the Jews. In any case, the use made of Mark by Matthew, Luke, and the author of the fourth Gospel points conclusively to the fact that it must have been written before 80 A.D.

The Place of Origin. Most interpreters of this Gospel regard it as a Roman Gospel written to the church in that city not long after the terrible Neronian persecution so vividly described in the Annals of Tacitus. When it is read with that bloody catastrophe as a background we begin to understand the reasons for the great emphasis laid upon the heroic bravery of Jesus in the face of all his sufferings and the important place given to the story of the Passion in this Gospel. (See p. 1365.)

The latinisms, the allusion to Rufus (15²¹, cf. Rom. 16¹³), the translation of Aramaic words, the explanation of Jewish customs and practices, the persistent tradition that links Mark with Paul and Peter during their stay in Rome, all point to the imperial city as the place where the Gospel was written.

Authorship. John Mark's name has long been associated with the authorship of this Gospel. The oft-quoted testimony of Papias, as well as the many references in the early Fathers, makes the association a very probable one (cf. art., Formation of N.T., p. 856b). Zahn and Bartlet are of the opinion that Mark's signature to his Gospel is to be found in the story of the young man who was so nearly arrested in the garden of Gethsemane (told only in this Gospel), for the story seems to be purposeless except to identify the young man with Mark, the author. The references to Mark and his home in the N.T. show how favorably placed he was to be a recorder of gospel narrative. His home in Jerusalem was probably the place where Jesus and his disciples met for their Last Supper together, and the early Christian community must often have gathered there for prayer and fellowship (Acts 12¹²). Paul, Peter, and Barnabas were friends of the family. Some of the stirring scenes associated with Pentecost perhaps took place within this home (Acts 1^{13f.}). All this supports tradition and makes the testimony of Mark peculiarly valuable in reference to the Jerusalem ministry of Jesus.

Characteristics of the Author. The characteristics of the evangelist are suggested or implied in his Gospel.

(1) It is very evident that he was a bi-lingual speaker. His narrative reminds us of a palimpsest, the upper writing of which is Greek and the lower Aramaic. He is not translating, but his mind is so steeped in Semitic modes of thought that the structure of his sentences and the idioms that he employs clearly reveal his Hebrew origin. On the other hand, though he is deficient in culture and his vocabulary is small, yet he is not without some feeling for the niceties of the Greek language, as evidenced in his striking use of the colorful imperfect tense and of some arresting Greek words.

(2) As a writer he is little concerned with either chronological or psychological development, though he seems to have been careful to confine the ministry of Jesus in Jerusalem to a week and to have divided the last day of our Lord's life into four periods corresponding to the Roman watches. Mark makes it quite clear also that Jesus gradually restricted his teaching, as it became more advanced, to a limited number of followers, i.e., to the Twelve. There is inevitably a simple natural development impressed on his record. He begins with the story of the baptism, which is followed by that of the temptation. Then we have the record of a specimen day in the life of Jesus, which reveals his popularity with the masses as a teacher and healer. After that comes a series of incidents in which Jesus clashes with the authorities; this opposition gradually grows in intensity till we come to the arrest in Gethsemane and the crucifixion. This simple story is crowned by a resurrection narrative. Mark's narrative is therefore seen to be made up of a series of episodes loosely linked together and chosen especially for their moral and spiritual value. They are selected with the express purpose of confirming the loyalty and strengthening the endurance of the much-tried Christians in Rome. As a Christian himself of long standing, the author knows that following Christ is attended by many hardships and sufferings, and that it calls for rigid self-discipline and self-denial and a willingness to take up the cross in a very literal sense.

(3) His narrative shows that he was peculiarly fond of numbers (for detailed statement see Stanton's art., Journal of Theo. Studies, April, 1925). This was in contrast to the custom of ancient educated rhetoricians, who avoided as far as possible the names of places and persons and the giving of exact numbers. Mark, on the contrary, tells us that the Temptation lasted forty days (113), and that the woman had suffered with an issue of blood for twelve years (525); his favorite expression for the disciples is "the twelve"; the disciples are sent out two by two (67); in the parable of the sower we note the parallelism between the three classes of seed that germinated and the three that did not (41f.); in the story of the feeding of the five thousand the disciples have two hundred denaria worth of bread (637); while the ointment in Mary's cruse cost three hundred pence (145).

(4) The evangelist was a man of decided opinions, one might even call them prejudices. For example, he seems to have thought that the purpose of Jesus in teaching by parables was to confuse the minds of the unbelieving masses and to prevent them from understanding the message of the Master (411, 12). In this he is clearly wrong and has done Jesus a grave disservice. Another prejudice which he has superimposed on his narrative is the thought that the demons possessed a knowledge of the Messiahship of Jesus and of his divine Sonship denied in the beginning even to the immediate followers of Jesus (311). On the other hand his love of symbolism is shown when he informs us that when Jesus was crucified the veil of the Temple was rent from top to bottom and that from the hours between twelve and three darkness covered the whole land (1533, 38).

Dependence on Peter. Papias makes the following statement: "And the presbyter said this: Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately whatsoever he remembered. It was not, however, in exact order that he related the sayings or deeds of Christ. For he neither heard the Lord nor accompanied him. But afterward, as I said, he accompanied Peter, who accommodated his instructions to the necessities [of his hearers], but with no intention of giving a regular narrative of the Lord's sayings. Wherefore Mark made no mistake in thus writing some things as he remembered them. For of one thing he took especial care, not to omit anything he had heard, and not to put anything fictitious into the statements" (Fragment VI, Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. i., pp. 154, 155, Edinburgh edition. Preserved in Eusebius, Eccles. Hist., iii, 39). According to this, Mark was dependent on the reminiscences of Peter. A careful study of his Gospel confirms this, for after a very cursory introduction the ministry of Jesus begins with a series of incidents in Capernaum, Peter's home town, and it is in his house that Jesus stays while in the city. Peter appears in this Gospel nearly always in an unfavorable light (833 1437, 66-72); none of the halo that later writers painted about his head, which is plainly visible in Luke and Matthew, is to be seen. Peter was in nowise injured by this frankness, since the church at Rome knew how fully he had atoned for any lack of loyalty which he may once have shown in his following Jesus. The relative prominence given to the Twelve in the Gospel, and the fact, as Stanton points out, that the evangelist tells his story in the plural, though not himself one of the company who went about with Jesus, indicate that in many places in his narrative Mark is dependent on the personal recollections of one of the inner circle. For much of the teaching of Jesus in his Gospel, Mark would have recourse to a collection of the sayings preserved in the church, which corresponded in a large measure to that document which scholars designate by the letter Q (see art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, pp. 871-2).

Purpose of the Gospel. The chief purpose of the Gospel is to portray the personality of Jesus in such a way that the church in the hour of its severe trial would receive power to endure and to remain faithful. The words, "Consider him that hath endured such gain-saying of sinners against himself (mg.), that ye wax not weary, fainting in your souls" (Heb. 123), would form a very appropriate headline for this virile Gospel.

The Portrait of Jesus. The following are some of the outstanding features in the character of Jesus emphasized in the Gospel.

(1) The many-sidedness and wealth of Jesus' personality are brought out in the varying estimates that we have of him in ch. 1. In v. 1 we have first of all Mark's own estimate (but see mg.) in the words "Son of God"; in v. 7 the Baptist's "mightier than I"; in v. 11 the judgment of God, "Thou art my beloved Son"; in v. 22 that of the people in the synagogue, that he "taught as having authority"; and in v. 24 the opinion of the demons, "the Holy One of God." In the same chapter Jesus is presented in the following rôles: He is One whose coming is anticipated by the prophets (vv. 2, 3); a baptizer of men with the Holy Spirit (v. 7); a recipient of wonderful visions (vv. 9-11); One ministered to by angels (v. 13); a preacher of the gospel of the Kingdom (v. 15); a maker of evangelists (vv. 16-20); an authoritative teacher of new truths (v. 22); One who could cast demons from men (v. 25); a healer of the sick and of lepers (vv. 31, 40-45); a man of prayer (v. 35); and One whose soul is aflame with missionary passion (vv. 38, 39).

(2) The courage and moral heroism of the Master are apparent on every page. There is no trace of fear on the part of Jesus in the presence of wild demoniacs and lepers; he is perfectly calm and self-possessed when scribes and Pharisees try to defame his character with their scornful insults; in the presence of high priests, Roman soldiers, and procurators he is every inch a king; and while the storm is raging on the lake he is asleep on the cushion. In this brief Gospel we have presented before us the sublime figure of One who, though he is fully conscious that a terrible end awaits him in Jerusalem, yet remains undismayed, pursuing his road with fearless tread.

(3) Another beautiful feature in the life of Jesus emphasized by Mark is his unfailing kindness and willingness to help. The physician's duty is ever to be at the disposal of the most needy cases. The reply to the scribes in Lk. 13³², "I cast out devils and perform cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I am perfected," exactly expresses the character of Jesus as outlined in this Gospel. No one appeals to him in vain; the little children receive a blessing from his hands; distracted suffering women find in him a real friend; and the ostracised of the community find in him One who truly understands their case and has for them a real sympathy.

Abiding Value of the Gospel. Just as the first readers in Rome of this vivid portrayal of the Son of man were encouraged to face cruel tortures and punishments of unheard-of severity, and above all to maintain their loyalty and missionary zeal in the face of colossal obstacles and continuous disappointments, so the Christian Church to-day, in reading afresh the story of the life of Jesus as written by Mark, will be greatly strengthened and encouraged in its task of presenting the claims of Christ to an age bewildered by many conflicting emotions, torn by faction, burdened by many sorrows, weighed down by the spirit of materialism, and yet in its heart of hearts yearning for one who will be its guide and shepherd through the perplexing mazes of its day. The road to the future, it has been well said, is the road back to the N.T. We cannot more effectively begin to walk that road than by reading and rereading this striking presentation of the Lord of life by John Mark.

Literature: Commentaries by Allen (Oxford Church Commentary), Bacon, Bartlet (Century Bible), Rawlinson (Westminster Commentary), Gould (International Critical Commentary—uses the Greek). Menzies, The Earliest Gospel; Montefiore, The Synoptic Gospels; T. H. Robinson, Mark's Life of Jesus; Streeter, The Four Gospels.

CHAPTER I

1. The Beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ the Son of God. This phrase, according to some interpreters, is a title for the complete gospel, and not merely for this record. By it the author wanted to suggest that a written gospel could only be a mere beginning of the spiritual movement which it helped to make possible. It was necessary for redeemed lives to take up the story and complete the tale of the cross in every generation. Others think that what is meant is that the story of the Baptist is the starting point of the gospel. The probabilities are that the expression refers to the opening chapter as a whole, which aims at giving the record of a typical day in the ministry of Jesus. The various incidents have been chosen to show the many-sided character of his work. (For the various ways in which, in this single chapter, Jesus is presented, see intro., section on "The Portrait of Jesus.") This typical introductory chapter fittingly closes with the statement "they came [or, kept on coming] to him from every quarter."

The word gospel is found far more frequently in Mark than in any other of the Gospels. Usually, as in 1¹⁵ 8³⁵ 10²⁹, it stands alone without further definition, showing that when this Gospel was written it had become a technical term for the message of salvation proclaimed by the early evangelists. In 1¹⁴ it is defined as a "gospel of God"—a message whose special aim it is to inform men of the character and grace of God; here it is described as the gospel of Jesus Christ, indicating that Christ is the sum and substance of the gospel. The expression Jesus Christ, when this Gospel was written, had become a proper name; henceforth there was no need to say "the Christ." One important MS., the Sinaiticus, omits the words Son of God, but the witnesses for their insertion are weighty and there does not seem to be sufficient reason for their omission. The expression occurs again in 3¹¹ 5⁷ 15³⁹. In the Book of Wisdom the righteous man is called "a son of God"; Plato and Alexander the Great were given this title by their contemporaries; and the expression is found in the Emperor cults of the Græco-Roman world. When used of Christ the words signify his possession of a unique moral and religious quality.

2-8. John the Baptist. See notes on Mt. 31-12 Lk. 32-16. Mark gives a graphic picture of the forerunner of Jesus, as follows:

(1) His coming was foretold by the prophet Isaiah. The first part of the quotation in vv. 2, 3 is from Mal. 31. It is omitted in Matthew and Luke and is probably a gloss. The words in v. 3 are from Isa. 40³ and originally referred to Cyrus, who was to deliver the Israelites from captivity; so John was to herald the coming of Jesus the great Emancipator of men.

(2) He was a man with a message (v. 4). While it is true that the etymology of the Greek word translated repentance means change of mind and attitude, the fact that the word was chosen in the Greek Bible (LXX) to translate the Hebrew word meaning "to be sorry" shows that the emotional elements should not be entirely eliminated. The Greek word translated remission, employed by the Greeks of unfasting a boat tied to a post by the shore to launch it into the water, was taken over by the early Christians to indicate that act of God whereby he releases men from all forms of bondage to send them forth into a life of honorable service. John's message produced a religious awakening which touched even the capital itself (v. 5).

(3) His diet consisted of locusts and wild honey (v. 6). Both are a common diet in Palestine to-day. They reveal John's simple ascetic mode of living. His only garment, made of camel's hair, was well adapted for inclement weather. It probably reminded his contemporaries of his likeness to the great Elijah, whom he resembled also in prophetic power and directness.

(4) His confidence in Jesus is complete (vv. 7, 8). He recognizes in Jesus a greater moral dynamic power than he possesses himself. He expects him to baptize not in water but in spirit. Mark omits the words "with fire" found in Matthew and Luke. The man who is fully baptized in the Spirit of Jesus has moral enthusiasm. The Hebrews thought of the Divine Spirit as a quasi-physical substance which could be "poured out" like water (cf. Isa. 44³ Joel 228). John (14¹⁶, 17, 26) and Paul (Eph. 21-22) later spiritualized the conception.

9-11. The Baptism of Jesus. (Mt. 313-17 Lk. 321, 22.) The news of the religious revival in the Jordan Valley quickly reached the quiet town of Nazareth. Jesus, who had long been pondering over the great purpose of his life, felt in his inmost soul that for him an important hour had struck. The conviction was slowly borne in upon him that the Baptist was none other than his Elijah preparing his way, so that he might have access to the hearts of the people. The dawning consciousness of being his people's Messiah reached its meridian in a remarkable vision at Jordan, whither he had come to show his complete sympathy with this new religious awakening. This vision, the account of which is expressed in highly symbolic language, was a profound personal spiritual experience. The symbolism used is such as was natural to the time.

He saw the heavens rent. The Jews believed in a plurality of heavens, in the remotest of which dwelt the Most High. By this symbolic language the idea is conveyed that Jesus at his baptism was given a unique vision of God and came into living vital fellowship with him. The later evangelists in reporting this scene have converted the poetical symbolical representation of Jesus into one of actual fact (cf. Luke's "in a bodily form, as a dove"). In rabbinic literature the dove is sometimes a symbol for the Spirit of God: sometimes it is compared to the hovering of a bird over the young in its nest (cf. Gen. 12, mg.). The dove is also a symbol of moral purity, guilelessness, gentleness, and peace. Mark thinks of the voice (v. 11) as audible. The words originally conveyed the idea of a profound subjective experience by which Jesus was assured of his heavenly Father's love and of his call to undertake a great divine mission. One important MS. gives as the words heard at the baptism, "This is my beloved Son, to-day have I begotten thee." The Greek word translated "well-beloved" has been found in certain contexts with the meaning of "only," and such may be its meaning here (cf. Jn. 133f.).

12, 13. Jesus' Temptation. See notes on Mt. 41-11 Lk. 41-13. The round number forty days was used in the O.T. for the fast of Moses and Elijah. It was a favorite number with Jewish historians. Mark alone mentions the wild beasts; for him they serve either to intensify the loneliness of the wilderness or to typify the strong merciless character of the forces of evil. The angels may very well symbolize the forces of righteousness and purity that are ever present in the arena of the soul's struggle; the word ministering in the N.T. means often to nourish or support with food. The evangelists probably think of the Lord as being sustained, like the Israelites in the wilderness (Neh. 9¹⁵) or like Elijah (1 Kings 19⁵), by supernatural supplies. On the other hand, since "angel" may also mean "messenger," it is possible that the sustenance was brought by human hands.

A Typical Day. Vv. 14-45. The incidents recorded in this section are grouped together in the framework of a single day in Capernaum, and to the evangelist they represent a typical day's activity in the life of our Lord.

14, 15. Jesus the Preacher. (Mt. 4:12-17.) Mark says nothing of a contemporary ministry of John the Baptist. This statement may have been determined by ideal considerations. The work of the forerunner must be completed before that of the new preacher of righteousness begins. Mark is giving us here his own summary of the ministry of Jesus, who hardly went about Galilee repeating this same stereotyped phrase. The description stresses the following points:

(1) Jesus proclaimed a gospel (good tidings) of God. The message he preached brought new light on the character and nature of God, enriching the spiritual conceptions of the prophets by making love and mercy central in his character. To the church of Rome, for whom this Gospel was written (see intro.), Christianity set forth the unity, sovereignty, grace, and holiness of God, and withal his accessibility to and personal interest in every child of the race. What a contrast all this was to the polytheism prevailing in the Græco-Roman world!

(2) The time is fulfilled. This may be an echo of Paul (Gal. 4:4). The coming of Christ was exceedingly timely. Rome had established its marvelous organization from the British Isles in the west to Persia in the east; Greece had made her matchless language a universal medium of intercourse and thought; and the Jews had planted synagogues all over the Roman Empire and had preached a noble conception of God and a lofty morality. Throughout the world there was a feeling of ennui and dissatisfaction and a yearning for a more deeply spiritual salvation (see art., Backgrounds, pp. 850-2).

(3) The realm of God is at hand. A new day is about to dawn when the will and sovereignty of God will sway the hearts and thoughts of men. Those who would have the experience must repent. Like John the Baptist, Jesus stressed the importance of a complete break with the past. For the meaning of repentance, see note on v. 4. The penitent must also believe in the gospel. The demand for a complete trust in his message was a primary element in the ministry of Jesus.

16-20. Jesus the Leader. (Mt. 4:18-22, notes on Lk. 5:1-11 Jn. 1:35-42.) Jesus realizes that he must gather around him those whom he could train for the great task of winning men to God. The first four of this small group are Peter, Andrew, James, and John; they must have come into contact with Jesus before this and must have heard him preaching and teaching in Galilee (cf. Jn. 1:35f.). Whether the resolve to follow Jesus involved a complete abandoning of their daily work there and then is doubtful. It certainly involved this later on, but Mark gives the impression that the four never returned to the task of fishing as a means of livelihood. It is said that men in India to-day will sometimes with equal abruptness leave home and occupation to become disciples of a wandering teacher.

17. They are first called to discipleship, and while following Jesus they are to be made into evangelists, or fishers of men, moral and spiritual net-menders.

19. The net was the small cast-net, in the throwing of which great skillfulness was required. It is even to-day a specialty of fishermen on the sea of Gennesaret. The Greek word used for mending (Greek katartizō) is used in Lk. 6:40 of the perfecting of a pupil. Paul employs the word (1 Cor. 11:0) of mending the net of the church torn by faction and division, and (Gal. 6:1) of restoring a soul spoiled and marred by a moral lapse. In 1 Thess. 3:10 the church's faith is the net; it is full of defects, and consequently needs restoration.

21-34. Jesus the Teacher and Healer. (Mt. 8:14-17 Lk. 4:31-41.) Capernaum is chosen by Jesus as the chief center of his early ministry. It was on the great trade route to Damascus and was a center of customs. The Roman garrison was quartered in the town; in consequence, it was an admirable place for Jesus to minister in. On the Sabbath, Jesus enters the synagogue for worship. He embraces the opportunity to address the congregation. Mark says nothing of the content of his teaching (cf. Lk. 4:14, 15, 23) but emphasizes his manner and the influence it exerted on the crowd. The teaching was new (kainē); it was vital, spiritual, and authoritative, wholly unlike that of the scribes, who were always quoting what this or that rabbi had said or had contended for. The teaching of Jesus was not sophistical; it did not emphasize minute points; on the contrary, it stressed general principles of importance for life and religion (cf. Mt. 5-7).

Jesus' first act of healing (vv. 23-26). The patient is a worshiper in the synagogue and is described as a man possessed with an unclean spirit. It is strange that such a man should be found within the synagogue precincts. Belief in demons was widespread in the days of Jesus and he himself does not seem to have disputed this popular belief. The demons formed under the devil a kingdom of their own and were responsible for inflicting on men and women all kinds of extreme abnormal sicknesses (see Glover, Jesus in the Experience of Men, ch. 1). The person possessed became the abject slave of the demons, and acted as their mouthpiece. The passionate preaching of Jesus stirs this man to the depths of his soul and in the quiet of the synagogue he utters a shrill cry. Jesus delivers him—to use psychological terms—by the power of his strong personality and through the influence of suggestion. The main difficulty of the narrative is the acknowledgment on the part of a man possessed by demons that Jesus is the Holy One of God. Many commentators think that Mark has worked over this incident and has introduced into it a theory of his own that demons possessed supernatural knowledge and consequently knew things denied to ordinary mortals. It is certainly a real difficulty if we are to believe that men in the power of evil spirits had knowledge which was not possessed even by the followers of Christ. To the church at Rome this incident would serve to emphasize the truth that the kingdom of evil could not stand before the kingdom of God.

For hold thy peace (v. 25) read be quiet. The Greek word was technically used in hellenistic magic to express the binding of a person by means of a powerful spell so as to make him impotent to do harm.

Jesus' second act of healing (vv. 29-31). Simon and Andrew had a house in Capernaum which was Jesus' headquarters while in the city. Simon's mother-in-law is laid aside with a fever. What the nature of the complaint was we are not told, but Jesus simply grasps her hand, and there is healing power in his touch (see art., Miracles of N.T., p. 924b). The influence exerted by the strong will and sympathy of Jesus is sufficient to explain what happened: the term "miracle" hardly needs to be used here. That Jesus was able to effect remarkable cures on people, however, the Gospel tradition makes quite evident.

A general healing (vv. 32-34). There were in Capernaum many sick folk and persons possessed by demons. It is not surprising then that their friends at sundown, when the Sabbath was over, brought them on stretchers to this wonderful Physician. Mark carefully distinguishes between demon-possession and sickness. Perhaps his statement that they brought all who were sick and only many were healed implies that there were some cases which even Jesus could not cure (cf. 65). On the other hand, Matthew says that all were brought and all were healed (424), perhaps because he thought that Mark was liable to misinterpretation.

35-39. Jesus Seeks Retreat. (Mt. 423-25 Lk. 442-44.) Many reasons are given for Jesus leaving Capernaum. His seeking a place of quiet at dawn may have been a life-long habit. Successful ministering to men, Jesus realized, could be accomplished only by constant communion with God. To meet the tests and challenges of Jerusalem one must have a Bethany and a Mount of Olives. To live nobly in the living room of life depends on our having an inner chamber whose doors we can close and in whose silence we can hear the words of God by which alone man can live (see notes on Mt. 724-27). Can we imagine the chagrin and dismay of the four disciples when they opened the door in the morning and saw the expectant multitude but discovered that there was no Christ within? Will the multitudes to-day when they come to the house of the Lord find there the Spirit of the Christ to heal and bless?—Others think that the work of healing was interfering with the task of preaching and teaching, and that that was the reason why Jesus fled. His answer to the eager disciples in v. 38 suggests that a consuming missionary passion had something to do with the sudden departure.

40-45. The Healing of the Leper. (Mt. 81-4 Lk. 512-16.) The variant readings of this story show that it is one that has occasioned difficulty. In v. 40 some MSS. omit and kneeling down to him. In v. 41 instead of being moved with compassion some authorities read being angry. Leprosy was of many kinds, curable and incurable. Elaborate rules are laid down in the O.T. (see Lev. 13⁴⁵, 46) to regulate the conduct of lepers. The fact that priests could pronounce a leper clean (v. 44) shows that some forms of the complaint would yield to treatment. Some interpreters suggest that the man simply came to Jesus to ask him to pronounce him clean. The suggestion robs the story of its greatest significance, which is less in the healing than in the fact that Jesus touched an untouchable. Therein lies a real test of his followers. Mark relates the incident, in part, to illustrate our Lord's fidelity to the Law. In matters relating to hygiene, we can well imagine how careful Jesus would be to support the religious authorities in their endeavor to prevent the spread of this terrible disease. (Cf. p. 925a.)

45. Some prefer to make he refer to Jesus, and to regard the matter as the word of the Gospel, the preaching of which caused two very dissimilar results—enmity on the part of the religious and political leaders, and increased popularity and influence with the people.

CHAPTER II

The Rising Tide of Opposition. Just as in ch. 1 we have the description of a typical day in the ministry of Jesus, so here we have a series of incidents arranged by Mark to show the rising tide of opposition.

1-12. Enmity Because of the Claim to Forgive Sins. (Mt. 9:1-8 Lk. 5:17-26.) Certain difficulties arise here as to the manner in which four men could have brought the paralytic to the roof and let him down where Jesus was. External staircases were common in many houses, and there may have been one here. Wellhausen thinks that the expression they uncovered the roof (v. 4) is a mistranslation of an Aramaic expression meaning, "they brought him to the roof."

The great crux in this incident, however, is the phrase The Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins (or, power to forgive sins on earth). This is the first occurrence of the expression "Son of man" in the Gospel. In the days of Jesus the phrase was used to denote man as distinct from beasts and angels. There are examples (and some claim this to be one) where Jesus uses the expression of man in general (cf. Mt. 8:20). Ezekiel frequently uses the title to describe himself as a prophet (21, 3, 8, 31, 3, 4, 10, 17, 25), and there are some who deduce from this that Jesus employs it here and in other passages in a prophetic sense. The title is found in Dan. 10:5, 16, 18, 12:6, 7 and in the Book of Enoch in a decidedly Messianic sense. In what sense is it used here? Does it mean "man," or is it the equivalent of "I," or has it prophetic meaning, or does the title here and elsewhere in the Gospels have its full Messianic sense? It is not likely that Jesus would have adopted the title to set forth his Messiahship thus early in his ministry; but in the days when the Gospel was written it was a generally accepted Messianic designation and would therefore be naturally employed by Mark for describing this early incident. There is no passage in Jewish writings where the Messiah is said to be endowed with the power to forgive sins: forgiveness was always the exclusive prerogative of God, hence the plain inference here concerning the nature of Christ himself. The claim that to forgive is a prerogative delegated to men by God cannot be maintained, not even with the help of Mt. 9:8. Jesus claims here the unique power of assuring men that their sins have been forgiven and are no longer a barrier to their fellowship with God.

13-17. Enmity Because Jesus Calls a Tax Gatherer. (Mt. 9:9-13 Lk. 5:27-32.) The Romans

exacted taxes of various kinds from the inhabitants of Palestine. Water, meat, salt were all subject to taxation; there was also a road tax, a city tax, a house tax, as well as a poll tax. Judæa, Peræa and Idumæa were required to contribute 600 talents (about $720,000; see art., Time, Money, etc., p. 78b) in taxes. From this we can surmise that the publicans, the collectors of these dues, were far from being popular men; they were ranked as robbers, brigands, ruffians, murderers and reprobate, whose evidence in courts of law was invalid and whose money could not be accepted as alms. To register his protest against such an attitude of intolerance and aloofness, Jesus called one of this class to his inner circle and invited others of them to a feast. He would remind his scornful critics that the place of the true physician was among those who needed him most, however outcast or obscure. If Mt. 9:9 is a parallel, then Levi is probably "Matthew the publican" in the list of disciples in Mt. 10:3, although Matthew is nowhere called "son of Alphæus."

18-22. Enmity Because Jesus and His Disciples do not Fast. (Mt. 9:14-17 Lk. 5:33-39.) Fasting was of two kinds—a general fast obligatory on every man, and a private fast which was voluntary. The general fasts were held on the ninth of Ab (the fifth month), the anniversary of the burning of the Temple; in time of great national need such as drought, crop failure, and pestilence; and on the day of reconciliation. They were usually held on Mondays and Fridays. Voluntary fasting is referred to in 2 Sam. 12:16 Psa. 35:13 Mt. 6:16. It was an indispensable mark of true piety—to make good a wrong, to atone for a fault, to fulfill a wish, and to secure a hearing for a prayer. The fasting of v. 18 must be the fast ordained as an expression of mourning for a beloved leader and the supererogatory fasts of the Pharisees referred to in Lk. 18:12.

The sons of the bride-chamber (v. 19) were the intimate friends who waited on the groom, who rejoice while their friend is with them, but are sad when he goes away (see note on Lk. 5:34). Jesus here hints that the day is coming when his disciples will have ample occasion for being sad—a hint, undoubtedly, of his impending death.

20, 21. By the use of these two homely yet radical allegories, Jesus shows very clearly (as an additional reason for not fasting) that the new religion which he has come to establish cannot be harmonized with the old customs and practices of Judaism. It must create its own forms and practices, which will best express its genius and preserve its purity and power. The new cloth of Christianity is not to be used for patchwork purposes, but to provide the sons of the Kingdom with new garments for the needs of the new day. The new wine of the gospel which is to satisfy the aspirations of men and women is to be enshrined in appropriate forms. The Eastern bottle was a goat-skin, which weakened with age, and which the fermenting of new wine might burst. Christian truth must be given clear, full, and adequate expression. This requires that it change its "thought-forms" according to the age in which it lives and in harmony with the development of other branches of knowledge. The content of the gospel is "the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever": what needs to change with changing experience is the method of presenting it.

23-28. Enmity Because of Alleged Sabbath Violation. (Mt. 12¹⁻⁸ Lk. 6¹⁻⁵.) Jesus and his disciples in passing through the field plucked grain and rubbed out the kernels in the hands. This was regarded as a violation of the law which prohibited reaping and threshing on the Sabbath. Jesus justifies his conduct by quoting the example of David, who once ate the shew-bread (1 Sam. 21¹⁻⁶). It must be remembered that when this Gospel was written the Sabbath was not observed by Gentile Christians, and no doubt this incident and the following one were regarded as justifying their freedom. The obligation of the Sabbath is admitted, but the question of exceptions is raised, and in case of exceptional needs the Sabbath law must be subordinate. This is the Christian principle: human need, not mere caprice, is determinative.

25. The practice of setting twelve loaves of unleavened bread—the shew bread—every Sabbath in the Temple was a very ancient one. The flour had to be of the finest, and the loaves were large in size. This rite goes back to the pre-Mosaic stage of Hebrew religion, and its origin is no doubt due to the naïve conception that the god needed physical nourishment. The number twelve may have had originally an astronomical significance (the twelve signs of the Zodiac), but in later times it would naturally be associated with the twelve tribes. The rite in the later period also acquired a new and higher significance. It was a concrete expression of the fact that Jehovah was the source of every material blessing, and it became (Num. 47) the standing expression of the nation's gratitude for the bounties of his providence.

27, 28. Neither Matthew nor Luke has v. 27, which probably comes from another context. In v. 28 we have either an independent saying or a Christian comment. The rabbis had a similar law, "To you the Sabbath is given over but not you to the Sabbath." Jesus enunciates here a principle of far-reaching significance: the Sabbath is a gift of God to be utilized for spiritual and moral equipment, so that men may render their highest and best service to their fellows. For the creation and maintenance of the Christian ideal of life, worship and praise are absolutely indispensable to the Christian himself, and provision must be made for them for others. If the expression Son of man is interpreted messianically the verse is best taken as the conclusion of the evangelist; the alternatives are to take it as the equivalent either of Christ himself or of man (see note on 21¹²).

CHAPTER III

1-6. Climax of the Opposition to Jesus. (Mt. 12⁹⁻¹⁴, notes on Lk. 6⁶⁻¹¹; cf. Jn. 9¹³⁻³⁴.) As was his custom (Lk. 4¹⁶), Jesus came to the synagogue for the service on the Sabbath. One of the worshipers was a man with a withered hand—a stonemason, according to the Gospel to the Hebrews. Friends and foes alike take Jesus' power of healing for granted and the latter watched to see if he would heal on the Sabbath. The word used here for watch always implies in the N.T. an evil intent. He divines their thoughts immediately, and with his customary fearlessness he bids the man stretch out his hand. Healing on the Sabbath was only permissible among the Pharisees in case of danger to life; where there was no danger healing was unconditionally forbidden. No medicines or special foods could be taken on the Sabbath, no fractures could be set, nor could a hand or foot out of joint be immersed in hot water. Such rules must have been extremely obnoxious to Jesus, and by this action he cancels the whole array of merely legal requirements of this character. His deed illustrates the principle set forth in 22⁷.

The question of Jesus in v. 4 refers not merely to what he knows he is about to do, but also to the plotting against his own life, which he knows his enemies are on that same Sabbath day contemplating! Who is the best observer of the Sabbath, he is asking, the man who uses the day for another's good, or the group of people who use it to devise another's hurt? They remain silent under the evident reproof, and Jesus proceeds with the man's cure.

5. Mark is especially fond of drawing attention to the looking of Jesus (cf. 334 532 1023 1111). Matthew and Luke omit this attribution of anger to Jesus (cf. intro. to Matthew, p. 953b). His righteous indignation is called forth by the emphasis of these men on what he considers to be unimportant things, but his anger is tempered by pity—he is grieved at the hardening of their heart. The Greek word used here for “hardening” (pōrōsis) was also used of the process by which the extremities of fractured bones are reunited by a callous; here it is a metaphorical term for obtuseness or moral blindness. Some MSS. read deadness.

6. The Herodians were not a special party but were some of the supporters of the Herodian court. The consent of Herod would be needed for the trial of any of his subjects for breaking the Sabbath.

7-12. The Popularity of Jesus. As a contrast to the opposition of the leaders, Mark in a few rapid sentences shows in what enthusiastic esteem Jesus is held by the common people. The summary shows us clearly that a new phase in the ministry of Jesus has begun; the synagogue is forsaken and the open places and the seashore are sought. Jesus, in a word, begins an open-air ministry. One is reminded of the way in which the great pioneers of the modern evangelical movement were forced out of the churches of their day, and of how in consequence that great open-air crusade was begun which had such far-reaching results on the life of England and America. The many places mentioned in vv. 7, 8 serve to emphasize the far-reaching character of Jesus' ministry.

9. The Greek word (proskartareō) translated wait on (or to be in attendance) occurs only in this verse in the Gospels; in all its other occurrences (Acts 14 242, 46 64 813 107 Rom. 1213 136 Col. 42) the word denotes diligence in prayer. It looks as though the writers of the N.T. wanted to suggest to other readers that prayer should be to them in their busy lives what the little boat was to Jesus—a refuge from the pressure of the crowd, a means to seek places of rest, an agency to secure food for the daily supplies, and a pulpit from whence to deliver the oracles of God.

11. Son of God. For Mark this title given to Jesus by the unclean spirits means more than “Son of David.” As Rawlinson puts it, Mark proclaims a Christ whose person suggests already the supernatural mystery of the Incarnation—a Christ who is the Divine-human Lord of the Christian society, stronger than demons, able to rebuke the storm, to open blind eyes, and to overcome death.

13-19. The Call of the Twelve. (Mt. 102-4, notes on Lk. 612-16). Jesus during his brief ministry gathered around him many followers. These varied considerably in the strength of their loyalty and attachment. Luke informs us (83) that certain women ministered to him of their substance. Such men as Joseph of Arimathæa (1543), Simon the leper (143), and the owner of the house where the Passover was held (1412-16), were some of his Jerusalemite followers. The tradition, however, is very early and strong that Jesus called twelve men to be in specially close contact with him. Mark suggestively states that they were called to be with him so that he might send them forth to preach and to cast out devils. The success and value of all ministry rendered in the name of Jesus is entirely dependent on the constancy and sincerity of our fellowship with him.

The list of names here varies from the list in Lk. 613f. and Acts 113, but is identical except in order with Mt. 102f. Mark knows nothing of the identification of Levi with Matthew. Thaddæus in Mark becomes in Luke and Acts Judas the son of James. Some have concluded from this that the inner circle was larger than twelve. Most of the men in the list are only shadowy names, of whom we know next to nothing. Some have epithets or surnames, e.g., Simon called Peter, or in Aramaic, Kephas, the name by which he was known to Paul (1 Cor. 112). It is interesting to note that a man so voluble and changeable should have borne the name meaning rock. Did Jesus give it to him (Mt. 1618) because he foresaw his stanchness and martyr end; or was it given in the hope that the name would have a steadying influence upon him? James and John are given the epithet sons of thunder. Only Mark records this. The epithet may indicate an inflammatory disposition, or may have been given because the two were twins. Simon is described as the Canaanite, a word which Luke explains as meaning Zealot, a party opposed to the domination of Rome. Iscaiot means the man of Kerioth. Kerioth was in southern Judæa. Judas was the only one of the Twelve not a Galilæan.

20-22. A Twofold Charge Against Jesus: Fanaticism and Alliance with Satan. (Mt. 932-34 1222-24, notes on Lk. 1114-16.) This paragraph reveals the extreme judgments formed about Jesus, by his own family and by the officials. The former assert that he is a religious fanatic for whom they must care; the latter maintain that he is in collusion with the forces of darkness and evil, in the employ and pay of Beelzebub. These judgments show how wide was the gulf that separated Jesus from those who should have known him best and from the religious circles whose training and life should have prepared them for the understanding and appreciation of his true character. Such erroneous declarations must have deeply wounded his sensitive nature, and they serve to show how lonely and isolated must have been his life.—For Beelzebub some MSS. read Beelzebul; the former means "lord of the dwelling," the latter "the lord of flies" (cf. 2 Kings 12 and see note on Mt. 10²⁵). From the word-play in v. 27 and Mt. 10²⁵ Beelzebub is probably correct. The epithet came to be attached to the devil, perhaps as lord of the house of evil spirits.

23-30. Jesus' Reply to These Charges. (Mt. 12²⁵⁻³⁷, notes on Lk. 11¹⁷⁻²³.) Jesus replies first to the Pharisees in two parables. In the first parable he shows how utterly ridiculous and senseless the charge is, for the kingdom of darkness knows full well that it cannot achieve its ends without co-operation and unity. That anyone whose avowed purpose it was to storm and overthrow the world of evil spirits should be aided by their leader is the height of folly. To relieve the distressed is a good deed; Satan is concerned to oppose the good and spread the evil; how, then, can Jesus in his good deed be in league with Satan? Opposition to the good is always supported by illogical reasoning. In the nature of the case, the good cannot be found fault with: if it is, the reasons are fallacious. The second parable (v. 27) is but loosely connected with the first. In it Jesus shows that instead of acting under the control of Beelzebub he is engaged in the endeavor to overthrow and fetter him so that he may spoil his house—i.e., may rescue all those who have been brought under his subjection. It is implied in Mt. 12²⁸ that Jesus is deeply conscious that the Spirit of God is helping him in this struggle against the forces of darkness.

28, 29. The saying of Jesus with regard to "the unpardonable sin" has occasioned perplexity to scholars and anxiety and unnecessary pain to many devout believers. No true believer could ever claim that Jesus was possessed by Beelzebub. The sin referred to—blasphemy against the Holy Spirit—is that callous attributing of evil motives to what is clearly the result of the working of the Spirit of God—a sin which is the slow outcome of years of worldly living. One important MS. has no forgiveness for never forgiveness. If we may adopt this reading, it would seem to imply that although the sin is essentially unforgivable while this state of mind exists, nevertheless a change may take place and repentance ensue.

31-35. Jesus' New Family. (Mt. 12⁴⁶⁻⁵⁰ Lk. 8¹⁹⁻²¹.) Jesus next replies to his relatives. The gist of the reply is in the words contained in vv. 34, 35. The charge of insanity brought against Jesus by his own loved ones showed that they had virtually thrust him for the time out of their lives (but cf. Gal. 1¹⁹). The home circle at Nazareth was no longer his for solace and love, but a new circle of brothers and sisters was being created to which he would now increasingly turn for consolation and friendship. We are introduced here to the formation of that great family of God, the elder brother of which is Jesus, and the members of which are drawn from all races and lands. The experience of Jesus must have been repeated a thousand times in his own age, and these words would bring a wealth of comfort to many in Rome whose initiation into the Christian family had involved the severing of warm ties of love. Jesus also enunciates here a cardinal principle when he states that the condition on which men and women are brought into vital relationship with him is that they shall do the will of God. He includes in this the demand for repentance, renunciation, sacrifice and self-discipline, and all that is contained in the Sermon on the Mount.

CHAPTER IV

Parabolic Teaching and Its Reasons. Still following his method of grouping together typical examples of Jesus' activity and experience, Mark in this chapter gives us a number of illustrations (see vv. 33, 34) of Jesus' parabolic teaching. The chapter is largely parallel to Mt. 13 (cf. also Lk. 8).

1-9. The Parable of the Sower and the Soils. See notes on Mt. 13¹⁻⁹.

10-12. The Aim of Teaching by Parables. See notes on Mt. 13¹⁰⁻¹⁵. Matthew has clearly elaborated Mark at this point. Perhaps this is because he writes from the standpoint of the later experience of the church, when it had become evident that so many did not understand the mystery of the kingdom of God.

13-20. The Interpretation of the Parable of the Sower. See notes on Mt. 13¹⁸⁻²³.

21-25. Sayings Concerning the Right Use of Parables. Mark has here grouped a series of passages which are scattered in various parts of Matthew and Luke (cf. 8¹⁶⁻¹⁸). Out of their context it is hard to state their exact meaning. In the first group (vv. 21-23) Mark seems to emphasize the fact that the disciples of Jesus must publish far and wide the message of the gospel. Mark erroneously held that the function of parabolic teaching was to veil the truth. Even so, the time has now come for the veil to be removed, so that the ordinary man—for he that hath ears to hear means everybody—may understand the full glory of the gospel. In the second group (vv. 24, 25) is emphasized the importance of cultivating a right attitude to the truth. The man who comes with reverence, insight, application, and a sincere desire to learn will be amply rewarded by continued discoveries in the rich fields of truth; while inattention and indifference will result in a serious impoverishment of those divine capacities by which truth is apprehended (cf. Mt. 25²⁹).

26-29. The Mystery of Growth. Mark alone records this parable of the seed growing apparently of itself (but cf. Mt. 13²⁴⁻³⁰). Jesus here seeks to point out, first, that there is a mysterious divine element working in spiritual growth as well as in natural growth; and second, that in the spiritual realm one must wait on God's time. The preacher's duty is to prepare and clean the soil and sow the right kind of seed; like the farmer he must exercise patience and hope in the full conviction that in the spiritual universe as in the natural there are divine forces which promote the growth of good impulses and produce great fruitfulness in human lives. This parable records the optimism and hopefulness of Jesus, and must have been of great inspiration to the persecuted church of Rome as it may be to us to-day. For v. 29 see Joel 3¹⁴; it probably is a reference by Jesus to the impending Judgment (cf. 13^{4f.}).

30-32. The Parable of the Mustard Seed. See notes on Mt. 13³¹, 32 Lk. 13¹⁸, 19.

33, 34. Unrecorded Parables. Mark here intimates that he is reporting only a selected number of Jesus' parables. The four Gospels give us a reliable account of Jesus' work, but not a complete account (see Jn. 21²⁵). Mark also intimates that Jesus' teaching was progressive: he taught according as they were able to hear. His private exposition to his disciples was due to his purpose to have them adequately prepared for the work they were later to do (cf. v. 10; Mt. 13¹⁸, 51, 52 16⁵⁻¹²).

35-41. The Storm on the Lake. See notes on Mt. 8²³⁻²⁷ Lk. 8²²⁻²⁵; also N.T. Miracles, p. 923b. The storm which overtook the boat in which Jesus was, overtook also the other boats, and the ensuing calm meant safety as much for them as for his own boat. The incident has, therefore, value as an acted parable: Jesus entered into the severest experiences of men, but he also brought with him a power to utilize them for good. He shares our lot, and we share his victory.

CHAPTER V

1-20. The Gerasene Demoniac. (Mt. 8²⁸⁻³⁴ Lk. 8¹⁶⁻³⁹.) We have set before us here very clearly certain popular conceptions of antiquity in reference to demons. Since they were unclean (v. 2) they preferred to make their dwelling in unclean places such as tombs, or in unclean animals like pigs. Knowledge of a demon's name (v. 9, cf. 9³⁸ Acts 19^{13f.}) gave to the exorcist power over the possessed person. Some claim that in the present case the name was withheld and that only the number—Legion—was given. The demons were believed to be very averse to changing their abode and were terrified to be without an abiding place. Mark has superimposed on the narrative a preconception of his own that demon-possessed persons, though they had never seen or heard Christ, had the power immediately to recognize his Messiahship. To us to-day it is incredible that a raving lunatic should possess a knowledge which even those who lived closest to Jesus were slow in obtaining.

To reconstruct the historical nucleus of this story is impossible at this distance of time. It would seem that Jesus on this first visit of his to the Decapolis, or ten cities, a district peopled chiefly by Gentiles, met a man suffering from the delusion that he was possessed of a legion of evil spirits. After some conversation with him Jesus was able to deliver him from the delusion and restore him to mental health. The most satisfactory explanation of the story of the swine is that they were stamped by the ravings of the maniac (see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925). The church in Rome would find in the incident evidence that Jesus could do mighty works outside the borders of Palestine—Decapolis being non-Jewish territory—and that no man, however sinful and depraved, was beyond the pale of Christ's redeeming grace. The incident seems to show also that one of the great obstacles to work in heathen centers was the material losses which a community suffered when Christianity was adopted in place of a pagan cult. But that discipleship may involve loss is true anywhere. "The world" has never been friendly to Christianity and its purposes.

1. Gerasenes. Some MSS. read Gadarenes (Mt. 8²⁸), others Gergesenes. Gadara is too far south. There was a Gerasa a long distance from the lake but this incident occurred at the shore. Sanday identifies the spot with Khersa or Kersa, near Magdalan.

21-24, 35-43. The Healing of Jairus' Daughter. Mark, like Matthew (9^{18f.}) and Luke (8^{40f.}), dovetails this story with that of the woman with the flow of blood (see notes below on vv. 25-34). The duties of Jairus, as a synagogue ruler, would be to arrange the synagogue services. He seeks the help of Jesus to restore his child to health. Messengers come to say that since the child is dead the presence of the Master is no longer needed. Jesus overhears the remark but nevertheless proceeds with the father to the house of the sick child. The professional mourners have gathered by the time he arrives, but after seeing the child Jesus is aware that she is not dead but asleep. Suspended animation must often in those days have been mistaken for death; hence the "four days" test of Jn. 11³⁹. The diagnosis is received with mocking laughter. Jesus both touches the child and addresses her, seeking to reach her mind through two bodily senses. He speaks in his own Aramaic idiom. The words, Little girl, get up, may have been the very words with which the weeping mother had been wont to call her in the morning. To the amazement of all, the child responds.

Rawlinson thinks that the evangelist is describing a resurrection and not a recovery from a swoon, and he uses the narrative to show that death is not an "eternal repose" but a sleep looking forward to an eternal awakening. It is not at all unlikely that in the course of tradition the incident served this purpose, as it may continue to serve it still, but Jesus' own words, that the child was not actually dead, should be taken at their face value. (Cf. p. 924a.)

23. To make whole and to live are Semitic expressions meaning to restore to health and to heal. 36. Not heeding. The Greek word can also mean overhearing (see mg.) and this is preferred by many in this context. 39. There is a story that an ancient physician, Asclepiades, meeting one day a funeral procession, examined the body and found that it still had life in it. Tradition magnified the incident, so that in later accounts it is said that he had restored the dead body to life.

25-34. The Woman with the Flow of Blood. (On the time of the incident, see above under vv. 21-24.) Mark describes the serious nature of the complaint by dwelling on its long duration and on the fact that medical treatment instead of helping only resulted in aggravating the disease. It was the belief of the time that even the garments of eminent personalities had power to heal (cf. Acts 5¹⁵ 19¹²), and this woman believes that by touching the tassel of Jesus' flowing robe she would find immediate remedy. From a psychological standpoint, the power of autosuggestion and the intense emotional disturbance caused by coming into the crowd played a very great part in the cure. Jesus, sensitively aware that something unusual has happened, addressed the woman—Who touched my garments?—evidently with a view of transforming her confidence in him, mingled as it was with elements of superstition, into something higher and purer. In his final words to her Jesus implies that the woman has the beginnings of a faith that shall also be morally effective—a faith which, like a grain of mustard seed, can effect great transformations. Matthew modifies the story. He makes the healing the result not of the woman's touch of faith but of the direct pronouncement of Jesus (see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925a).

35-43. See above under vv. 21-24.

CHAPTER VI

1-6. Jesus at Nazareth. See also notes on Lk. 4¹⁴⁻³⁰. This paragraph reveals several things concerning Jesus. (1) He had evidently been satisfied to spend his early life in the little town of Nazareth. (2) He was a member of a large family. There were four brothers, one of whom, James, played a prominent part in the life of the early church (Gal. 1¹⁹ Acts 12¹⁷). There were also two, if not more, sisters. The father's name is not given, presumably because he is not living. There is a tradition that Joseph died before Jesus grew up. Rawlinson suggests that to describe a man as the son of his mother was to convey the insinuation that his paternity was unknown, and he infers from this that Mark may have been acquainted both with the Christian tradition of the virgin birth and with the Jewish insinuation of illegitimacy. The inference seems hardly to be sound in view of the fact that Mark nowhere makes an explicit affirmation on this important question. (3) Jesus toiled as a carpenter. Matthew characteristically changes this to "the carpenter's son" (13⁵⁵). The word used here, tekton, means a man who did the wood work of any building; hence Jesus would go from place to place as need arose and thus gain much invaluable experience from contact with men. (4) Jesus was spurned by his kinsfolk and old friends. Rumor had reached them of the outstanding works performed by him (Lk. 4²³); his teaching in the synagogue revealed his unusual insight and wisdom; and yet his experience illustrated perfectly the old saying that men of unusual gifts are rarely honored by those among whom they spend their early years. In the Oxyrhynchus Logia, v. 4 is quoted as follows: "No prophet is popular in his native town and no physician effects cures among his friends." (5) The result of the rejection was to check the exercise of Jesus' power. Then as now he needed the co-operation of faith and love. Even the divine Lord is impotent in an atmosphere that is cold, critical, and unappreciative.

7-13. The Commission of the Twelve. See notes on 3¹³⁻¹⁹ Mt. 10¹⁻¹⁶ 9³⁵⁻³⁸ Lk. 9¹⁻⁶ 10¹⁻¹² 13²².

14-29. Herod's Judgment of Jesus and the Death of John the Baptist. See notes on Mt. 14:1-12 Lk. 9:6-9. Matthew has no equivalent of Mk. 6:15. These various opinions concerning Jesus were well known to the disciples, who repeated them to him (828).

30-44. Feeding the Multitudes. See notes on Mt. 14:13-21 Mk. 8:1-21 Lk. 9:10-17, and cf. Mt. 15:32-39.

45-52. Walking on the Sea. See notes on Mt. 14:22-33. In view of the tradition that Peter is Mark's source, and that in this Gospel Peter usually appears in an unfavorable light (see intro., p. 997b), it is curious that Matthew and not Mark should tell of Peter's failure to walk to Jesus.

53-56. Jesus' Popularity. See notes on Mt. 14:34-36 Mk. 37-12.

CHAPTER VII

Tradition that Destroys the Law of God. Vv. 1-23. (Mt. 15:1-20.) This paragraph, in which, as Montefiore admits, Jesus aims a tremendous blow at the ceremonial laws of the Jews, is composite in character. Attempts to discover the original nucleus are, however, unsatisfactory. The historical occasion is clear enough, namely, the questions of prying critics (vv. 1, 2, 5) to which Jesus made an unanswerable reply. The gist of the reply is in vv. 14, 15, regarded by the disciples as a parable, which he thereupon proceeds to explain (vv. 18-23). The illustration from the oath or vow Corban (vv. 8-13) is in perfect keeping with Jesus' attitude (see Mt. 23), and there is no reason for regarding it as a later addition. The explanations in vv. 3, 4 are, of course, Mark's own. The quotation in vv. 6, 7 is from the LXX of Isa. 29:13.

1-8. Ceremonial Cleanness. The Jews were scrupulously careful to cleanse the hands before partaking of food to avoid ritual uncleanness, and very definite regulations were laid down as to the manner in which this should be done. It was necessary to pour a certain minimum quantity of water over the hands up to the wrist twice, care being taken that none of this water should flow beyond the wrist, lest it flow back and render unclean the hand again. If one's hands are washed by another, the hand must be held with the fingers pointing upward. The word translated diligently, in v. 3 (Greek pugmē), means literally "with the fist," but it may also be rendered "up to the elbow" or "up to the wrist." Such punctiliousness on the part of the Pharisees recalls to the evangelist the very appropriate words of Isa. 29:13. The Hebrew text does not yield this meaning, wherefore some conclude that the quotation, being from the LXX, is due to the evangelist.

Plea is made here for the inwardness of religion, the consecration of the whole personality to the moral demands of God, devotion to the law written in the inward parts. In his noble answer (vv. 14, 15) Jesus shows very clearly that the things that defile the soul and poison the wellsprings of life are moral and spiritual in character, such as mean motives, arrogance and self-righteousness, intolerance and envy, impurity and uncleanness: these are the insidious forces which corrupt human life, not failure to wash the hands in the prescribed way.

9-13. The Oath "Corban." Mark has translated this Semitic word by the Greek word meaning gift or given. Josephus translates the word by the phrase "gift of God." By corban was meant that something was declared taboo and so withdrawn from use for another, except that the thing so dedicated should be brought to the Temple as a sacred gift. Jesus seems to have known of cases in his day in which sons made use of the oath to avoid the sacred duty of helping their parents. Rules were later enacted to soften the severity of this vow and still later its use was condemned altogether. It was too obviously a mere device for evading obligations. A money-lender in the days of Origen informs us that debtors used to love to delay paying their debts by the use of this Corban formula.

14-23. The Inwardness of True Religion. Rawlinson suggests that the principles of Jesus are here applied to the life of the church at Rome under the literary device of a private conversation between Jesus and the disciples. The preservation of the purity of motive and impulse is imperative, because therein lie the springs of human action. The catalogue of sins in v. 22 is typical of the prevailing sins in the Empire (cf. Mt. 15:19). Evil thoughts is a general expression. It stands first as the prolific fount of the black brood of the eleven evils that follow. Three of the sins, fornications, adulteries, and lasciviousness, are sins of passion and impurity: they leave their defiling touch on every age; three—theft, murder and covetings—are sins against property and the persons of others; three—the evil eye (or envy), deceit (or guile), pride (or arrogance)—are sinful tempers of mind; the remaining two describe attitudes of the heart toward the spiritual—railing, meaning irreverence, ridicule of the sacred, even blasphemy, and foolishness, meaning here moral obtuseness and religious indifference.

The word wickedness both summarizes the sins already mentioned and includes others not mentioned, as though the writer intended to stop at this point. Instead of stopping, however, he goes on to specify still other forms of wickednesses that have their real origin in evil thoughts.

24-30. The Greek Woman of Syro-Phœnicia. (Mt. 15²¹⁻²⁸.) Jesus may have crossed the borders of Galilee for Tyre either to secure a period of rest or because he was driven from Galilee by the authorities. It is not likely that he penetrated very far into the country. Luke omits this incident, presumably because he feels that the words of Jesus were liable to be misunderstood by the Gentiles. Matthew so narrates the story (especially if we adopt the reading of several MSS. of v. 26, it is not lawful for it is not meet or good) as to show that Jesus' mission was solely to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Mark, on the other hand, introduces the word first into the saying of Jesus in v. 27, implying that the turn of the little dogs (for such is the meaning of kunarium as distinct from the pariah dog of the streets) would come in due time. Jesus must have spoken the words in a half-whimsical way and with a smile, for there was that in his manner which encouraged the woman to persist. He knew full well that the provisions of his Father's table would suffice for Jew and Gentile alike. The incident is a fine revelation of Jesus' gracious attitude to women. It is of interest also because the conversation was carried on in Greek. This is the only miracle in Mark where Jesus heals a patient whom he has not seen (see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925b).

31-37. A Period of Healing Activity: the Miracle at Decapolis. (See Mt. 15²⁹⁻³¹ and cf. Mk. 51-20.) Mark gives here a typical miracle from the healing activity of Jesus following his return from the country of Tyre. He relates only one incident of the Tyre ministry (vv. 24-30), and only one incident of the present Decapolis ministry. A reference to Matthew, however, will show how extensive the latter ministry was. Among those who, Matthew says, were brought to Jesus in this non-Jewish district (Decapolis means "the Ten Cities," a Greek-speaking league in the territory southeast of the Sea of Galilee) were the dumb. This man—who was also deaf—was one of these, and Mark describes the cure in detail. The fact that the man could apparently talk a little, although unintelligibly, would suggest that he was not born deaf. What Jesus did was to restore faculties that had become impaired.

We have here a striking account of what might be called Jesus' psychological procedure. He aroused the man's confidence and expectancy. Everything he did was designed to break down any possible psychic barrier.

Taking him aside, examining his ears, using spittle, manipulating his tongue, looking heavenward, exhibiting emotion (the sigh), and then the sudden command, "Hear, speak!"—all these have the appearance of being steps deliberately chosen to lead up to the desired result (see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925a).—He spat. It was a common belief of the time that spittle had curative power, especially for diseases of the eye (cf. 8²³).—In ephphatha Mark has preserved the Aramaic, which he also translates (cf. 5⁴¹). Since the man himself may have been a Greek the representation of Jesus as using his own native Aramaic is a sign of Mark's historical accuracy—since the man was deaf, and Jesus would normally use the Aramaic, and only Greek when speaking to Greeks.

CHAPTER VIII

1-10. Feeding the Four Thousand. See notes on Mt. 14¹³⁻²¹ and cf. 6³⁰⁻⁴⁴ Mt. 15³²⁻³⁹. In distinction from the feeding of the five thousand, Jesus is here presented as one who is able to satisfy not only the Jews but the Gentiles as well, for the location is changed to Gentile soil. Jesus is apparently still in the region of the Greek Decapolis on the east side of the lake, since the Dalmanutha for which he took boat (v. 10) is on the west side. As in the other feeding miracle, the words of v. 6 suggest the procedure at the Eucharist. The statement in v. 2—that the crowd had now been with Jesus three days—implies that they were accustomed to take food with them when they accompanied him and that the supply was now exhausted. Abbot sees a symbolic significance in the five loaves and twelve baskets of the one miracle and the seven loaves and the seven baskets of the other, as well as in the fact that in the one case the basket is a Jewish basket (Greek cophinos) and in the other a Gentile basket (Greek spuris or sphuris). That is, the twelve baskets suggest that he is ministering to the twelve tribes of Israel; the two sevens suggest respectively the seven spirits of God and the seven churches mentioned in the book of Revelation as representing the Gentiles. (On the relation of the two miracles to each other, and other questions, see the art., N.T. Miracles, p. 923a.)

11-13. Demand for a Sign. See notes on Mt. 12³⁸⁻⁴² 16¹⁻⁴. It is deeply significant that the demand for a sign should have been given immediately following one of the most spectacular events in the ministry of Jesus. The refusal of Jesus is absolute and unqualified (but cf. Mt.). It is evident that the mighty works already accomplished are not enough to authenticate the divine mission of Jesus, yet the demand for signs is evidence of his increasing influence. He grieves deeply over the request because it reveals superficiality and an extreme emphasis on external things. He refuses the request because he knows that loyalty and faith that are a product of the miraculous are defective in depth and power. He who is not convinced of the value of unseen things from a knowledge of the personality and spiritual message of Jesus will be unmoved by the most spectacular miracle (cf. Lk. 16³¹). Jesus' supreme evidence is himself, not his miracles.

14-21. Lessons from the Miracles of the Loaves. (Mt. 16⁵⁻¹² Lk. 11⁵³⁻¹²¹.) The disciples are perturbed at discovering that they have only one loaf, and they apparently discuss with one another what they shall do. They are rebuked by the Master for their spiritual density (vv. 17, 18), to which Matthew (v. 8) adds lack of faith. The language of the rebuke shows very clearly that Jesus intended the two miracles of feeding to have spiritual significance, and it is the inability of the disciples to understand what this is that he blames so severely. The message which Mark wished this conversation to teach to the church in Rome was that the resources of Jesus were amply sufficient to meet all their needs. The paragraph reveals the radical difference in outlook as between Jesus and the disciples: they are immersed in the material, while he rises from the material to the spiritual.

15. The verse is probably out of place. Mark interprets it as referring to the teaching of the Pharisees and Herodians, while Luke (who puts it in a different context, 12¹) suggests that the word leaven refers to the "hypocrisy" of the Pharisees, a poison against which the disciples must ever be on their guard. Others suggest that the leaven of the Pharisees and Herodians means the determined opposition of these two groups. Interpreters with sacramentarian sympathies are inclined to regard the miracles of feeding as veiled parables of the death of Jesus and its vicarious character.

16-21. If we interpret literally these verses recording the rebuke to the disciples, Jesus must mean by them that there was no need for the disciples to worry about bread; what he had done for the five thousand and the four thousand he could repeat whenever occasion arose. Such teaching would be fatal: it would rob the disciples of all foresight and care for their physical needs. The words must be interpreted to mean that Jesus is blaming the disciples for their inability to see the significance of the symbolical feeding. Or we may have here an echo of the rebuke by the early church of certain groups who were unable to see the deeper meaning of the Eucharist.

22-26. Healing of the Blind Man at Bethsaida. (Jn. 9¹⁻¹², notes.) Omitted by Luke and Matthew either because they have other healings of the blind (Mt. 9^{27f}. Lk. 18^{35f}.) or else because the cure is a gradual one and lacks a certain dramatic element. Spittle was frequently thought by the ancients to have medicinal value (cf. 7³³). This miracle would serve the evangelists in their ministry to the church at Rome to emphasize the truth that while some are ushered into the Kingdom by sudden and almost instantaneous conversion, others find the entrance is slow, gradual, and painful. For them, the perception of the glories of the Kingdom comes only by degrees (see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925a). Some important MSS. read in v. 26, Tell no one in the village, which is a much more natural reading.

The Preparation for the Passion (827-1045). The parallels are, roughly, Mt. 16¹³⁻²⁰ Lk. 9¹⁸⁻⁶² 18¹⁵⁻¹⁹ 28. This section—so Wellhausen thought—is as solemn and sacred as the story of the Passion itself. The thrice-repeated predictions of the Passion which it contains (83¹ 93¹ 103³, 34) are like the solemn tones of some muffled bell. Jesus now leaves the crowd and concentrates his attention on the disciples with the purpose of giving them clearer and more definite views of himself and his work. The section is full of significant and semi-technical terms, such as the gospel, the name of Jesus, present and future age, kingdom of God, glory, life, ransom, discipleship. The words of Jesus concerning his sufferings must have made a profound appeal to a martyr church passing through the dark experiences of persecution. As Jesus was not taken by surprise but foresaw what would happen, so they must realize the end awaiting many of them.

27-30. Peter's Great Confession. See notes on Mt. 16¹³⁻²⁰ and cf. Lk. 9¹⁸⁻²¹. The name Cæsarea Philippi was given by Philip the tetrarch to the city which he had built in honor of the Emperor, on the site of the ancient Paneas, at the source of the Jordan on the southwest slopes of the Hermon range. In the vicinity Herod the Great had built a large temple to Augustus. It was here, where the forces of nature and the incarnation of political power were worshiped, that Jesus gave to the disciples definite teaching concerning his character as the Messiah. The Marcan account, which is virtually reproduced by Luke, has in Matthew important additions which have given rise to much controversy. According to Mark, Jesus, after he had received from his disciples the popular estimate, turns to them to ask what they themselves think. Peter quickly answers for the group, Thou art the Christ. Jesus thereupon warns them to keep silence. The Greek word translated charged is exceedingly strong. It means to address angrily, to blame, to speak solemnly or to make remonstrance, to bring something to an end or to prevent something from being done. It would seem from this that Jesus was dissatisfied with Peter's confession. If he were, it would be not because of the words themselves—which were true—but because Peter showed by the tones of his voice that he was not yet free from the old popular notions of Messiahship. That this was the case was very quickly discovered (v. 83²).

31-33. Jesus Foretells His Sufferings and Death. See notes on Mt. 1621-23 and cf. Lk. 922.

34-38. See notes on Mt. 1624-28 Lk. 923-27.

CHAPTER IX

1. See notes on Mt. 1627, 28 Lk. 927.

2-8. The Transfiguration. See notes on Mt. 171-13 and cf. Lk. 928-36. Historical facts most certainly underlie this incident, although just what they are it is difficult to say. The early church attached very great evidential value to it, and it is not impossible that in the course of time the incident was somewhat colored by the desire to make this evidence more emphatic. Some have seen in the incident an expression of the faith of the church represented as a symbolic vision; others like Wellhausen and Loisy suppose that the story is based on a post-resurrection appearance of Jesus to Peter; still others explain it as a subjective vision granted to Jesus and the disciples in a sort of mystic trance like Paul's when he was caught into the third heaven—a trance induced by intense absorption in prayer, which Luke informs us was the original purpose of Jesus in going up the mountain. The prophets received divine intimations through similar channels (Isa. 61^f. Ezek. 128 21; cf. Rev. 110). The statement in Luke concerning the subject of the conversation of Jesus with Moses and Elijah, namely, his "decease," shows that his mind was preoccupied with the thought of the suffering and death that awaited him in Jerusalem. What he needed was reassurance of the Father's favor, and strength to face the coming encounter with death, and in this experience the need was met.

The value of the incident for us is in its illustration of the fact that prayer exercises a transfiguring influence on life and character, and that moments of high exaltation must be converted into a means of serving one's fellows. It means also that Jesus is the culmination of revelation. The Law and the prophets—represented by Moses and Elijah—are fulfilled in him; henceforward men are to concentrate their thought on the message which he has given. The transfiguration is first and foremost an individual experience in the life of Jesus, the exact nature of which must have been communicated by him to the disciples. That they did not understand the full meaning of his announcement of his impending death (v. 10) is only what we should expect. Here, as so often, the meaning of Jesus' words and deeds had to wait for the illumination of later experience.

2. The exact statement of time—after six days—serves to link the transfiguration very closely with the incidents that precede. The eight days of Lk. 928 may be due to a system of reckoning like that which puts the resurrection of Jesus three days after his burial. The Greek word here translated transfigure is a technical term in Hellenistic Greek for magical metamorphosis. Luke omits it, perhaps because of its association with such processes.

5. Peter's words are natural to one in a half-hypnotic state of mind. Some take his words to mean that he feels it is a fortunate thing for the disciples to be present to show honor to these strange visitors by providing shelter for them and the Master.

7. The cloud symbolized the divine glory (cf. Ex. 1610 1 Kings 810, 11): the Shekinah was to appear again in the Messianic period. Where the cloud of glory was there was the Divine Presence. The word beloved, as in 111, is used in the LXX, and in other Greek writings, in the sense of "only," so that the phrase is equivalent to "only-begotten" (Jn. 118).

9-13. Conversation with the Disciples. (Mt. 170-13.) Jesus' conversation with the disciples serves to show very clearly what had been occupying his mind on the mountain. Turner would transpose the second half of v. 12 to follow v. 10, which certainly removes some difficulties. It is clear that the identification of the Baptist goes back to a genuine saying of Jesus (cf. Mt. 1114). The conversation seems to show that for Jesus the experience of the transfiguration impressed on his mind that suffering was inevitable but that it would be an "exodus," a departure (cf. Lk. 931, mg.), and a means whereby the people would be led from the servitude and bondage of sin into a life of liberty and freedom. The preparatory work, which the Jews said would be accomplished by a return of Elijah, Jesus states had already been done by John the Baptist.

14-29. The Healing of the Epileptic Boy. (Mt. 17:14-21, notes on Lk. 9:37-48.) The contrast between the effulgent glory of the mountain scene and the confusion in the plain below has been strikingly depicted in Raphael's great masterpiece. The recurrent convulsions with their attendant dangers, the fits, the temporary aphasia, foaming and rigidity, all show very clearly that the boy is epileptic. According to the belief of the day the disease was due to the presence of a malicious demon. The incident brings out also the contrast between the all-conquering faith of Jesus and the impotence of the disciples, due to their unbelief (v. 19). Jesus appears to resent the element of uncertainty in the father's expression, if thou canst, but the father's words in reply to Jesus, I believe; help thou mine unbelief, show what was the actual fact of the case, namely, that a struggle was going on in his soul for certainty against the ever-present forces of doubt and unbelief. He not only expresses his own feelings but that of multitudes of men in every age who are confronted with the harrowing problem of suffering. (Cf. Lk. 17:5, 6.)

19. By these words Jesus may have implied that his end would come soon.

24. Several MSS. add after said the words with tears.

28, 29. These verses may be later additions and reflect the judgment that certain demons cannot be exorcised except by those who live a life of asceticism and prayer. Several MSS. add after prayer the words with fasting.

30-32. The Second Announcement of the Passion. (Mt. 17:22, 23, notes on Lk. 9:43-45.) This is more general and less definite than the first announcement. The disciples are still completely mystified and act as though they had not heard the first at all, which only serves to show how tenaciously they clung to the old conceptions of the Messiah.

33-37. Childlikeness and True Greatness. This is one of a group of sayings and incidents (vv. 33-50) which serve to illustrate the sacrificial principle which Jesus is now applying so persistently to himself. See notes on Mt. 18:1-14 20:20-28; cf. Lk. 9:46-48. The disciples, clinging to the old conception of an earthly kingdom, are disputing with one another as to which one of them would receive the positions of greatest honor and renown in it. The altercation had been audible to Jesus, who was walking ahead. He detested overweening pride and love of power, because they fomented the spirit of rivalry and cruelty in the hearts of men. He tells the disciples very definitely that the two elements in greatness are humility and willingness to serve others. He enforces his teaching by taking a child, and putting his arm around his neck in a protective way (for so the Greek word means) he affirms that there is no diviner service than the service of boys and girls—helping them to form right habits and ideals and sheltering them from the pitfalls of life.

38-40. The Strange Exorcist. (Lk. 9:49, 50.) Jesus had shown himself to have such unusual power in casting out demons that it is not surprising that some person should use his name for exorcising. The Master's answer as given here is preserved in the opposite form in Mt. 12:30 and Lk. 11:23. It is a great saying on the importance of cultivating the spirit of tolerance. There are plenty of real enemies without creating new ones out of those who are already engaged in doing good in the world.

41-48. Concerning Hindrances. See notes on Mt. 18:1-14 Lk. 17:1, 2. These verses follow more naturally vv. 33-37. Rather than live so as to make it difficult for the innocent and immature to follow the path of honor and purity, it would be much better never to have lived at all. No sacrifice is too great (vv. 43-47) in life to reach that strength and purity of character which will enable us to be of greatest service to the youth of our community. What a splendid revelation we have in these words of Jesus' enthusiastic interest in and love for young life! And, on the other hand, what a revelation of the danger which attends that selfish use of our faculties—hands, feet, eyes—whereby wrong is made easy and right is made difficult for those whom we should help!

47, 48. The Greek word for hell is Gehenna, a name originally given to the ravine outside Jerusalem where human sacrifices were offered to Moloch (Jer. 7:31f.). Later, because the name was of evil omen, it became a metaphorical expression for the place where the wicked were punished (2 Esdras 7:36). The imagery of the second part of v. 48 is taken from Isa. 66:24. As Rawlinson suggests, it calls to mind maggots preying on offal and fires perpetually burning for the destruction of refuse. It typifies the destruction of waste products in God's creation rather than the prolonged torture of human beings. This teaching about hell, J. Weiss thinks, fits in well with the Jewish belief in revenge, but not with a gospel of God, whose character is love.

49, 50. The Metaphor of Salt. See notes on Mt. 5:13 Lk. 14:34f. Some MSS. add to v. 49 and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. This is a gloss suggested by Lev. 2:13 to make clearer the thought of the first part of the verse. Just as salt purified the flesh, the sacrifices of Judaism, and so made them acceptable to God, in like manner suffering and sorrow make life clean and pure. A saying like this would be a source of great inspiration to the members of the church of Rome, facing as they were daily the possibility of martyrdom.

Pure salt cannot lose its saltiness (v. 50a), but when mingled with other foreign ingredients as was the salt of the Dead Sea this loss was possible. Salt in this saying is a metaphor to signify all that was most distinctive in Christian character—those qualities of love, hope, faith, self-discipline, and humility which make a Christian man a vital force in a community to preserve the things by which its life is sustained. Salt in v. 50b is a symbol of peace and friendship. To eat bread and salt with one another was in the East a sign of covenant relationship. So among Christians concord and co-operation are indispensable qualities.

CHAPTER X

1. See notes on Mt. 191. 2.

2-12. The Question of Divorce. See notes on Mt. 531, 32 193-12.

13-16. Jesus Blesses the Children. See notes on Mt. 1913-15 Mk. 933-37 Lk. 1815-17.

17-22. The Great Refusal. See notes on Mt. 1916-22 Lk. 1818-23.

23-27. Riches a Soul Peril. See notes on Mt. 1923-26 Lk. 1824-27.

28-31. Reward for Self-renunciation. See notes on Mt. 1927-30 Lk. 1828-30.

32-34. The Third Prediction of Suffering. See notes on Mt. 2017-19 Lk. 1831-34. Jesus' anticipation of suffering and ultimate death at the hands of the religious and political authorities grew more definite as he drew near to the city. The evangelist, of course, wrote these words long after the Passion took place. It is therefore not unlikely that the words are colored by his knowledge of the actual event. For all that, it is only in the light of Jesus' anticipation of a necessary suffering that we can understand his procedure during these closing months.

35-45. The Ambition of the Sons of Zebedee. (Mt. 2020-28 Lk. 2224-27.) According to Matthew, this request for pre-eminence in the coming kingdom is made by Salome the mother, and not by James and John. If, as some think, she was a sister of the mother of Jesus, she may have thought that family relationship should give her sons some claim to priority. The two brothers, according to Mark, think of the coming kingdom in terms of grandeur and outward pomp, and they consider that Jesus has it in his power to confer on them the chief places in that kingdom. The request reveals how slowly "the training of the Twelve" had proceeded. In his moving answer Jesus shows clearly that to attain power and pre-eminence cups of bitterness must be drunk and baptisms must be undergone, and instead of lordship over men there must be self-devotion to their service and a purpose to free them from all forms of bondage (v. 39). Willingness to suffer and to engage in sacrificial service, not ambition for high place, are the essentials for the sons of the Kingdom. Jesus illustrates his meaning by contrasting the ideals of his kingdom with those of the great empire in which he lived, where autocratic power was wielded and where men of the type of Cæsar and Alexander held sway (v. 42). He also points to his own life dedicated to the good of others as the ideal to which they must attain. In his own case, all self-interest was entirely consumed by his burning passion to be of help to sin-stricken humanity.

38. The cup is a common scriptural symbol for both happy and bitter experiences (cf. Psa. 116 165 235 7310 Jer. 167 2515 Mt. 2639). Baptism (cf. Lk. 1250) is a symbol for suffering of an overwhelming character. It is as though one were plunged into troubled waters (cf. Psa. 1816 427 691 1244). There is no need to infer that these words are a prophetic anticipation of the martyrdom of these two disciples. James we know was a victim of the Herodian persecution (Acts 122), but tradition is uncertain as to the manner of John's death.

40. Jesus here touches on one of the paradoxes of the life of the kingdom of God. God chooses men for great service, but men so chosen must show themselves fit to be chosen.

45. This is the only place in the Gospels where the Greek word translated ransom occurs. It means, literally, a price paid for the deliverance of a person or thing. In the LXX it is used for the redemption of a slave (Lev. 1920) and of a life (Ex. 2130). The language of this great saying is reminiscent of Isa. 53, in which the sufferings of the Ideal Servant are described. Indeed this chapter in Isaiah may have helped Jesus to arrive at the conviction that his sacrificial life was destined to exercise a redemptive influence on multitudes in all lands shackled by sin. We are not to infer, however, from this use by the Master of the metaphor of ransom that he considered his life and death as an exact penal equivalent for all sin. His thought moves from result to cause. The result is the deliverance of mankind from sin. The cause is himself—the way in which he gives his life. Hence his self-giving is as a ransom because it does what any literal ransom does—it delivers.

46-52. The Healing of Blind Bartimæus (cf. Mt. 20²⁹⁻³⁴ Lk. 18³⁵⁻⁴³). Matthew relates that there were two blind men. Jericho was only fifteen miles from Jerusalem. It was a busy commercial and religious center. The retinue of Jesus has been considerably increased by the pilgrims going to the feast. Blindness was very common in Palestine and its wretched victims often posted themselves at the city gateways, especially at the Passover seasons. The cry of help calls from the disciples a severe rebuke, but Jesus, deeply touched, commands the blind man to be brought to him, and restores his sight. The Sinaitic Syriac version of the man's reply in v. 51 is that I may see thee. According to Matthew, Jesus touched the eyes of the two men before their sight was restored (see art., N. T. Miracles, p. 925a).

47. Only here in Mark and the parallel in Luke is Jesus directly addressed as Son of David (cf. 12³⁵). Because of its Messianic significance the title is frequent in Matthew. The blind man may have heard it applied to Jesus by some of the crowd. This would indicate a growing consciousness on the part of the people of Jesus' real character.

CHAPTER XI

1-10. The Triumphal Entry. See notes on Mt. 21¹⁻¹¹ Lk. 19²⁹⁻³⁸ Jn. 12¹²⁻¹⁹.

11. This verse may really parallel Mt. 21^{10, 11}. In that case, it would seem that Jesus did not actually enter the city on the day of the public acclaim, but turned aside to spend the night in Bethany (cf. v. 19). Luke puts the lament immediately after the acclaim (19⁴¹).

12-14. The Cursing of the Fig Tree. See vv. 19-26 and notes on Mt. 21¹⁸⁻²² Lk. 13⁶⁻⁹.

15-18. Jesus Cleanses the Temple. See notes on Mt. 21¹²⁻¹⁷ Lk. 19⁴⁵⁻⁴⁸.

19-26. See also vv. 12-14 and notes on Mt. 21¹⁸⁻²². For v. 26 see R.V. mg.

27-33. The Source of Jesus' Authority. See notes on Mt. 21²³⁻²⁷ Lk. 20¹⁻⁸.

CHAPTER XII

1-12. The Parable of the Wicked Vine-dressers. See notes on Mt. 21³³⁻⁴⁶ Lk. 20⁹⁻¹⁹.

13-17. The Question of Tribute. See notes on Mt. 22¹⁵⁻²² Lk. 20²⁰⁻²⁶.

18-27. The Sadducees' Question Concerning Resurrection. See notes on Mt. 22²³⁻³³ Lk. 20²⁷⁻⁴⁰.

28-34. The Greatest Commandment. See notes on Mt. 22³⁴⁻⁴⁰. Matthew omits the beautiful and far-seeing comment of the scribe and Jesus' answer to it (vv. 32-34).

Luke makes the incident, with the scribe's question, "Who is my neighbor?" the basis of the parable of the good Samaritan (10^{25f.}). The parable fits the setting perfectly. Why Matthew omits both the scribe's comment and Jesus' parable we cannot say, unless it was that he disliked the slight on ceremonialism implied in the first (but cf. ch. 23), and a similar slight together with a fine universalism in the second.

35-37. Son of David. See notes on Mt. 22⁴¹⁻⁴⁶. The remark about the common people is not found in Matthew. Mark contrasts their interest with the suspicion of the religious leaders. To the people, the argument about David's Son seemed reasonable enough. To the scribes it was less convincing. Perhaps this explains what Jesus went on to say.

38-40. Condemnation of the Scribes. See notes on Mt. 23, especially vv. 1-7. Mark gives here a brief example of denunciations which Matthew records in similar circumstances at great length (cf. Lk. 20⁴⁵⁻⁴⁷).

41-44. True Sacrifice: the Widow's Mite. See notes on Lk. 21¹⁻⁴. The money brought was for the support of the Temple. The rich gave ostentatiously. This widow was not ashamed of her small gift, for she made no effort to conceal the amount. Jesus, looking on, saw into the hearts of the various givers, and he was not deceived by the differences of value. He found three lessons in what he saw: first, that the sacrifice is real only when the giving is costly; second, that gifts are not acceptable to God which were obtained in the first place by unjust means (see v. 40); and third, that where there is sorrow and loneliness, surcease for it may be found in the house of God.

CHAPTER XIII

The Apocalyptic Discourse. (See introductory note on Mt. 24 and cf. Lk. 21⁵⁻³⁶.) This chapter, which contains the only long discourse in Mark's Gospel, and one entirely different in character from our Lord's usual discourses as recorded in Matthew and Luke, presents many perplexing problems. Few modern interpreters believe that the whole discourse can be attributed to Jesus. The lack of unity, the presence of so many stereotyped apocalyptic formulae, the complete contrast which it presents to our Lord's declaration in Lk. 17^{20f.} (note), all go to support the theory that the chapter is a composite structure made up of genuine sayings of Jesus and a Jewish or Jewish-Christian apocalypse. Even the genuine sayings of Jesus seem to be colored by the prevailing eschatological hopes and expectations of the early church. On the one hand, we have the declaration which exhibits the Kingdom as imminent, with no other sign of its nearness than the Gospel itself; and, on the other hand, the declaration which exhibits the Kingdom as being delayed till after a series of spectacular events shall have been accomplished, and we must choose between them. Scholars have long agreed that vv. 7, 8, 14-20, 24-27 form part of a short Jewish or Jewish-Christian apocalypse. (See art., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 188-9.) Three events are depicted in these verses, namely, the woes or birthpangs of the new age, the revelation of the antichrist or the abomination of desolation, and the manifestation of the Son of man (see Dan. 8¹³ 10⁵, 6 11³¹ 12¹¹, notes). The discourse should be carefully compared with the parallel accounts in Matthew and Luke. The variations in the forms of additions and omissions form another clear proof of composite character.

1-4. The Occasion of the Speech. Jesus foretells the inevitable doom which is awaiting the city of Jerusalem. The four disciples want to know both the time of the event and its sign. Their questions relate to the fall of Jerusalem, but the rest of the chapter and the form of the question in Matthew (24³; cf. mg.), "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" show that the evangelist is thinking of much more than that. Indeed, the questions are for him but the point of departure for the entire following discourse.

5, 6. False Messiahs. Three of these are referred to in Acts, namely, Theudas (5³⁶), Judas of Galilee (5³⁷), and "the Egyptian" (21³⁸). All may be read about in Josephus (Antiquities, xviii, 1: 6; xx, 5; xx, 8: 6).

7, 8. The Beginning of Travail. The woes and labor pangs of the Messiah was a technical rabbinic expression for the national calamities which were to usher in the advent of the Messiah (cf. Isa. 66⁷⁻⁹).

9. Persecution. A typical saying of Jesus in which he anticipates the persecution of his followers (see Mt. 10¹⁷).

10. The Universality of the Gospel. This statement seems quite out of harmony with the Jewish character of the whole apocalypse. Luke omits it; it was probably not in the tradition known to him. The saying has all the marks of a genuine utterance of Jesus which may have been spoken by him on another occasion.

11-13. Help from God; the Division of Families. This promise of the help of the Spirit of God in times of emergency and the prediction of the inevitable division in families owing to the reception of the gospel by some of the members are both repeated from the instructions in Mt. 10¹⁷⁻²²; cf. Lk. 21¹²⁻¹⁷. The word end (v. 13) may refer either to the death of Jesus or to the end of the world.

14-20. The Reign of Terror. The phrase abomination of desolation (or abomination which causes desolation) is derived from Dan. 9²⁷. There it refers to the altar of Zeus erected by Antiochus on the site of the altar of burnt-offering, to the great horror of the Jews. Jesus' use of the phrase on this occasion probably refers to the predicted desecration of the Temple in Jerusalem by the Roman armies. He emphasizes (vv. 15-19) the unexpected and sudden nature of the calamity before which all must flee. The tribulation is a technical apocalyptic term for the period of distress which is to precede the manifestation of the Messiah. If Jesus is referring to the destruction of Jerusalem under the Romans in the near future, then what he says in v. 20 is literally true. The populace was almost annihilated (see Josephus, Wars of the Jews, v, vi.).

21-23. False Messiahs Again. These verses seem to reflect the apostolic age and probably represent the admonitions of the evangelist to the church to guard against all pretenders. The warning holds good for every age: there is always the possibility of a false or imaginary Christ being put in the place of the true Christ.

24-27. The Coming of the Son of Man. The early church took the vision found in Dan. 7⁹⁻¹⁴ of the coming of the Son of man on the clouds of heaven and applied it to the return of Jesus. Since we know that Jesus made free use of apocalyptic language, there is no reason why he should not have made this identification. Nature's sympathy with the great events in the life of Jesus is often stressed in the N.T. (cf. Mt. 27^{50f.}) and the thought is reflected in much Christian art and poetry. The early church undoubtedly thought of the second coming of Jesus as a visible event, but the evident delay of it brought about a gradual change in the point of view (1 Thess. 4¹³⁻¹⁸, and cf. notes on 2 Pet. 3³⁻⁷).

28-37. Two Parables: the Fig-Tree and the Householder. The fig-tree, one of the commonest trees in Palestine, has already been used in Mark to give warning (11¹²⁻¹⁴, 20, and see notes on Mt. 21¹⁸⁻²²). Here it serves as a simple analogy. Just as leaves in spring herald the coming of summer so the things described in vv. 9-13 will show that the destruction of the Temple is near and the coming of the kingdom of heaven following closely upon it. For us the teaching means that periods of stress—personal or national—may herald spiritual advance.

30. If this verse refers to the fall of Jerusalem, it shows that Jesus thought of it as impending and to take place in the lifetime of those listening to him. This would dispose of the supposition, often made, that "the coming of the Son of man" is identical with "the end of the world." At the same time, his coming, whatever form it may take, involves change: "the old order changeth, giving place to new."

32. This was regarded by Schmiedel as one of the nine "foundation pillars" for an authentic life of Jesus. The principle he went on was that any statement that implied a limitation on Jesus' knowledge or power must be true: otherwise it would not have found a place in the record. Some suppose that Jesus, as Son of God incarnate, voluntarily assumed ignorance, but it is difficult to make that psychologically intelligible.

33-37. The result of all the teaching is an appeal for vigilance illustrated by the parable of the householder. This idea of the necessity of watchfulness appears in various parabolic forms elsewhere (Mt. 7:24-27 12:35-48 25:1-30).

CHAPTER XIV

The Story of the Passion. We come now to "the beginning of the end." The synoptic parallels are Mt. 26 and Lk. 22, on which see notes.

1, 2. The Plot to Kill Jesus. (Jn. 11:45f.) Mark and Matthew assert that two days before the Passover the chief priests and scribes held a meeting to devise means to arrest Jesus before the crowds gathered together for the feast. The word passover is used (a) for the Passover lamb slain on the afternoon of Nisan 14 and eaten after sunset Nisan 15, (b) for the appointments needed for the paschal supper (cf. v. 16), and (c) for the great festival itself, lasting from Nisan 14 to 21. It is used in v. 1 in this third sense. The Jews reckoned a day from sunset to sunset; the Romans from dawn to dawn. Wednesday, Nisan 13, remained such to the Romans (as to us) even after sunset, while to the Jews Nisan 14 began with sunset on Wednesday. This difference in the calculation of time is responsible for the variation in the Gospels on the date of the crucifixion and of the Last Supper (see notes on Jn. 19:31 and cf. art., Chronology of N.T., p. 875). Unleavened bread (called Azuma) was the food of the Jews at the Passover feast. It was to be entirely free from leaven. The word was also a technical term for the feast itself. It is used metaphorically in 1 Cor. 5:6-8 of a pure and true way of life and of men in whom sin has been conquered.

3-9. The Anointing at Bethany. Luke omits this story because he has recorded a similar one (7:36-50). The fourth Gospel tells us that Mary the sister of Martha anointed the feet of Jesus (12:1-8, notes). Matthew and Mark here say, his head. It would be easier to anoint the feet, for Jews in their ordinary meals reclined on carpets strewn on the floor, and rested the elbow on cushions. The story serves to bring out, on the one hand, the mercenary character of Judas, who wanted to put a money value on what was priceless; and on the other hand the insight and understanding of Mary, who seemed to divine the fate of Jesus. Mary in the N.T. is always found at the feet of our Lord (Lk. 10:39). Only one utterance of hers is recorded, and that is a repetition of her sister's (see Jn. 11:21, 32); but her actions are like great works of art whose value lies in what they suggest. The words Jesus applies to her act (Greek kalon ergon, v. 6) could be translated a beautiful deed. His commendation shows the high valuation he placed on the symbolic and the sacramental. Art and beauty have a proper place in the Kingdom: to be indifferent to them is to lessen the worth of life. When the good is adorned with beauty its appeal is made stronger. To eliminate the adornment is only justifiable when it is absolutely necessary. In this case it was not necessary: that is why Jesus rebuked Judas (v. 6, cf. Jn. 12:4). True love gives its all. There is an abandon about it which makes questions of mere economy look small indeed.

3, 4. Nard was a fragrant oil derived from an Indian plant. There is much discussion as to the propriety of the first syllable in the R.V. name spikenard. See R.V. mg. for alternative readings, such as genuine nard, pure nard, and liquid nard. The complaint of wastefulness may well have been made (as John says) by Judas, who in Jn. 17:12 is called "the son of waste" (or "perdition"), i.e., one in whom the forces of moral decay had almost finished their deadly work.

8, 9. Jesus here suggests the truth we so often forget—that deeds of love done for the living are of greater worth than deeds done for the dead. Such deeds of love are imperishable. Every act of self-forgetting service is an everlasting memorial—"music sent up to heaven by the lover and the bard; enough that he heard it once—we shall hear it by and by."

10, 11. The Bargain of Judas. Luke (22:3-6) adds two significant details: that Judas fell under the control of Satan, and that the arrest was to take place privately. Only Matthew mentions the thirty pieces of silver (see notes on 27:3-10).

12-16. Preparation for the Passover. (See notes on Lk. 22:1-13 Jn. 13:1, 2 19:31.) According to the fourth Gospel, Jesus was crucified when the Passover lambs were slain in the Temple on Nisan 13 and before the actual Passover festival began. If that was so, the meal which Jesus had with his disciples was not a true Passover meal. Nevertheless, he may have intended it to have all the spiritual significance of the Passover rite. The probabilities are strongly in favor of the suggestion that the house where the Last Supper took place was the house of John Mark, which seems to have been the rendezvous of the early disciples. This was perhaps the house to which the disciples fled after the crucifixion (cf. Lk. 24⁸⁻¹²) and where the stirring events of Pentecost took place (Acts 1^{13f.}). It was certainly to this house that Peter came after his release from prison (Acts 12¹²). For the Passover there were required unleavened cakes, wine, water, bitter herbs, a sauce called charosheth, and lamb brought from the Temple to be roasted. Jesus had probably made previous arrangements with certain members of this household so that the statement in v. 13 need not imply supernatural knowledge on his part.

17-25. Jesus at the Last Supper. According to Matthew and Mark (Jn. 13²¹⁻³⁰, notes; but cf. Lk. 22¹⁴⁻²³), one of the first things which Jesus does after the disciples have reclined for the meal is to announce the presence of a betrayer. The emphasis on he that eateth with me is made because table fellowship involved certain sacred obligations. The phrase he that dippeth with me in the dish is its equivalent. From this one would gather that Judas was not pointed out at the outset of the meal and that he partook of the Last Supper. The accounts in Matthew and Mark of the institution of the Eucharist are practically identical. Luke in his narrative approximates to that of Paul in 1 Cor. 11²³⁻²⁵. The important addition in the latter is the command to perpetuate the rite as a memorial of the death of Christ. Matthew and Mark when they wrote knew the important place the rite already had in the services of the church and so perhaps did not think it necessary to record it. To the simple statement in Mark, this is my body, Paul adds "which is for you," and Luke adds "given for you," and the blood . . . shed for many in Mark is in Luke "poured out for you." In every case what is emphasized is the sacrificial character of Christ's suffering, and the bread and wine as symbols of that fact. In commemorating the Eucharist today, the Christian may be confident that he is doing that which goes back to a specific command of his Lord.

25. The Greek word used here for new is kainos—a different word from that used for "new wine" in 22². The latter means "newly made," whereas the present word means that Jesus would enjoy with the disciples fellowship of a spiritual order under entirely new conditions.

26-31. Peter's Denial Foretold. (Mt. 26³¹⁻³⁵, notes on Lk. 22³¹⁻³⁴.) It was customary at the Passover celebration to sing the so-called Hallel Psalms (115-118). The hymn sung by Jesus and his disciples may have been one of these. On the way to Olivet Jesus intimated that all would be offended. The meaning of "offend" in this case was that they would come under such severe testing that their loyalty would weaken and they would fail. Jesus substantiates this by a verse from Zech. 13⁷ which reveals to us the intimate relationship—shepherd—he holds toward his disciples. He himself, however, is confident of an immediate triumph and in the very face of death he promises to meet his disciples in Galilee. Peter characteristically asserts that, whatever the rest may do, he will prove himself staunch and loyal. But Jesus knows Peter better than Peter knows himself, and he tells him that before the cock has crowed twice he will have denied him thrice. Oscar Holtzmann quaintly remarks that the cock could not keep up with Peter. Matthew and many MSS. of Mark omit twice.

32-42. Jesus in Gethsemane. (Mt. 26³⁶⁻⁴⁶, notes on Lk. 22³⁹⁻⁵³.) Jesus was wont to resort to Gethsemane for rest and meditation, but on this visit momentous issues are impending; far-reaching decisions have to be taken; the cross and all its shame are clearly revealed; and for a moment he shrinks and hesitates. It is only by earnest prayer that his will is brought into complete harmony with the Father's; but once that is achieved, he leaves the garden without fear or hesitation.

The moving record is full of suggestiveness for the reverent mind. (1) We find there the loneliness of Jesus. Judas was already in league with the authorities; eight of the disciples are outside the garden; the three who are permitted to enter are a stone's throw away (according to Luke) and even they are drowsy after the excitement of the day and quickly fall asleep. (2) We observe the contrast between the tremendous moral resolution of Jesus and the apathy and indifference of the disciples. (3) We observe, too, the intensity of Jesus' emotions. For greatly amazed and sore troubled in v. 33 Moffatt reads appalled and agitated. If v. 34 is a quotation from Psa. 63 ("my soul also is sore troubled"), it is significant that Jesus should add the words into death. The sweating of blood is mentioned by Luke alone. (4) Finally, we observe that the petitions are reminiscent of the Lord's Prayer; e.g., Abba, Father; what thou wilt (v. 36); and that this reminiscence continues into the words spoken to the disciples, that ye enter not into temptation (v. 38). It is as though during his agony he had been staying his mind with the very Prayer which he had given to others as a model.

Whence came the evangelist's knowledge of this experience? Jesus was too far away for the disciples to have heard him, and in any case they were asleep. H. G. Wood suggests that if they were not physically close enough to have heard him, they were afterward spiritually near enough to interpret the scene aright. If Mark was the young man of v. 51 who had followed Jesus and his disciples, he may be depending here on his own experiences. If he was not the young man himself, he may have known him. There is, however, something very attractive about the suggestion that the youthful Mark was an unsuspected observer of the events in Gethsemane, and that his experience that night definitely won him for Christ's cause.

41. It has been suggested that the Greek word translated It is enough really refers to Judas, and might be rendered He has it, i.e., "Judas has his price, and the hour is here." This would supply a vivid touch to the narrative, but it involves a forced translation of the word.

43-50. The Arrest of Jesus. (Mt. 2647-56, notes on Lk. 2247-53 Jn. 183-11.) The arrest was carried out by the orders of the Sanhedrin, who despatched a number of Temple police to do the work under the guidance of Judas. Judas hides his purpose under a greeting and an effusive kiss. The intensive form used here for the verb kiss is the same as describes the father's greeting of the prodigal and the kiss of the woman who anointed Jesus' feet in the Pharisee's house (Lk. 15²⁰ 738). It means kissed much or passionately, and therefore suggests the depths of shame to which Judas had fallen. The synoptists vary in their reports concerning the attitude of Jesus to Judas. In Luke, Jesus says, "Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" In Matthew he says that which is almost unintelligible, "Friend, do that for which thou art come." Some prefer to translate it, "Friend, what are you doing?" The disciple who draws his sword and cuts off the ear of the high priest's servant is identified in the fourth Gospel as Peter; the servant's name is Malchus (18¹⁰). Luke alone states that the ear was healed. Only Mark is silent on Jesus' disapproval of Peter's action. His words about the futility of drawing the sword in such circumstances are found only in Matthew. All the synoptists, however, agree in reporting Jesus' astonishment at the manner of the arrest; it implied he was wont to hide himself instead of appearing openly in the Temple. The words in Matthew about the legion of angels Jesus could have called upon are the more striking in view of the recent prayer. The story of the arrest closes with the statement that it was all in fulfillment of Scripture. When Mark was written it was already an accepted belief of the church that all events in the life of Jesus happened according to Scripture, although Matthew makes much more use of the formula than Mark.

51, 52. The Young Man with the Linen Sheet. Many scholars, e.g., Zahn and Bartlet, are of the opinion that Mark is describing a personal experience of his own and that here we have in a hidden corner of his Gospel his own signature (see closing notes under vv. 32-42). If it could be definitely proven that the passion narrative was written by a Jerusalemite, the fact would be an effective reply to those who feel that the Gentile character of the Gospel makes it difficult to believe that it has come from the hands of one who was in such close touch as Mark with the actual events.

53-65. Jesus Before the High Council. (Mt. 2657-68, notes on Lk. 2266-71.) Mark has probably antedated this preliminary trial of Jesus before the Sanhedrin. Luke (22⁵⁴, 66) correctly places it in the early hours of the morning of the next day. The court found it difficult to discover a charge upon which witnesses could agree. Some swore—falsely, says Mark—that Jesus had declared he would destroy the Temple made with hands and build in its place in three days one not made with hands. Jesus could hardly have meant literally the first part of this statement; the second part contains the nucleus of a great truth, namely, that though the earthly temple would one day be destroyed, in its place there would arise a new spiritual temple in the form of his church (cf. Eph. 219-22). The fourth Gospel (219-22) "spiritualizes" these words by referring them to the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus—a questionable interpretation. Some think that the words contain a reference to the apocalyptic expectation of a new Temple coming down from heaven at the end of time (cf. Ezek. 40-43). Unable to find unanimous testimony on the accusation (v. 59), the high priests shift their ground. Is he the Christ? they ask. Jesus had remained silent on the first charge; this question, however, he answers in a bold affirmation. The high priest used the phrase Son of the Blessed to avoid using the sacred name God. "Son of God" does not seem to have been in Judaism a widely recognized title of the Messiah, although it could claim the sanction of Psa. 27. This is the first time the question of the Messiahship of Jesus comes to open expression between him and his opponents, but the very fact that the question is now raised shows that it was already openly discussed by people. The words in v. 62 about the future may be an addition of the evangelist in which he asserts in apocalyptic terms the faith of the early church in the return of the Messiah. Yet since it is certain that Jesus predicted his return, there is no reason why he should not sometimes have used apocalyptic language for the purpose as well as the more spiritual language of Jn. 14³, 18, 19, 28 16¹⁶⁻²⁴. The high priest is satisfied that the case against Jesus is fully proved by his affirmative I am. The affirmation is declared blasphemous, and blasphemy was punishable by death. The servants and court officials begin the cruel mishandling of their victim, although their mocking invitation to him to prophesy was unintentional evidence to the fact that in the popular opinion Jesus was regarded as a prophet (cf. Mt. 21⁴⁶).

66-72. Peter's Denial. (See also v. 54, Mt. 26⁶⁹⁻⁷⁵, notes on Lk. 22⁵⁴⁻⁶⁵ Jn. 18¹⁶⁻¹⁸, 25-27.) While Jesus was undergoing a supposedly legal trial, Peter was undergoing a moral trial. The night was chilly, and the fire was attractive to one who was cold, and hungry, and sleepy. To the accusation of the maid and the bystanders, Peter makes a bold denial—even with curses—of any connection with the prisoner. Luke in 23⁶¹ graphically reports that it was a look from Jesus after the third denial that reminded Peter of the recent warning about the danger he was in (Mk. 14³⁰). Drawing his mantle over his face (for so we may render the Greek word translated when he thought thereon), Peter went out weeping bitterly. The placing of the two trials side by side very forcibly brings out the contrast between the strong moral resolution of Jesus and the vacillating weakness of the erstwhile bold spokesman of the apostolic circle.

CHAPTER XV

The Last Day of Jesus' Life on Earth. This is the theme of the present chapter. The parallels are Mt. 27 Lk. 23 and Jn. 18²⁸⁻⁴⁰ 19¹⁻³⁰, on which see notes.

1-15. The Trial Before Pilate. See notes on Mt. 27¹¹⁻³¹ Lk. 23¹⁻²⁵. The Roman procurator was in residence at Jerusalem during the Passover, and as the Sanhedrin had no power to impose the death penalty, the case of Jesus had to be brought before him. It is probable that Jesus knew enough Greek to be able to dispense with an interpreter (cf. notes on 7²⁴⁻³⁰ 7³¹⁻³⁷). The charge brought against him is that he claimed to be the king of the Jews. This expression he himself would interpret in a spiritual sense, but Pilate and the authorities regarded it as treasonable in its implications. Pilate is wise enough to see that the religious leaders are actuated by envy and malice, and for a moment he refuses to pass sentence. He even suggests a way out of the difficulty. The demands of the crowd, however, become so clamorous and insistent that, partly out of fear, and partly out of desire to win popular favor, Pilate yields.

16-20. The Scouring and Mocking. To scourge before crucifying was the customary procedure. Josephus speaks of men whom the procurator Florus "whipped, and nailed to the cross" (Wars of the Jews, ii, 14: 9). The mockery was the crude and gruesome humor of rough men who failed to comprehend the real character of their victim. They should be judged accordingly—not as we should judge those whose eyes were enlightened. Did not Jesus himself pray for them? (Lk. 23³⁴.)

21. Simon of Cyrene. Cyrene was a Jewish colony in north Africa. Simon was probably on his way to keep the Passover. This is a more reasonable supposition than that of those who would translate the phrase from the country by from a field, as though he were coming home from work. For in that case he would be living in the neighborhood, and the very reason for mentioning him as from Cyrene seems to be to connect him with Africa, just as the reason for mentioning his two sons is to establish a connection with the church in Rome of which they were members (Rom. 16¹³), and for which Mark wrote his Gospel. It is as though Mark were saying that the one kindly act done for Jesus that day was done by a non-Jerusalemite, the father of Roman Christians. Both Matthew (27³²) and Luke (23²⁶), however, record the incident.

22-32. The Crucifixion. (Mt. 27³³⁻⁴⁴, notes on Lk. 23²⁶⁻⁴⁹ Jn. 19¹⁷⁻³⁷.) The Greek word crucify can mean impalement on a single stake as well as fastening on a cross. The fact of the superscription over his head, however, would indicate that Jesus was crucified. The place of crucifixion was usually barricaded, and according to the report of Mark only Roman soldiers and Jewish officials were near the cross. This cruel form of punishment was usually inflicted only on slaves and the worst criminals. Plutarch mentions the custom of criminals carrying the cross to the place of execution. Not one of the synoptic writers tells us whether Jesus was bound or nailed to the cross. The former was the less immediately painful method, but it really prolonged the suffering, for the victim slowly died of starvation. The belief that Jesus was nailed is due partly to Jn. 20²⁵ and partly to the fact that his death took place within a few hours; the exact number cannot be decided, but probably it was not more than six. Mark has the crucifixion begin at the third hour (9 A.M.; v. 25), the darkness come on at the sixth hour, and death occur just after the ninth hour (vv. 33–37; but cf. Jn. 19¹⁴). Death was due to overstrained nerves, exhaustion, and heart-break. The Marcan account emphasizes the utter loneliness of Jesus, who during three hours—"dark" in more senses than one—was without a friend of any description to show sympathy. The myrrh was a narcotic (v. 23). Jesus' resolute refusal of it reveals his purpose to "tread the wine-press alone." The railleury gets its point from the fact that Jesus had indeed spoken of destroying the Temple and of having come to save others. Had the mockers been able to take the long look they would have seen how profoundly true his claims were. The future was his, not theirs.

33–41. The Death of Jesus. See notes on Mt. 27^{45–56} Lk. 23^{44–49}. Mingled with the historical statements are statements of a symbolical significance. The darkness referred to is probably due to the desire of the author to emphasize the sympathy of nature with the suffering Christ. An eclipse is known to have been impossible, and it is unlikely that clouds alone would have caused a dense darkness. The rending of the Temple veil must also be taken as symbolical. The Holy of holies, where the glory of God dwelt, entrance to which was denied to ordinary men, is now open to all by the cross of Christ.

34. This cry of Jesus has caused great perplexity to many. A common supposition is that it was introduced into the narrative from Psa. 22, of which it is the first verse. It is not at all impossible that details from that psalm, which in so striking a way depicts the emotion of Jesus on the cross, have crept into the narrative (but see note on Matthew's account). On the other hand, the psalm as a whole is not a cry of despair, and the quoting of the first verse only may have been to show that although Jesus had in his suffering recalled that psalm, nevertheless, as with the psalmist so with him, the feeling of despair is only momentary. Mt. 27^{51–53} supplies additional material which may be supposed to be more or less legendary in character (see notes there). The account of the influence of the crucifixion on the centurion in charge bears the marks of verisimilitude, but we should not read into his words a confession of the full deity of Christ as that was defined in the later creeds (v. 39, mg.). To the evangelist he is the first fruits of that great band of Gentiles who gladly owe allegiance to the Son of God (cf. Acts 10). While the disciples are nowhere to be seen, the loyal women keep anxious vigil at a distance. The cause of the Cross will never lack loyal women. They feel the emotional appeal of all that is connected with it. Its great need is for more men of the caliber of the centurion—convinced men.

42–47. The Burial of Jesus by Joseph of Arimathea. (Mt. 27^{57–61} Lk. 23^{50–56} Jn. 19^{38–42}.) The character of Joseph, who immortalized himself by this noble act of love, is drawn in a few strokes. He is of good social standing and a distinguished member of the Sanhedrin. It is probably from him that the evangelist derived certain information as to what took place in the court at the trial of Jesus. He is a man of real moral courage, for, though a member of the Sanhedrin, he is a follower of Jesus and eagerly awaits the immediate coming of the kingdom of God. Only John says that he was a disciple "secretly, for fear of the Jews" (19³⁸). In approaching Pilate to request the body he was running the serious risk of incurring social and political ostracism. He was willing to pay the cost of discipleship in another way, for he spared nothing to give the body of Jesus an honorable burial. The tomb was newly hewn, says Matthew, and one in which no man had yet lain, says Luke. Again the symbolism is suggestive. Jesus was to give death a new meaning, and it was fitting that the tomb he was to immortalize should be new and unpoluted.

CHAPTER XVI

1–8. The Resurrection. The parallels are Mt. 28^{1–10} Lk. 24^{1–12}, on which see notes, and cf. Jn. 20^{1–10}. Mark's Gospel broke off suddenly at v. 8, or it may be that the original ending became lost. At a later period, efforts were made to complete or restore it.

9–18. The Appearances. See the parallels, Mt. 28^{16–20} Lk. 24^{13–49} Jn. 20^{11–21}²³. This is the "longer ending" of Mark. It is absent from the Old Syriac and the Old Latin MSS., as well as from the two great codices, the Sinaiticus and Vaticanus. This longer ending is a mosaic made up of materials drawn chiefly from Luke's Gospel and non-canonical sources. It tells of an appearance to Mary Magdalene, and gives a condensed account of the visit to Emmaus (vv. 12, 13; cf. Lk. 24^{13–35}). The appearance of Jesus to the eleven is not on a mountain as in Mt. 28¹⁶, but at a simple evening meal, perhaps as in Lk. 24^{36f}. The style of this ending is in striking contrast to Mark's own style, for the whole appendix is characterized by an emphasis on the disbelief of the disciples (cf. vv. 11, 13, 14), and the didactic aim is very conspicuous throughout. In the margin of an ancient Armenian MS. this appendix is ascribed to one Ariston. Papias speaks of an Aristion who was a disciple of the Lord (quoted in Eusebius, Eccles. Hist., iii, 39). This first appendix was added to the Gospel about the end of the first century. The codex Washington adds after v. 14 a rather crude paragraph which has been taken from some early second-century Christian writing. In some MSS. of the Gospel another shorter ending has been added as well: "But all that had been enjoined they reported concisely to Peter and his companions; and after these things, Jesus appeared to them, and from east to west sent forth through them the sacred and incorruptible proclamation of eternal salvation." This ending is probably Alexandrian in origin and was taken from an apocryphal writing of the second century.

19, 20. The Ascension. Neither Matthew nor John says anything of an ascension. It is mentioned in Lk. 24⁵¹, and in Acts 1⁹⁻¹¹. The words must not be taken too literally. The real meaning of Jesus being at the right hand of God is that Jesus and what he represents is the determining influence in God's governance of the lives of men. The outlook of the later apostolic age is clearly reflected in v. 20. The verse has value in indicating what has actually been accomplished. The best commentary on it is the Acts of the Apostles.

LUKE

By PROFESSOR J. A. FINDLAY

INTRODUCTION

The Dedication. This Gospel, like the Acts, is dedicated to "Theophilus," addressed as "most excellent," which is equivalent to the English "Right Honorable," and indicates that, like Felix and Festus, who bear the same title, he was a Roman official. We do not know whether he was a Christian, but Christians did not use such titles in their intercourse with one another, and we may infer that he was simply a distinguished outsider who was inclined to be sympathetic. Perhaps the Gospel converted him, for he is no longer addressed as "most excellent" in the Acts.

Why the Gospel Was Written. As Theophilus was a Roman official—Theophilus may not have been his real name; it would have been unwise to give him a name that the world would recognize—Luke probably wished to show that the empire had nothing to fear from the church. The author emphasizes the fact that Roman officials acquitted first Jesus and then Paul of political crime. If Jesus was crucified and Paul sent in chains to Rome, if Peter was imprisoned, it was done to please the Jews. Everywhere the Jews are described as the instigators of persecution, and Paul feels sure of justice when he appeals to the emperor's tribunal. He himself is a Roman citizen; Felix, a notoriously corrupt official, married to a Jewess, only keeps him in prison at Caesarea to oblige the Jews.

Dr. Plooij has lately suggested that the Gospel and the Acts were both, in whole or in part, intended to brief Theophilus for the defense of Paul before Nero, Theophilus being a member of the court which was to try his case. If the whole of the two books were written for that purpose, it would involve a very early date for them, for Paul arrived in Rome in 59 A.D. Perhaps we may modify the theory, while retaining its essential features, if we say that the author, who seems to describe himself as traveling to Palestine in 56-57 A.D., but was not imprisoned at Caesarea with Paul, though he set out for Rome in his company two years later, spent the interval in collecting materials. He tells us in 13 that he had taken pains to make personal inquiry into the facts, his purpose being to prepare a defense of his friend in the trial he knew was impending, and to send to Theophilus an outline gospel along with his record of Paul's missionary journeys. This would account for the fact that the story (in Acts) breaks off in a most tantalizing way with Paul enjoying a considerable degree of personal freedom in his own hired house in Rome, no hint being given us of the tragic end of his career. (But cf. pp. 942-3.) Luke apparently did not make Mark's acquaintance till he reached Rome (Philm. 24 Col. 4¹⁰, 14). Then he discovered that Mark also was projecting a Gospel; as the result of consultation with him he later on—perhaps after the death of Paul—combined his own collections with information derived from Mark and published the combined work for the general benefit. In this commentary the view is taken that Luke's own material formed an outline-Gospel based on the collection of sayings of Jesus known as Q. The scheme on which the Gospel is built up will then be Q plus Luke's own material (here referred to as L), plus material from Mark's Gospel afterward worked in, plus a birth-story and an account of the Passion and resurrection, both of which may or may not have been part of L. (Cf. art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, p. 868.)

Authorship. Luke is mentioned by name three times in the N.T., unless, as Deissmann thinks, "Lucius of Cyrene" (Acts 13¹) is another way of writing his name. The three places are Philm. v. 24 Col. 4¹⁴—here he is called Paul's doctor, for that is what "the beloved physician" means—and 2 Tim. 4¹¹. Is this Luke the author of the third Gospel as well as the Acts? In Acts 16¹⁰⁻¹⁸ 20⁵⁻²¹ 27¹⁻²⁸ 16, the writer apparently speaks of himself as one of the company; "they" and "them" become "we" and "us." This means either that the author of the whole book has joined the party, or that he is using a diary kept by a companion of Paul, without warning us that he is doing so (cf. p. 1095). As ancient writers do not acknowledge authorities, we cannot take it for granted that the author of the travel-diary is the author of the whole book, and other tests must be applied. Before we pass on to consider them, however, we should notice that, if the Western text (cf. p. 861b) can be trusted, we must add one more to these "we-passages," for in Acts 11²⁷, 28 that text adds, "And there was great rejoicing, and, when we were gathered together." This locates the diarist at the Syrian Antioch. Even if "Lucius of Cyrene" is not Luke, there are good reasons in favor of the view that he was at one time a member of the church there. Ramsay pleads for Philippi as his home, on the ground that the first generally recognized "we-passage" is connected with Paul's visit to Philippi, and that Paul leaves the diarist there (17¹) and picks him up again in Macedonia (20⁴). But if he lived at Philippi why did he stay at Lydia's house? (16⁵.)

Luke was a doctor, Paul tells us. Some years ago Hobart discovered medical terms on every page both of the Gospel and the Acts and Harnack has re-enforced his conclusions. H. J. Cadbury has shown that Hobart's argument has been carried too far; by the same method it could be proved that more than one other contemporary writer (e.g., Lucian) was also a doctor. It is clear that we cannot overpress the "medical" argument; however, a residuum of instances remains to make it reasonably certain that the diarist, as well as the evangelist and the author of the Acts, uses words in the description of disease which were confined (in that sense) to medical writers. We may infer that they were all three the same person, and that he was Luke, Paul's doctor and companion in Rome. At Lk. 8⁴³ our evangelist is following Mark; he has got as far as Mk. 5²⁶. There he reads "had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse"—a sweeping hit at the faculty! The best texts of Lk. 8⁴³ read simply "who had not strength to be healed by any" (see R.V. mg.). The word "doctor" is omitted, and the blame is put, not upon medical incompetence, but upon the woman's inability to respond to treatment. Surely, we can infer that the writer is a doctor himself.

General Characteristics of the Gospel. Luke is keenly interested in social reform, and is inclined to think of the contemporary social order as fundamentally bad. He is intensely sympathetic with the poor and hungry, is a townsman not habitually resident in Palestine, for he tends to be hazy about the details of Palestinian topography. A man of the larger world, he is yet able to assimilate the point of view of the old-fashioned Jewish quietists who welcome Jesus into the world, and even to reproduce their language. The birth-story is a triumphant and sympathetic reproduction of the ideas of people who lived an entirely different life from his own. His personal interests, however, are all with Samaritans and Gentiles, but he is no anti-Semite, and is eager to record instances of friendship between Jews and Gentiles (cf. Lk. 7⁵) and to show that Paul, Peter, and James were all in fundamental agreement. He has his likes and dislikes. He tells with gusto and twice over the story of the experiment in voluntary communism in the church at Jerusalem, and in 12³³ extends to all believers the suggestion made to the young ruler. He dislikes crowds, and shows a bias in favor of asceticism and against married life. His most endearing characteristic is his chivalrous attitude toward women.

Luke's Accuracy. Luke is certainly not a scientific historian in the modern sense of the word. Attacks have been made upon his accuracy in recent years, but most of them can be repelled with the help of evidence from inscriptions. The most serious question is that of the census which is used to date the birth of Jesus in 2¹. It is alleged (1) that there is no evidence for any census of Palestine earlier than the one mentioned in Acts 5³⁷, and this took place in 8-9 A.D.; and (2) that Quirinius was not governor of Syria till that date. Tertullian, himself a Christian Father, seems to contradict Luke on this point; he tells us that Saturninus was governor of Syria when Jesus was born. To these objections Ramsay (in Was Christ born at Bethlehem?) replies: (1) After 8-9 A.D. a census was taken every fourteen years; correspondence passed between Herod the Great (who died 4 B.C.) and the Emperor Augustus on the desirability or otherwise of holding such a census in Palestine; hence it is probable that a census was attempted fourteen years before 8-9 A.D., and that the direction that people should go to the place of their family's origin to register was intended to make the census palatable to the Jews. (2) We have inscriptional evidence, dealing with Quirinius' career, to the effect that about 8-6 B.C. he held a military commission in Syria. We may infer that Luke is right, and that Jesus was born about 6 B.C., if not earlier. (Cf. art., Chronology of N.T., pp. 874-5.)

A Theory of the Composition of Luke-Acts. The treatment in this commentary assumes some such reconstruction as follows of the course of events leading up to the composition of Luke-Acts.

In 59 A.D., Luke comes to Palestine with Paul (Acts 21¹⁵), bringing with him Q, the collection of the sayings of Jesus (see p. 872). He knows that Paul intends to appeal to Cæsar (Acts 23¹¹), and so spends the two years of Paul's imprisonment in South Palestine collecting materials for the trial, intending to send them to Theophilus. The result is an outline-gospel (called L in this commentary) based on Q, and this he combines with a birth-story (learned in Jerusalem) and a Passion and resurrection narrative. In his second volume (the Acts) he combines stories—learned in Jerusalem and Samaria—of the ascension of Jesus and the early days of the church with a diary of his own travels in Paul's company, and with information derived from Paul of his adventures when the author was not with him. When Paul sails for Rome he goes with him, after adding to his book a history of Paul's imprisonment and speeches at Cæsarea. In Rome he completes his book with an account of their shipwreck and arrival in Rome. The so-called Proto-Luke or original Luke (L) had been already despatched to Theophilus, perhaps from Palestine; now Luke sends or hands him his second volume. All this has happened before Luke has met Mark; his meeting with Mark leads to the reconstruction of the Gospel already written (L), for Luke discovers that he had a very inadequate record of the Galilæan ministry; perhaps he had not been to Galilee during his residence in Palestine. At the same time he rewrites the early chapters of the Acts, including in his narrative an alternative account of the beginnings of the church at Jerusalem on the basis of information about Peter given him by Mark (Acts 31-5, 16 932-1224). The completed books were afterward published for the benefit of the church at large.

The contents of the original gospel written by Luke in Palestine and sent to Theophilus will then be: birth-stories of John the Baptist and Jesus; John's preaching; the baptism and the voice from heaven ("Thou art my Son; this day I have begotten thee"); genealogy of Jesus; temptation; sermon at Nazareth; call of Simon Peter; list of the Twelve; sermon on the level place; healing of the centurion's servant (from Q); raising of the widow's son at Nain; John the Baptist's message and a discourse thereon; an anointing by a woman in Galilee; names of the women who supported Jesus; transfiguration; journey to Jerusalem; charge to seventy and sayings on their return; parable of the good Samaritan; teaching about prayer and the parable of the friend at midnight; casting out of a dumb demon (from Q) and discourse on Satan casting out Satan, with parable of the haunted house; the woman in the crowd; invective against Pharisees at dinner; discourse about "the leaven of the Pharisees" and what his followers must fear; the preciousness of little things and people in God's sight and the unforgiven sin; the appeal for arbitration and the parable of the rich fool; "consider the lilies and the birds"; the privileges and the duties of would-be followers, and the parable of the wicked slave; the impatience of Jesus and the consequences of his coming in the sphere of domestic relationships; the need for getting rid of entanglements and of instant repentance, individual and social; the parable of the fig-tree spared one year longer; the cure of the woman bent double; parables of the mustard-seed and the leaven; sayings about the narrow door and the danger of exclusion; Herod's murderous intentions and the refusal to be intimidated by them; a last appeal to Jerusalem; healing of the man with the dropsy and specimens of the table-talk of Jesus; parable of the rich man's supper; a demand for absolute devotion; parables of the tower-builder and the king going into action; a saying about saltless salt; parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son; the unjust steward and "Dives" and Lazarus, with sayings on the sanctity of the law and divorce, about repeated forgiveness, and faith like a grain of mustard-seed; the parable of the dutiful slave; the story of the ten lepers; sayings about Lot and Lot's wife and about making one's soul one's own; "one shall be taken and one left"; the body and the eagles; parables of the importunate widow and the Pharisee and the publican; the story of Zacchæus; parables of the nobleman and the pounds; the triumphal entry; prophecies of the fall of Jerusalem and weeping over it; a further description of the siege, and various warnings and encouragements; the story of the woman taken in adultery (?); the Last Supper and sayings at the table and afterward; the agony in Gethsemane and the arrest of Jesus; trials before the Sanhedrin, Pilate, and Herod, and Peter's denial; the story of the cross, with two otherwise unrecorded sayings, and the story of Dysmas (see the notes on 2339); the weeping of the woman, and the saying about the green tree and the dry; the resurrection appearances, with the story of the Emmaus road; last discourse, and parting at Bethany.

The only additional sayings found in this Gospel in Marcan connections are in 539 ("old and new wine") and (in the "Western" text) the saying to the man working on the Sabbath (after 65). It will be observed that it is precisely in regard to the ministry by the lakeside that Luke's knowledge was defective before he met Mark, and that all the incoherencies in the Gospel as finally published are due to Luke's attempts to fill up gaps in L. The same somewhat patchy effect is noticeable in Acts 1-12. So much stress is laid upon L in this commentary, because Streeter's theory (in The Four Gospels; for fuller discussion of Streeter's theories, see intro. to Matthew, Mark, and John respectively), reinforced as it has been by Vincent Taylor in Behind the Third Gospel, is much the most important and reassuring contribution that has been made to gospel-study in recent years; it has added a new and very early witness to synoptic tradition.

SPECIAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THIS GOSPEL FOR OUR INTERPRETATION OF THE PERSON AND WORK OF JESUS CHRIST

In attempting a summary exposition of Luke's Gospel we must lay chief emphasis upon the three sections in which most of our evangelist's own contributions are embedded, namely, 11-43⁰—the birth-story, and the beginning of the Galilean ministry of Jesus; 951-1814—the so-called Travel-Document; and 2214-2453—the story of the Passion and resurrection. In the detailed commentary which follows, we shall perhaps fail to see the wood for the trees; that is why it has been thought well to bring out here in outline the purpose of the Gospel taken as a whole.

The Key Passage. We look, then, for some one passage which may be regarded as summarizing the message of the book, as Mt. 28²⁰ summarizes that of the first Gospel, or Mk. 314 that of the second. Our Lord's own text and sermon at Nazareth (Lk. 418-27) suggests itself. Jesus has come, first, to bring the good news of salvation to poor people (the birth-story); second, to preach release to the captives, and sight to the blind (his ministry in Galilee); and third, to proclaim one year of the Lord which men must accept. To do his work he must not delay, but "set his face like a flint to go to Jerusalem," and those who would avail themselves of "the day of salvation" must not dally or even look back, but leave all else behind to follow him. These three points are all contained in his text (418, 19). A fourth point is developed in the sermon. It is that the reason why Jesus cannot stay at Nazareth or among his own people is that he has a world to redeem (426, 27), and so must go out from Nazareth to Capernaum, from Galilee to Jerusalem, from the few who loved him and would keep him to themselves to the many; and to win the many it is not enough that he should go about doing good in Palestine. Time is short, and he cannot cover the ground. He must die, must shed his blood "for many." It is for us to cover the ground (2447), but what we have to carry is not simply the story of "the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth" or of his wonderful deeds of power in Palestine (1937), but the Gospel of a crucified and risen Saviour, who is alive for evermore. So this book gives us the history only of "the things which Jesus began both to do and to teach" (Acts 11).

The Stories and Songs in Chapters 1 and 2. In these chapters are a number of stories and songs which Luke collected in Jerusalem and its neighborhood during his two years' residence in Palestine (57-59 A.D.). They have considerable historical value, for barely thirty years have elapsed since the Passion, and Mary the mother of Jesus may well have been alive still. If she had removed to Ephesus by that time—tradition has it that she did so in her old age—Luke would probably have met her already; he is at Miletus with Paul in Acts 20, and there meets the elders of the Ephesian church. The story here is throughout told from Mary's point of view, and Mary is a peasant girl of Nazareth. The key-words of these early chapters are "salvation" and "Saviour" (147, 68, 69, 71, 77 211, 30), not only salvation "from their sins" (cf. Mt. 121), but from all their "enemies" (171, 74). Jesus is to "redeem his people" (168 238); by this is meant the removal of tyrants from their thrones and the exaltation of the lowly (152). The poor are to be filled with good things, and the rich sent empty away. The coming of Jesus is "good news for the poor." This deliverance is not to be brought about by war but by the act of God which will inaugurate the reign of peace on earth and good will among men (214); "the day spring from on high" is to guide men's feet into the way of peace (178, 79). It is clear that Luke has brought out with skill and sympathy the feelings of the poor and lowly "people of the land" who first welcome Jesus into their arms. He is aware of the narrowness of their outlook (235), and one of his purposes is to show how narrow this outlook is. He is careful to make it plain, too, that even after the resurrection some of them at least still clung to it (2421 Acts 16). For a little time, however, Luke is content to sun himself and us in the radiance of that morning, and reproduce the simple melody of the songs sung by these old-fashioned people who had so long been waiting for it.

Zacharias and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, and to some extent even Joseph and Mary, are representatives of a type of piety that had survived into a new age, and was out of touch with the times. With John (the Baptist) we catch for the first time a sterner and deeper note. God's ancient people have no prior claim to a place in the new Israel, for an entirely fresh beginning is to be made. Descent from Abraham will have nothing directly to do with their position in the new Israel; repentance alone, with the change of life that follows true repentance, will be of any value. Luke deliberately continues the quotation from Isa. 40 (made also in Mk. 12 Mt. 11¹⁰, but not given at such length) till he comes to the words "and all flesh shall see the salvation of God" (34-6). Not merely the aristocracy of church or state, "the Pharisees and Sadducees" (Mt. 37), but the crowds as a whole (Lk. 37) are called "generation of vipers," i.e., "children of the devil"; neither Jewish blood nor poverty is to provide a passport into the new Israel: even the poor must learn to share the necessities of life with each other, and to be content with their wages, while the richer publicans are to refrain from extortion and profiteering on the taxes (310-14). There is no reference now to "salvation from our enemies," or to any distinction between God's people and the Gentiles. Indeed, the change from the atmosphere of ch. 2 to that of ch. 3 is as sudden as any in the N.T., and there can surely be no doubt that the contrast is intentional. We are in a new age indeed; much of chs. 1 and 2 might belong to the O.T.; in ch. 3 we have been carried violently past the old landmarks, and find ourselves in a new world. Only in the book of Amos have we anything approaching the bluntness with which this other prophet of the wilderness sets on one side all national prerogatives.

The Sermon at Nazareth. The breach between the parochialism of his own people and the universalism of the Kingdom, proclaimed by John and realized in Jesus, becomes complete in ch. 4. "No prophet is acceptable in his own country," because his own people know, or think they know, so much about him. It is characteristic of Jesus that he refuses to be monopolized by anybody. It is the same after the resurrection: "He made as though he would go further" (24²⁸; cf. Mk. 6⁴⁸), and when they recognized him, "he vanished out of their sight" (24³¹). "But he, passing through the midst of them, went [or was going on] his way" (4³⁰); so far as we know, he never went back to the village of his boyhood. This detachment, the refusal to be managed or dictated to by anyone, however dear, had been characteristic of Jesus as a boy. When Mary claims him in the Temple (24⁸), he admits the justice of her claim by going back with her, and becoming subject to his parents, but at the same time hints that their right in him is not unqualified. He will go back with them and stay a long while, but not forever; his final loyalty must be to his "Father's business."

The Call of Peter. We can detect the same suggestion in the story of Peter's call. "Put out into the deep" (5⁴), says Jesus to Simon;

the words might be a motto for the Gospel and the Acts as well. Peter, like Jesus himself, and all those who follow him, is to be a "come-outer"; his fisherman's net is already too small for his catch (5⁶). As Nazareth has become too small for Jesus, so Peter is to come away from the fishing, and angle for a less manageable prey—live men (5¹⁰). Jesus leaves Nazareth, Peter leaves Bethsaida, and they go on trek together; the happy ending of the great adventure can be found in Jn. 21¹⁹.

The Call of Levi (Matthew). In 5²⁸ Levi the publican falls in, and his call leads to our Lord's declaration of a radical program (5³⁸). Yet he does not leave friends and home and the dear, familiar customs of the past through any itch for novelty; he is no revolutionist by preference. Luke alone (5³⁹) tells us that, at the very moment when he detached himself most completely from the religious and social conventions of the past, he expressed his sympathy with the people who liked the old ways best. He understood and perhaps shared their preference, but one thing was dearer to him than all dear familiar things and people, and that was to do his Father's will.

The Anointing of Jesus in Simon's House. We may pass over ch. 6 and the greater part of ch. 7, for apart from the story of the raising of the widow's son at Nain, and one or two other details—dealt with in the commentary—the material this section contains may also be found in Matthew or Mark. But at 7³⁶ we come to one of Luke's loveliest stories. Both Simon and the woman are described as lovers, and all lovers are adventurers. Simon's love for Jesus was not heroic, but perhaps it was an adventure for him to ask this peasant-prophet to dinner at all. True, he did not go to seek him, but, staying timidly at home, invited certain acquaintances of his who could be trusted not to talk too much outside about the low company he was entertaining to meet Jesus. And his entertainment was half-hearted too. After all, prophet as he had become, Jesus had been brought up, he thought, in a peasant home, and would not expect water for his feet, scented for his head, or the salutation suitable to a social equal. Simon's love was indeed so little, so much more like patronizing curiosity than anything worthy the name of love, that it needed the magnanimity of Jesus to call it "love" at all; that was because Simon did not feel that he had any special reason for gratitude. The sinful woman, on the other hand, "would have inclosed herself in alabaster had she dreamed that he was sweet enough to keep." She made a great venture, for she was risking a public rebuff, because she loved so well. Jesus too is out on the road; he is leaving behind him the safe friendships of Nazareth, and becoming notorious as the boon companion of publicans and sinners; he has launched out "into the deep," and is quickly losing the confidence of most of the good people of his day; the cross is already visible at the end of the road.

Jesus' New Family. So he goes on his way with his motley company (82. 3), Joanna the aristocrat and Mary of Magdala, Simon the fisherman and Levi the publican together. The issue of his choice of friends is seen in 81⁹⁻²¹; his mother and brothers make one last attempt to save him from himself, but he declares that he will not go home again; he will find mother and brothers among his new companions. What this severance must have cost Jesus we can only guess. Surely, he did not prefer the company of these publicans to that of his mother! When he sat at Matthew's table the conversation must have jarred upon him, for these people would not change their habits of speech in a moment. The difference was that they followed his way, while the others would lead him their way; so he bore with it all. We may be sure that he would not spare the vices of the company when he sat at the publican's table any more than in a Pharisee's house he refrained from denouncing the abuses characteristic of Pharisaism (11^{39f.}).

Anticipating the Cross. We next come to 951-62 (vv. 57-60 only are found also in Matthew). We notice the phrase in v. 51, "the days of his taking up" (as the Greek says literally). This cannot refer to the ascension, for no one could say that the ascension was yet drawing near. It is suggested in the commentary that the story of Elijah is in the mind of the evangelist here; there is a clear reference to him in v. 54, and to the call of Elisha in v. 61. This may account for the phrase "his taking up." It means his exaltation to the cross, what the fourth Gospel calls his "lifting up." As Elijah left his companions, the "sons of the prophets," behind, as stage by stage he descended to the Jordan (2 Kings 21-12), till only one was left to see him carried away, so Jesus is to leave his disciples behind as he marches on to the exalted desolation of the cross. Like Abraham, he goes out, but, unlike him, knows where he is going, and his face is set like a flint to go to Jerusalem (the phrase appears to be taken from 2 Kings 12¹⁷, where Hazeal set his face to go to Jerusalem, to destroy, as Jesus did so to save; there is another parallel in Isa. 50⁷). The hardening of his purpose is brought out more and more clearly as these chapters go on; the shadow cast by the cross has now begun to fall between Jesus and his disciples. Earlier in the chapter Jesus has challenged them "to take up their cross daily" (see the notes on 918-27 for this phrase) and share his supreme adventure; already it is clear that none of them will really do so.

The Transfiguration. The same idea is present in the transfiguration scene (928-36). Jesus is talking with Moses and Elijah about "the departure (mg.), which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem," and as he does so the look of his face becomes different ("was altered"), while a cloud parts him from his three friends, "and they feared as they entered into the cloud." The reference to the events of Passion night is unmistakable. Those who will follow him now must expect no settled home, as Jesus could never "lay his head" to rest till he bent it on the cross (958; cf. Jn. 19³⁰—"he bent his head," the same words); they must not go back, even on the most necessary business; they must not even look back (v. 62). Over the whole section there broods the sense of urgency. As a matter of fact, Jesus does not go straight to Jerusalem; one's conclusion must be that these passages come from someone who had left all to follow Jesus, upon whose mind the challenge had made an indelible impression.

The Charge to the Seventy. Much of the charge to the seventy missionaries in ch. 10 follows lines suggested by other gospel material, but we may notice "salute no man on the way" (v. 4). Salutations in the East take a long time, and the king's business requires haste. If the suggestion made in the commentary (at v. 18) is right, the words of Jesus on their return deepen our sense of his growing isolation. While they had been enjoying their easy successes over "all the power of the enemy" (v. 19) he, whose powers had made such victories possible, had been watching Satan "fallen like [destructive] lightning from heaven." Their immunity from hurt by "all the power of the enemy" was to be won by his surrender to it, for "he saved others; he could not save himself." But he soon forgets his own sorrow in contemplation of the triumph he was winning for these "baby-minds" (v. 21), in rejoicing that things hidden from men of wise and quick perception were now to be revealed to these simple friends of his, who, little knowing what it would cost, were embarked with him in his great adventure.

The Parable of the Good Samaritan. This parable (1025-37) further defines the nature of the campaign which Jesus is undertaking in his journey to Jerusalem. He, like the good Samaritan, is shortly to undertake "a business-journey" (see commentary on the word translated "as he journeyed" in 10³³) along the road from Jericho to Jerusalem which had earned the name "the ascent of blood" from its sinister associations. Again, like the good Samaritan, he was in haste to fulfill his mission (cf. 12⁵⁰). But he too was delayed on the road by his compassion for the lost, the victims of the world's carelessness or cruelty. Neither priest nor Levite could stop to succor the publican and sinner—they were so busy with their engagements or so careful of their security—but he could not pass, and, while he lingered, was himself overtaken. This is the Gospel of the road to the cross.

We are to carry on his work of rescue; he was the stranger—"a Samaritan" was one of the names they gave him (Jn. 8⁴⁸)—who proved himself our "neighbor" at such a cost; we must prove ourselves neighbors in a world rapidly becoming as hostile to our faith as it was to him, and prove it in the same way.

The Parable of the Friend at Midnight.

The next considerable block of Lucan material is to be found in 11⁵⁻⁸, the parable of the friend at midnight. If this "acceptable year of the Lord" is rapidly drawing to a close, if the sands are running out, all the more need that those who are to share with Jesus this business of redemption should put forth all their powers. If they could not themselves rescue the fallen, they must pray with the persistence of the man who will not stop knocking at his neighbor's door, in his impatience to supply his friend's wants. Our pity for the lost and broken should make us "shameless" in the instance of our prayer.

11^{27, 28}. Here a woman in the crowd sentimentalizes over Jesus. He keeps sternly to the point; this is no time for personalities, good or bad; his only real friends are those who hear and vigilantly treasure God's command and are heart and soul with him in this business.

11²⁹⁻⁵⁴. The rest of the chapter, most of which is common to Matthew and Luke, emphasizes the responsibility of the generation who were fated to live at such a time of crisis, and the need for an instant and complete surrender to his own claim. Those who are not energetically with him are against him. They can do only one of two things with such a one as he: either follow him, or crucify him. Scribes who taught the people that the whole duty of man consisted in a meticulous attention to ritual, in superficial purifications, were hindering, not helping; they were taking away "the key of knowledge" (v. 52), for they at least might have known better.

The Dangers of Wealth and Self-centered Ease. Ch. 12 follows in the same strain. The parable of the rich fool (vv. 14-21) is directed against all those whose ideal in life is to secure some kind of property and then settle down to enjoy it alone, letting the tiresome world go by. Jesus will not be a divider of property; the whole question of the rights or wrongs of property-owning is brushed impatiently aside as irrelevant to the real business of men in times like those. "They are asking for you" (v. 20), God, by the lips of Jesus, said to that generation, and he still says it to this. The only question that matters is not "How much do you own?" but "How much will you give?" Seek first his kingdom, and necessities at least will come your way; seek first to keep yourself alive, and your soul will die. Sooner or later, you will be wanted, and, if you have locked yourself up, the summons will find you dead amid all your plenty; even the things you have stored up for yourself will then go back into the common stock. Whether it be health of mind and body or the salvation of your soul, you can only secure it by risking it in the business you were made for, the service of the age you live in. "The little flock," the few who had thrown in their lot with Jesus, had no reason to fear the future (v. 33); if the possession of material goods made them unwilling or afraid to venture, better get rid of them; the only strong rooms that could not be broken into, the only purses that would never wear into holes were in God's treasure house; the only coins banked there were deeds and prayers of brotherly compassion. So, with loins girt and lanterns burning, they were to be "like men looking for their Lord," who prove their readiness for his coming and earn promotion by providing for the needs of the other members of his household (v. 42); their reward will be that he will provide for their needs himself (v. 37). After the parable of the slave who exploited his position of trust and tyrannized over the domestic staff (vv. 45f., found also in Mt. 24⁴⁵⁻⁵¹) Jesus points out that the greater the responsibility—and what responsibility could be greater than that of the men who lived with and listened to him?—the more exacting would be God's requisition (vv. 47, 48). Then the impatience of Jesus to set the world on fire with his own passion of love to God and pity for men sweeps over him again. The early dreams of peace and good will (21⁴) have faded now; there can be no peace so long as the times are what they are, and he is what he is. Men and women must take sides; families will be divided. Cannot they read the signs of the time? The best, the only thing for discerning men to do is to cut themselves away from all entanglements, to cut their losses and settle their feuds; otherwise they will be caught in the toils of a justice which will exact the last penny of loss and suffering from those who dalli with minor issues on such a day of grace and of danger as this.

A Call to Repentance and Deeper Insight. In ch. 13 the same challenging appeal is continued. Catastrophes were happening here and there, it was true, but this did not prove their victims specially guilty; unless they all repented, they would all be destroyed. This sweeping prophecy was literally fulfilled less than forty years later. The fig-tree (Jerusalem—see notes on 131-9) might be spared one year longer; Jesus himself would make one last and yet more moving appeal to his Jewish contemporaries; and, if that failed, there was an end of the world as they had known it. While they are making up their minds, however, he can still fulfill his mission. A woman in his congregation has a nervous disorder, and cannot lift herself up (vv. 11f.); she is a “daughter of Abraham” (cf. 19⁹), and therefore has a double claim upon him. She has been bound by Satan for eighteen years, and he cannot wait till the Sabbath is over to set her free. That is what he has come for, to break into the strong man’s house, and distribute his spoils (that means, “release his victims”—see 1122), and “the better the day, the better the deed.” But the message he has come to deliver is no mild and amiable doctrine of universal benevolence; it has the potency of the mustard-seed, the buoyancy and penetrative power of the yeast in the dough (vv. 18-21). In any case, things can never again be as they had been in a country and a world in which such words as his had been spoken, and such deeds as his done.

A Call for Instant Decision. In the next section (1322-35), the note of passionate urgency is heard even more resoundingly. We have a picture (v. 24) of men waiting at a closed door and a hand waving them away from the window, of people left out who felt sure of reserved seats, while others who had never had a chance before and come from most unlikely places crowd in. Some of the Pharisees, either with good intentions or because they want to move this uncomfortable prophet on, warn him that Herod, who ruled in Perea as well as in Galilee, is intending to kill him (v. 31). Jesus has no fears of that crafty “fox,” and refuses to be hustled (cf. Jn. 7⁶) to suit anyone’s convenience. “On the third day”—i.e., very soon—Jesus must take the road again, for Jerusalem is calling him. He cannot rest now till his work is done.

The Table-Talk of Jesus. In 141-24 we have an example of the table-talk of Jesus, but the same note, in more subdued tones, can be heard. The people who will not fulfill their engagement to supper have other business and domestic engagements. That was the tragedy of it; the men of that generation were so busy (cf. 1726-30). Well, if they would not come in, others would; if the banqueting-hall cannot be filled from the streets and lanes of Judaism, he will go further afield, out into the highways and byways of the great world’s life; he is not to be beaten by the obstinacy or preoccupation of any one set of people.

Counting the Cost. In 1425-35 we are told that in these days Jesus was still being followed by great crowds of people. Passion like his is certain to gain some response, even if the response is only that of easily impressed curiosity. In Perea, as in Galilee, Jesus has a kind of popular success. But he is under no delusion; he warns his crowds of admirers that he cannot now enlist them unless they mean business. He is building a tower of refuge, undertaking a campaign against an enemy numerically stronger than himself (see commentary for a more detailed exposition of vv. 28-32); let those alone follow him now who are prepared to stake everything and bid farewell to all they possess (v. 33).

Three Parables of Losing and Finding. Ch. 15 begins by noting that the audacity of Jesus’ claim repels all but “the publicans and sinners,” but them it draws the closer; they are not afraid of his demands, because their daily experience had forced home upon them the desperation of their own condition. Jesus goes on to vindicate his behavior to such people. Some of them were lost outside the fold, others inside the house, but all of them had a place in the family; and, if they were brought back home (the lost sheep), or, in the home, yet not of the home, they were found in the home (the lost coin), all the more if they came back of their own accord (the lost son), the Father would not, could not, refuse to have them in, no matter how many others of the happier children stayed out because they could not endure such disreputable company. Nor can he spend much more time arguing with their critics; they must make up their minds quickly whether they would come in or not, for by and by “the acceptable year” would be over.

The Unjust Steward. Like the unjust steward, people with a place in society are now in a more secure position (ch. 16). Very soon there will be a reversal; there had been signs of such a change for some time (72⁹, 30), but now the tide has turned. From henceforth the first are to be last and the last first (13³⁰). The men who had been in possession had mismanaged the estate, and were already under notice of dismissal. What could they do? Let them hasten to make friends of these publicans and sinners. Just for the moment the position which they held so insecurely enabled them, if they would, to earn their gratitude. Like the steward's tenants, for a little while the outcast and the fallen were dependent on their social and religious superiors, but it would not be so for long. Let them use their more fortunate position to make friends (v. 9), so that, if they cannot gain an entrance on their own merits, they may at least have friends in the new world who will be kinder to them than they themselves had ever been in the old days.

"Dives" and Lazarus. The parable of "Dives" and Lazarus (16¹⁹⁻³¹) makes the same suggestion, but much more forcibly. Here were these two living side by side, seeing one another and each hearing the other's voice every day of their lives, "Dives" representing the rich middle and upper-class Jew, rich in possession of "Moses and the prophets" if not in material goods, and Lazarus the poor outcast. The publican was not poor in this world's goods, but his condition was no less pitiful; he was on the threshold of the Jewish Church, yet always just outside. But it would not be so for long; the time would come when Lazarus would be in "Abraham's bosom" (cf. 19⁹), and "Dives" turn would come to be outside. Then, when it was too late, he would claim acquaintance with Lazarus, would realize that he needed the man with whom he would have nothing to do in happier days. And he might have known better; "Moses and the prophets" bade him care for "the stranger within his gates," not to turn away from his own flesh. These publicans and sinners were "his own flesh," children of Abraham like himself, though he would not own them.

A Parable of Service. The first part of ch. 17 is more or less closely parallel to material in the first Gospel, and need not detain us here. However, in vv. 7-10 we have another fragment from Luke's own collections. This little parable is obviously connected by deliberate contrast with 12^{37, 38}, a contrast brought out in the commentary. Those who are to be the friends of Jesus must be ready to do something more than their bare duty; the emphasis is on the word "commanded" (v. 10); to enter into real fellowship with him it is not enough to be exemplary in conduct, as some of the Pharisees were (18¹²); the self-forgetting or self-abasing surrender of passionate love must permeate the whole relationship if it is to be anything better than that subsisting between slave and master (v. 10, and cf. Jn. 15¹⁴).

The Grateful Samaritan. The story of the grateful Samaritan further illustrates this point (17¹¹⁻¹⁹). The nine Jewish lepers took Jesus literally, punctiliously obeying his command to "show themselves to the priests." The "foreigner" (v. 18, mg.) could not even do what he was told to do until his gratitude had found some vent. So his "faith" saved him (v. 19), and faith is more than mechanical obedience; it is love in action (Gal. 5⁶).

Prophecies of the Fall of Jerusalem. Through the remainder of ch. 17 the note of warning is intensified. Rejecting his last appeal, Jerusalem would soon become a veritable city of destruction. They must escape for their lives, must not return home to secure their most necessary goods, must not even look back, "in that day." Whatever Jesus meant by "the day when the Son of man is revealed" (v. 30), Luke takes him to mean the day of the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans; notice the reference to the "eagles" in v. 37. "That day" was the logical outcome of Passion week.

Two Parables of Prayer. In ch. 18 we have another appeal for persistent prayer. If you cannot be moved to such "shamelessness" by desire to help a needy friend (cf. 11⁵⁻⁸), at least for your own soul's sake, now you have been warned of what is coming, storm the gates of heaven with all the instance of prayer, as a shrewish woman would pester a comfort-loving magistrate because she thinks herself wronged. Why God's own elect should have to suffer with and for their times is a mystery, and God's apparent inability to find an easier way out than such world-catastrophes, as the men of the age to which Jesus came, and such as we have lived through, is a deeper mystery still. All the more, because you cannot fathom the depths of his purpose, you should "pray without ceasing." In v. 8 Jesus seems to be as near despairing of the issue as he ever was before he uttered his cry of desolation on the cross. Was there no one who would hazard all with him in the great adventure? It is a comfort to us to know that he too felt the oppression of our fears for civilization, that his prophecies of doom were not of the "take-it-or-leave-it" type. He bore the burden of our fears for the world as well as all our other burdens.

The one thing which he could not understand was complacency, and so we have, in yet another parable (vv. 9-14), the picture of the Pharisee and the publican at prayer together, yet so far apart; one imprisoned in his own immaculate record—there is no reason to suppose that the claim the Pharisee made for himself was not justified—the other redeemed by nothing but his penitence; the one secure but unreachable, the other with the barriers all down, wide open to redeeming grace.

In the rest of the chapter Luke rejoins the Marcan outline again, and we need only notice the contrast between the children, with whom Jesus was happy because their minds were open still, and the rich ruler or magistrate who, though he professes to want the one thing more, has a mind too rigidly made up to face the ultimate demand.

The Story of Zacchæus. Zacchæus (191-10), on the other hand, is carried out of himself so completely by the honor done to him by the prophet that he is ready, like Abraham (v. 9), to "go out, not knowing whither he went." Still is the path to the cross lit up for Jesus by his discoveries of the few, lost in the crowd if he had not singled them out, who are ready to hazard all with him.

The Parable of the Pounds. This parable (191-27) contains yet one more protest against those who, in face of the challenge of a great responsibility, hold fast to what they already have, and will take no kind of risk for fear of losing it (cf. 17³³). It contains also a prediction of the fate of the appeal he is about to make to Jerusalem. Though Luke has an independent account (see commentary) of the triumphal entry, his story does not add very much that is relevant to our line of study, nor in the next two chapters (20 and 21) is there much that is not included in the first and second Gospels.

Prophecies of the City's Fall. In 21²⁰⁻³⁶ we have an even more detailed prophecy of the fall of the city; its most important feature is to be found in v. 28, where the word translated "redemption" appears for the first time. Here the Jewish Messianic hope is no longer meant (cf. 23⁸ 24²¹), but the deliverance of believers from approaching world-catastrophes. By the suffering of the present time only can the Kingdom come. The hope of bringing about a nation-wide act of repentance by preaching the word has passed altogether out of sight; only through struggle and calamity can the new order be brought in (for the same idea in Paul, cf. 2 Cor. 4¹⁷ and the phrase "fill up what is lacking in the sufferings of Christ," Col. 1²⁴).

The Last Supper. In the first part of ch. 22, Luke is following Mark still, and, especially if vv. 19, 20 are not part of the original text of the Gospel (see commentary), we have nothing distinctively Lucan till we come to v. 21. The reason why Jesus cannot share the loving-cup (vv. 17, 18) is that "the traitor's hand"—as we may read v. 21—is with him on the table. Much as he had looked forward to that evening (v. 15) he was preoccupied, unable to throw himself whole-heartedly into the fellowship. Nor had the Twelve ever been further from understanding him, for they are still disputing as to who was greatest among them. Perhaps Judas was responsible for this unhappy development; he had started the old controversy to cover his own embarrassment, and the others became involved in it without realizing what they were doing. Everything suggests that there were times during the meal when Jesus was unlike himself, silent and remote. There is pathos in the words of v. 28, "ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations (or trials)"; they were not to be with him any longer; his consolation is to think that his loneliness will soon be over now, and to look forward to the consummation when misunderstandings will be forgotten (vv. 28-30). He is the servant, waiting upon the others (v. 27; cf. Mk. 10⁴⁵); they should be waiting upon him (177-10), strengthening him against the dark hour so soon to come, but he cannot make them understand, and, if he could, he would not now, for he will not let them see more of his sorrow than they can bear. He finds momentary relief in thinking of them, in praying for Peter through the trial coming to him, in his knowledge that Peter will not fail, and that his recovery will mean that the others will come round too. The Peter who is so soon to deny him is still the rock on which the church is to be built (cf. Mt. 16¹⁸); "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Meanwhile Jesus must go on his way alone (v. 22); his destiny has reached its climax (v. 37). Friend of outcasts as he had been, he is now to be himself an outcast. While his disciples, whom he had striven for so long to win over to share his thoughts, are childishly quarreling about precedence or foolishly planning to defend him with their puny swords (see commentary for the detailed exposition of vv. 35f.), he must meet his darkest hour alone.

The Agony in the Garden. He had come to rouse the sleeping beauty in the men whose love he had given up everything to win, and he has only succeeded in making them all the worse for his coming (Jn. 15²²). Hitherto he has been sustained by the certainty of ultimate triumph, but that does not comfort him now, for he cannot forget the people of his own times and nation. Even if one go to them from the dead, they will not be persuaded (16³⁴). Jesus was a true patriot; in Gethsemane he is agonizing in pain and deadly fear for "those who were his own" (cf. Jn. 1¹¹ Lk. 23^{28f.}). As his pain and fear grew to a crisis he prayed yet more desperately, and his sweat became like great clots of blood falling to the ground (v. 44). That it should come to this! The people of his own nation were no worse than those of other times and places—indeed, in some respects they were better—but that this people, so laboriously trained, should seal their own doom by murdering Him who had come "to save his people from their sins"! Nor was it merely with the tragedy of tomorrow that Jesus was laboring, for the sorrow of all the ages is being forced through the channels of his soul. He knew how many times it would be repeated! He had warned them, poured out unavailing his burning compassion and flaming wrath, but it was too late for works of mercy now, too late for anger. There was nothing to do but feel it and be sorry. To the end he will seek to hold despair at arm's length by thinking of the few whom he had won. They are not ready, but he will pray for them when they are too weary and bewildered to pray for themselves (cf. v. 46 and v. 32). Soon it is too late even for this, for Judas is here; there is but time for one last cure (v. 51), one last protest against the stupidity of it all (vv. 52, 53). It is their "hour indeed, and the triumph of the dark."

Peter's Denial. Peter is in the dark, too; what he was doing between the arrest and his appearance before the fire in Caiaphas' courtyard (22⁵⁴) we do not know, but we can imagine him stumbling about among the stones of the Kedron ravine with the devil wrestling for his soul. Surely, he had been loyal, but all through these demoralizing months, since Jesus had begun to talk about failure and death, he had lost touch with him, and the surrender in the garden had been the last straw. What could Peter do anyhow? When he did try to defend his Master he was only rebuked for his pains. Loyalty and resentment are fighting a life-and-death battle in his mind, and by the time he reaches the high priest's house he is in no fit state to be seen. The challenge of the serving maid provokes the explosion. Sick of the humiliation into which his association with Jesus has landed him, his one desire is to get back to Galilee away from those mocking townspeople, to do a man's work again in the sun and the air, and try to pretend that he had always been Simon the fisherman. But he cannot get away, for the prayer of Jesus holds him fast. The searching glance (v. 61—the same word is used of our Lord's first sight of Peter in Jn. 14²) does the rest, and Peter's heart is broken.

In the morning we watch the Sanhedrin at cross-purposes with Jesus in the hall of Caiaphas' house. The exact meaning of vv. 67-70 is discussed in the commentary, but, verse by verse, our impression of the widening gulf between Jesus and all the others is deepened. The chief impression we get from Luke's story is that of the futility of it all. Only Jesus is master of himself, for the storm of violent emotion has passed.

The Trial and Crucifixion. The one idea of all the others is to hurry Jesus away; he is sent from Pilate to Herod, and back again to Pilate, mocked and browbeaten, and finally given up to the mob in sheer desperation, because there seemed no other way of getting rid of him (ch. 23). On the way to Calvary Jesus is still thinking of his people's sorrows rather than his own; he is quietly coming to a conclusion, which he expresses in his redeeming prayer (23³⁴). It was too bad to be true; this monstrous delusion could not last forever. If they crucified him, it was only because "they know not what they do." This is his verdict on the tragical history of man. "Hypocrisy"—that men would not be true to themselves—had been his greatest hindrance; in the fact that his murderers were all consciously or unconsciously playing a part he now finds his ground for hope in the dark hour of his fate. Men are not altogether bad when they crucify the Christ, for "an enemy hath done this." His own suffering will break the strong man's power, for he is stronger to endure than Satan is to attack him. He will distribute his spoils, he will set the strong man's captives free (11^{21, 22}). True, he could not save his people from the doom that must follow such a deed, for if such things could be done in springtime, what will be the issue when winter comes? (23³¹.) But the destruction of the Jewish state is not to be the end; these people are more to be pitied than blamed, for they were only doing as they did because they were captives, and his prayer will at long last set them free (cf. Heb. 12²). The dying thief's cry was, we may be sure, a welcome assurance that in their despair his people would turn to him. We are still waiting for the answer to our Saviour's prayer; at least we can be sure that he was not mistaken.

Meanwhile the Gentile soldiers divide between them his garments, while the Jews look on (vv. 34, 35); here is another promise for the future. If the Jews of that generation, spectators then, were fated to be spectators of the world's history for long centuries, that would only mean that he would thus become the Saviour of the Gentiles (cf. Rom. 11²⁵ and the same idea in Lk. 21²⁴). Luke omits the cry of despair (Mt. 27⁴⁶ Mk. 15³⁴), and passes on to Jesus' self-committal to his Father; content to leave the problem with him, he falls asleep at last.

The Resurrection. Luke's account of the resurrection is chiefly distinguished by the story of the walk to Emmaus. Jesus is still the stranger (24¹⁸) staying "all by himself in Jerusalem," but he is master of every situation and spends the few hours he has with his disciples in tracing out God's age-long purpose, of which his suffering was but a part (vv. 26, 46). Even now, when they would fain appropriate him, he vanishes "out of their sight." Set free from three and thirty years, from a narrow land, from the limitations of space and time, he is setting out upon his conquest of the world. No longer the monopoly of the few, he will only continue to be theirs as they share him with all the others. Even now he does not forget his people; the disciples are to begin at Jerusalem (v. 47). His Holy Spirit their possession, they will be safe, for he has faced and fought through the worst fears that come to men who risk failure and heartbreak for the world's redemption. So, with a last blessing, he is parted from them; as he left Nazareth and Galilee behind, going out and out and out until he is left alone in a region where we cannot follow him even in thought, so now he leaves our little world of time and space behind, "from henceforth serenely waiting till all his enemies fall beneath his feet." His security, so hardly won through a travail we could not share, is ours, for he has given to us his Holy Spirit (v. 49), the power "from on high"—i.e., power won by a victorious, ascended Christ. We are to go out and out and out, as he did (Acts 13), until, lifted up out of the earth, he draws all men to him. So he who was alone shall become "the firstborn of many brethren."

Literature: On the English text alone, Commentary by Ragg (Westminster Commentaries); Ramsay, Luke the Physician; Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, pt. 2; Sanday, The Life of Christ in Recent Research; M. Jones, The Four Gospels; J. A. Findlay, Jesus as They Saw Him, pt. 2; Burkitt, The Gospel History and Its Transmission; Hayes, The Most Beautiful Book Ever Written; Cadbury, The Making of Luke-Acts. For students who use Greek, the Commentary on Luke by B.S. Easton will prove of great value.

CHAPTER I

For special interpretative notes on ch. 1 see the introduction, pp. 1025-6.

1-4. The Writer's Aim and Method. In these verses Luke gives us a carefully written preface summarizing his sources of information. With Paul's arrival in Rome, a period of gospel-writing has begun. There have been many attempts in that direction, but Luke is satisfied neither with their completeness nor their accuracy. A Gospel bearing the name of Matthew cannot have been included among the "many," but "eyewitnesses from the beginning" means that Luke had consulted disciples of Jesus. In the Acts he mentions "Mnason, an original disciple," whom he met when traveling from Caesarea to Jerusalem in Paul's company (21¹⁶), and we may think also of Manaen, Herod Antipas' foster-brother (Acts 13¹); Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward (Lk. 8³); Mary, the mother of Jesus; and John, the son of Zebedee, who is prominent in both the books. Mark is called "the minister of Peter" in early patristic writings, and "those who became ministers of the word" may refer to him. Luke's criticism of earlier writings lays stress upon the fact that they did not tell the story "in order from the beginning"; neither Q nor Mark had a birth-story, whereas Matthew's Gospel has (cf. notes on Mt. 1¹⁸⁻²⁵).

5-25. The Annunciation to Zacharias and Its Consequences. This story must have come from the inner circle in Jerusalem, for it is steeped in Semitic thought and language. Luke is specially interested in John the Baptist, because when he wrote followers of John were common in the East. In the Acts (18^{24, 25}) he describes Apollos as "understanding only the baptism of John." The fourth evangelist shows signs of the same concern (Jn. 3³⁰). Apostolic preaching, like Mark's Gospel, began with the baptism of John (Mk. 1^{1, 2} Acts 12²); Luke will tell us what led up to his birth.

There were twenty-four courses (v. 8) of priests, and they took turns in coming up to Jerusalem for a week's duty in the Temple. The parts individual priests played was decided by lot, and it fell to Zacharias that morning to carry the fire from the altar of burnt-offering, which was outside the Temple proper, to the golden altar of incense in the Holy Place. V. 17 foreshadows our Lord's identification of John with the Elijah who was to be at once herald of Messiah's coming and his attendant when he came. The idea that Zacharias was afterward martyred by the Jews is probably due to a mistaken identification of this Zacharias with the Zachariah of Mt. 23³⁵. Along with Jesus and John the Baptist he is venerated by the Mohammedans as an ascetic and holy man.

26-38. The Annunciation to Mary. This intimate account of her experiences may well have come from Mary herself. Luke's interest in the birth-story centers round Mary; in Matthew (118-25, note) the story is told rather from Joseph's point of view. The Most High (vv. 32, 35) is a reverent evasion of the name of God, which was too sacred to be uttered when it could be avoided. So "in the presence of the angels" (151⁰), "Heaven" (152¹), "who art in heaven" (Mt. 69), "the Power" (Mk. 146²), all stand for "God." The picture of Mary's innocent and serene submission is as beautiful as it is convincing. (See further p. 957; and on the question of the virgin birth, see art., The Life of Jesus Christ, p. 891.)

39-56. The Magnificat. One of the characteristic marks of Luke's Gospel is its emphasis on praise, and this note pervades the birth-story. In addition to the Magnificat and the Benedictus, we have the angel's song, while the shepherds (220), Simeon (228) and Anna join in the chorus (cf. also 415 525, 26 716 856 943 1127¹. 1313, 17 1718 1937 2453 Acts 421, etc.). The Magnificat should be ascribed to Elizabeth, not Mary, for the best reading in v. 46 is "and she said," not "and Mary said." It was Elizabeth whose "reproach"—that of childlessness—was taken away. Her hymn is modeled on Hannah's song (1 Sam. 21^{f.}); she also had been a childless wife. Like Hannah, Elizabeth shows a certain animus against the rich and well-fed. Luke himself shared this feeling; it was the one thing he had in common with the simple people who welcomed the new-born Jesus into their arms. Jesus did not long for the overthrow of the rich; he was sorry for them rather than resentful against them. But the old-fashioned folk among whom he was born longed for the redress of social inequalities as well as for the redemption of Israel (see also p. 1025, and cf. Jas. 51^{f.}).

57-80. The Birth of John the Baptist. The name "John" means "Jehovah's gift." He is to be the morning star—this is what is meant by the dayspring from on high (v. 78). Cf. Jn. 535 where he is described as "the lamp that burns itself out in giving light," and is put away when the sun rises. In Rev. 221⁶ Jesus is himself the morning star. We may refer here to the fact that Luke lays continual emphasis upon the person and work of the Holy Spirit (141, 67 226, 27 322 41, 14, 18 1113 1212 2449). With the exception of 1113 1212 these references cease altogether when the ministry of Jesus has well begun until after the resurrection. If we compare 1212 with 2115, it would seem that, as the Passion draws near, Jesus himself has taken the place of the Holy Spirit. (Cf. Edwin Lewis, Manual of Christian Beliefs, ch. 10.) This fact should be studied in connection with Jn. 739; there "glorified" means "crucified." Luke never uses the phrase "the Spirit of God" (cf. Mt. 1228 Lk. 1120).

CHAPTER II

For special interpretative notes on ch. 2, see the introduction, pp. 1025-6.

1-7. The Birth of Jesus. Jn. 742 suggests that our Lord's descent from David and his birth at Bethlehem were not generally known at Jerusalem. There is no hint in Matthew or Luke that Mary also was descended from David, unless the fact that she went up to Bethlehem to be enrolled may be thought to suggest this. Jesus was not son of Joseph in any but a legal sense, so that his descent from David might be regarded as doubtful if it were not for the unanimous testimony of N.T. writers (cf. Mt. 11 Lk. 24 Rom. 13 Heb. 714 Rev. 221⁶). Jesus seems not to have been enthusiastic about it, if we may judge from Mk. 1237, even if he did not repudiate it.

"There was no room for them in the living-room" (v. 7) is a better translation than "inn." It was a foretaste of the Lord's experience throughout his earthly ministry (cf. 958). Nothing is said about an inn-stable; by the "stable" is meant the entrance to one of the village houses, in which the animals are tethered in rough weather. On each side of the steps leading up to the living-room, which is on a higher level and further inside, a pit dug in the floor contains the animal's food. These are the mangers; we must think of Mary as giving birth to Jesus in a narrow space near the cottage door, while up the steps the people to whom the house belonged were living as usual. The very early tradition that the birth of Jesus took place in a cave may be correct, for many Syrian peasants still live in mere holes in the rock.

8-20. The Shepherds and the Angels' Song. Jesus cannot have been born at Christmas; Bethlehem is generally intensely cold at the end of December, and no shepherds could have been "watching over their flocks by night" then. In the winter the flocks are taken into sheepfolds or caves at night, but in late summer sheep are too languid to feed in the daytime, so the shepherds take them out at night. Everything points to the late summer or early autumn of 7 or 6 B.C. as the date of the birth (see p. 874). In spite of the R.V., the best reading of the angels' song is "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will among men." To translate "Among men of his good will" upsets the rhythmical balance of the hymn. The angels' hymn of peace should be compared with the shouts of the disciples at the triumphal entry, "Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest" (1938); and with the words of Jesus, "I came not to bring peace on the earth." (See pp. 891-2.)

21-39. The Circumcision of Jesus: Simeon and Anna. Simeon was a Pharisaic quietist who had long been waiting for the consolation of Israel (v. 25). Side by side with the man stands the woman, as so often in Luke. We think of the Queen of Sheba and the Ninevites, of Dionysius the Areopagite and Damaris, of Aquila and Priscilla. We also notice Luke's emphasis upon fasting; it is characteristic. A sign spoken against (v. 34) recalls the "sign of Jonah" (1129). The clouds are already creeping over the sky (cf. Isa. 814, 15). A sword (v. 35) is to pass through the heart of Mary too; it is the sword of separation, for by and by she will be tragically sundered from her son (819). The "Lewis" Syriac version, the oldest translation of the Gospels in any language (see p. 864b), has "Thou shalt cause a sword to pass through thy heart," suggesting that Mary herself was partly responsible. The words "ransom (redemption) of Jerusalem" (v. 38) remind us of a phrase at the other end of the Gospel (2421). For the broader Christian hope of world-redemption Luke uses another word from the same root, best translated "redemption" (2128)—see note on that passage.

40. Whereas John grows in strength (180) Jesus grows in "wisdom and charm," for charm is what Luke means here by the word translated "grace." Cf. 240 252 422 ("charming words"); 633 742 ("he charmingly forgave them both").

41-52. The Visit to the Temple. His first visit to the Temple was for Jesus an exhilarating adventure. When he entered the city as an adult his impressions were less favorable, and found issue in a whip of small cords (Jn. 215). His words in v. 49 may be translated "engaged in my Father's business," or "in my Father's house," or "among my Father's people." The company of the men who spent their leisure in Bible-study must have been delightful to the eager boy, who had perhaps found visiting preachers at Nazareth disappointing. The rabbis too were pleased with him; what was disturbing in a grown man was amusing in a boy. Josephus tells us a similar story about himself! The tone of Mary's expostulation suggests that she was already finding her Son beyond her; Luke sympathizes intensely with her, as in that sadder scene when she comes to fetch him home (819). Jesus understands, and goes back to Nazareth until his time should come; Joseph has fallen into the background. This narrative must have come from Mary herself, like that of the visit of Gabriel (128f.) and of the shepherds (219); in two of the three cases Luke adds, "she kept all these things in her mind." Already Jesus speaks of God as his Father; all the same, he goes back to Nazareth, and all we are told of his life in his teens is that he was more popular than ever.

CHAPTER III

1-20. The Ministry and Imprisonment of John Baptist. See notes on Mt. 31-12 141-12 Mk. 11-8 617-29. Peculiar to Luke in this section are vv. 1, 2, 5, 6, 10-15, 19, 20—vv. 10-15 evidently coming from L (see intro., p. 1023). Luke puts the ministry of Jesus in its world-setting, and continues the quotation from Isa. 40 until he gets the universalistic note (v. 6). As he tells of the experiment in voluntary communism made by the first Christians in Jerusalem (Acts 243f.), he is glad to recall the fact that John bade his converts share the necessities of life (v. 11). Publicans and soldiers (vv. 12, 14) were associated in daily life, for the taxgatherer was so unpopular that a military guard was needed for his protection. Jesus and John alike were successful with publicans and soldiers.

Other points to be noticed are: (1) Luke makes John call not merely the Pharisees and Sadducees (Mt. 37) "generation of vipers" (v. 7), i.e., "children of the devil," but the "crowds"; his dislike of crowds peeps out here; (2) he puts the blame for the imprisonment of John, as for his murder (99), on Herod, not Herodias (v. 19). The almost unanimous conclusion of critics is that the original reading of v. 16 in Q was, "I baptize you in water . . . he shall baptize you in fire." Mark interpreted "fire" as "Holy Spirit," and Matthew and Luke combine Mark and Q.

21-38. The Baptism and Genealogy of Jesus. See notes on Mt. 11-17 Mk. 19-11. Luke says it was when Jesus was praying that heaven was opened; he brings out the fact that Jesus prayed at all the crises of his life (cf. 516 612 918, 28, 29 111 2231f.). The three parables on prayer are all peculiar to Luke (115f. 181f. 189f.) and so are the two prayers on the cross (2334, 46). The words "in bodily form" (v. 22) are found in Luke alone, and informed opinion seems to favor the Western reading of the voice from heaven: "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee." This reading was altered to harmonize with the other Gospels, and also because it encouraged the Adoptionist heretics, i.e., the men who thought of his baptism as the birth-day of the divine in Jesus.

The genealogy, which is tacked on rather awkwardly to the story of the baptism, is chiefly remarkable because, unlike Matthew, Luke traces the pedigree of Jesus back, not merely to Abraham, but to Adam and to God. Beginning to be about thirty years old (v. 23) is a strange phrase, suggesting, if the reading is correct, that Luke was not quite sure how old Jesus was. He must have been over thirty, if he was born in 6 B.C., and the Baptism is to be dated 26 A.D. Luke has evidently an independent story of the Baptism of Jesus (L), to which a genealogy was attached.

CHAPTER IV

1-13. The Temptation. See notes on Mt. 41-11 Mk. 112, 13. Here Matthew and Luke are keeping step, the order of the last two temptations being reversed, Luke following the order of Q, and Matthew improving the dramatic sequence of the story. Jesus is tempted to use his divine power to maintain himself in comfort (the first temptation) or to advertise his mission (the third in Luke's order). He rejects both suggestions in words taken from Deuteronomy, words which apply to all God's children. Then, the tempter suggests, if he will not overbear men by divine power, the only course left open is that of human compromise. Jesus will accept neither alternative, and so chooses the way of the cross. The last words of v. 13 should be rendered "until his opportunity." Satan returned to the charge in Peter's well-meant protest (omitted by Luke), in the taunting cries of enemies, when Jesus was crucified (23³⁵). His claims to world-empire are stated more strongly in Luke than in Matthew (cf. Lk. 4⁶ Mt. 49); we cannot be sure that he has not an independent account of the temptation, as of the baptism.

14-30. The Sermon at Nazareth. (Mt. 13⁵³⁻⁵⁸, notes on Mk. 61-6.) Here a story from L gives a very appropriate setting to a saying from Q: "No prophet is acceptable in his own country." Rendel Harris thinks that the "Targum"—an Aramaic translation of the Hebrew O.T.—was read in the synagogue at Nazareth. The extant Targum reads: "The spirit of prophecy is upon me, because it has brought me up to preach the gospel to poor people." If that was the text of Isa. 611 which Jesus read, we can understand the sequence of the narrative better. "He says," the people of Nazareth would be thinking, "the spirit of prophecy has brought him up. We know where he was brought up—at the carpenter's along the road!" One of the "unwritten" sayings of Jesus (sayings, i.e., not found in the Gospels) discovered at Oxyrhynchus reads, "A doctor does not work cures on those who know him well"; it sounds genuine, and fits in here. "Doubtless," says Jesus, "you will be saying to me: 'Prophet, preach at home! Doctor, heal yourself'. . . . But no prophet gets a hearing among his own people; no doctor can cure the people who know him well!" After his barren visit to Nazareth, Jesus most reluctantly, we may be sure, cut his connections with the village of his boyhood; so far as we know, he never returned. Mary apparently was not at the service which ended so tragically; she held aloof, and we can only imagine what her thoughts were.

See further on vv. 18-27, the introduction, p. 1025b, 31-44. The Ministry in Galilee. See notes on Mt. 814-17 423-25 Mk. 121-39. Luke here inserts from Mark an account of the lakeside ministry of Jesus. (See Mk. 121^f.) The doctor's hand is visible in the more accurate description of Peter's mother-in-law's complaint—it was malaria. In v. 44 we read in the best MSS., "in the synagogues of Judæa" (not "Galilee"—see R.V., mg.). Judæa here stands for the whole of Palestine (cf. 717 23⁵). Luke comes from Syria, and does not divide up Palestine as Palestinians did and still do.

CHAPTER V

1-11. The Call of Peter and of the Sons of Zebedee. See also notes on Mt. 418-22 Mk. 116-20; intro., p. 1026. Here Luke leaves Mark to give an alternative version (from L) of the call of the first disciples, his custom being to give us layers of information from his different sources. The order of L was baptism, temptation, sermon at Nazareth, call of Peter. But into this scheme he has fitted rather awkwardly an account of preaching by the lakeside taken from Mark. In Mark, the call of Peter comes before the account of ministry by the lake (116^f.) and long before the visit to Nazareth (61^f.); whereas in Luke the people at Nazareth talk about the mighty works he has been doing in Capernaum, before his first visit to Capernaum has been mentioned! (423, 31.) It is impossible to reconcile Luke's account of Peter's call with Mark's much simpler narrative. In Mk. 116^f. Peter is fishing by himself; in Lk. 53^f. he has been fishing all night from a boat with the others. The similarity of Luke's story with the post-resurrection narrative of Peter's second call, in Jn. 2115^f. (notes), tempts a conjecture that Luke has heard of the later incident, but was not aware that it took place after the resurrection. Mark has the right of way here, for he gives us Peter's own account, and the latter's

"Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, Lord" (58), is more probable after the denial than long before it. Launch out into the deep (54) reminds us of "Follow me" (Jn. 21¹⁹), and the nets were breaking (56) of "the nets were not broken" (Jn. 21¹¹); but there is a transition from catching men alive (51⁰) to feeding lambs and sheep (Jn. 21¹⁵⁻¹⁷) which makes one hesitate.

12-39. The Ministry in Galilee Continued. See notes on 431-44 Mt. 81-4 91-17 Mk. 140-45 21-22. Luke is here following Mark again (see Mk. 135-39). Notice his emphasis on our Lord's habit of solitary prayer (v. 16) and his description of Peter's one-roomed peasant's cottage as having tiles in the roof, like a Roman villa (v. 19). He is not familiar with housing conditions in the cottages of the poor by the lake of Galilee (cf. Mk. 24). Luke alone is our authority for the statement that Levi left all (v. 28), and the words "to repentance" (v. 32) are peculiar to him (see also intro., p. 1026). For other instances of Luke's emphasis upon the need for repentance see 648 ("he dug and went deep"); 962 131^f, 8, 24 ("agonize"); 1426 ("yes, and himself too") 30, 33 157, 10, 18, 21 1630 174, 32 1813 (cf. 738 58); 198, 9 Acts 319 935 151⁹, etc.—all found in this form in Luke only. Other points at which Luke breaks away from Mark are as follows; for "in that day" (Mk. 220) he has "in those days" (v. 35)—the institution of Lent is based on this Gospel; and for Mark's "fast" (219) he has "make them fast" (v. 34). But the most important variation comes in v. 39. Jesus understood the prejudices of old-fashioned people; he was a radical and a conservative in one.

CHAPTER VI

I-II. The Ministry in Galilee Continued. (Mt. 121-14, notes on Mk. 223-28 31-6.) The correct reading in v. 1 is a sabbath, not the obscure "second sabbath after the first" of A.V. A scribe wrote in the margin of an early copy "first" before "sabbath"; then another scribe corrected "first" to "second," and later copyists, unable to discover which was right, wrote "second-first." Between vv. 5 and 6 the Western MSS. read: "On the same day he saw a man working on the sabbath, and said to him, 'Man, if thou knowest what thou art doing, blessed art thou; but, if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the law.'" This fragment shows signs of Luke's style, and may have been left out as offending the susceptibilities of sabbatarians. It is in accordance with the spirit of Jesus (cf. Rom. 14⁵, 6).

12-16. Choosing the Twelve. See notes on Mt. 101-4 Mk. 313-19. For the list of the Twelve, Luke may have had an independent authority, for he differs somewhat from Matthew-Mark. Jesus spends the night in prayer before choosing them. When we come to the list itself we notice the name of "Judas of James" (i.e., "the brother of James") between Simon the Zealot (Matthew-Mark "Canaan") and Judas Iscariot. As the apostle whom the MSS. of Matthew-Mark variously call "Thaddæus" or "Lebbæus" is not in Luke's list, we may take it that "Judas of James" is the same person. The "Judas, not Iscariot" of Jn. 1422 helps to support Luke's accuracy here. Judas was probably his name and Lebbæus (which reminds us of Levi), or Thaddæus, his nickname. "Zealot" means political extremist; zealots as a party are not mentioned till the eve of the fall of Jerusalem, but the tendency to direct action against the government appears much earlier, and the second Simon's nickname labels him as of that way of thinking. Possibly the name "Iscariotes" (Western text, "Scariotes") is to be explained in the same way, for "sicarii" (translated "assassins") are mentioned in Acts 2138 and they also were active during the last agonies of the siege. The names "Simon," "Judas," and "James" also occur (Mk. 63) among the brothers of Jesus; they may have been so, and this would account for certain jealousies, if comparative outsiders, like Peter, James, and John, seemed to be favored at their expense.

17-49. The Sermon on the Level Place. See notes on Mt. 51-12, 38-48 71-5, 12, 16-27. Here we leave Mark again for Q and L. Luke follows Mark as far as v. 19, except for the mention of the "level place," but in v. 20 we come to beatitudes corresponding to those found in Mt. 51^f. Three points of difference should be noticed: (1) In Matthew, the sermon is delivered on the mountain, whereas Luke says that Jesus came down to the level place; (2) in Matthew, Jesus goes up to get away from the crowds; in Luke he comes down to meet them; (3) in Matthew, there are eight beatitudes, in Luke four beatitudes and four woes. Under the first and second headings there is no serious discrepancy. The "mountain" is the hill that rises behind the site of Capernaum; there is a level place about two thirds of the way up; Jesus went up to the top for privacy with his disciples, then came down to meet the crowds. The sermon on the level place is a kind of manifesto, that on the mountain-top a confidential talk to his Twelve. We may accept the general scheme just outlined and yet be doubtful whether the whole of Mt. 5-7 was delivered on the mountain, or the whole of Lk. 620-49 on the level place.

Comparison with Mt. 5-7. If the main body of Mt. 5-7 and Lk. 6²⁰⁻⁴⁹ comes from Q, we must pick out from Luke what does not occur in Matthew. (1) First come the four woes (vv. 24-26); they must come from L, and, if so, have an early tradition behind them. (2) Whereas Matthew has "the poor in spirit," "they that are hungry and thirsty for righteousness," Luke has "ye that are poor now," "ye that are hungry now," "ye that weep now" (Matthew "they that mourn"), "for the Son of man's sake" (Matthew "for righteousness' sake")—the words peculiar to each Gospel are in italics. Q probably had "blessed are the poor, the hungry, the mourners," etc.; Matthew's additions are meant as explanations of the words "the poor," etc., whereas Luke takes them literally. The woes are inspired by pity rather than indignation (cf. the parable of Dives and Lazarus, which also comes from L). (3) V. 34, part of v. 35 ("lend, hoping for nothing again," or "despairing of no one") and v. 38 come from L. (4) In v. 29 the picture is that of forcible seizure of a garment on the road; in Mt. 5⁴⁰, on the other hand, the action takes place in a law-court; hence in Luke the upper garment is snatched away, and the undergarment is to be surrendered voluntarily, while in Matthew the undergarment, the absence of which would not be so much noticed as the unfortunate man left the court, is sacrificed first, and the upper garment is to follow. (5) In Mt. 5⁴⁶, 47 we have "What reward have you?" and "What do ye extra?" in Luke, twice over, "What grace have ye?" In v. 35c comes Luke's characteristic "graceless" (not in Matthew), and in v. 40 "everyone who is perfected" (also Luke only); in Mt. 10²⁵ we are led to think of patience under hard conditions, in Luke of positive achievement. (6) Again in vv. 47-49 (cf. Mt. 7²⁴⁻²⁷) Luke has in mind North Syrian conditions (great rivers and river floods), Matthew the Palestinian wadi, dry for the greater part of the year, but in the rainy season the bed of a raging torrent. Matthew is much more racy of Palestinian soil. (7) In the whole passage Luke has consistently emphasized differences in social conditions and their promised redress; Matthew thinks that Jesus refers to the humble and dissatisfied, as contrasted with the proud and complacent, Luke thinks that he refers to the poor and hungry, as compared with the rich and well-fed. (8) The Jesus depicted by Luke has no animus against laughter (v. 25) for no Gospel so charmingly expresses his happy humor. But in the sunniest parables, tears are never far away; there is more laughter, but there is also more weeping in this Gospel than in the others. For hilarious joy, see 1⁴⁴ 6²³ ("leap," Luke only); 10²¹ ("exulted," Luke only); 15⁷, 10, 24, 25. Notice the contrast between the right (15²⁴) and the wrong kind of revelry (12¹⁹ 16¹⁹); for tears, cf. 6²¹, 25 7¹³, 38, 44 19⁴¹ 23²⁷. (9) In 6²⁰⁻⁴⁹ we have a picture of abounding generosity abundantly rewarded (v. 38) not only by God, but in the long run by men as well. "Ask, and it shall be given you" (Matthew); "give, and it shall be given you, pressed down, shaken together, and running over" (Luke only; cf. Acts 20³⁵).

Matter found in Mt. 5-7 in one solid block lies scattered in Luke, not only here, but in 8¹⁶ 11²⁻⁴, 9-13, 33-38 12²²⁻³⁴, 58, 59 13²⁴⁻²⁷ 14³⁴, 35 16¹³, 16-18; the presence of the point-less "but" in 6²⁷ means that Luke has omitted from Q the contrast with the law of Moses developed in Mt. 5^{21f.}, but has forgotten to drop the "but" which depends for its force upon that contrast; the omission is due to the fact that it would not be interesting to Theophilus.

CHAPTER VII

1-10. The Centurion's Servant. See notes on Mt. 8⁵⁻¹³ Jn. 4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴. In v. 1 is the only occurrence in Luke of a formula five times repeated in Mt. 7²⁸ 11¹ 13⁵³ 19¹ 26¹. It came from Q and separated the sermon from the story of the centurion. This was one of the only two narratives found in Q, if we do not count the temptation (see p. 872a), the other being the healing of a man possessed by a dumb demon (11¹⁴; cf. Mt. 12²²). The centurion would be in the police service of Herod Antipas; his synagogue is now being reconstructed out of its ruins at Tell-Hum, the most likely site of Capernaum. The stones, some of which weigh five tons, are so elaborately carved that they cannot be dated later than the first century (A.D.), for after that the rabbinic schools at Tiberias insisted that no new synagogues should be built with figures of animals carved in stone. The appearance of the Roman eagle over the porch suggests that a Roman was the builder. He must have been a wealthy man, for the synagogue was large and most elaborately decorated; in police administration opportunities for the acquisition of wealth were many; then as now Matthew makes the man approach Jesus himself; in Luke he appeals by deputies, and, after sending them, is seized with further scruples, and sends more emissaries. The servant knew of the appeal to Jesus, and his faith helped the cure (but cf. p. 925-6).

11-17. The Widow of Nain. This story, unlike the last, comes from L. "Soon afterward" (v. 11) hints that Luke is not quite sure when it happened. Nain was not in Galilee proper; its modern equivalent, Nein, lies on one of the hills which border the plain of Esdralon to the southeast, and overlook its narrow outlet toward Jezreel and the Jordan Valley. The death of a widow's grown-up son was regarded as the greatest possible misfortune, and the "whole city" was expressing its sympathy. Nain would be a tiny village, but all Luke's villages are "cities." A bier was "unclean," but Jesus ignores this, and touches it, as he touched the leper (513). The miracle rouses the same difficulty as the raising of Jairus' daughter; it is possible that the young man was not really dead, but to suggest such an easy explanation in each case when a dead person is said to have been raised does not settle anything. It is clear that it was believed that Jesus could and did raise the dead. (See art., Miracles of N.T., p. 924a.)

18-35. The Message of John the Baptist, and the Discourse to Which it Gave Occasion. See notes on Mt. 11²⁻¹⁹. Here we are back again in Q, for Matthew and Luke are closely parallel. Typically Lucan touches are to be found in v. 21, "he graced with sight," and the addition of "luxury" to the "glorious apparel" of v. 25. Luke alone tells us that Jesus himself was once clothed in glorious apparel in a king's palace, but then it was in mockery (23¹¹). V. 29 looks like Mt. 21³², but is strangely different. According to Matthew, "publicans and harlots go into the Kingdom before the Pharisees"; in Luke "the publicans justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John, but the Pharisees and the lawyers" (i.e., "scribes" of Matthew-Mark; Theophilus would have taken "scribes" to mean "clerks") "set at naught the counsel of God as regards themselves, not being baptized by him." Luke is here in a difficulty with his sources. The Old Syriac reading, "justified themselves in God's sight," appears to harmonize better with 10²⁹ ("wishing to justify himself"; cf. also 16¹⁵ 18¹⁴). Luke uses Pauline expressions, like "grace" and "justify," not quite in the Pauline sense. In v. 32, "weep" for the "beat your breasts" of Mt. 11¹⁷ (mg.) is Lucan and Greek. In v. 35 Luke has "children," Matthew (11¹⁹) "works"; again we have a variant translation of a common Aramaic original, for in Semitic language the ideas of works and children lie very close together.

36-50. The Anointing of Jesus in Simon's House. See also intro., p. 1026. This story is distinct from that of the Bethany anointing in Passion-week (Mt. 26⁶⁻¹⁶, notes on Mk. 14³⁻⁹ Jn. 12¹⁻¹¹; not given in Luke). It is inserted here to illustrate the saying from Q about Jesus as the friend of publicans and sinners. We must, of course, ascribe it to L. In this Gospel only are we told that Jesus went to dinner not only with publicans, but also with Pharisees (cf. 11³⁷ 14¹). There is no valid reason for the identification of this woman either with Mary Magdalene (8²) or with Mary of Bethany. The phrase "out of whom seven demons had gone" (8²) does not imply that Mary Magdalene had lived a specially sinful life, and the traditional use of her name to denote a "fallen" woman is a libel upon her. The fact that the host in Galilee was Simon the Pharisee, and at Bethany the host was, according to Mark-Matthew (not John), "Simon the leper" has led to the suggestion that the two stories are different versions of the same incident, or that this Galilean woman was Mary of Bethany, who repeated her act twice. Probably Mark had heard parts of both stories, but did not know that there were two; from the Galilean story of the anointing he got the host's name, from the Judæan that it took place at Bethany. He knew of a Simon who had been a leper at Bethany, and of his relations with Jesus, and jumped to the conclusion that he was the host in question. (Jn. 12² says nothing about Simon.) Luke takes this Galilean story from L; when he gets to the place in Mark where the anointing at Bethany comes he quite naturally omits it because he has already told a similar story.

Jesus was reclining in the lowest place, nearest to the door; there was no back to his couch and anyone looking in through the open door would see the feet of its occupant tucked up underneath him. The woman had been looking for Jesus; he had been her best friend, and she had something for him. So she slips in, bends over his dusty feet, washes them with her tears, and dries them with her unbound hair, afterward drenching them in scent which she had brought in a flask hidden under her cloak. By this time Simon has noticed what is going on at the other end of the room and calls his neighbor's attention to it. Jesus then gives him a lesson in courtesy, using the poor woman as his example. At first the parable does not seem to fit. We should have expected "she is forgiven, because she loved." But that misses the point. Both Simon and the woman are forgiven, for "he charmingly forgave them both" if v. 42 may be so applied. But the value of God's forgiveness depends upon the reception it receives. Jesus is not comparing Simon's sins with the woman's but Simon's ingratitude with her abandon of grateful love. Simon appreciated neither his own sin nor God's free grace.

CHAPTER VIII

1-3. The Women Who Supported Jesus. (See also intro., p. 1027.) This fragment (from L) informs us how Jesus and his disciples were maintained. Mary Magdalene had been possessed by seven demons. J. Weiss thinks that the phrase means that she had had six relapses; perhaps we should think of recurrent attacks of hysteria. Chuza was a highly placed official; we know nothing about him from other sources. One other prominent figure at Herod's court became a Christian (Manaen—Acts 13¹); perhaps Chuza was himself sympathetic, as were several other aristocrats (cf. Jn. 18¹⁶). In any case, women brought up in official circles enjoyed as much liberty as American women do to-day. Joanna was probably one of Luke's informants (see 24¹⁰ with note).

4-18. The Parable of the Sower and Other Sayings. See notes on Mt. 13¹⁻²³. The entire section is found in Mk. 4¹⁻²⁵ (notes); the fact that 8¹⁶ is a "doublet" of 11^{33f.}, which comes from Q, shows that Luke sometimes gives the same saying from two sources, as Matthew commonly does. The setting by the lakeside, common to Matthew-Mark, is omitted, and in v. 10 a quotation from Isa. 69, 10, again common to Matthew-Mark, is cut short. Luke is too conscientious to drop it altogether, but he does not care for it, though he gives it at full length in Acts 28^{26f.} There it is directed against the Jews in general, and sums up the history of their rejection and the entrance of the Gentiles into the Kingdom. With patience (or "in endurance," v. 15) is a typically Lucan addition, and in the phrase an honest (or "perfect") and good heart we have the Greek expression for a perfect gentleman. We notice also "how you hear" (v. 18) for "what you hear" (Mk. 4²⁴); Luke lays great stress on the ways in which different people respond to the responsibility of hearing; some hear with the ear, others listen with the mind (cf. 16⁶ 94⁷¹—"in the ears of the people"; 21⁹, 51 Acts 21⁴, etc.).

19-56. The Galilæan Ministry Continued. See notes on Mt. 12⁴⁶⁻⁵⁰ 82³⁻³⁴ 91⁸⁻²⁶ Mk. 3³¹⁻³⁵ 43⁵⁻⁴¹ 52¹⁻⁴³; cf. p. 1024a. From Mk. 4 Luke now goes back to Mk. 3^{31f.}, but the difference between v. 21 and Mk. 3³⁵ makes one suspect that he has an independent source, especially as he goes to Mk. 4³⁵ for the next detail in the narrative. He has omitted the parable of the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4²⁶) as well as that of the leaven and the mustard-seed, which he inserts from Q at 13^{18f.} In v. 24 we have "Master, Master, we perish!" for Mark's "Teacher, carest thou not that we perish?" (in Matthew, "Lord, save! we perish!") and in v. 25 "Where is your faith?" for Mark's "Have ye not yet faith?" In the next story of the Gerasene demoniac (vv. 26f.) Luke interprets Mark's "out of the country" (5¹⁰) as meaning "out of the inhabited earth," and so he has "into the abyss" (i.e., "back into the underworld," v. 31). "In the whole city" (v. 39) is a strange rendering of Mark's "in Decapolis," for Decapolis is a large district held by ten Greek cities; perhaps he means by "the city" the lakeside Gerasa (modern Khersa). To the story of Jairus' daughter Luke adds the fact that she was an "only" daughter (v. 42)—so "only" son in 9³⁸. "Before all the people" (Luke only, v. 47) emphasizes the courage of the woman. In v. 50 Mark's "Fear not, only go on believing" (5³⁶) becomes "One act of faith, and she shall be saved" (such a rendering brings out the change of tense in the Greek). His language has been influenced by the doctrine of salvation by faith (cf. Acts 16³¹). In Luke the formula, "Thy faith hath saved thee," is applied not only to the healing of the body (Mk. 5³⁴ 10⁵²), but also to the forgiveness of sin.

CHAPTER IX

1-6. The Mission-Tours of the Twelve. See notes on 10¹⁻¹² 13²² Mt. 9³⁵⁻³⁸ 10⁵⁻¹⁶ Mk. 6⁷⁻¹³. Luke has two accounts of mission-tours and two ordination-charges, one addressed to twelve, the other (ch. 10) to seventy. Both narrative and discourse are in ch. 9 based on Mark, in ch. 10 on Q. Luke emends Mark's colloquial "brass" (see the Greek) to "silver" (Mk. 6⁸), tidies up his grammar, and for his "do not wear two undergarments" has "do not possess a change of undergarments" (cf. 31¹). He did not know that Galilæan peasants wear two undergarments in cold weather. Moreover, in Luke the disciples are not to take a staff; here Luke and Matthew agree against Mk. 6⁸; this detail must come from Q. The "wallet" mentioned in all three Gospels is the religious mendicant's collecting-box; they were not to take collections at their services. Nor were they to "affect the gentleman"; sandals were worn on the road, slippers carried to be put on in the house. For "shake off the dust from your feet" cf. Acts 13⁵¹.

7-17. Herod Hears of Jesus, Who Retires to Bethsaida and Feeds Five Thousand Men. See notes on Mt. 14¹, 2, 13-21 Mk. 6¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 30-44. At this point Mark tells of Salome's dancing. Luke gives us no information as to how John the Baptist met his death except that Herod was responsible. He also alters Mark's "John whom I beheaded is risen" (Mk. 6¹⁶) to "John I beheaded, but who is this?"

In regard to the feeding of the five thousand, there are two points to notice: (1) The incident is located at Bethsaida. There were perhaps two Bethsaidas; one Bethsaida Julias, a Græco-Roman city on the right bank of the Jordan above the lake of Galilee, the other on the western lakeside between Magdala and Capernaum. The latter site would accord well with Mark's narrative, for he says—and Peter was not likely to be mistaken here—that the crowds went on foot, and got to the scene of the supper first. This would be possible if Jesus did not cross the lake, but only the bay between Capernaum and this Bethsaida. The modern road between the two places is very rough, but is less than three miles long. Bethsaida Julias is out of the question; it could not be described as "a desert place." (2) The Western text makes it clear that Jesus was praying (v. 16) when the loaves were multiplied; that is exactly the sort of detail that Luke usually brings out.

18-27. Peter's Confession. See notes on Mt. 16:13-20 Mk. 8:27-9:1. We come now to what is called "the great omission." It has been thought that Luke has jumped, so to say, from Mk. 6:45 to 8:26. More probably he returns to L; although this is doubtful in the case of vv. 18-27, for 14:25-34 looks more like corresponding material from L. On the whole, it is best to accept the view that Luke had no version of Peter's confession in L (it was not in Q), and so took that important narrative from Mark before giving his alternative version (from L) of the transfiguration. He has abbreviated Mark rather drastically, leaving out the reproach addressed to Peter. Matthew includes both the praise and the reproach of Peter; Mark leaves out the praise and keeps the blame; Luke leaves out both praise and blame. Peter comes out worst precisely in Peter's own account!

J. L. Bryan has recently made a strong plea for the rendering of "take up his cross" (v. 23) as "take up his tent-peg." He argues that carrying the cross would at that time mean to the disciples "die a revolutionist's death," for crucifixion was the death meted out to political prisoners, and the last thing that Jesus desired was to suggest to his disciples that they should court such a fate; they were only too ready to dream of revolution. Moreover, though Jesus had foretold his death at that time, he had not mentioned that it was to be by crucifixion. It is important to remember that he was himself crucified as a revolutionary leader, not as a blasphemer; the penalty for blasphemy was death by stoning. The original meaning of the word translated "cross" is "something that sticks up," and the Arabs still use a word very like it when they bid their women take up the tent-pegs before they set out on their day's march. The fact that Luke adds to the phrase the word "daily" helps Mr. Bryan's argument. "Daily" is characteristically Lucan (cf. 11:3, where Mt. 6:11 has "to-day").

In v. 24 Luke omits Mark's "and the gospel's"; as Mt. 16:25 does the same, we may suggest either that Luke has Q in his mind, if not before his eyes, or that the words are a later addition in Mark. In v. 26 Luke modifies the sharpness of Mk. 8:36 (cf. Mt. 16:26); he has "lose" or "forfeit," whereas Matthew has "forfeit." Doctor Field suggested that the former word implies total, the latter partial, or temporary, loss. Luke also omits the words "come with power" from Mk. 9:1, thus generalizing the saying. He consistently interprets Mark's eschatology in a less definite fashion whenever possible. Matthew is more precise even than Mark, for he has "the Son of man coming in his kingdom."

In vv. 20 and 21 we might render, "What do you say about me when you are away preaching," or, "in answer to inquiries?" Peter says, "We say you are God's Messiah." But "Jesus reproved them, and bade them never say it to anyone in future." Though Jesus did not in so many words repudiate the title "Messiah" or "Christ," he seemed to avoid it as much as possible (but see note on 10:1-24). It is curious that from the very beginning Christians have called him by a name which with one doubtful exception (Mk. 14:62, see note) he never used of himself!

28-36. The Transfiguration. See notes on Mt. 17:1-13 Mk. 9:2-13; intro., p. 1027. Luke differs from Matthew-Mark in dating the ascent of "the mountain" (Matthew "a high mountain") eight instead of six days after the first prophecy of the Passion. Instead of "was transfigured before them" (Matthew-Mark)—in its strict sense the words involve a radical transformation (cf. Rom. 12:2)—he has the more cautious phrase "the look of his face became different." Moses and Elijah are talking of "his exodus which he was going to accomplish in Jerusalem" (v. 31, cf. mg.); no hint of this is given in the other Gospels. The disciples are "laden with sleep" (v. 32); this detail too is found in Luke only. The words rendered "When they were fully awake" might be translated "having managed to keep awake." Luke tells us that "they feared as they entered into the cloud" (v. 34); Matthew-Mark have simply "and they were sore afraid," while Matthew adds that Jesus touched them and dispelled their fear. Instead of "This is my beloved Son; hear him" (Mark-Matthew), Luke has "This is my Son, my chosen" (v. 35; cf. 23³⁵, "the elect," again Luke only). For Mark's "he did not know what to answer" (9⁶) Luke has "he did not know what he was saying" (v. 33)—an intentional change, to avoid the suggestion that Peter said something because he did not know what to say. Luke has not altogether discarded Mark, but his version as a whole is based on L. The drowsiness of the three reminds us of Gethsemane, where once again the disciples "do not know what to answer" (Mk. 14⁴⁰). In both cases Jesus is thinking about his death; in one case Moses and Elijah, in the other "an angel from heaven" (Lk. 22⁴³) are in attendance; in both cases the disciples are heavy with sleep, but the scene of one incident is a mountain in Galilee, of the other a garden in Jerusalem. At the transfiguration the face of Jesus is shining; in Gethsemane his sweat is "like great clots of blood."

Moses and Elijah had each had their exodus from the range of hills to the east of the Jordan which form the background to every picture of the land. Neither had come down again, and it was thought that their spirits still haunted those hills. No wonder then that Peter and the others saw them with Jesus there, and that Peter wondered whether Jesus was not going to forsake his humble friends for his new-found companions, and leave them to go sadly home alone, like Elisha. Every time Peter tries to push away the thought of his Master's death he is separated from him; so it is with the modern disciple. "They feared as they entered into the cloud" suggests that the chill shadow of the Passion was already creeping over their spirits. Luke leaves out the conversation about Elijah which took place on the way down as not interesting to Theophilus.

37-48. The Healing of the Epileptic, and Another Prophecy of the Passion. (Mt. 17¹⁴⁻²³; notes on 18¹⁻⁵ Mk. 9¹⁴⁻³⁷.) The healing of the epileptic boy is told briefly, for Luke has nothing to add except that the boy was an "only" son (cf. 7¹² 8⁴²). The typically Lucan expressions, "they were all struck aback at the magnanimity of God" (v. 43) and "put into your ears these words" (v. 44; cf. 14⁴) should, however, be noticed. Luke says three times over in different ways that the disciples did not understand this second prophecy of the Passion, in spite of the fact that in this Gospel there is here no reference to actual death. He insists that his nearest and dearest did not understand Jesus (cf. 2⁵⁰ 13³⁴ 24¹⁶). In Mt. 17²³ grief rather than bewilderment is suggested. Mark paints a sorry picture of the behavior of the disciples in 9^{33f.}; they quarrel behind the back of Jesus, and when challenged are silent and embarrassed. Mt. 18¹ makes them bring a straightforward request for information to Jesus, while Lk. 9⁴⁶ mentions simply that a dispute had "come in" without saying how it began.

49, 50. Jesus States the Law of Toleration. V. 50 (cf. Mk. 9⁴⁰) gives us a striking contrast with 11²³; the former states the law of toleration, the latter that of self-examination, the one the point of view from which we are to criticize others, the other that from which we are to criticize ourselves. In neither case is neutrality possible.

51-62. Jesus Starts for Jerusalem. (Mt. 17²², 23 19¹, cf. 8¹⁹⁻²²; see also intro., p. 1027.) Here Luke leaves Mark once again and does not return to it till we get to 18¹⁵. If it was at this point that Jesus "set his face like a flint to go to Jerusalem" (v. 51), we can only say that he was a long while getting there, for at 17¹¹ he is still "between Samaria and Galilee." All that takes place between 9⁵¹ and 18¹⁵ cannot be assigned to this one journey, unless it was a very circuitous one! Perhaps Luke associated the stories and sayings he gathered together in L during his residence in Palestine with the country he went through himself, and the people he met with, between Caesarea and Jerusalem (cf. Acts 21¹⁶). Luke is quite clearly almost hypnotized by this last journey of Jesus, for he keeps on referring to it (9⁵¹, 53, 57 10¹, 38 13²², 33 17¹¹ 18³¹, 35 19²⁸). "The days of his taking up" (v. 51) is a difficult phrase; we cannot say that the days of his ascension were coming on; we can only conclude that Luke is giving us verbatim a phrase used by his informant. This section is permeated by suggestions of the story of Elijah and his last journey (vv. 54, 61); this may account for the use of the word translated "taking-up" here. In v. 54 the A.V. reading is preferable; the words, "as Elijah did," and "the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them," were omitted from some MSS. because they seemed to favor the Marcionite heresy, which laid great stress on the contrast between the O.T. and N.T. Over the whole passage there broods the atmosphere of an urgency that brooks no delay. Elisha was allowed to "kiss his father and his mother," but this man must not even look back. The Syrian plow has only one handle; we read "put his hand"—not "hands"—"to the plow." In this section, vv. 51-56 and 61, 62 come from L, the rest from Q (cf. Mt. 8¹⁹⁻²²).

CHAPTER X

1-24. The Mission of the Seventy and Its Results. (Cf. on 9¹⁻⁵ 13²² Mt. 9³⁵⁻³⁸ 10⁵⁻¹⁶

1120-27 13¹⁶, 17 Mk. 66-11, 30; see also intro., p. 1027.) Luke had evidently heard in Palestine, perhaps from one of them, that seventy disciples were sent to prepare the way for Jesus on his journey south. Both Q and Mark contained a charge to missionaries, and Luke has already given us his version of Mark's ordination-charge (91-5); now he applies his similar Q material to the sending of the seventy, using his own information to illustrate Q.

Lk. 103-16 is parallel to Mt. 105b-15, but there are striking differences. (1) Mt. 105b, 6 are absent; they were out of place in a charge given to men who were to travel through Samaria; they are probably a Matthean addition to Q. (2) To the words in Mt. 107 Luke in v. 9 adds "to you"—i.e., "to you Samaritans." (3) "Greet no one by the way" is absent from Matthew, who is all for friendliness; Oriental salutations take a long time. Again the note of urgency, as everywhere in Luke. (4) Mt. 1010 has "the workman is worthy of his food," Lk. 107, "the workman is worthy of his hire"; in 1 Tim. 518—the only place in the N.T. where the words of Jesus are cited as "Scripture"—we have the saying in its Lucan form. Matthew is thinking of allowances, Luke of wages. The words "freely ye have received, freely give" are also wanting in Luke. (5) V. 2 is found in Mt. 937, 38, vv. 13-15 in Mt. 1121-24.

With the return of the seventy we come back to L. Whether I was watching Satan fallen like lightning from heaven (v. 18) is meant to suggest triumph or foreboding is not clear. The words sound like exultation in the coming defeat of Satan, but the casting out of Satan from heaven, according to Jewish ideas, meant "woe for the earth and the sea" (Rev. 1210-12). Perhaps we should think of a mingling of exultation in ultimate victory with a foreboding of the trouble which must be endured before that consummation. Meanwhile, successful preachers must not be elated by results; they will have sufficient reason to rejoice, if, after a lifetime of preaching to others, their names are found written in the book of life at the end (v. 20). At the gate of an ancient city was posted a list of burgesses, and so the idea had grown up that God kept a roll (cf. Ex. 3232, 33 Ezra 262 Neh. 1222 Ezek. 139 Psa. 13916).

With vv. 21f. we come back to Q again (cf. Mt. 1125f.). "Jesus exulted in the Holy Spirit" (Matthew "Jesus answered and said") because, not the learned and the wise, but baby-minds like those of his followers were first to be intrusted with the broadcasting of his unique knowledge of God. It is important to notice that this passage undoubtedly comes from Q, for Matthew and Luke are closely parallel here. Q is our earliest source for the teaching of Jesus, and yet its Christology is as high as anything in the fourth Gospel; our earliest and latest authorities agree in asserting that Jesus claimed to be in a class by himself with God the Father, over against all created beings in heaven and earth (cf. Mk. 1332 Jn. 146). He is the "Only Son," for none of us can hope to be a second Christ; all the same, though we cannot share his experience with the Father, all the knowledge that he has gained through that experience he will share with us. Baby-minds find it easier to understand than the "wise and prudent," because they have less to unlearn. But they are not to be elated, but humbly to acknowledge that better men than they have longed to catch a glimpse of the truths that are being lived out before their eyes, and died without the sight. We are not worthier than other men, only more fortunate.

25-37. The Parable of the Good Samaritan.

See notes on Mt. 2234-40 Mk. 1228-34 and intro., p. 1027b. The conversation with the scribe—Luke calls the "scribes" of the other Gospels "lawyers," because Theophilus would understand "scribes" to mean "clerks"—reminds us of Mk. 1228f., and is perhaps a reminiscence of the same incident from another source. That source is not Q, but L; if it had been Q, Matthew would have given us both the Marcan and the Q versions. The Samaritan was a commercial traveler with two mules, one to carry his samples, while he rode on the other. On the other hand, priest and Levite had no pressing business; they came that way by chance. The priest was going down away from the Temple, and so was not in danger of incurring ceremonial defilement. The main point of the parable is to be found in its concluding words: "Who of the three proved himself a neighbor?" The question is not "Who is my neighbor?" but "To whom can I show myself a neighbor?" In the next chapter (115-8) we meet a man who was a neighbor, but was not neighborly; here we have one who was not a neighbor, but was neighborly. Jesus was himself nicknamed a "Samaritan" (Jn. 848); perhaps the fathers were not far wrong when they suggested that he was thinking of his own journey along that dangerous road, though to identify the innkeeper with the church, the two pence with the sacraments, and "when I come again" with the Second Coming seems artificial.

38-42. The Home at Bethany. Luke knows Bethany, for he refers to it elsewhere (1929); his calling it "a certain village" is in line with the reserve practiced by the other Synoptic Gospels about this family; Mark-

Matthew suppress the name of the sisters, calling Mary a "woman"; Luke suppresses the name of the village where they lived. It is a perversion of the story to call Martha the "practical" sister. She had allowed herself to get hustled; not understanding Jesus, she thought that he would appreciate fussy and elaborate preparations. What he really wanted was quiet and sympathetic listening, and this Mary gave him. Vv. 41, 42 should be rendered: "Martha, Martha"—Jesus often repeated his friends' names twice (cf. 2231)—"you are worrying and working yourself up over getting a big supper ready; one course will be enough. Mary has chosen the menu that suits her and me, and she is not to be dragged away from it."

CHAPTER XI

1-13. How to Pray, with an Illustration.

See notes on Mt. 69-15 77-11. Only Luke says Jesus was himself praying, when his disciples asked him to teach them to pray like that; also that John the Baptist gave similar instructions to his converts. The Lord's prayer, as it stands in the best MSS. of Luke, runs as follows: "Father, hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; give us day by day our bread for the coming day; and forgive us our sins, as we ourselves forgive everyone who is in debt to us, and bring us not into temptation." Luke's version is in prose; Matthew's (69-13) is rhythmical, and its form is probably that of the primitive church liturgy. Luke gives us the original form of the prayer, as it stood in Q, though Marcion had an additional clause in place of Matthew's "Thy will be done," etc., namely, "Let thy Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us." This is not specially Marcionite, so may be genuine. Abba might mean "Father" or "our Father," and which art in Heaven means simply "God."

The parable which follows (L) may contain a reminiscence of the boyhood of Jesus (see also intro., p. 1023). We can see the peasant-family asleep on the floor of their one-roomed dwelling round the fire with its embers still glowing, and the lamp, an old slipper filled with oil, burning on its stand. Visitors after the door is shut are unusual, for the Syrian village is silent after nightfall. The friend who had come on a journey might be only a casual wanderer; hospitality is rarely refused to a stranger. When an unexpected guest arrives the host's first precaution is to share bread and salt with him; those who have partaken of bread and salt together are fast friends and will keep faith. The man inside was not a churl; his reluctance to get up was due to the inconvenience of disturbing the whole family, as he would have to do, when they were all herded together in the little dark room! But would anyone but Jesus have dared to use an illustration like this when speaking of prayer? Another of his three prayer-parables (all three we owe to Luke) is equally audacious; a shrewish widow bullies a cynical magistrate into doing the right thing for once by making herself a nuisance! There was no danger of serious misunderstanding; if a peasant who does not want to get up out of bed can be made to do so by sheer unashamed persistence, how much more will your heavenly Father, who welcomes the knock at his door, be quick to listen and reply! He has difficulties greater than we dream of in answering our prayers, and needs our perseverance.

Jesus does not tell us that we shall get what we want when we ask; when we seek, that we shall find what we expect; when we knock at the door, that what waits for us on the other side will be altogether to our taste. It will at least be the best possible. God does not play practical jokes on his children, as the heathen gods do with their worshipers, leading them on, and then cheating them with snakes that look like fish till they sting. The egg and the scorpion come in Luke only; Mt. 79, 10 has loaf and stone, fish and snake; Luke fish and snake, egg and scorpion. As this passage comes from Q, it is difficult to believe that Matthew and Luke's editions of Q can have been identical. In v. 13 Luke has "the Holy Spirit"; Mt. 711 "good things."

14-28. A Miracle, Followed by a Slander and a Compliment. See notes on Mt. 932-34 1222-32, 43-45 Mk. 320-30. The story of exorcism must come from Q, for it occurs in the parallel passage in Mt. 1222f.; where, however, we read that the possessed man was both blind and deaf (see note on 721.). In the Q passage which follows Luke has perhaps inserted one verse from Mk. 811 (v. 16); further on he takes the Q passage about seeking a sign (vv. 29f.). Luke has in v. 20 finger of God, where Mt. 1228 has "Spirit of God"; for some reason he always avoids the phrase "Spirit of God." Vv. 21, 22 are very full; they give us a parable on false confidence in material treasure. In vv. 27, 28 a sentimental woman intervenes (this from L), wishing in very audible tones she were the mother of Jesus (see intro., p. 1028). Jesus has said before (821) that "those who hear the word of God and keep it" will be mother and brothers to him; now he replies that "those who hear the word of God and keep it" have a happiness greater than his mother ever knew. Our aspiration should be, not to bear a relationship to Jesus that no one else can share, but "to hear and do" his "every word"; if, however, we do so, we shall, without having sought it, enter into intimate relations with him.

29-36. The Reply to the Demand for a Sign. See notes on Mt. 12³⁸⁻⁴² 622, 23. The sign desired was a voice from heaven, supposed to guarantee prophetic inspiration. The Queen of Sheba comes in (v. 31) before the Ninevites (cf. the reverse order in Mt. 12^{41, 42}). Vv. 33-36 form a doublet with 8¹⁶; that comes from Mark, this from Q. The word translated light at the end of v. 33 means a light reflected through a window or seen through a door; as in 8¹⁶, Luke is thinking of the effect of a lighted room seen from the road; Mt. 5¹⁵ of its effect on the inmates of the room. This is characteristic of the difference in outlook between the two Gospels.

37-54. Woes Upon the Pharisees and a Dirge Upon His Contemporaries. (Cf. 20^{45, 46} Mt. 16⁵⁻¹² 231-31, notes; Mk. 12³⁸⁻⁴⁰; see also intro., p. 1028.) Luke had heard that the woes upon the Pharisees contained in Q (cf. Mt. 23) were uttered when Jesus was at dinner in a Pharisee's house; some, thinking of the requirements of courtesy, will question if this was really so. The phrase "the Lord said" (v. 39) implies oral tradition, for members of the inner circle called Jesus "the Lord" to outsiders (cf. Mk. 11³). The same expression (in narrative) is found in Lk. 7¹³ 10^{1, 41}, (cf. Jn. 4¹); in all its Lucan instances, the passage in which it occurs comes from L. V. 41 is peculiar to Luke, and should be emended—by a slight change in the suggested Aramaic original—to only purify what is within, and behold all is pure to you—i.e., "to the pure all things are pure." In v. 44 we have unseen tombs, where Mt. 23²⁷ has "whitewashed tombs"; there were whitewashed tombs in the Temple, sepulchers of idolatrous kings who had been buried there; Matthew has the topical reference right (cf. Acts 23³). They killed, and you build (v. 48) seems awkward; it appears to mean that the fathers killed the prophets, the sons completed their work by burying the prophet's memory under a mountain of insincere flattery. Therefore the wisdom of God said (v. 49) suggests that Jesus is quoting here from a Wisdom book; Harnack thinks that the phrase comes from Q, and that the quotation went on to "Jerusalem, Jerusalem," etc., which follows in Mt. 23^{36f}. In that case Matthew has given us the quotation complete, Luke has broken it up into two parts, for he does not give us the lament over Jerusalem till we come to 13^{34f}. For "you shut the kingdom of heaven" in Mt. 23¹³ Luke has you have taken away the key of knowledge (v. 52); and in vv. 53, 54 we should render "began to be very angry and, extending the scope of debate, to snatch at his words, lying in ambush for him to catch him in some unguarded answer"—three alternative translations of a difficult Aramaic phrase (cf. "bed" in 5¹⁸, "mattress" in 5²⁴, "that on which he was laid" in 5²⁵, and in 14¹² "dinner," "supper," or "reception"). All three passages suggest the conscientious use of variant translations in a dictionary.

CHAPTER XII

1-12. Warnings and Encouragements. See notes on Mt. 10¹⁷⁻³³ Mk. 3²³⁻³⁰. V. 1 (L) contains a note from the memory of one of Luke's informants. Then follows another passage from Q, containing a warning against the men who had so lately been guilty of malignant slander. Vv. 4, 5 correspond to Mt. 10²⁸; in both Gospels it seems more consonant with the teaching of Jesus to interpret him who has authority to cast into hell of Satan, not of God. Five sparrows for twopence (v. 6) is an interesting variation of the "two a penny" in Mt. 10²⁹; the suggestion of the odd one thrown in as a makeweight cannot have been an invention by Luke, but must have come from the memory of a hearer of Jesus. The extra sparrow casually thrown in by the salesman counts full value with God; is not forgotten before God (v. 6) is a reverent way of saying, "God does not forget." Mt. 10²⁹ has "not one of them falls to the ground without your Father."

13-34. On the Dangers of Wealth and Self-centered Ease, and How to Escape Them. (See notes on Mt. 6^{19-21, 24-34} and intro., p. 1028.) In this section, vv. 14-21, 32 and part of 33 come from L, the rest from Q (cf. Mt. 6^{19f}). The parable of the rich fool is one of the raciest of the stories told by Jesus. When people said soul to themselves, they meant what in England is meant by "old man," and take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry means literally, "you ought to be retiring from business; have a good meal and a drink and try to be merry." But the liveliest touch comes at the end; this night thy soul is required of thee should be rendered, "this night they are asking for your soul." The man was a fool because he tried to be merry by himself; as if anybody but a curmudgeon would try, and even he could succeed! Into his carefully secluded dining room there came a visitor, as there always does sooner or later, however jealously the door is barricaded. It was God, and the man looks up to see his Maker, who bids him join "the great majority," and be a democrat at last. There was everything in the room, a well-spread table, splendid appointments, everything but a man, for men and nations wither when they shut themselves up. Nor can they shut themselves up for long; sooner or later the door blows open, and reality must be faced; men and nations must ultimately take their chance with the rest, and, if they wrap themselves up in self-centered ease, they will presently have no soul left to face reality with. To be rich toward God (v. 21) means to be rich in experience of communion with God and fellowship with men, and this only comes from a life of self-denying adventure.

In v. 29 we notice the phrase translated Be not of a doubtful mind. It is unique in the N.T., and is connected with wind and weather; indeed, it is equivalent to the colloquial, "Don't get the wind up." V. 32 gives us a precious fragment from L; it has the hall-mark of authenticity upon it. Sell your goods (v. 33) extends to all disciples the advice given to the rich young ruler (18²²). There is nothing so sweeping anywhere else in the N.T., but it is probably genuine reminiscence, for it seems reasonable to suppose that all who joined the inner circle of disciples disposed of their property before doing so; Peter and the others had "left all." Such membership was voluntary, like the communism of the early church. Some of the friends of Jesus did not leave home (e.g., Martha and Mary), but those who traveled about with him had a common purse (8³), and critics of the experiment described twice over in Acts (24⁴, 45 43⁴, 35) must realize that it was not a new experiment; it was an attempt to go on as before.

35-48. The Lord's Coming; Its Conditions and Demands. (Cf. 177-10 Mt. 251-13 24⁴²-51; see also intro., p. 1028.) Vv. 35, 36 are Luke only, and should be ascribed to L. They remind us of Mt. 251⁴, but, whereas there the Master is the bridegroom coming suddenly to claim his bride, here he is the bridegroom bringing his bride home, unless the "wedding" is not his own. The Syrian bridegroom feasts with his bachelor friends for an unspecified time, then suddenly leaves them to fetch his bride home, while his friends depart (53⁴, 35). Servants wait up to admit him when he returns. We are to be like men who wait for their Lord (v. 36), who comes when he is least expected. The last part of v. 37 also comes from L, and provides us with an interesting contrast with 177¹; there the servant of Jesus is told that he must not dream of his Master thanking him, much less waiting on him; here the promise is given that, if he is faithful, his master will thank him.

We should observe a delicate point in vv.

42-44 which we render "... whom his Lord will set in temporary charge of his catering. . . . Truly I tell you, he will set him in permanent control of all he possesses"; and also that where Mt. 24⁴⁵ has slave, Luke has steward (cf. 16¹), where Matthew has food, Luke has rations; both changes are characteristic. Vv. 47, 48 come from L, and suggest that, whatever may be the doom of the unregenerate, it will at least be capable of comparative alleviation.

49-59. The King's Business Requires Haste. (See notes on Mt. 103⁴-36 161⁴-4 525^f. and intro., p. 1028.) In vv. 49-51 we have one of the few passages which suggest impatience in Jesus; vv. 49, 50 come from L, v. 51 from Q, but, whereas Mt. 103⁴ has a sword, Luke has division; Theophilus might take "a sword" too literally. In v. 53 Luke has "five in one house divided, three against two, and two against three," all of these words being absent from Mt. 103⁵. Again, as in the saying about five sparrows (v. 6), we infer that Jesus is repeating the sentence in an improved version. Three against two, and two against three reproduces the domestic situation; the husband's mother is the tyrant of the house, and with the casting vote ranges herself with her son and his daughter against her daughter-in-law and her son! Moreover, according to the Greek, the women are at daggers drawn, while the men merely have a difference! Subtleties like these could not be expressed in Aramaic, but in Greek-speaking districts Jesus probably could and would talk Greek; he was bilingual (see p. 880).

The passage about "the signs of this time" is not found in the best texts of Matthew (162, 3), and so must come from L. In this Gospel we see Jesus as the messenger of God, not only to individuals but to the life of his day and of all times, with an appeal to be forced home quickly and a mission to be accomplished within a given time, and, as for the Master, so for his followers, there can be no rest till the work is done. They must be off and away, getting rid of the adversary quickly; by the adversary (v. 58) here is meant anyone or anything that stands in the way. Mt. 525, 26 gives a different color to this saying; he has "Be friendly with your adversary"; Luke's version should be translated, "Take pains to be rid of your adversary." The setting in Matthew is that of a Jewish, in Luke that of a Roman court.

CHAPTER XIII

1-9. Except Ye Repent. (See also intro., p. 1029.) The whole of this section comes from

L, and its note is still that of urgent appeal. Pilate's massacre of Galileans, of which we have a fuller account in Josephus (Antiquities, bk. xviii, ch. 3, and footnote in Eng. trans.), exasperated Galilean opinion to the last degree; it was a factor in the growing alienation of the populace from Jesus, who steadily refused to countenance direct action. In v. 4 Jesus transfers the subject of discourse from Galilee to Jerusalem, on which his thoughts tend to rest more and more. The parable of the fig-tree spared one year suggests the parable found in Isa. 51^{f.}, and looks forward to the triumphal entry. The "fig-tree" stands for Jerusalem, planted in the "vineyard" of Palestine; the "three years" implies that Jesus had, as the fourth Gospel says, carried on a prolonged ministry already in that city. This parable should be read along with the cursing of the fig-tree (Mk. 11¹³ Mt. 21¹⁹, notes; not in Luke). The first of the two stories—both are really parables (see p. 924a)—betrays the hopes of Jesus as he approached the city, the second betrays his despair, when his supreme appeal had failed.

10-21. Another Cure, and Two Parables. (Mt. 13³¹⁻³³, notes; Mk. 4³⁰⁻³²; intro., p. 1029.) In this passage the phrase the Lord (v. 15) comes in again; we infer that it comes from L. Healing was allowed on the Sabbath, if it were a matter of life or death; in this matter practice was better than theory, for animals were watered on the day of rest. With the phrase daughter of Abraham (v. 16) compare "son of Abraham" (19⁹) and "Abraham's bosom" (16^{22f.}), all found in Luke alone. It is curious that this Gentile appreciates so keenly the patriotism of Jesus. The tone of the story is that of Mt. 12¹²—"it is right to do good on the sabbath." The Sabbath is not designed merely for rest or even for worship, but for humanitarian service. In vv. 18-21 Luke is closely parallel with Mt. 13³¹⁻³³, so we are back in Q.

22-35. A Call for Instant Decision. See notes on 91-5 101-12 Mt. 7¹³, 14, 21-23 85-13 23³⁷⁻³⁹ and intro., p. 1029. This section comes from L. V. 22 reminds us once again that we are on the road to Jerusalem. In v. 24 we are on Q ground (cf. Mt. 7¹³), but, whereas Matthew has "Enter through the narrow gate," Luke has Agonize to enter through the narrow door. We should probably omit the period at the end of v. 24, and read straight on to v. 25: shall not be able (Matthew has "few there be that find it") when once the Master of the house, etc. The note of urgency is unmistakable; we have a picture of latecomers waved away from a window. For Mt. 7²³ "I never knew you," Luke has I know you not whence you are (v. 25), in other words "I don't remember where you come from"—once more the universalistic note. According to Matthew, the unadmitted plead all they have done in the name of Jesus (7²²), according to Luke all he had done for them (v. 26); we can scarcely believe that Matthew and Luke are here working at a common document.

In vv. 31-33 we are still with L. Whether the Pharisees who warn Jesus of Herod's design mean to be friendly or not is not clear; in any case he is not going to move on before his time to please either them or Herod. V. 33 should be translated (with early Greek commentators) "only I must cast out demons and accomplish cures to-day and to-morrow, and on the day after that take to the road again." "Two or three days" is a phrase corresponding to our "day or two" (cf. Hos. 6²).

34, 35. The plaint over Jerusalem comes in Luke before the triumphal entry, in Matthew after it (23^{35f.}); the consequence is that in Luke until the time comes when ye shall say (v. 35), etc., refers to the entry itself, in Matthew to the Second Coming. The cry of the hen-bird is the cry of the Heavenly Wisdom (cf. 11⁴⁹ and note); no inferences can safely be drawn from this passage as to earlier visits to the city.

CHAPTER XIV

1-24. The Table-Talk of Jesus. (Cf. on Mt. 22¹⁻¹⁴; see also intro., p. 1029.) For the third time in this Gospel (cf. 7³⁶ 11³⁷) Jesus is asked to dinner by a Pharisee. The story of the healing of the man with the dropsy comes from L, but the ironical advice to guests is found also in the Western text of Matthew between 20²⁸, 29. Evidently, Jesus is the guest of the evening, and as such sat in the highest place (at the right hand of the host), was expected to start the ball of conversation rolling, and was allowed considerable license in teasing his fellow guests. Perhaps Jesus had taken the lowest place (cf. 7^{36f.}) and had been called up to the top table. If this was a so-called charity-feast, as some authorities suggest, v. 12 would contain a shrewd thrust at the host; the poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind ought to have been there.

The interrupter in v. 15 seeks to relieve the tension by a platitude, and the parable of the great supper that follows exposes the hollowness of pious patter. Mt. 22^{1f.} is a partial parallel, but the parable in Matthew has a different introduction and a different dénouement, being colored by the tragedy of Passion week. In Matthew, "both bad and good" come in to the prince's wedding feast, in Luke the poor, the maimed, the halt and the blind partake of the supper; in Matthew the main point of the story is the fate of one man who came in, and was turned out, in Luke the main point is the behavior of the invited guests who were too busy to come. The story in Luke is gayer than its counterpart in Matthew, and is told in a most humorous way. Notice the politeness of the farmer and the cattle-dealer ("I pray thee, have me excused") as contrasted with the downright refusal of the married man ("I am married to a wife, and therefore I cannot come").

25-35. Counting the Cost. (Cf. 11³³ Mt. 5¹³⁻¹⁶ 10³⁷, 38; see also intro., p. 1029.) At this stage Jesus appears again to be threatened with popularity. Not only does he get invitations to dinner, but large crowds are following him. But he is not encouraging, and his sternest words to would-be disciples follow immediately upon this Indian summer of popular favor. The hate of v. 26 goes back to an Aramaic word which means "love less," so that Mt. 10³⁷, 38 is an accurate rendering of the meaning, if not of the actual words, of Jesus (cf. Mt. 5⁴³: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor more, and thine enemy less"). Luke slips in the wife (v. 26) among the people we are to love less (cf. v. 20); the evangelist's bias is unmistakable (cf. 18²⁹ where again "wife" is in Luke only). Yes, and himself too, is also peculiar to Luke. In Mt. 10³⁹ we hear of "losing" self, here of loving self less. Three times over Luke has cannot be my disciple (vv. 26, 27, 33), three times over Mt. 10³⁷, 38 has "is not worthy of me."

The two parables from L inserted here (vv. 28-32) should be understood as meaning that Jesus will count the cost before he takes all and sundry into his service. He is the man building the tower, the king going into action with a numerically superior adversary. The Kingdom has two aspects; it is to be a tower of defense for the distressed, and will involve an agelong crusade against the powers of evil. V. 33 reminds us of 12³³, calling, as it does, for an entire surrender of all material possessions (cf. notes on 12³³ and 5²⁸): whoever does not say good-bye to all he possesses (cf. Mk. 6⁴⁶ for the word translated "say good-bye"). V. 35 is nearer to Mk. 9⁵⁰ than to Mt. 5¹³ but probably comes from Q.

CHAPTER XV

Three Parables of Losing and Finding. (Mt. 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴; see also intro., p. 1029.) In spite of, or perhaps because of, the relentlessness of Jesus, the publicans are still attracted to him, and three parables follow, one from Q, the other two from L.

The parable of the lost sheep has a different application in Matthew (18¹²⁻¹⁴, note); there we read that the Father's face is set against one of these "little ones" being lost, here that there is "joy in heaven over one repentant sinner found." Luke's is the gospel of penitence (cf. 5⁸, 32 7²⁹, 38 13³, 5 15⁷, 10, 18 16³⁰ 18¹³ 19⁸ 22³² 23⁴¹ 24⁴⁷). Through this chapter there runs a rising note of joy; "joy in heaven" (v. 7), "joy in the presence of the angels"—a reverent way of saying "joy in God's heart" (v. 10)—and merriment, joy in which God and man share. This is in perfect harmony with Jesus' fundamental thought of God as a Father. Only a fatherly God could be a rejoicing God.

Characteristically, Jesus adds a woman's parable (cf. 13¹⁸⁻²¹), appealing to each section of his audience in turn (cf. also 17³⁴, 35), but the parable of the lost coin is no mere replica of that of the lost sheep. The coin is lost inside the house, the sheep outside the fold. The publicans belonged to God's family; like Zachæus, they were "children of Abraham." Memory of days at Nazareth may have suggested this parable; the peasant-woman would miss her coin, and her recovery of it would provide a topic of conversation at the well for many days.

In the story of the lost son the characters are sketched to the life. The casual youngster who never realizes how badly he has treated his father till he swoons away with hunger, the puritanical elder brother who has no use for him, but calls him "thy son," the father who smothers his son's remorse with a welcoming kiss, and sets everyone in the house feasting and dancing because the ne'er-do-well has at last deigned to come home, all are alive. At the beginning of the story the father is on the point of retiring from the management of the farm, and vests profits and responsibilities equally in his two grown-up sons. When the younger of them disappoints him he would have to go back to work again. The hushes that the swine did eat (v. 16) were carob-pods, still counted a delicacy in the East, and known to schoolboys as "locust-beans" or "honey-beans." But there are sweet and bitter carobs; Tatian's Gospel-Harmony (second century, A.D.) has "carobs of the sea" (salt carobs); the nicely brought-up youth could not stomach bitter carobs, which are still given to cattle. Came to himself (v. 17) is a medical term, and means "came to his senses after fainting." The hired servants were poor relations, taken into the house and paid for menial service, members of the family, though not on a level with the children. Notice the contrast between the prodigal's limping walk and his father's running, and that the father does not allow him to say, "Make me as one of thy hired servants," but smothers the odious suggestion with a kiss (R.V.). He wants everything at once, ring (to show that he is still heir of what is left of the property), clothes, shoes, and fatted calf. This calf was taken from its mother and forcibly fattened for the table (only being given a rest on the Sabbath); it was kept for some great occasion. The music provided was the bag-pipes (in Old English, "symphony"—cf. Wycliffe's translation—now called "sawpion" in the Near East). The elder son is disgusted when he finds the house all lighted up and the proceedings in full blast; he has come from his work and is tired. The servant from whom he demands an explanation is glad that the young master has come home, but his ardor is soon damped when the elder brother refuses to come in. Then the father tries his hand, but does not know how to deal with the son who had stayed at home. While he is hesitating the young man airs his grievance: "I have been a perfect slave to you all these years." Jesus makes us sympathize with all his characters in turn; we know that the child who stays at home does sometimes get taken for granted. But even if he had cause for complaint, that of all days was not the day to bring it out! Only of another Elder Brother was it true that he never disobeyed one of the Father's commands, and that all that the Father had was his (cf. Jn. 17¹⁰); he did not grudge his brethren their welcome home, but went into the far country (cf. 19¹²) to live with them and die for them, to show them what home was like.

CHAPTER XVI

1-18. The Unjust Steward, and Some Sayings. (For vv. 14-18, cf. Mt. 531, 32 624 117-19; see also intro., p. 1029b.) This story from L has caused difficulty to Bible students, because it seems to involve an approval of dishonesty. Jesus is not holding the steward's conduct up to admiration, except in one particular. He is using a corrupt social order as an illustration, not setting his seal upon it. The steward is a "steward of injustice," not because he was dishonest, but because he was involved in a way of life which Jesus condemns without argument. He worked on commission, as all agents, including tax-collectors, did in the Levant until recent times. In other words, he was not paid a wage, but was expected to maintain himself out of the rent, part of which went into his own pocket, and part to the landlord. He was accused (v. 1), not of fraud, but mismanagement; sending for the books meant notice of dismissal. He was not robust enough to go on to the land, yet wished to retain his self-respect. So he called a meeting of tenants, two of whom were in arrears with their rent, which was paid in kind. Remitting his own share of the rent they owed, he knew he would earn their gratitude, not at the master's, but at his own expense. They, he calculated, would find him work, or hospitality, until he could get work for himself. He was a shrewd business man, who knew that friends go further than money.

We are all stewards, for the only independent capitalist in the universe is God. We are concerned, not with the ownership of material goods, such as money, health, time, etc., but with their circulation. Like the steward, we work on commission, being allowed to use a proportion of these good things for ourselves in return for service to the community. We are all set under authority, some people above us, others below us; we are not better than those who have less money, health, time, than we. We are unjust stewards; if our accounts were required for audit, they would not bear strict examination. In any case, we are all under notice of dismissal, as the steward was. What can we do? Jesus says, make friends with the people dependent upon us for the time being; before long we shall be dependent upon them. They will receive you into the eternal tents (v. 9) means that the friendship of those we have helped will be our lasting possession, while the money, health, time we give up to secure their friendship will not be ours for long anyhow. Life, as ordered by God, depends on giving and taking, and it is not selfishness, but humility, to be willing to make use of one another.

The Pharisees are charged by Luke, not by Jesus, with being lovers of money in v. 14; it does not appear that they were specially open to that accusation, whatever "devouring widows' houses" (Mk. 12⁴⁰) may mean. You are they who justify yourselves (v. 15) reminds us of 7²⁹ 10²⁹ 18¹⁴. The saying in v. 16 is found in a very different form in Mt. 11¹²; there it seems to mean, "John was the last of the prophets, and with him the days of violent preaching are over." Here, on the other hand, John is thought of as inaugurating a new era of pressure in which men must do violence upon themselves in order to enter the Kingdom. V. 17 is certainly from Q, corresponding closely to Mt. 51⁹. The other saying—about divorce—is nearer to Mk. 10¹¹, 12 than to either Mt. 5³² or 19⁹.

19-31. "Dives" and Lazarus. (See also intro., p. 1030.) This parable is connected with that of the unjust steward; both illustrate our dependence upon one another, the unjust steward in this life, "Dives" and Lazarus in the world beyond the grave. Here are two men traveling along the same road from birth to death, neither knowing how the other lives. What did "Dives" think about Lazarus? Perhaps he was sorry for him, and would have made a donation in support of some institution in which such poor creatures could be looked after; but why should he be planted on his doorstep? Lazarus was too far gone to think about "Dives" at all; he was there because guests at the rich man's table would use pieces of bread to wipe their fingers on and then toss them over their shoulders out of the open window into the road, where Lazarus would be waiting to catch them. So they pass their lives, daily within sight and sound of each other, but in different worlds. In course of time both men die, and the rich man is buried. Soon the undertaker's trappings are put away, and meanwhile Lazarus has disappeared. There is no one to bury him, so he is taken by the angels, who care for this world's unfortunates, to Abraham's bosom.

Paradise, according to contemporary belief, was situated in the third of the seven heavens (cf. 2 Cor. 12⁴), on the south side. There were Abraham and the patriarchs, but on the north side, parted from Paradise by a deep ravine, was the abode of the rich who had neglected their poor brethren. All this is figurative, but there must be truth behind it, or Jesus would not have used such imagery. "Dives" and Lazarus are still within sight and sound of each other, but Lazarus is in now and "Dives" is out. Like many rich people, "Dives" thinks that everyone is at his beck and call, and he remembers having seen Lazarus before, so he tries to claim acquaintance with him. But the gulf between the two has deepened; "Dives" would not cross then, now Lazarus cannot. Here is a state of affairs the commonness of which blinds us to its absurdity; two men living close together, but with a great gulf between them, and never a human word passing from one side to the other. Such barriers, easily surmounted at first, strengthen as time goes on. Vague dislikes become antipathies, antipathies harden into hatred. Yet God would not throw us continually together unless he meant us to make overtures to one another; he gives us a hint that we shall want a certain man some day by obtruding him upon our notice.

But Jesus never leaves us with a warning without opening a window of hope somewhere in the story. The name "Lazarus" (Eleazar) means the same thing as "Jesus"; the former may be translated "God has delivered," the latter, "Jehovah has saved." Do not the words, If one go to them from the dead make us think of One who did? Mohammedan writers tell us that there was no name which Jesus loved better than to be called "the poor man." Lazarus was a "poor man," while "Dives" and his brethren stand for the Jewish nation, who have Moses and the prophets. Like Lazarus, Jesus had not where to lay his head, and his friends were "poor outcasts of men, whose souls are despised." He accepted the patronizing invitations of the rich (7³⁶ 11³⁷ 14¹), willing to be fed with the scraps from the rich man's table. Soon he knows he is to die; the angels are waiting to take him home (Mt. 26⁵³), but what of the people he has come to save? The months are slipping by, their hearts are hardening, the great gulf is deepening. Can he reach them from that other side? Father Abraham, who represents orthodox Jewish eschatology, says, "No; when men die, their fates are fixed." Now they will not, then they cannot. But does this dogma settle the question when one of the two is Jesus? The early church had no doubt that, when Jesus died on the cross, he passed the barrier, broke into the prison where those who died in sin and unbelief lay, and preached the gospel to them (but cf. note on 1 Pet. 3¹⁹). We must leave it there; we can almost hear Jesus talking to himself, and can only state our faith that the cross must have a meaning for all men wherever they may be, that there is no part of his universe cut off from the saving ministry of Him who has "the keys of death and Hades" (Rev. 1¹⁸).

CHAPTER XVII

1-10. Some Sayings and a Parable of Service. See notes on 12⁴⁷, 48, 35, 36 13²⁵ Mt. 25¹⁻¹³ 18⁶⁻⁹, 15-22 Mk. 9⁴²⁻⁴⁸ and intro., p. 1030. Vv. 1, 2 must come from Q (cf. Mt. 18⁶, 7, though Matthew is there following Mark). V. 3, is puzzling; it looks a little like Mt. 18²¹, 22, but is differently turned. In Matthew, Peter is bidden to forgive his brother up to "seventy-seven times" (the best reading); here the disciple is bidden to forgive his brother "seven times in a day," if he professes repentance: there is no mention of penitence in Matthew. We must surely refer v. 3 to L. In the next verse we have the unusual phrase in narrative the apostles (v. 5); and the occurrence of the phrase the Lord (v. 6; see the note on 11³⁹) confirms our view that we are concerned here with oral tradition (in other words, with L). There follows the saying about faith as a grain of mustard-seed, but in a curious form. Mt. 17²⁰ 21²¹ has "say to this mountain," like Mk. 11²³ from which Mt. 21²¹ comes. Where has

Luke got his say to this sycamine tree from? As Mt. 17²⁰ comes from Q, we should infer that Q had "say to this mountain." Luke found the saying both in Q and in Mark connected in Mark with the cursing of the fig-tree; he omits the latter, but has worked the fig-tree into the saying! The little parable (from L) in vv. 7f. is almost the exact opposite of 12³⁷ (see note). We should drop out the word unprofitable (v. 10), and read "we are slaves; we have only done our duty."

11-19. The Grateful Samaritan. (See also intro., p. 1030.) Jesus is still going to Jerusalem, but is farther away than ever! This story comes from L, and appeals to Luke, who is interested in the Samaritans (cf. 9^{52f.} 10³³ Acts 8^{5f.}). Some excuse may be found for the nine; they would hurry off to obey the command to show themselves to the priests; the Samaritan would not go to Jerusalem at all. The sympathy of the foreigner Luke with this foreigner (v. 18) is unmistakable.

20-37. Prophecies of the Fall of Jerusalem. (Mt. 24²⁶⁻²⁸, 37-41 Mk. 13^{1f.}; see also intro., p. 1030.) Luke tends to apply (see on 13³⁴) sayings which in Matthew refer to the consummation of history at the Second Coming rather to historical events such as the fall of Jerusalem; here is a signal instance of his method. V. 20 comes from L: with observation means "when you are looking for it"; the first half of v. 21 is from Q (cf. Mt. 24²³), the second from L again. One of the sayings of Jesus found by Drs. Grenfell and Hunt at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt confirms the meaning within you. V. 22 also comes from L; the title Son of man is thus attested for all our Gospel-sources, Q, Mark, L, Proto-Matthew, and John (on these sources, see art., Structure of Synoptic Gospels, pp. 872-3). As this saying is addressed to the disciples, one is inclined to think that it refers to a regretful longing they will experience for the days of "the Jesus of history" rather than to disappointed expectation of the Second Coming. In vv. 23f. we are back again in Q; Luke uses in his day instead of "the coming of the Son of man" (Mt. 24²⁷); he deliberately avoids the word for "Second Coming." Vv. 25, 28, 29, 30, 32 come from L; they are not in Matthew. In Mk. 13¹⁴⁻¹⁶ ("the little apocalypse") as in Mt. 24^{17, 18} we have the same warning to flee from the doomed city, but Luke omits the passage about "the abomination of desolation" and "let him that readeth understand" (Mt. 24¹⁵ Mk. 13¹⁴). In v. 33 we have another version of a saying found six times in the Gospels (Mt. 10³⁹ 16²⁵ Mk. 8³⁵ Lk. 9²⁴ 17³³ Jn. 12²⁵)—each time in a slightly different form. Here we should translate: "Whoever wants to make his life his own shall lose it, and whoever loses it shall bring it to life again."

CHAPTER XVIII

1-14. Two Parables of Prayer. (See also intro., p. 1030.) The story of the unjust judge reminds us of that of the friend at midnight (11^{5f.}), the difference being that in the latter case the persistent neighbor was anxious to help a friend, while the widow insists on justice for herself. Here again we have an unforgettable picture: the termagant who will not be snubbed, patronized, or bullied by the cynical magistrate, whose only concern is for the maintenance of his dignity. Every day she gets more violent, until the old worldling says to himself, "Even though I don't care for God or man, yet because this widow keeps on bothering me, I shall have to redress her grievance, for I am afraid that in the end she will give me a black eye!" (Cf. v. 5 mg.) The last phrase is slang, used by Paul when he says, "I buffet my body" (1 Cor. 9²⁷). The magistrate is not seriously afraid of assault and battery in open court, but was afraid of a scene, by which his dignity would be so badly compromised that, whenever he sat there, people would remember how he was bearded by a widow! The A.V. "weary me" (v. 5) is due to the desire of the translators to avoid a colloquial phrase, and was suggested by the fact that when people are tired they have dark shadows under their eyes.

The verses (6-8) that follow are difficult. Their meaning seems to be that if a cynical magistrate can be forced to do the right thing by a woman who will not be put in her place, how much more will God listen to the prayers of his children? He is long-suffering in their case (v. 7); that is only because wrongs are not easily righted. In v. 8 Jesus seems to despair for a moment, not of the justice of God, but of the persistence of men. The faith (mg.) means "the right kind of faith." How swiftly light and shadow follow one another as we read this brightly colored and various Gospel! At one moment we are listening to a story bubbling over with humor, the next we are plunged into the dark, and Jesus is almost in despair!

The other story—that of the Pharisee and the publican (vv. 9-14)—gives us a picture of the wrong kind of shamelessness in prayer. What the Pharisee was saying aloud would be the prayer which every Jewish boy was taught, "My God, I thank thee I was not born a Gentile, but a Jew, not a slave, but a free man, not a woman, but a man"—cf. Gal. 3²⁸, where Paul contradicts the first prayer, clause by clause. What the Pharisee was saying: to himself (v. 11—"within himself") Jesus lets us overhear. Here are two men at prayer together; the Pharisee separates himself from his fellow worshiper, the publican feels himself desperately alone: "God," he says, "you might be friends with me, the outcast!" The man who holds himself aloof goes home unblest, the man who longs for fellowship is justified rather than the other.

In these parables all the people who keep away from their fellows come out badly: the rich fool who tried to be merry all by himself, the elder brother who would not come in, "Dives" who did not want Lazarus on his doorstep. On the other hand, Lazarus wants to be fed with the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table, the prodigal son, ne'er-do-well as he is, comes to himself and longs to get back home to the others, the unjust steward is eager to make friends, the publican mourns his loneliness, and these get the best of it. In nearly all these parables the same phrase recurs in different forms; the rich fool "reasoned within himself," the prodigal son "came to himself," the unjust steward "said within himself," the unjust judge "said within himself," and the Pharisee "prayed to himself."

15-30. The Coming of the Children and the Rich Young Ruler. (Cf. 2228-30 Mt. 19:13-30, notes; Mk. 10:13-31; intro., p. 1031.) In v. 15 Luke takes up Mark again, but the children are infants, the needle is a surgeon's needle (v. 25); both are medical terms. Luke also puts in wife among the possessions left behind by those who follow Jesus (v. 29; cf. note on 14:20), and has for the sake of the kingdom of God, where Mt. 19:29 has "for my name's sake," and Mk. 10:29 has "for my sake and the gospel's sake."

31-43. Another Prophecy of the Passion and the Healing of a Blind Beggar. (Mt. 20:17-19, 29-34; notes on Mt. 9:27-31 Mk. 10:32-34, 46, 52.) In vv. 31-34 we have an abbreviated version of Mk. 10:32f.; like Matthew, Luke alters the "after three days" of Mark—a colloquial expression for "in a day or two" (cf. Hos. 6:2 Lk. 13:33)—to the more precise phrase on the third day. Mark tells us that the blind man's name was Bartimæus, and that he received his sight when Jesus was leaving Jericho (10:46); Luke seems to be deliberately correcting him. He has also omitted the story of James' and John's request and its sequel (see Mk. 10:35f.).

CHAPTER XIX

1-10. The Story of Zacchæus. (See also intro., p. 1031.) In this section Luke deserts Mark again, giving us another story from L.

Who was the man little of stature—Zacchæus or Jesus? The last alternative is possible, as the text does not clearly say; if Jesus was little, it would be natural to get up into a tree over the road to get a sight of him in the crowd. Here and there in the Fathers there are hints that Jesus was of insignificant stature, but they may only involve an inference from "when we see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him" (Isa. 53:2). When Jesus went to the house of Zacchæus, for one new friend he made, he would lose many; we can hear the murmurs of the crowd: "Do you see with whom he has gone to stay? the richest profiteer in the town!" Jericho was the pantry of Judæa, and is still exceedingly fruitful; the chief publican there would be a very rich man. But, like many other wealthy men, he had a soft spot somewhere, and Jesus touched it. He would know what it would cost Jesus to be seen going home with him, and would be immensely proud to have such a guest. Like the publican in the parable he felt his position acutely, and his repentance was as thoroughgoing as we should expect. Jesus rewards him by calling him a son of Abraham (cf. 13:16), one of the "lost sheep" (Mt. 10:6) whom Jesus had come to seek and save (Mt. 18:11—omitted in R.V.—is not part of the true text of that Gospel, so v. 10 must be assigned to L.).

11-27. The Parable of the Pounds. (Mt. 25:14-30; see also intro., p. 1031.) In this section two parables from L appear to be combined; there is a double plot. One is concerned with a nobleman who went to a far country to claim a kingdom, while his fellow-citizens intrigued against him; the other with a master who left his slaves in charge of sums of money, and came back to settle up accounts with them. The latter of the two parables reminds us of the parable of the talents in Mt. 25:14f., but it can hardly come from the same source. In Matthew the slaves start with unequal opportunities (one has five talents, another two) and the successful slaves end with an equal reward, for the same words of commendation are bestowed upon both; in Luke they start with equal opportunities (each has a pound) and end with unequal rewards (one gets ten cities, another five). The reward of faithful service is greater responsibility (cf. 12:48). This parable is intertwined with another (vv. 12, 14, 27) referring to the fate of the Jews. One of the Herods, Archelaus, went to Rome in pursuance of his claim to Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa; he succeeded in getting the title of ethnarch, not of king, and exacted vengeance on the citizens of Antipatris, who had intrigued against him. Jesus is leaving the Jews to found a world kingdom, and the Jews will suffer for their rejection of his claim, as, indeed, they did.

28-48. The Triumphal Entry and Its Sequel. (Mt. 21:1-7 Mk. 11:1-11, 15-19.) In this section we come back at first to Mark again. In v. 37 Luke makes it plain that it was the disciples who shouted; he omits "Hosanna" (unintelligible to Theophilus); if he knew what it meant (it is equivalent to "God save the king"), he might have taken it as implying that, after all, Jesus did claim an earthly kingdom, the very thing Luke wished to avoid! He also leaves out (Mk. 11:10), "Blessed is the coming kingdom of our father David." He has Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest (cf. 21:4 "Glory in the highest, and peace on earth"). The words are a reproduction from the memory of an eyewitness of the confused cries of the disciples, for "peace," "heaven," "glory," and "the highest" are all ways of addressing God without using the sacred name. The impression grows upon us as we read that Luke is not solely reliant on Mark here; he has an independent account of the entry in L.

Vv. 39-44 are peculiar to Luke, though we have in Mt. 21:16 a complaint about the shouts of the children. V. 40 contains a reminiscence of Hab. 2:11, "the stone will cry out of the wall" (cf. Lk. 38). The very stones (v. 40) of this city of blood will protest if no one acclaims the coming of its king! Weeping over the city follows naturally, and this detail must have come from an eyewitness. The mind of Jesus is burdened not so much with his own sorrow as with the city's doom; his patriot heart is breaking. The fall of Jerusalem occupies a more prominent place in this Gospel than in the others (cf. also 21:24-26, 28, 35, 36 23:28-31). In the hurried description of the cleansing of the Temple, Luke is dependent on Mark (11:15-18).

CHAPTER XX

1-26. Disputation in the Temple and a Parable. See notes on Mt. 21:23-27, 33-46 22:15-22 Mk. 11:27-33 12:1-17. Here too Luke closely follows Mark. In v. 15 the wicked husbandmen cast the Son out of the vineyard, before they slay him; Mark has "slew him, and cast him out of the vineyard" (12:8). According to the best modern critical opinion, Matthew followed Mark in this detail; in our text he agrees with Luke (Mt. 21:39). If by the vineyard (cf. Isa. 51:1) is meant Palestine (Mt. 20:11), it would not be true to say that Jesus was cast out of the vineyard, and then slain. Luke thinks of the "vineyard" as Jerusalem, and so has altered the order, for Jesus suffered "outside the gate" (Heb. 13:12). In v. 16 we have, in Luke only, the exclamation translated God forbid! ascribed to the opponents of Jesus. Dr. J. H. Moulton pointed out that this is one of Paul's characteristic formulas (cf. Gal. 2:17 6:14, etc.) and inferred that his friend Luke wished to suggest that Saul of Tarsus was the leader of the chorus of protest on this occasion. He afterward became the chief expounder of the text, the quotation of which, if Moulton is right, roused his fierce resentment (cf. Rom. 9:33). In the rest of the section (except v. 18) Luke follows Mark closely.

27-47. More Discussions. (Mt. 22:23-46 23:1-12, notes; Mk. 12:18-40.) The most important difference from Mark to be found in this section comes in vv. 34, 35, and here Luke's preference for the celibate life betrays itself. Mk. 12:25 (cf. Mt. 22:30) has "when they rise from the dead" (Matthew, "in the resurrection" only); Lk. 20:34f. has "the sons of this world marry and are given in marriage, but those who are counted worthy to attain that age and the resurrection from the dead do not marry": this could be interpreted as "do not marry in this life." No doubt this was not meant, but Luke does not trouble to avoid the ambiguity. The words as found in Luke suggest also conditional immortality, i.e., immortality dependent upon fellowship with God (cf. 1 Cor. 15:50-58). Jesus refutes the Sadducees out of the Pentateuch (v. 37), their doctrine being that only the first five books of the Bible were in the fullest sense inspired.

CHAPTER XXI

1-38. The Widow's Mite and Prophecies of the City's Fall. See notes on Mt. 24:2-22, 29-36 25:31-46 Mk. 12:41-44 13:1-37. In the story of the widow's mite there is no change from Mark except that Luke heightens a little the pathos of the widow's poverty by a stronger word for poor. Then Luke follows Mark closely as far as v. 11, though for "not yet is the end" (Mk. 13:7) he has the end is not immediately (v. 9), and he adds epidemic diseases in v. 11 to the list of the coming woes. He also abbreviates the long description of portents in the sky (Mk. 13:24-26) to "there shall be fruitful and great signs from heaven" (v. 11). Vv. 12-17 roughly correspond to Mk. 13:9-13, though the order is different, and for "he that speaks is not you but the Holy Spirit" (Mk. 13:11) Luke has I will give you a mouth and wisdom, etc. (v. 15). This is a doublet in Luke (cf. 12:11, 12), but 12:12 is nearer than 21:15 to Mk. 13:11. As Mt. 10:19 is more general than either, it is possible that Lk. 12:12 comes from Mark, and that here Luke has turned from Mark to Q; vv. 18-22 which follow come from L. In v. 24 we have the phrase until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, which reminds us of Rom. 11²⁵ ("until the full complement of the Gentiles has come in"). The great mass of the Jews were to be left out of the Kingdom to make room for the Gentiles, but only for a time. Neither Jesus nor Paul could rest content with anything less than the salvation of his own people, for both were patriots. Vv. 25 and 26 are quite different from Mk. 13^{24, 25}, but in v. 27 we are back in Mark again (13²⁶) while v. 28 is peculiar to Luke. The word redemption (v. 28; see also intro., p. 1031) is not the same as that used in 238 242¹; there the narrower Jewish hope is meant; here the thought is nearer Rom. 8²³ ("the redemption of our body," i.e., "of society"). In Jewish eschatology the idea that the darkest hour must come before the dawn was deeply rooted; before the Messianic age must come "the Messianic woes" (see arts., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 188, 210; Backgrounds, p. 846). In vv. 29–33 we find Marcan material again, only the phrases and all the trees (v. 29) and the kingdom of God (v. 31) being peculiar to Luke. On the other hand vv. 34–36 are distinctive. After v. 36 it is generally agreed that Jn. 753–811 should come in, as they actually do in one important group of Greek MSS. (the "Ferrar" group; see p. 826a). They bear the marks of Luke's authorship, and certainly do not belong to the fourth Gospel at all. The story was also found in the "Gospel of the Hebrews," of which only a few fragments remain. Its right place is in Passion week; in v. 36 we read and to stand fast before the Son of man; in this story (Jn. 81¹¹) we hear of a sinful woman who did stand before the Son of man, while her critics were shamed away.

CHAPTER XXII

1–13. Preparations for the Last Supper. (Mt. 26¹⁻⁵, 14–20, notes on Mk. 14¹, 2, 10–16.) Luke omits the story of the anointing at Bethany, because he has already told us another story of the same kind from L (736^{f.}), but he follows Mark in his insertion of the betrayal by Judas at this point. He follows Mark too in what looks like a mistake in v. 7 (Mk. 14¹², note). The paschal lamb was normally killed on the afternoon of 14th Nisan, which would last that year (probably 29 A.D.) till 6 P.M. on Friday (i.e., on Friday afternoon). The fourth Gospel makes it clear that the paschal lamb had not been eaten when Jesus was being tried (Jn. 18²⁸). That must have been so, for it is incredible that the crucifixion could have taken place on Saturday. Both Paul (1 Cor. 5⁷) and John (19³⁶) think of Jesus as himself the Paschal Lamb; in that case his death would have taken place on Friday afternoon, as all Christendom has always believed. It has been said that in special circumstances it was regarded as permissible to eat the paschal lamb on the evening before, and that this was the case here. But the suggestion is beset with difficulties, and it is more likely that the association of the Last Supper with the pass-over meal itself was a mistake, and that the fourth Gospel has deliberately and rightly corrected Mark on this question (see art., Chronology of N.T., p. 875, for these various points). Canon Box has told us lately that it was customary for rabbis and their pupils to meet on the eve of great feast-days, and greet the coming of 6 P.M. with a simple meal of bread and wine and the passing round of the loving-cup; this pre-Christian lovefeast (the "Qiddush") was the meal of which Jesus partook on Thursday evening; there is no mention of a lamb or of bitter herbs in our accounts. Luke alone tells us that Peter and John were the two disciples sent to make preparations; otherwise he follows Mark closely here.

14–38. The Last Supper. (Mt. 26²¹⁻³⁵, notes on Mk. 14¹⁷⁻³¹; see also intro., p. 1031.) In the account of the Supper itself Luke is divergent from Mark; his informant must have been one of the Twelve, or perhaps the host of the evening; here, as in Gethsemane, we probably have John the son of Zebedee's account. Vv. 15, 16 are peculiar to Luke, and possibly support Box's theory (see under vv. 1–13): "I longed earnestly to eat this Passover with you before I suffer, but I have been disappointed, and I will not eat of it till it finds its fulfillment in the kingdom of God." Mark (14²⁵) tells us that Jesus said he would not drink of the fruit of the vine, but says nothing about not eating the Passover. Some editors print v. 15 as a question, "Have I earnestly desired?" etc., the answer expected being "No." In our text as it stands there are two cups (vv. 17, 20). but it is practically certain that vv. 19, 20 (see R.V., mg.) should be excised from this Gospel. They are absent from many of our earliest authorities, and their presence in later texts is due to the fact that the actual words of institution were wanting in Luke, and they were inserted from 1 Cor. 11^{23f.} This reduces the number of our authorities for the institution of the Eucharist from four to three (Mark, Matthew, Paul) but weakens little, if at all, the evidence for its historicity. V. 21 certainly follows v. 18 admirably: "I will not drink of the fruit of the vine [the loving-cup] . . . because the hand of the traitor is with me at the table."

In the verses which follow there are many details which remind us of Mark-Matthew, but Luke is clearly independent. It is strange that the Twelve should have been disputing about precedence at the Last Supper itself; one can only think that Judas covered his retreat by starting again the old question, "Who is the first?" In Mark-Matthew, much of the material found here comes in connection with the request of James and John, which is dropped altogether by Luke (Mk. 10^{42f}. Mt. 20^{25f}.). There is an obvious connection between the words in v. 27 and the story of the feet-washing (Jn. 13^{1f}.), which perhaps comes from the host of the evening. After I am among you as the one that waits on table (v. 27) the Western text beautifully adds, "and you have grown while I waited upon you to be like the servant."

Vv. 28-30 are peculiar to Luke, except the last clause, which comes from Q (cf. Mt. 19²⁸). It is like Jesus to tell them, at the last moment at which it was true, that they had been with him in his trials; in Gethsemane they could not stay with him any longer, or "watch with him one hour."

Vv. 31, 32 also come from L; Jesus begins by addressing Simon, his name being twice repeated (cf. 10⁴¹), but goes on to speak of all of them ("Satan has desired to have you"), then comes back to Simon ("I have prayed for thee"), and passes on to the others ("strengthen thy brethren"). They were all to go astray; it was enough that he should pray for Peter, for, when Peter turned, they would all turn. Peter would turn by and by, but Jesus "turned" first (22⁶¹); just as we are to pray to escape from all that is coming (21³⁶ 22⁴⁰), but Jesus prays for us (22³², 40); we are to "dig and go deep" (6⁴⁸), and Jesus digs about us (13⁸); we are to "agonize" (13²⁴), and he is in agony for us (22⁴⁴).

Vv. 35-38 are also peculiar to Luke. When they went out on their earlier missionary tours (9^{1f}.) they did not need to provide for or defend themselves; every door was open to them, because they were his. Now every door would be shut in their faces precisely for the same reason. Jesus is now "numbered among outcasts" (Isa. 53¹²). This passage may be taken in one of two ways: (1) It may be taken literally. Jesus is telling his disciples that they must be prepared to defend themselves if necessary, though not to defend him (cf. Mt. 26⁵²). They were not ready for martyrdom yet, and had not done their work. In any case he would have them leave him, and keep out of danger. (2) The other explanation is profounder. If they decide to defend themselves by force, the time will come when they will have to sell the very clothes off their backs to buy weapons. They do not understand him—how could they?—and think he is appealing to them for protection. Lord, here are two swords, they say, and he replies, Let it go at that. The second explanation is more convincing.

39-53. The Agony in the Garden and the Arrest. (Mt. 26³⁶⁻⁵⁶, notes on Mk. 14³²⁻⁵²; intro., p. 1031.) Luke is here quite independent; did this story in L come from John the son of Zebedee, like that of the transfiguration? It must have come from one of the three, and it was not Peter, for Peter's story is in Mark. Luke emphasizes, as we should expect, the command of Jesus to pray (vv. 40, 46): Mark-Matthew have "watch and pray"; Luke has simply pray. He does not tell us that only Peter, James, and John were allowed to enter the garden. Vv. 43, 44 do not appear in some early MSS. (see R.V., mg.) and their authenticity has been questioned. But we can more easily understand their being omitted than their being inserted, for many early Christians would be disturbed by the idea that the Son of God could be in such agony at the prospect of death. If we can find any good reason why early readers should question the genuineness of a passage we ought to retain it in our text, for the probabilities are that it would be deleted as needlessly disturbing in the days before the text was settled. Moreover, the medical language of v. 44 confirms us in the view that it was written by Luke; we should translate, not drops of blood, but "clots of blood." Sleeping after sorrow (v. 45) hints at a kindly excuse for the three, quite in Luke's manner; he makes Jesus kneel in Gethsemane (v. 41), whereas in Mark-Matthew he "falls" (Mt. 26³⁹ says "on his face," Mk. 14³⁵ says "on the ground"). Kneeling was the Greek mode in prayer; Jews stood, or, in deep emotion, prostrated themselves in prayer. Stephen (Acts 7⁶⁰) kneels; cf. Eph. 3¹⁴, where Paul is writing to Gentile Christians.

V. 48 is in Luke only; according to Mt. 26⁵⁰ Jesus said to Judas, "Comrade, why are you here?" The healing of the servant of the high priest's ear is also recorded by Luke alone (v. 51), and the same is true of his last sad words as Jesus is being led away (v. 53); they are strangely in the Johannine manner.

54-65. Peter's Denial. (Mt. 26⁵⁷⁻⁷⁵, notes on Mk. 14⁶⁶⁻⁷²; see also intro., p. 1032.) Here again Luke is quite independent of Mark. In Mk. 14⁶⁷, ⁶⁹ the same girl challenges Peter twice, while Mt. 26⁷¹ tells us that his second assailant was "another girl." In Luke, on the other hand, first a girl, then two men in turn attack him, nor are we told that his dialect betrayed him; Theophilus would not be interested in the Galilean dialect. It is more important that in Luke alone Jesus, here called the Lord (v. 61), turns and looks at Peter, casting upon him the searching glance which made his first meeting with the Master of his soul memorable (Jn. 142); in these two looks is written the history of Peter.

66-71. The Trial Before the Sanhedrin. (Mt. 26⁵⁷⁻⁶⁸, notes on Mk. 14⁵³⁻⁶⁵; see also intro., p. 1032.) V. 67 is found in Luke alone, again strangely in the Johannine manner. What does If I ask (v. 68) mean? What was he to ask? Luke omits the Marcan, "I am," in reply to the high priest's challenge (Mk. 14⁶²), but in v. 70 he has "you say that I am." Mt. 26⁶⁴ has "Thou hast said"; Mk. 14⁶² "I am"; Lk. 22⁷⁰ "you say that I am," a combination of Mark and Matthew. At any rate, we have strong evidence that Jesus did not say simply "I am," for it must be remembered that here Matthew and Luke are independent authorities; there is no question of Q. This is important, for nowhere but in Mk. 14⁶² does Jesus in so many words call himself "the Christ" (see, however, Mk. 9⁴¹, which also is altered by Matthew and Luke). It is difficult to believe that he would have done so on this single occasion. Doctor Abrahams has argued that "Thou sayest," "Thou hast said," "You say" do not mean "Yes" or "No," but something between the two. The idiom, which is purely Semitic, is found also in Mt. 26²⁵ Jn. 18³⁷ Lk. 23³; in all three cases for one reason or another Jesus wishes to avoid giving a direct answer. In the first of them he repeats the words of Judas' question, "Rabbi, surely it is not I?" and answers, "Surely not, Judas!" and in the second "The 'King of the Jews,' you say; I have been born for this . . . to bear witness to the truth." We may then understand Lk. 22⁶⁷⁻⁶⁹ to mean, "You say, 'the Christ': I say, 'the Son of man.'"

CHAPTER XXIII

1-25. Trials Before Pilate and Herod. See notes on Mt. 27¹¹⁻²⁶ Mk. 15¹⁻¹⁵ and intro., p. 1032. We have an interesting various reading in v. 2. Marcion's edition of this Gospel adds two clauses to the list of charges against Jesus; they are, "and destroying the law and the prophets . . . and leading astray the women and the children." For the first of these clauses, cf. Mt. 5¹⁷, a repudiation of the charge; the second looks as if it might be authentic, for the influence of Jesus over women is often emphasized by Luke. In v. 3 we notice the formula Thou sayest, again; at this point Luke confirms Jn. 18³⁷. Luke is evidently independent of Mark through the whole of this section. In v. 5 (cf. 444 717) Judaea stands for the whole of Palestine, including Galilee. The trial before Herod (v. 7) is recorded by Luke alone; he had special information about Herod and his court (cf. 83 Acts 13¹). The only time that Jesus was "clothed in a glorious robe" came when he was in a king's palace (cf. 725), just as the only time he was with the rich was when he was buried (Isa. 53⁹). Luke transfers the mockery of Jesus from the Roman soldiers (Mk. 15¹⁷) to Herod's court: this may be a correction with knowledge. He also makes the people of their own motion declare for Barabbas; Mark says that "the chief priests stirred them up" (15¹¹). According to Luke, three times over did Pilate assert his belief in the innocence of the prisoner; in the same way three officials in succession pronounced Paul guiltless of any offense against public order (Acts 23²⁹ 26³¹, 32). Throughout his Passion story the evangelist is concerned to throw the chief blame for the murder of Jesus upon the Jews; notice the phrases in v. 25, "him that for sedition and murder had been cast into prison, whom they were asking for," and cf. Acts 23⁶ ("ye crucified") and Acts 3¹⁴ ("ye denied . . . ye asked for a murderer").

26-49. The Crucifixion. (Mt. 27³²⁻⁵⁶, notes on Mk. 15²²⁻⁴¹ and intro., p. 1032.) One is tempted to look for Luke's chief authority for his wonderful story of the cross to Simon of Cyrene, who afterward, apparently, became a Christian (Mk. 15²¹; cf. Rom. 16¹³). If "Simeon who was called Niger" (Acts 13¹) was the same person (his nickname, "Niger," or, as we should say, "colored," suggests Africa, and we have "Lucius of Cyrene" as the next name in the list of "prophets and teachers" at the Syrian Antioch), he must have been thrown into close contact with Luke, who was once (see p. 1023a) a member of that church, and afterward moved to Philippi. Another suggestion that has found some favor is that Luke's authority was Saul of Tarsus himself; he was a pupil of Gamaliel (Acts 22³), who was teaching in Jerusalem at that time; his interest in Pharisaism and in Jesus' attacks upon it would naturally bring him to Calvary, if he was in Jerusalem then, and he might well have been present at the trial before Pilate (cf. also note on 20¹⁶). The parallels between the Lucan story of the Passion and that of the martyrdom of Stephen are striking (cf. Lk. 23³⁴ and Acts 7⁶⁰; Lk. 23⁴⁶ and Acts 7⁵⁹—in both cases Jesus is to Stephen what "the Father" is to Jesus), and we know that Saul was present at Stephen's martyrdom. May he not have drawn his friend's attention to the parallel? Moreover, in 1 Tim. 11³ Paul applies the words of Lk. 23³⁴ to his own case; he, like the dying robber, had been "crucified with Christ" (Gal. 220), and caught up to Paradise (2 Cor. 12⁴), and Luke alone tells us the story of the penitent robber!

The seven words from the cross are as follows:

(1) "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do" (Lk. 23³⁴); (2) "Woman, behold thy son . . . behold thy mother" (Jn. 19^{26, 27}); (3) "To-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise" (Lk. 23⁴³); (4) "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Mk. 15³⁴ Mt. 27⁴⁶); (5) "I thirst" (Jn. 19²⁸); (6) "It is finished" (Jn. 19³⁰); (7) "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit" (Lk. 23⁴⁶). The only one of the seven sayings reported by Mark-Matthew is (4), the cry of despair, which, we are told, was uttered in a loud voice. Galilean friends and followers of Jesus were standing at some distance (Lk. 23⁴⁹), and so would only hear what was said in a loud voice. Mark-Matthew report another loud cry, but their authorities could not make out what was said then (Mk. 15³⁷ Mt. 27⁵⁰). This is just what we should have expected, for the first and second Gospels come from the Galilean circle.

The omission of the cry of despair from Luke and John sets us a more difficult problem. In John it may be accounted for by the absence of the "disciple whom Jesus loved," who would be engaged in taking Mary home (Jn. 19²⁷). Luke perhaps could not bring himself to believe that Jesus had felt himself forsaken in the hour of his direst need.

Other details peculiar to Luke are the wailing of the women on the way up the hill, and the words of Jesus to them (vv. 27f.), with the saying about the green and the dry tree (v. 31). It is characteristic of Luke to find a redeeming feature in the behavior of women, and of Jesus even then to be thinking of other people's future troubles rather than his own present sorrows. As he moved up the hill the trees were all in leaf; if this could be done in the spring, what will happen when winter comes? The reference to that terrible last winter before the city fell is obvious (vv. 28f.).

The great saying, Father, forgive them (v. 34), faces us with a more difficult problem, for it is absent from some of the oldest MSS., like 22, 44 (see art., Transmission of N.T., p. 860). Evidence for its authenticity may be found in Acts 31⁷, but an even stronger argument has been based upon the fact that the words were always taken in antiquity as applying to the Jewish murderers of Jesus, not specially to the Roman soldiers who carried out the crucifixion. In that case we can understand how the words came to be dropped, for it would be argued that the fall of Jerusalem proved that the Jews had not been forgiven; it followed that Jesus could not have prayed for them, for the prayers of Jesus must have been answered. Like 22^{43, 44} (see note) these verses can confidently be kept in the text, for it is far easier to account for their omission than for their insertion after the doom of the Jews had come upon them. Jesus had found in "hypocrisy," which in the Gospels means not so much conscious insincerity as self-delusion, the most insuperable obstacle in his way. Now, so to speak, he turns it inside out, and sees it as his ground of hope for humanity. Men are not all bad, even when they crucify Christ; they are tragically mistaken, and delusions cannot last forever.

In the rest of v. 34 there is another dramatic touch; the Jews stand beholding, while Gentile soldiers divide between them the garments of Jesus. Looking on then, as they had got into the habit of doing (Zech. 12¹⁰), the Jews have been fated to be spectators of the world's history ever since. In v. 35 we have a word which, as used of Jesus, is peculiar to this Gospel; it is the chosen one (cf. 935).

The story of the dying malefactor (v. 39)—or, rather, as we ought to render the word, "revolutionist" (cf. Jn. 10⁸ 18⁴⁰, where the word "robber" has the same meaning)—is Luke's greatest contribution to the Passion story, whether his informant was Simon of Cyrene, the centurion, or Paul. His traditional name was Dysmas, and he probably came from Galilee; we can reconstruct the outline of his biography from the records of that distressful time, when bands of irregulars harassed the Roman legions as they marched along the defiles of Galilee, swooping down from the hills on their rear, doing as much damage as they could, and then taking to their heels. In the company of an older and more callous companion, Dysmas had sunk lower and lower, until he had been caught red-handed in an act of brigandage and condemned, as all political prisoners were, to the cross. How did he come to think of Jesus as a king? Perhaps he had been present at the trial, awaiting his turn; in any case, he would have seen the superscription, "This is Jesus the king of the Jews," over the cross. When they are near death, men's minds work rapidly, and possibly he had heard in his boyhood that the king when he came would be rejected and killed by the wicked rich, and afterwards come again in glory (cf. Isa. 53 Zech. 12¹⁰). We cannot be sure of this, however, for it is not certain, though it may be regarded as likely, that the idea of a suffering Messiah is older in Judaism than the second century A.D., when it first explicitly appears in its literature. However the dying man reached his conclusion, Jesus welcomed it, and was ready with one last effort to lift the lost sheep out of his despair to Paradise before he sank himself. With what delight he must have greeted the prospect of having a man with him on the other side, for he had not fallen out of love with human nature yet! Like every other unprejudiced person in the Gospel, Dysmas acquits Jesus of any crime against the civil power.

In v. 44 Luke's language seems to suggest an eclipse of the sun; this, of course, would be impossible at full moon. The other Gospels use more guarded language, and their testimony is to be preferred here. Luke passes over the forsaken cry during the hours of darkness, a cry which, following so soon after the rescue of Dysmas, poignantly illustrates the words "He saved others; himself he cannot save." For the rending of the veil (v. 45) there is an interesting parallel in rabbinical writings, where we read that forty years before the destruction of the Temple, at the passover, the doors of the Temple swung open of their own accord. Evidently, some unusual event at this Passover was long remembered (see notes on Mk. 15³³⁻⁴¹).

After his despair Jesus rallies again to commit his spirit to his Father's keeping in the words of Psa. 31⁵. Mt. 27⁵⁰ ("let his spirit go") and Jn. 19³⁰ ("gave up his spirit") suggest the same idea, though the thought in Matthew is that he gave up his spirit to men, in John that he gave it up to God; once again Luke and John are associated together (cf. Lk. 22^{53, 67}). The centurion's confession (v. 47) tallies with Mt. 27⁶⁴ Mk. 15³⁹, for a "son of God" (Matthew-Mark) and "a righteous man" were synonymous terms in current Jewish language (the theological interpretation was to come later); but the belated repentance of the crowds who came to see this sight (v. 48) is recorded by Luke alone.

50-56. The Burial of Jesus. (Mt. 27⁵⁷⁻⁶¹, notes on Mk. 15⁴²⁻⁴⁷.) Here Luke comes back to Mark for a little while. The only difference is that in Luke the women prepare the spices before 6 P.M., while in Mk. 16¹ they wait till the Sabbath is over (Saturday 6 P.M.) before they buy them. Luke also tells us that no one had ever yet been laid in the tomb in which Jesus was buried (Jn. 19⁴¹ confirms this detail). Evidently, Joseph buried Jesus very hurriedly.

CHAPTER XXIV

For special interpretative notes on ch. 24, see the introduction, p. 1033a.

1-12. Resurrection Day: Morning. See notes on Mt. 28¹⁻¹⁰ Mk. 16¹⁻⁸. Discrepancies between the resurrection-narratives are serious, but not greater than we should expect, for, at a time of such wild excitement, there would be a happy incoherence, and everybody would be talking at once, as fresh witnesses to the truth of the amazing news came pouring in. We should have been properly suspicious of convenience in a made-up tale if everybody had agreed as to the detail of what actually happened. (See art., Miracles of N.T., p. 930.) According to Mark, the women saw "a young man clothed in white"; according to Matthew, they saw an angel; according to Luke, "two men in gleaming robes" (Mk. 16⁵ Mt. 28² Lk. 24⁴); the simplest account is probably nearest the truth. Why seek the living among the dead? (v. 5) and the inclusion of Joanna—probably Luke's informant—among the witnesses are peculiar to Luke; from Joanna perhaps comes the lifelike touch of resentment at the skepticism of the men (v. 11; the "Lewis" Syriac version has "as if they had spoken out of their wonder"—an unmistakable suggestion of hysteria). V. 12 is to be excluded on textual grounds (like 22^{19, 20}); it probably comes from Jn. 20³¹.

13-35. Resurrection Day: Afternoon. The traditional site of Emmaus is a long way from Jerusalem, and can only be reached by road nowadays by a long twenty-five mile detour. But there is a rough and difficult path which provides a much shorter route, longer, however, than the sixty furlongs (v. 13) mentioned by Luke. The two friends (some traditions say they were a man and his wife) were arguing hotly, and were "throwing words at one another" when the stranger overtook them, for they are still unconvinced by the story of the women. In v. 18 we should render their surprised question, "Have you no friends in Jerusalem?" or "Do you lodge all by yourself in Jerusalem?" V. 21 reveals in a flash how little the rank and file of his disciples understood Jesus even now; they are still harping on their hopes of a national Redeemer; that was perhaps why their eyes were holden. When they get to Emmaus they press the stranger to come in; like the Jesus of Galilee (Mk. 6⁴⁸), he will never force himself upon anyone, but waits for an invitation. Only when he takes the head of the table, breaks the bread, and repeats his familiar blessing over it do they recognize him. Perhaps they had not caught sight of the nail-prints on his hands before, or perhaps no one else did the honors of the table in quite the same way. Directly they recognized him he vanished out of their sight (v. 31). It is still the same with us; when we try to keep him to ourselves we lose him. They had to go back and join the others before they could see him again (for the same idea cf. Jn. 20¹⁷ Mt. 28¹⁰). Forgetting their weariness, they return over the rough, dark path to Jerusalem, and find the others still up. But before they can tell their great news the others break out with, The Lord is really risen; he has appeared to Simon (v. 34, and cf. 1 Cor. 15⁵). It was just like him to find time to visit broken-hearted Peter. For another suggestion of the risen Lord's special regard for Peter, cf. the mention of his name separately in Mk. 16⁷. In v. 32 there are three beautiful readings: "burning," "veiled," and "burdened." The subject of the unknown traveler's discourse on the road is the same as it was in Jerusalem later on in the evening—the doctrine of the suffering Messiah, illustrated from the O.T.

36-53. Resurrection Day: Evening. V. 40, like v. 12, does not belong to the best text; like v. 12, it comes from the fourth Gospel (Jn. 20²⁰). It is surprising that even now the disciples need so much convincing, but this very fact tells strongly in favor of the authenticity of the story, for, in a manufactured narrative, recognition would have been instantaneous. Just as on the road earlier in the day, Jesus preaches a sermon to them from the O.T. Before the publication of any of our N.T. books, someone (perhaps Matthew the publican) made an anthology of O.T. texts, interpreted as referring to Jesus, for the benefit of Christian preachers and teachers, and for many years this collection of "Testimonies against the Jews," as it was called, provided an armory for the defense and propagation of the gospel; it was used by all N.T. writers, including Paul himself, and so must have been written very soon after the resurrection. This idea must surely have originated with Jesus; Jn. 2²² states in so many words that the disciples did not understand "the Scriptures" (i.e., the O.T.) till Jesus was risen, and Paul's first line of defense (cf. 1 Cor. 15^{3, 4}) was the O.T. Probably, then, Luke is substantially right when he tells us that this was what Jesus busied himself with on Resurrection day—he explained the O.T. The O.T. will always keep its place in our Bible if only for the reason that it meant so much to Jesus (Mk. 14⁴⁹ Mt. 26⁵⁴ 51¹⁸); indeed, we cannot understand him fully without its help; only, we must read it through his eyes.

The words and was carried up into heaven (v. 51) cannot have been part of the original Gospel, for they not only flatly contradict Matthew and John—both describe subsequent appearances—but also Acts 1³. The ascension cannot have taken place on the evening of Resurrection day, and the Western text saves Luke from very serious self-contradiction by omitting these words, together with "he was taken up" in Acts 12. In the second part of his work, not in his first, Luke described the ascension.

(For a note on the theory of the composition of Luke-Acts suggested by the treatment in this commentary, see intro., pp. 1023-5; and for a note on the special significance of this Gospel for our interpretation of Jesus Christ, see intro., pp. 1025-33.)

JOHN

BY PRINCIPAL ALFRED E. GARVIE

INTRODUCTION

Comparison with Other Gospels. Any careful reader of the Gospels will at once be struck by the likeness to one another of Matthew, Mark, and Luke on the one hand, and the unlikeness to them of John on the other, and a closer scrutiny only confirms the impression. These three Gospels are called the Synoptic, because they give a common view of the ministry of Jesus, almost entirely different from that of the fourth. In those, the ministry is placed in Galilee and surrounding regions, except in the last week in Jerusalem; in this, with the exception of a few incidents, the ministry is exercised at Jerusalem at the great feasts. In those, the ministry might be confined to one year; in this, it must have extended over at least three Passovers. In those, Jesus calls his disciples from their fishings at the Sea of Galilee; in this, he calls them from following John to join him beside the Jordan. In those, the cleansing of the Temple is at the end; in this, at the beginning of the ministry. In those, the Last Supper takes place at the time when the Passover is being celebrated; in this, on the evening before, and Jesus is on the cross when the Passover lamb is being slain. In those, most of Jesus' teaching is in short sayings of—as Wendt describes them—"popular intelligibility and impressive pregnancy" (The Teaching of Jesus, vol. i, p. 109), in proverbs and parables; in this, the teaching is generally in long discourses, and sustained argument, sometimes of perplexing subtlety. In those, the tone of controversy is subordinate; in this, predominant. In those, the kingdom of God (Mark and Luke) or the kingdom of heaven (Matthew) is the principal theme; in this, the person of Jesus as not only the Christ, but as even the Son of God. Matthew and Luke begin with the stories of the infancy; Mark with the baptism of John; John with what is generally known as the Prologue, the description of the eternal Word of God and his manifestation in time. Those three begin on the plane of human history; this one begins on the heights of divine reality. Luke in his preface indicates the purpose of his careful research in his address to the most excellent Theophilus, "that thou mightest know the certainty concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed" (14). John in his conclusion states regarding his selection of the signs done by Jesus, "These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name" (20³¹). The one has a historical, the other a doctrinal purpose, although common to both are the religious interest and motive. Can such diverse representations of the same life be both accurate? If we accept the Synoptics as historical, must we reject the fourth Gospel as unhistorical?

The Historical Value of the Fourth Gospel.

The complex character of the fourth Gospel excludes the two extreme solutions of the problems of its historicity, namely, that on the one hand this Gospel can be regarded as accurate historical narrative to the same extent as the Synoptics, and that, on the other hand, history is so manipulated in the interest of doctrine that we must set it aside as mainly if not altogether unhistorical. Westcott's The Gospel of St. John may be mentioned as an instance of the one extreme; and Ernest F. Scott's The Fourth Gospel as illustrating the other. An intermediate position is possible which assigns to this Gospel a greater historical value than most scholars have in recent years allowed to it, and seeks to do justice to all the evidence which can be offered of the subordination of history to doctrine in the purpose of the author. A writing has a double reference in time, the time about which it is written, and the time in which it is written, and so also of place. Even a modern historian cannot so completely transport himself to another age and another land as to conceal altogether when and where he writes. An ancient historian never regarded it to be his duty so to transport himself. In regard to this Gospel, the one reference is to Jerusalem in the fourth decade, the other to Ephesus in the last decade of the first century. The question to which divergent answers are being given is this: Which of these two references is the more important for our interpretation and valuation of the Gospel? Has the author more to tell us about the Judæan past or the Ephesian present of his writing? It is conceded that the author shows, or at least appears to show, a familiarity with Jerusalem in the time of the ministry of Jesus; is the explanation offered by Scott adequate, when he states that "apart from its allegorical value, the picturesque detail in John's narrative can be set down, not to the accurate memory of the eyewitness, but to the fine instinct of the literary artist"? (Op. cit., p. 19.) Is it not preferable to find here a confirmation of the belief that much in the Gospel goes back to an eyewitness? It may be admitted that there is much in the doctrinal development of the Gospel which finds its more probable setting in the Ephesus of the last decade than in the Jerusalem of the fourth; but does that justify the assumption of the one setting when the other is at least as probable? Is it not more reasonable to treat as historical what there is not convincing reason to regard otherwise? Some considerations can be advanced to justify an unprejudiced inquiry regarding the historical value of the Gospel.

1. The Account of the Ministry of Jesus Incomplete. Without depreciating the historical value of the Synoptic Gospels it may be urged that they give an incomplete account of the ministry of Jesus. The historical framework of Matthew and Luke is supplied by Mark; and according to a trustworthy tradition he reported what Peter had preached about Jesus (see p. 997). Peter's interest as a Galilæan would be in the Galilæan ministry. That he makes no mention of a Judæan ministry prior to Passion Week is no evidence that such a ministry did not take place, as we are not compelled to assume that he was always with Jesus when he passed beyond Galilee and the neighboring regions. The sources from which the other material used in Matthew and Luke comes carry no guarantee of adequacy or completeness. The character of the Synoptic Gospels does not exclude the possibility of words and works which they do not record, and a longer ministry. "The chronology of the life of Christ," says Canon Streeter, "is simply a question of Mark against John" (The Four Gospels, p. 424, The Macmillan Company), and "the Johannine chronology solves more difficulties than it raises" (ibid., p. 421).

2. Evidence that the Account is Incomplete. This possibility seems to be turned into a probability, if not a certainty, by this consideration. We think of Christ as World Saviour and Lord: he came and offered himself to the Jewish people as the Messiah. Would the offer have been adequate if made for many months in the province of Galilee, despised by the Judæans, and only for at most three weeks in Jerusalem? Is it not in the highest degree probable that he made his appeal to the nation, when the largest number could be reached from all parts of the world, as at the great feasts, just as the fourth Gospel records? This consideration should have decisive weight for the historicity of the chronological framework and local setting of the fourth Gospel.

3. Further Evidence from the Synoptic Record. The Synoptic record of Passion Week (or weeks) lends confirmation to this conclusion. Would a previous ministry exercised in Galilee have provided an adequate cause for the extreme hostility of the Jewish rulers, and their reckless determination to rid themselves of Jesus? Does not their conduct become more intelligible if it were preceded by a series of controversies of increasing acuteness, such as the fourth Gospel presents to us? Is not Jesus' lament over Jerusalem robbed of all its pathos if he had not made any more effort to gather "her children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings" (Mt. 23³⁷) than the Synoptics record? Do not the words "how often" suggest more than one visit? This evidence in favor of the representation of the fourth Gospel cannot be lightly set aside.

4. Historicity of the Supplementary Material. If, as has just been shown, the fourth Gospel can be regarded, even on Synoptic evidence, as supplementing the historical testimony of the other Gospels, although the recording of biography or history is not its primary intention, we need not assume that in "the signs" reported the Gospel is very freely handling, modifying for its own purpose at will, Synoptic material. The narrative in Jn. 4⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴ need not be regarded as a variant of Lk. 7²⁻¹⁰; nor that of Jn. 5²⁻⁹ of Mk. 2¹⁻¹². A convincing proof of identity in the second instance is not supplied by the use in both records of the words, "Arise, take up thy bed," and of the vulgar word Kraballon, which Matthew and Luke both avoid. (See Estlin Carpenter, The Johannine Writings, pp. 381, 382.) Whether literary dependence is involved is another matter. So we may further ask, Is it certain that there can have been only one cleansing of the Temple, or may not the one have been a prophetic challenge at the beginning, the other a Messianic claim at the end of the ministry? Is it incredible that there were two anointings—the one Luke records (7³⁶⁻⁵⁰) and the other reported in Mt. 26⁶⁻¹³ Mk. 14³⁻⁹ and Jn. 12¹⁻⁸, even if, as Canon Streeter maintains, John's report of the one incident was influenced by Luke's record of the other? (Op. cit., p. 402.) Even if John had access to and was familiar with the Synoptic Gospels, any literary dependence which can be proved does not exclude the probability of his having other sources of information which he regarded as equally trustworthy. And, if there were a Judæan as well as a Galilæan ministry, similar events may have taken place, similar cures have been wrought, and similar words spoken.

5. The Author's Influence on His Own Ma- terial. Canon Streeter, after a careful scrutiny, reaches the conclusion that John did not use Matthew and that, even if he knew the Gospel, he refused to accept it as apostolic because of its apocalyptic and Judaistic sayings. He is certain that John used Mark, because, although only one fifth of the words are the same, yet "he often reproduces some of the more out-of-the-way phrases of Mark." He bases his argument for the literary dependence of John on Luke on those instances in which John supplements Luke in supplying particulars of persons and places mentioned less definitely in Luke. Not so certain, but probable in his view, is the dependence, not on a Proto-Luke only, but on our Luke also (op. cit., pp. 395-426). It is difficult not to regard such an argument as Canon Streeter here presents as finally conclusive. But one difficulty must be stated. If these written Gospels were known and used by John, the differences between the fourth Gospel and the Synoptics show a very free handling by the evangelist of the material he had before him. Two considerations do partially relieve the difficulty. The one is that, if the author (or source) was himself a witness of the life of Jesus, or was directly dependent on a witness, these Gospels, neither of which claimed an apostle as author, would not have the authority for him which they possessed for a later generation. The other consideration is in the fact that the writer of the fourth Gospel is not mechanically piecing together materials found on a written page, but is rather presenting us with a picture resulting from the fusing of his own materials, as Canon Streeter puts it, "in the crucible of his creative imagination." Again one seems justified in raising this further question. If "the disciple whom Jesus loved" was either the evangelist or the source of his independent material, he is represented as after the resurrection in close association with Peter (202), from whom Mark, according to tradition, derived his material. May he not accordingly have absorbed much of this tradition, even in verbal details, before Mark's Gospel was written? A similar question may be raised regarding the dependence on Luke. Canon Streeter postulates an earlier work than our Luke which he calls Proto-Luke, which was independent of Mark. If Luke gathered this material when he came as Paul's companion on Paul's last visit to Jerusalem, would he not be moving in circles in which the beloved disciple also moved, and thus would not both be gathering their material from the same sources? It would betray rashness to challenge the conclusions of a scholar so competent as Canon Streeter; but may not a scholar, just because he is always handling documents, assume literary dependence as the only possible source of a resemblance which may better be accounted for by personal contacts?

6. The Fourth Gospel at once Parable and Fact. Although Canon Streeter, feeling that the fourth Gospel belongs rather to the literature of devotion than to history or biography, describes John as mystic and prophet, and speaks of his "creative memory," he yet separates himself from many more recent writings on the fourth Gospel in insisting that John was not indifferent to historical facts, and concerned only about the eternal truths which the facts symbolized. "John may have been mistaken about his facts," he says, "but to him it is as important to emphasize the historical as to see in the historical a symbol of the Eternal" (op. cit., p. 389). John sees in the historic fact of the Word made flesh "an acted parable." There was a real coming of the Eternal into time, a real life, a real death, a real resurrection. For him, the taking of flesh, i.e., the incarnation, was a real event involving sacrifice, limitation, and suffering, and not merely, as certain Gnostics held, a piece of unreal phantasy. If the evangelist himself was not indifferent to fact, we are justified in looking for fact in his narrative.

The Literary Character of the Fourth Gospel. While at the first glance the fourth Gospel shows a literary unity which has led to the comparison of it to "the seamless robe" (Jn. 1923), yet on closer scrutiny it is discovered to be a complex composition. The Gospel seems to have had a checkered career after it appeared in its original form. Of this the first indication may be found in the R.V. mg. of 753. "Most of the ancient authorities omit Jn. 753-811. Those which contain it vary much from each other." A close examination of the language shows it to be not Johannine but Lucan; and it is probable that if this passage never had a place in our Luke, it belongs to the same source that much of the Lucan material has been derived from. If such an insertion was possible in a sixth century MS. (Codex Bezae; see p. 863a), it being absent from MSS. of the fourth and fifth centuries, it is not rash to assume the probability of insertions in the centuries before our oldest MSS., if the internal evidence justifies such an assumption. Another indication may be given. Moffatt in his New Translation inserts 715-24 after 547 with the note, "Restoring 715-24 to this its original position in the Gospel" (pp. 120, 121); and in other places a similar rearrangement will be found. Many scholars now agree that in many parts there has been displacement. Still another indication may be offered. So conservative a scholar as Westcott describes ch. 21 as an Epilogue, and states that "this chapter is evidently an Appendix to the Gospel, which is completed by chapter 20" (Gospel of St. John, p. 299). His argument that this Appendix was written by the author of the Gospel is not convincing. Even if "there is no evidence to show that the Gospel was published before that appendix was added to it," i.e., evidence of a textual character, the two facts mentioned above forbid our assumption that even our oldest MS. of the fourth century preserves the Gospel in its original form. Lastly, any careful reader of the Gospel must realize what may be described as a change of mental scene, when he passes from John 11-18 to what follows. A theological exposition of the truth regarding the Word of God gives place to a historical narrative, in which the Word is not again mentioned, but much is said about the Son of God. Scholars agree in describing 11-18 as the Prologue, but are not agreed whether, like the Epilogue or Appendix, it is to be regarded as part of the original work. These three facts—the possibility of later insertions, the probability of displacements, the detachment on account of their distinctive character of the Prologue and the Epilogue from the main body—afford a starting point for our investigation.

1. Character and Significance of the Appendix. We may begin with the Appendix, as there is here most general agreement that it is an addition to the original Gospel. Our view of it will be affected by our conclusion regarding the last two verses (vv. 24, 25). Even Westcott regards these verses as "separate notes attached to the Gospel before its publication" (op. cit., p. 306) and ascribes v. 24 to the Ephesian elders. The hyperbole of v. 25 would itself make it suspect, and the oldest MS., Codex Sinaiticus (p. 862b), omits it; it is probably an addition by a very early scribe. The intention of v. 24 is to identify the author of the Gospel with the apostle John, since the sons of Zebedee are mentioned in v. 2, although there is not a word in the Gospel to support such a contention, and even the Appendix does not make the identification inevitable, since "two other of his disciples" are also mentioned. The tradition of authorship, which afterward became common, was evidently still challenged when this attestation of quite unknown authority was added, affording us unintentioned evidence that the authorship was in doubt. If v. 24 is not an added note, but belonged to the Appendix as originally written, then this attempt to settle a disputed question must be regarded as one of the reasons for the Appendix.

Two other reasons for the Appendix may be suggested, the one concerned with "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (v. 20), and the other with Peter (vv. 15-17). Jesus' words in Mk. 91, "Verily I say unto you, there be some here of them that stand by, which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God come with power," were evidently understood as a promise that one of the disciples would survive to the Second Advent. If the beloved disciple was identified with John the son of Zebedee, and was thus reckoned as the last survivor of the apostolic company, to whom the words were addressed, his death would cause widespread bewilderment. Had the Lord been slack in the fulfillment of his promise? The explanation of the promise in vv. 22, 23 was intended to relieve that bewilderment. The apostle's death seems the more natural occasion for such an explanation; but Canon Streeter, who expresses a far higher estimate of the character of the Appendix than most scholars, holds that the Appendix comes from the author himself, or one of his pupils, who "desires to forestall the dangerous disillusionment which he foresees will inevitably result from the non-fulfillment of this hope" (op. cit., p. 464). In that case the Elder or his pupil must have accepted without challenge the identification of him with the disciple whom Jesus loved.

The reason why Peter is mentioned is this: In the greater part of the Gospel, Peter and the other disciples with whose names the Synoptics make us familiar fall into the background, and only the beloved disciple and unnamed disciples come into view. The author of the Appendix seeks by the record of his restoration after his fall to recover for him his place of prominence and authority. If v. 24 is part of the Appendix, then the Appendix seeks to claim the authorship of the Gospel for one of the Twelve. Canon Streeter points out another consideration which throws light on the intention of the writer of the Appendix. In the Gospel itself only appearances in Jerusalem are recorded. Probably the edition of Mark current in Ephesus recorded as does Matthew an appearance in Galilee. The Appendix both confirms and corrects Mark. There was an appearance in Galilee, but it was the third, being preceded by the appearances in Jerusalem recorded in the Gospel (op. cit., p. 473). This interest in the Galilæan group of disciples, and the Synoptic representation of the ministry, runs through other passages, which in several cases interrupt the context, and may probably be later insertions of the author of the Appendix, whom we may call the redactor. Attention will be called to these passages in the commentary following; and a list of them need not be given here.

2. Character and Significance of the Prologue.

Turning now to the Prologue, it may be affirmed that it does not dominate the representation of the person and work of Christ to the degree in which Scott in the work already mentioned assumes that it does, nor does it stand apart to the extent which Harnack asserts, for its influence can be traced in some passages which may be briefly described as of a more metaphysical character, showing a tendency to emphasize the supernaturalness of the person of Jesus more than the rest of the record itself warrants, and as betraying an interest in the current eschatology, which the theology of the Gospel generally has left behind, but which reappears in the First Epistle. Canon Streeter, who very vigorously combats attempts at source-criticism, admits "a very large number of disarrangements," leaving the door open for such insertions as are suggested in the paragraph above, "and also a few editorial additions—528, 29, for example, which reflects the apocalyptic conceptions of an external judgment, thus directly contradicting the lesson of the previous verses" (op. cit., p. 382). Other passages there are which seem to indicate the standpoint of the Evangelist, who in the respects mentioned was not in entire agreement with the "disciple whom Jesus loved," whose witness he is for the most part reproducing, and to whom he seems to have stood in a relation similar to that of Mark to Peter. The designation, the "disciple whom Jesus loved" (20²), is his tribute to the teacher to whom he owed his knowledge of the life and teaching of Jesus, although 11⁴ and 1 John 11⁴, if they must be taken as referring to sensible and not only to spiritual contact, might indicate that he, as a boy or youth, may also himself have had some personal acquaintance with Jesus. As the Epistles go with the Gospel, we need not hesitate about naming the Evangelist "John the Elder," to whose presence in Ephesus at the end of the first century tradition bears testimony. To the Evangelist is due the Ephesian standpoint of the Prologue and other passages. The commentary will indicate where his distinctive thought appears clearly, although there must be many other places where he has modified the contribution of the Witness.

3. The Nature of the Contribution of "the Witness."

Before any attempt is made to identify the Witness, the nature of his contribution must be examined. In that contribution we must distinguish two strata. About half a century must have elapsed between the events reported and the report of them by the Witness to his disciple, the Evangelist. That report need not have been a private communication; it may have been given in public discourse to the Christian community. We need not assume that the Evangelist reported verbatim what he heard; but his own thought and style may have been so influenced by his teacher's, that even when he was not reproducing accurately the resemblance would be maintained. Characteristics of the Gospel, such as the Prologue and other passages, make it necessary to distinguish three persons, namely, the Evangelist, the Witness, "the beloved disciple" of Jesus, who in preaching told what he had seen and heard, and the disciple of this beloved disciple who recorded in the Gospel that teaching. In distinction from the positions set forth in the present discussion, Canon Streeter's view is that the beloved disciple is the apostle John idealized, whom he credits with some slight connection with the contents of the Gospel; and that the writer of the Gospel is a disciple of the apostle, himself responsible for the contents of the Gospel in its present form. What he says of the Evangelist as mystic and prophet (p. 365f.) would on the view here taken apply rather to the Witness. "The mysticism of John," he says, "like that of Paul, is a mysticism centered, not on Absolute Being, but on the Divine Christ." He lived in intimate contact and intimate communion with his living Lord. Not only so; there was a "revival of prophecy" as "the conspicuous feature of the early church." The mystic regarded himself, and was regarded by the church, as an inspired prophet, guided in his reminiscences and reflections alike by the Holy Spirit; and for him accordingly it was not necessary to distinguish the one from the other, as from the point of view of historical interest we could wish he had done. We can imagine what took place in his preaching. Even if experiences of the past, words heard, and deeds done are vividly remembered, they are affected and cannot but be affected by the experiences of the intervening years; a thoughtful man especially will color his reminiscences by his reflections; and the more thoughtful he is the less likely is he to reproduce what he has seen or heard without his own comment. Still less will a mystic in communion with Christ, a prophet filled with the Spirit, be only a verbatim reporter of past memories. When this mystic and prophet preached, past history and present experience were blended in the eternal reality of the present Christ and present Spirit. No separation of what was remembered from the interpretation now given to it would seem necessary, or even be possible either for the preacher or his hearers. Reminiscence and reflection are so blended that only here and there in the Gospel can we venture to detect the transition; and wherever this is possible it will be indicated in the commentary; but no complete analysis can be attempted.

Summary Statement of the Theory of Composition. The theory of the composition of the fourth Gospel which the writer has endeavored to maintain in the preceding section may be stated briefly as follows: (1) The foundation of the Gospel is in the personal reminiscences, supplemented by reflection, which constituted the preaching of the Witness, identified with the unnamed "beloved disciple," a Jerusalemite. (2) This preaching was reported with reasonable fidelity by the Evangelist, identified with John the Elder, of Ephesus, who added such comments, e.g., the Prologue, as seemed necessary to make the book intelligible for his environment. (3) At a considerably later date the Redactor, who cannot be identified, desirous of removing what might be a hindrance to the acceptance of the Gospel in the churches generally now familiar with the Synoptic tradition, if not accurately acquainted with the Synoptic writings, made such additions, e.g., passages dealing with the Galilæan ministry, and, in part at least, the Appendix, as he was honestly convinced were necessary to supplement the Gospel in regard to matters of interest and importance to him. Various points in this theory still wait to be considered.

The Authorship of the Gospel. Tradition in the church in the latter half of the second century connects the Gospel with the apostle John, the son of Zebedee. After a very thorough survey of all the earlier evidence, Canon Streeter comes to the conclusion that all the conditions are fulfilled by John the Elder, who was afterward on insufficient grounds identified with the apostle John. The Second and Third Epistles claim to be written by the Elder. This identification of the Evangelist with the Elder may be accepted without further discussion. But Canon Streeter assumes that the Elder had some personal connection with the apostle John. He says that only on this assumption can we make psychologically explicable the attitude toward the beloved disciple expressed in the Gospel (op. cit., p. 433). Since it is assumed by the present writer that the beloved disciple was the Witness to the words and works of Jesus, which form the main content of the Gospel, so slight a connection would not suffice, and so we must press the questions: Are there reasons against identifying the Witness with the apostle John; and what does the Gospel itself reveal to us about "the disciple whom Jesus loved"? (Cf. p. 857b.)

1. The Author's Interest in the Judæan Ministry. It has already been pointed out that the passages dealing with the Galilæan ministry are probably later insertions by the redactor; as will be shown in discussing them, they seem less accurate than we should expect them to be if they came from an eyewitness, such as the son of Zebedee was. The dominant interest of the Gospel is, not in the Galilæan, but in the Judæan ministry. Is this what we should expect from a Galilæan disciple? In the Gospel there is evidence of such a familiarity with things Judæan—places, persons, customs, changes of feeling in the multitude, and of policy in the rulers—as points to a Judæan rather than a Galilæan source. At the proper places indications will be given of an intimate knowledge of the ruling circles in Jerusalem, such as a Galilæan fisherman, even if he sometimes came to Jerusalem to sell fish, was not likely to gain. The Synoptic records show that John, the son of Zebedee, was indeed in the inner circle of the disciples, but not that he had either the moral character or the spiritual capacity to become the confidant of Jesus about his inner life, as the fourth Gospel represents the beloved disciple as having been. When it is argued that the Son of Thunder was changed into the apostle of love by the lapse of many years, what is ignored is that the fitness for such intimacy with Jesus must have been shown during the earthly ministry. Again, would the Galilæan fisherman have had the interest in the controversies between Jesus and the Jewish teachers and leaders which fill so large a place in the Gospel? A Jerusalemite disciple, closely associated with these Jewish circles, would much more certainly have such an interest. Much is lost and nothing gained for the value of the Gospel by attempting to restore the tradition of the authorship by John the son of Zebedee.

2. Theories Concerning the Identity of the Witness. The identification of the Witness with "the rich young ruler," Lazarus, or Nicodemus, cannot be proved, even if a plausible case can be made out. Without attempting any such identification the writer is content with bringing together such evidence about the position and the character of the Witness as the Gospel itself suggests. The description of him as "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (13²³ 21²⁰) is not a self-designation, but was given him by the Evangelist as the grateful tribute of a disciple who had been led by him into intimacy with the Lord. He may have been "the other disciple" who accompanied Peter to the tomb (20³⁻⁸), as he may have been Peter's host in Jerusalem. If a wealthy citizen of influential position, he too may have provided the ass for the triumphal entry by previous arrangement with Jesus (Mk. 11⁵, 6) and also the upper room for the Supper (14¹³, 14), at which as host he was present. It is not unlikely that it was he who was known unto the high priest, and entered in with Jesus into the court of the high priest, and "went out and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter" (Jn. 18¹⁵, 16). These indications lead us to the assumption that he belonged to one of the priestly (or even high-priestly) families. In the attitude of the Gospel to demonic possession, angels, and the resurrection, in these parts which can be ascribed to the Witness, some scholars find an indication that he belonged to the Sadducees. If his discipleship began at the Jordan, he being the other of the two disciples of John who followed Jesus (14⁰), that discipleship was not a constant companionship in Galilee, but was renewed at Jesus' visits to Jerusalem, and was probably kept secret for family reasons. There may be a personal confession in 12⁴², 43, "Nevertheless even of the rulers many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess it, lest they should be put out of the synagogue; for they loved the glory of men more than the glory of God," although the statement itself seems to reflect the conditions of a later time. This would adequately explain why this disciple does not appear at all in the record in Acts. Was his testimony and influence in distant Ephesus at the close of his long life the atonement that he sought to make for the years of secret and silent discipleship? But did the same reasons as had constrained him to so long secrecy and silence lead him to withhold his name, and was this disciple respecting his Master's feeling in these indirect indications of his personality? We are here in the region of conjecture, to which a high degree of probability can be given only by the cumulative impression of a number of minute details, which will be noticed at their proper places in the commentary.

The Religious Significance of the Gospel. It has been necessary in this introduction to deal with these critical problems, as there is no other N.T. writing about which there is so great a diversity of opinion as about the fourth Gospel. But great as may be the divergence on these matters, the agreement is general as to the religious significance of the fourth Gospel. It bridges the gulf between the Jerusalem of the fourth decade and the Ephesus of the last decade of the first century. It presents to us the Jesus of history transfigured by the light of the Christ of faith. It links history with philosophy; sets the events of time on the background of eternity; makes explicit what is implicit with the other Gospels, and roots the Christian experience in the Christian history. It so discloses the glory of the Son of God in truth and grace as to evoke the faith which in him lays hold on eternal life.

Scientific Criticism and Appreciation of Spiritual Values. For the relation between a scientific criticism of the fourth Gospel and the discernment of its teaching and the appreciation of its profoundly spiritual character, see the discussion and summary with which the commentary concludes, pp. 1092-3.

Literature: Westcott, The Gospel According to St. John; Sanday, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel; E. F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel: Its Purpose and Theology; Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, pt. iii; Marcus Dods, The Gospel of St. John, 2 vols.; Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel; Garvie, The Beloved Disciple; Hayes, John and His Writings; Manson, The Incarnate Glory; Strachan, The Fourth Evangelist, Dramatist or Historian? Lord Charnwood, According to St. John; Streeter, The Four Gospels, pt. iii.

CHAPTER I

1-18. The Prologue: The Word Become Flesh. This is by some scholars regarded as giving the key to the Gospel, and as an integral part of it; others regard it as an introduction added to commend the Gospel to readers interested in current philosophical thought. Scott sees every part of the Gospel in the light of the doctrine of the Word (Greek Logos, meaning "reason" as well as "word"). Harnack denies any influence of the doctrine on the presentation in the Gospel. In the exposition here it is assumed that the Prologue is due to the Evangelist, that several passages in the Gospel show its influence, but that what is due to the Witness presents the conception of Christ as Son of God, and not as Logos (on the identity of the Evangelist and the Witness see intro., pp. 1064-6). The Prologue is regarded by Rendel Harris as "a hymn in honor of Sophia" (Wisdom), in which the term Logos has been substituted for that of Sophia, and in his view it need not be ascribed to the same author as the Gospel. Burney (The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel), who ascribes an Aramaic origin to the Gospel, derives the doctrine of the Logos from a Palestinian source in the Targums; the Logos is the Mēmṛā, the tabernacled among us is the Shekīnā (Shekinah) and the glory is the YeKārā (p. 39). Stanton and most scholars, however, maintain that the doctrine depends on Philo, who combined by the allegorical method of interpretation Greek philosophy with the Hebrew Scriptures. While there are many resemblances, the crucial difference is this: that Philo had not reached the conception of the full personality of the Logos, because the fact of the incarnation was not within his ken. That the Word became flesh, fully man, necessarily modified the conception of the Word.

The idea of the Logos is common to both sources of Philo's theology. In the O.T., God's relation to the world is mediated by such conceptions as Angel, Spirit, Wisdom, Word, which are all personalized, but not presented as fully personal or as distinct from God himself. The associations of the Hebrew conception of the Word are carried over into the term Logos, while in Greek philosophy the emphasis lay on the meaning "Reason." The Prologue has more kinship with Hebrew than Greek thought. The Word is God's self-revealing activity within God himself before the world was, distinguished but not separated from God (vv. 1, 2) within the creation of all things (v. 3), and within the animation and illumination of man (v. 4), an illumination which men because of their spiritual incapacity failed to receive (R.V. mg. of v. 5, overcame for apprehended). Here is sounded the tragic note of the Gospel; rejection where reception should have been (cf. v. 11).

Vv. 6-8 are clearly an insertion, or at least a digression, the purpose of which is to deny that this divine illumination was to be found in John the Baptist, and to assert that his function was solely to testify; and this subject is taken up again in v. 15, in which the Baptist asserts the superiority of the Christ because of his priority (an evident reference to his pre-existence). This reference to the Baptist is probably to be explained by the existence of a sect in or near Ephesus, which claimed for the Baptist a position superior to that of Christ, and which may even have identified him with the Logos. (Cf. Acts 18:24-19:7. Apollos came from Alexandria, to which Philo belonged, and he knew only the baptism of John; the twelve men in Ephesus, whose baptism is mentioned in immediate connection with the account of Apollos, were also adherents of the Baptist.) It may be that the Evangelist belonged to this same sect, until the Witness unfolded to him the truth about Jesus.

Vv. 9-13 revert to the doctrine of the Word, and describe his activity prior to the incarnation. This illumination was constant (always coming into the world) and universal (every man). The R.V. mg. refers the coming to each man. The world here means, not the physical universe, but humanity, estranged from and asserting its independence of God.

Thus it ignored the creative presence in this illumination; for although it was his possession the men who belonged to him rejected him (the Greek of the first his own is neuter, of the second is masculine). The primary reference here is to the Jews, who had the advantage of the special revelation of God. The rejection, however, was not complete, as those who received, because regenerated by God himself, acquired the status and enjoyed the privileges of the children of God. V. 13 in the present reading contrasts spiritual with natural birth, possibly with reference to the Jewish boast of descent from Abraham (cf. 8:39); there is patristic evidence for the singular (who was born); with this reading there would be clearly a reference to the virgin birth.

In v. 14 the fact of the incarnation is stated. Humanity under all its conditions and limitations—for this is what flesh here means, not the body only—was assumed by the Logos. The Incarnate Word tabernacled (R.V. mg.) among men, and on him, as on the tent of old, rested the Shekinah, or God-presence. What distinguished this God-presence, however, was that in it divine sonship was revealed (an only begotten from a father, R.V. mg.). This links the Prologue with the rest of the Gospel, where not the Word, but the Son is the predominant notion. This revelation in the Son combined attractiveness and reality (the meaning which truth has throughout the Gospel). V. 15 breaks the continuity. In v. 16 the Evangelist reckons himself among those who shared the increasing benefits of this revelation; if he was John the Elder, he may as a boy have come into contact with Jesus, but any impression then made may have been deepened by his intercourse with the Witness. V. 17 contrasts this revelation in its attractiveness and reality with the legal system associated with the name of Moses. For all previous revelations of God suffered from necessary imperfection; only through the Son in intimate relation to the Father could the Fatherhood be fully revealed (v. 18).

19-34. The Baptist's Testimony: the Contrast Between Himself and the Christ. The first part of the Gospel (chs. 1-4) deals with testimony. The Baptist here, in his first testimony (cf. 3:22-30), disclaims his being the Messiah, or Elijah (Mal. 4:5), or the prophet (Deut. 18:15), and is content to describe himself in the words of Isa. 40:3. Challenged as to his right to baptize, he declares that his rite is only a purification preparatory to the manifestation of One so much greater than himself that he feels himself unworthy to perform for him the most menial offices (v. 26 suggests that the Baptist was aware of Jesus' presence).

The scene of this event is not known, and at an early date Bethabarah, or Betharabah, was suggested (R.V. mg.). This disclaimer was made to a commission, instigated by the party of the Pharisees (v. 24), but consisting of priests and Levites (v. 19). Is this a confusion, for the priests and Levites were mostly Sadducees? These religious leaders desired to look into this new religious movement, just as Nicodemus came, on behalf of his party, to interview Jesus himself (31-10).

Next day, probably after the commission had left, on the approach of Jesus, the Baptist bore witness (v. 29) to the atoning death, which, in view of his teaching as reported in the Synoptics, and his later doubt about the mission of Jesus (Mt. 11³), is perplexing. If, however, Jesus was with John some days (v. 26), it is probable that they had some conversation, and that Jesus imparted his conception of his vocation, as in Isa. 53 (see p. 664). John may have been for a time at least lifted above his own habitual mode of thinking about the Messiah. The message sent to him through his disciples in this time of doubt would be a reminder of this conversation (Mt. 11⁵). If this explanation is correct, the lamb is neither the paschal lamb, with which Paul identifies Jesus (1 Cor. 5⁷), nor the lamb of the morning and evening sacrifice, but the lamb to whom the Suffering Servant is compared in Isa. 53⁴. V. 30 repeats v. 15 and each verse breaks the continuity. As Jesus and John were related (Lk. 13⁶), v. 31 cannot disclaim personal acquaintance but only recognition of function as Messiah. Vv. 32-34 present a serious difficulty. Mark's account of the Baptism indicates that it was Jesus only who saw the dove as a symbol of the Spirit descending (Mk. 11⁰, 11; cf. Mt. 3¹⁶, 17). Did the Baptist share that vision? Or did Jesus tell him of it, and of his consciousness of his calling as Messiah; and do these verses record an imperfect reminiscence, changed in the lapse of time with a heightening of the supernatural, which is characteristic of other passages in the Gospel? The second view seems the more probable. Even although the term Son of God in v. 34 is used as a title of the Messiah, and not in the sense the Gospel itself gives to it, so open a declaration of Messiahship by the Baptist is not at all probable; and we must recognize here, as in the next passage (vv. 41, 45, 49), that a more developed phase of the Christian faith is thrown back to this early stage. All through the Gospel, the time about which the Evangelist is writing is seen in the light of the time at which he is writing, and the perspective is foreshortened. It is difficult, unless by a conscious effort which the Evangelist never made, to see the past just as it was, and not as the present makes it appear.

35-51. The Call of the First Disciples. In Mk. 11⁶⁻²⁰ (notes) the call is recorded of Simon and Andrew, and the two sons of Zebedee. This call to constant companionship in the public ministry in Galilee is not inconsistent with this account of an earlier intercourse with Simon (Peter) and Andrew. It has been sometimes assumed that the unnamed disciple of John (cf. vv. 35 and 40) was John the son of Zebedee, and that he also brought his brother to Jesus. But if this disciple was "the disciple whom Jesus loved" he was not, according to the view of authorship here taken, John the son of Zebedee (see intro., p. 1065). The account of the two days may come from an eyewitness; but his reminiscences are colored by reflections in two respects. So definite a confession of the Messiahship (vv. 41-45, 49) at so early a date would rob of its significance the confession of the Messiahship at Cæsarea Philippi (Mt. 8²⁹; cf. Mt. 16¹⁶). The words spoken to Peter (v. 42) also seem antedated, and to belong to a period when Jesus had gained a more intimate knowledge of his character. In v. 42, as in v. 48, appears the tendency of the Evangelist to assign to Jesus a supernatural knowledge of the secrets of human hearts in addition to the spiritual and moral insight the Synoptics also recognize. Jesus may have seen Nathanael with the bodily eye at his devotions; how did he gain such intimate knowledge as the commendation implies? It is Peter, not Jesus (v. 43), who desires to go to Galilee. As Bartholomew is usually the companion of Philip in the Synoptic lists, Nathanael (v. 45) is usually identified with him. Although the Evangelist lays stress on the supernatural knowledge of Jesus, he records words of Jesus which depreciate a faith so based (v. 50). In a symbolic saying with evident reference to Gen. 28¹², Jesus declares that the disciples will be the witnesses of a constant and intimate communion of God and man in him, the Son of man, a title used by himself alone (except Acts 7⁵⁶) to express both his dignity and his humility; he was above and yet with man.

CHAPTER II

1-12. The Marriage of Cana of Galilee. This incident is often regarded as an allegory of the transformation of religion which Jesus was to bring about; the water of Judaism is changed into the wine of Christianity. The story itself offers no hint of any such meaning. It is evidently intended to be the record of a miracle, less difficult to imagine than the multiplication of the loaves and fishes (61-13), but more difficult to understand because the occasion does not seem adequate for such a display of supernatural power. Some suppose that a natural occurrence, which was afterwards misunderstood, may lie behind the narrative, the more so if the disciple who was the witness of the Judean ministry was not present. As the incident had a personal interest for the mother of Jesus (v. 4), she may have been his informant, as she was committed to his care (1926, 27). Jesus' answer to her is not discourteous or disrespectful, according to the usage of the term "woman" at the time; but it is an assertion that in the use of his supernatural power he could follow no human prompting, not even his mother's (cf. Mk. 333-35), but only God's. The mother's words to the servants show that she did not feel rebuffed, but remained expectant. When the divine indication came, her hopes were fulfilled. The six jars would hold about one hundred gallons. The jest of the chief servant (vv. 9, 10) need not be taken seriously as an indication that there was any excess. V. 11 seems to be a comment of the Evangelist's not consistent with Jesus' estimate of the value of faith based on miracles (cf. 223 448).

13-22. The Cleansing of the Temple. As a similar action is placed at the end of the ministry by the Synoptists (Mt. 21¹²⁻¹⁷, notes), it is held by many scholars that the Evangelist for his own didactic aims displaced the incident. Two other possibilities, however, remain: (1) As the Synoptics record only one visit to Jerusalem, they may have brought together in their record incidents of several visits. (2) More probable is it that there were two cleansings; the first here recorded an outburst of prophetic enthusiasm, as the quotation in v. 17 suggests; the second a more definite assertion of authority as the Messiah. The account here seems accurate in its details and fuller than the Synoptic. The rebuke (v. 16) is less severe than that in the second record (Mk. 11¹⁷). Devout Jews visited the Temple at the three great feasts as often as possible; and Jesus, according to this Gospel, made a practice of going up at the feasts, when the city was full of pilgrims, and he could reach a larger multitude of his people than at any other time. When the hostility of the Jewish rulers became more marked, the presence of so many of his fellow countrymen from Galilee was a protection to him (cf. Mk. 14²). Challenged to give some proof of his authority, Jesus uses a symbolic saying (v. 19), which clearly means, "Destroy religion as you are doing, and I can quickly restore it." The rulers with prosaic literalness recall that the second Temple was begun by Zerubbabel in 559, and completed in 513, in the ninth year of Darius. The rulers, however, may have been referring to the Temple restoration begun by Herod in 20 B.C. In that case, the forty and six years would cover 20 B.C.—26 A.D., the latter year, if Jesus was born 5 or 4 B.C., being the year in which Jesus began his ministry (see p. 874). We could then paraphrase: "This Temple was begun forty-six years ago, and still it is not completed"—for the work on it continued until 63 A.D. The Evangelist, looking back after the resurrection, finds in these words a reference to it. It is possible that Jesus himself foresaw what the outcome of Jewish hostility would be (cf. Mk. 220-22), and yet was sure of his triumph. It is this saying of Jesus which was recalled at his trial as a charge against him, but in a distorted form (Mk. 14⁵⁸).

23-25. Jesus' Distrust of Belief Resting on "Signs." In Jesus' distrust of a belief resting on miracles the Evangelist again finds a proof of his supernatural knowledge (although the Greek word used for knew in v. 25 means not intuitive, but acquired knowledge). The struggle between truth and error, unbelief and faith, which is the recurrent theme in the Gospel, is thus begun (cf. 110, 11). It may be that this discovery of the hostility he would encounter led Jesus to greater reserve of utterance and restraint of action regarding his Messiahship, so that the breach should not be forced before the hour had come.

CHAPTER III

1-21. The Interview with Nicodemus. Nicodemus is often described as the "anxious inquirer," but against this view are the following considerations: his address to Jesus is patronizing; Jesus' answer conveys a rebuke of the patronage and indication of the speaker's inability to form a judgment; and v. 7 (the plural ye) suggests that he came as representative of the Pharisees as a class, who, anxious to keep their leadership in religion, desired to discover whether they could come to an understanding with this new teacher. It is this view of the incident that the severity of the tone and the uncompromising demand of Jesus suggest. The whole passage is one of the best instances of reminiscence being supplemented by reflection which the Gospel offers. Probably definite reminiscence ends at v. 10, with a curt dismissal of one who, claiming to be a teacher, was not willing to learn. What follows is largely reflection, into which sayings from another setting may have been attracted, as, for instance, vv. 13, 14, which have similar content to 12³¹, 32. The Ephesian environment of the Witness is reflected in v. 11. It is a mistake to assume, however, that the record has no relation to the Jerusalem situation. The teaching about the new birth is not solely a reference to Christian baptism, but has in view the baptism of John, and the baptism of the Spirit, which John foretold of the Messiah (Mt. 3¹¹), and which Jesus himself experienced at his baptism (v. 16). The truth of the new birth is paralleled in the Synoptic teaching (Mt. 18³).

The substance of the teaching in vv. 1-10 is consistent with the occasion assigned, even if the form may have been affected by the later environment of the Evangelist. Even as the Baptist had demanded a thorough change (Mt. 3⁷), so does Jesus, as a condition of having any understanding of or share in the kingdom of God (vv. 3-5); a phrase common in the Synoptics for the good that had come from God in Jesus and would still more fully come, but used in this Gospel only here (cf. 18³⁶—"my kingdom"), eternal life being the corresponding Johannine phrase. In the Synoptic report of the rich young ruler, the counterpart of Nicodemus, this Johannine phrase is used (Mk. 10¹⁷⁻²²). Nicodemus' objection to the doctrine does not show that he understood Jesus too literally; but that he wished to show how ridiculous was such a demand for change as addressed to his party. Hence Jesus does not correct a misapprehension, but repeats the demand with more direct reference to the actual situation. On John's baptism of repentance must follow the baptism of the Spirit's illumination. V. 6 may be a comment from the Evangelist's standpoint, flesh meaning here not necessarily the sensual, or even the sinful nature generally, as in Paul, but nature apart from God's renewing Spirit. In v. 8 there is a play on the word pneuma, which may mean "wind" as well as "spirit," as does the Hebrew ruach. The persistent incredulity of Nicodemus proved that nothing could be gained by continuing the conversation, and led the Witness, or the Evangelist, to rebuke the similar unbelief of those to whom the Gospel was addressed regarding the truth taught (v. 11). Incapacity to understand teaching about man's need of inward change proves unfitness to receive the higher truths about the incarnation (v. 12). Only the Incarnate, who comes from heaven (cf. 1¹⁸), can bring down such a revelation (v. 13; cf. Deut. 30¹²). Although the Jews in their unbelief reject him, lifting him upon the cross, God will also exalt him to be the Saviour of all who believe (this double sense is implied).

From v. 16 onward we have reflections of the Witness, and not record. God gives his only begotten Son (literally, unique, one who is like no other) as Saviour, not as Judge, as the Jews expected the Messiah to be (cf. Mt. 3¹²); but the offer of salvation is a test of character, and so inevitably judgment; acceptance shows the true or right disposition, rejection the false or wrong disposition (cf. 9³⁹; the analogy of light and darkness is used in many religions). While these verses suggest an inherent dualism of character, a moral determinism, the Evangelist elsewhere recognizes man's liberty and responsibility (vv. 16-21; see following paragraphs).

22-30. The Second Testimony of the Baptist. (Cf. 1¹⁹⁻³⁴). The Evangelist's comment seems to be given in vv. 31-36. Accordingly, vv. 22-30 are generally regarded as displaced, and as properly following 21. The brief Judean ministry on the lines of the Baptist's probably followed the visit to Cana, and came before the visit to Capernaum (2¹²). The Judean ministry, although similar to the Baptist's, proved more attractive than his. The jealousy of those disciples of John who had not followed Jesus was due probably to a taunt from the Jewish disputants (v. 25). The Baptist himself rose above any such feeling, and as before confessed and accepted his inferiority, and even rejoiced in it. Some of the ideas here seem antedated and belong to the theology of the Gospel rather than the thought of the Baptist; even if he recognized Jesus as Messiah, it is not likely that he spoke without any reserve. This figure of the marriage is used by Jesus himself in regard to his relation to his disciples (Mk. 2¹⁹⁻²⁰).

31-36. The Evangelist's Comments. This passage does not seem to be reflections of the Witness, as is 3¹⁶⁻²¹; but, rather, comments of the Evangelist, either on these reflections, if v. 31 follows v. 21, or on the Baptist's testimony, if it is also displaced. If the second connection is preferred, then the contrast is specially between John as of the earth and Christ as from heaven; if the first, it has a more general reference. One whose origin is heavenly can alone disclose the heavenly realities; if many reject this testimony, those who receive it can confirm that here is the truth of God. God's messenger delivers God's own words, either because he is himself fully inspired (A.V.), or because he fully inspires those to whom his words come (R.V.). As loved of God, and endowed with universal authority by God, the attitude of men to him of faith or unbelief determines their destiny of life or death, God's approval or displeasure.

CHAPTER IV

1-26. Christ and the Samaritan Woman. If this story is not a record of fact, it is a triumph of literary realism. While the subsequent experience of the church may have affected the language at some points, it may be accepted as substantially historical. As no disciple was present, the conversation must have been reported either by Jesus or the woman. It is more probable that the woman told the story with some exaggeration of details. In v. 29 she claims that her whole past life had been disclosed; and this suggests that in v. 18 she is confusing what Jesus had actually said and what her own conscience recalled in his presence. It is suggested by the allegorists that the number "five" (five husbands) refers to the five senses, or the five books of the Law, or the five gods worshiped by the Samaritans (2 Kings 17³⁰⁻³⁴). Great as was Jesus' moral and spiritual insight, it is improbable that it would extend to complete knowledge of the woman's life, although something must have been said which impressed her with his insight. While vv. 21-23 follow naturally on the woman's inquiry, so general a statement as v. 24 may be a reflection of the Witness, or comment of the Evangelist. (Cf. 1 John 1⁵ and 4⁸.)

The title Lord (v. 1) belongs to the post-resurrection period (cf. 6²³ 11² 20²⁰ 21⁷ Lk. 18⁶). The motive of the withdrawal to Galilee (v. 2) was an avoidance of even an appearance of competition between Jesus and John, of which the Pharisees would have been ready to make use, or a desire to prevent any premature Messianic movement, which would provoke opposition. The journey through Samaria as the shorter was preferred to that through Peræa, even though the strict Jew shunned the defilement it might involve. Jerome identified Sychar with Shechem (Nablus), but it is now usually identified with 'Askar, eastward of Mount Ebal. As the disciples had taken the rope and bucket with them, Jesus was not able to draw water for himself, and had to ask the woman. Her curt refusal, prompted by the hatred of Jew and Samaritan, which Jesus rebuked in the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk. 10³³), gave Jesus an opportunity for a talk in which he offered, and she welcomed, a still higher boon than he craved and she withheld. Water is here used not as a symbol of cleansing, as in the conversation with Nicodemus (3⁵), but of the satisfaction of the soul's deepest need. That the gift might be desired, conscience had to be aroused. The attempt to evade the question by an inquiry about ritual led to (a) a demand for sincere worship, (b) an assurance that such worship would not be localized, and (c) an assertion that the Jewish worship was more intelligent, and God's purpose to save would come from this people. A spiritual worship of God as Father will supersede all local rituals. The woman defers the solution of this and all other problems to the Messiah, whom the Samaritans, who used the Pentateuch at least, were expecting no less than the Jews. The announcement of his Messiahship by Jesus is in accord with the Evangelist's view that he made the claim from the beginning, but is inconsistent with the Synoptic record, unless we may assume that less reserve was necessary in Samaria than Galilee, as there was less danger there of precipitating the crisis.

27-38. The Return of the Disciples. The surprise of the disciples on their return to find Jesus talking to a woman illustrates the difference he has made in the position of woman. A Jewish rabbi would have avoided such conversation. The disciples' request that Jesus should take food was met by the assurance that he had found a deeper satisfaction in fulfilling his calling, for in the multitude whom the woman was bringing to him from the town he saw the speedy harvest of the seed he had sown. (The words in v. 35 mean either that four months usually separated seedtime and harvest, or that it was still four months to harvest. The second explanation would fix this incident in December, or January.) The disciples might share the joy of a spiritual harvest, of which they had not sowed the seed, even as, in accord with a popular proverb (v. 37), in the bread they had brought they were reaping where they had not sowed.

39-45. The Testimony of the Samaritans and the Return to Galilee. Responsive as the Samaritans were, Jesus, recognizing the prior claim of "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," or not desiring to encourage any Messianic movement in Samaria, spent only two days among them. The title Saviour of the World (v. 42) represents the Evangelist's own theology. Two thoughts are suggested in this passage: (a) the greater readiness of non-Jewish people to believe; and (b) the greater value of a faith resting on personal experience than of one based on the testimony of others. The motive of the return to Galilee stated in v. 44 recalls the use of the saying by Jesus at Nazareth (Mt. 13⁵⁷). Here it is doubtful whether the words are a statement by Jesus of his motive or by the Evangelist. If the former, Galilee is the country; if the latter, Judæa, which in the Evangelist's judgment was the proper home of the Messiah. If Galilee is referred to, what the words mean is that Jesus expected less ready response there than he had found in Samaria; if Judæa, the Evangelist means that Jesus expected a better reception in Galilee than in Judæa. In the first case, Jesus' expectations were not fulfilled; in the second, they were.

46-54. The Healing of the Son of the King's Officer. The story need not be regarded as a variant of the Synoptic story of the healing of the centurion's servant at Capernaum (Mt. 85-13, notes). If the Witness did not accompany Jesus on this visit to Cana, he may have had the story from his mother Mary (cf. 21, 2). Nor need we assume a heightening of the supernatural features in the greater distance of Cana from Capernaum, than that in the Synoptic story. If Jesus' miracles were answers to prayer (cf. 1142), distance would make no difference: but only if the healing depended on his personal presence (see art., Miracles of N.T., p. 925b). Jesus' reply to the request (v. 48) indicates his unwillingness to begin in Galilee the kind of ministry that had disappointed him in Judæa (223-25). A cry of need, however, he could not resist; but faith was tested in the response given. As the Jews reckoned the day from sunset to sunset, the seventh hour (one o'clock afternoon) would fall in the previous day if the father returned after sunset. If Mk. 114 continues the story after v. 54, it was Jesus' intention to avoid the working of the miracles as far as possible, and to carry out a preaching tour in the synagogues of Galilee.

CHAPTER V

As Testimony is the theme of chs. 1-4, so Controversy is the theme of chs. 5-11. It is the view of many scholars that ch. 5 should follow ch. 6, in which an account is given of the ministry in Galilee, and that 715-24 is the sequel of ch. 5.

1-9a. The Cure at the Pool of Bethesda. If the feeding of the five thousand took place shortly before the Passover (64), a feast (51) or the feast (R.V. mg.) might possibly be Passover, but was more probably the next great feast, Pentecost. The Witness here shows his intimate knowledge of locality in describing the place; the present tense need not mean that the sheep-gate and pool had remained despite the ruin of the city to his own day. The MSS. vary as to the name, Bethzatha being probably the original (R.V. mg.); for Bezetha, Josephus tells us, was the name of the northern quarter of the city. As R.V. mg. shows, the last clause of v. 3b and v. 4 are omitted in the best MSS., and are a later insertion. The resemblance of this story to that of the palsied man, even to the use of the same word for "bed" (v. 8; cf. Mk. 211), does not prove that this narrative is a free handling by the Evangelist of Synoptic material.

9b-18. The Controversy Regarding the Sabbath. As the Synoptic records show, Jesus' healing on the Sabbath soon led to controversy (Mk. 31-6). Although himself a Judæan, the Witness uses the term "Jews" in a depreciatory sense for the enemies of Jesus. The man's ignorance of his healer is a token that the story is not invented; and to find a reference to the thirty-eight years of wandering in the wilderness (Deut. 214) in v. 5b is hypercritical ingenuity. The man's report to the Jews in v. 15 does not necessarily prove treachery, although Jesus' warning in v. 14 shows his unfavorable view of his character. Jesus' defense in v. 17 does not bear the meaning the Jews put on the words. As Son he claims to be doing as his Father does, whose activity for man is not interrupted by the Sabbath. (Cf. Gen. 23.) The estimate of the intentions of the opponents seems premature (v. 18); their hostility probably took time to develop fully.

19-29. The Relation of Father and Son. There seems little doubt that this passage (except v. 24, which might be an authentic saying, and might fittingly follow v. 40 or v. 47) is neither reminiscence nor reflection of the Witness, but a theological exposition added by the Evangelist (see intro., p. 1062). In the following passage (vv. 30-47) Jesus uses the first person, here (except in v. 24) the third person is used throughout; and a doctrine of the relation of Father and Son is developed which it is altogether improbable that Jesus would present to his opponents; it is the Christology of the end of the century. The eschatology of this passage (vv. 25-29) is also in contradiction to the teaching of Jesus as reported elsewhere in this Gospel—a present judgment, a spiritual resurrection, and an eternal life here and now (v. 24). V. 29 is, indeed, the only passage in the Gospels in which a resurrection of judgment, in accordance with the solitary passage in Dan. 122, as well as a resurrection of life, is taught (cf. Acts 2415). With this teaching vv. 19-23 stand in contradiction, for they refer to a present inward experience. The Son is so intimate with the Father that he imitates him; and this he can do because the Father has given the Son power to do what he himself does, a greater work than physical healing, even spiritual quickening, namely, the exercise of a present judgment on men, in order that equal honor may be given to the Son as to the Father. The warning is added, that disrespect of the Son is disrespect of the Father. It is difficult for us to understand how in one mind two such disparate conceptions could rest; but we find the old eschatological conception of the Second Advent returning in Paul's letters (Phil. 121 321), even when he had reached the experience of constant present communion with Christ.

30-47. The Witness to the Son, and Jewish Unbelief. V. 30 resumes the thought of v. 17, and while we cannot assume that we have a verbatim report of the controversy, and we must admit that the Ephesian environment has colored the record, it is not improbable that Jesus had such a controversy with his Jewish opponents. Jesus' appeal in v. 17, that he was doing as God does, is now justified. He perfectly knows God because he is entirely dependent on and obedient to God. Should his witness be challenged, he can appeal to the witness of John, so highly regarded by the people, and to even a greater witness—his own works—as proofs of his divine mission (vv. 30-37a). Their unbelief is due to their ignorance of God, so that they cannot even understand the Scriptures, of which they are so diligent students. Their mental incapacity is due to a moral defect. They lack love for God, and are concerned about their own reputation among their fellows. They would be deceived by a self-assertive teacher. Their rejection of him he need not charge against them, as the very Scriptures would bring the accusation, since they too bore witness of him (vv. 37b-47). His appeal to the Scriptures calls forth the taunt, "How can this uneducated fellow manage to read?" (71⁵; Moffatt's N.T., p. 120); for 71⁵⁻²⁴ is undoubtedly the continuation of this controversy.

CHAPTER VI

Ch. 6 is the proper sequel to 4⁵⁴; Jesus having just come from Judæa to Galilee would not be likely to return again. If, however, there had been a crisis in Galilee, such as ch. 6 records, there was reason for his withdrawal from Galilee, unaccompanied by any disciples (51) and for a time unknown (vv. 13-15). The description of his movements in 6¹, the other side of the Sea of Galilee, is more appropriate if he were in Cana (4⁴⁶) than if he were in Jerusalem (5⁴⁷). In the introduction (see p. 1061b) it has been shown that this chapter is probably due to the redactor, and offers a summary of the Galilæan ministry, into which records of the Judæan controversy have been mingled. To disentangle the intertwined threads is "a forlorn hope" for any scholar.

1-14. The Feeding of the Five Thousand. It is much less probable that Jesus became concerned about the feeding of the crowd as soon as they gathered (v. 5) than that at the close of the day (Mk. 6^{35, 36}) his disciples should express their concern. Again, while it is not improbable that Jesus addressed such a question to Philip, it is improbable that the motive was as v. 6 states it. Both these details illustrate a characteristic of the Christology of the Gospel, namely, Jesus' independence of human counsel or help; he is always represented as taking the initiative. Other details peculiar to this record show no such theological tendency, and may be historical. The Passover may be mentioned in v. 4 to account for such a crowd, composed of pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem, or to prepare for the Eucharistic teaching of the following discourse (vv. 52-59). That the miracle precipitated a crisis (vv. 14, 15) is not improbable in itself and gains support from Mk. 6⁴⁵, which tells of the constraint on the disciples to leave him alone to deal with the multitude. Such a miracle as this, even as the other nature miracles, presents a greater difficulty than the healing ministry; and while there was more adequate occasion here than at the marriage in Cana it is more difficult to imagine the mode. At what point did the supernatural increase take place? To answer such a question lies beyond the province of a commentator. There is, indeed, a naturalistic explanation which may be mentioned, although many will regard it as far-fetched, namely, that the generosity of Jesus and his disciples, in sharing their scanty store with others, so stimulated the generosity of those who had any food with them that the needs of all were met (cf. art., Miracles of N.T., p. 923a).

15-25. The Walking on the Sea. The narratives here and in the Synoptic record (Mt. 14²²⁻³³ and Mk. 6⁴⁵⁻⁵²) do not differ substantially. The Greek preposition epi in v. 19 may mean "by" as well as "on." It is not impossible that Jesus was walking on the shore; and that the disciples in their excited condition believed him to be literally "on" the sea; as v. 21 shows they were nearer the shore than they thought (see p. 923b). While Mark states that Jesus entered the boat, John records that, reassured by his words of cheer, they were willing to receive him into the boat (v. 21). This naturalistic explanation, however, obviously destroys that very feature of the event which inspired the disciples' fear. It is not at all unlikely that a conversation on the lakeside did take place next morning (vv. 22-25); neither Matthew nor Mark has any record, but the summary in Mk. 6⁵³⁻⁵⁶ in its lack of details suggests that some of the disciples, in their disappointment that he had not made use of the popular enthusiasm, had for a time gone home, or that to allay their excitement Jesus had sent them home. In view of the mention of the synagogue in Capernaum in v. 59 it should be noted that the crowd found Jesus not in Capernaum, where at first they sought him, but "on the other side" of the sea, perhaps between Bethsaida and Capernaum.

26-40. The Teaching on the True Bread.

It is certain, as far as in so difficult a matter we can be certain, that there was both a conversation with "a great multitude" (v. 2; cf. vv. 14, 22) at the seashore on the True Bread—theme appropriate to the occasion—and a controversy, arising out of this teaching, with the Jews (v. 41 and v. 52) in the synagogue in Capernaum (v. 59). It is not so certain, however, that the conversation ended at v. 40, and the controversy began at v. 41; for in the report it would seem that the redactor has woven in the contents of another discourse on the bread of life, which, since it is probable that 7¹⁵⁻²⁴ should follow 5⁴⁷, belongs to that empty place between 7¹⁴ and 7²⁵. As the Feast of Tabernacles was associated with the wanderings in the wilderness, the demand of 6^{30, 31} would be at that feast much more probable than in the present setting, just after a miracle which had excited such enthusiasm. Since Mk. 71 reports that certain scribes had come from Jerusalem to Galilee, probably to assist the local Pharisees in contests with Jesus, the Jews here mentioned may not be Galilæans, but Judeans, controversialists whom he had to meet in Jerusalem. This would make it more easy to explain why here in Galilee the teaching is so unlike the Synoptic reports, and so like the teaching reported by this Gospel as given in Jerusalem. (For a critical analysis, see A. E. Garvie, The Beloved Disciple, pp. 46-50.)

The content of the conversation may briefly be indicated. The summons of Jesus to care more for the spiritual good than material goods elicits the question from the people regarding their duty. Jesus' claim to faith as God's messenger is challenged on the ground that he has not yet given ground for their faith. Will he give again the new manna from heaven, as, according to the Apocalypse of Baruch 298, the Messiah was expected to do? Jesus offers the assurance that, as the manna of old came not from Moses, but God, so now in himself God is giving them the soul's true nourishment. (V. 33 is a reflection of the Evangelist, which breaks the continuity.) The request for this gift is met by the assurance of complete satisfaction; and followed by the reproach that faith is lacking. It is suggested that 31^{1, 12} would find a more appropriate context between v. 36 and v. 37 than in its present setting. The thought of the bread of life is not carried on in vv. 37-40; but the teaching is not unrelated to the occasion. Jesus' refusal of the homage (v. 15) which had been offered was due to his entire submission to the will of God, and his purpose to accept only such as were led to him by the Father (cf. Mt. 16¹⁷), i.e., yielded to him the right kind of faith, not such as a miracle might excite. Those so accepted were assured as to their final destiny. (The last clauses of v. 39 and v. 40 seem to be an intrusion of the current eschatology, inappropriate to the context.)

41-51a. The Controversy with the Jews.

Another ground of objection to the claim just made was found in the knowledge the opponents had of the earthly descent, as contrasted with the heavenly claim (v. 42; cf. Mk. 63). The reply of Jesus reiterates the teaching of vv. 37-40. Those alone can exercise faith whom God enables, according to the prophetic promise of divine instruction (Isa. 54¹³), not by direct vision, but through the divine messenger; and to them eternal life is assured (the last clause of v. 44 is another intrusion). The repetition of the teaching about the bread of life seems to take us back to the seashore; unlike the manna, the partakers of which died, this bread gives eternal life. As to the claim of descent from heaven (v. 51) it is likely, in view of what the Synoptics represent as Jesus' method, that the later Christology has here colored the reproduction of whatever teaching may on this occasion have been given.

51b-59. The Eucharistic Teaching. While v. 58 is a reflection of the Evangelist on the teaching of vv. 32-35, 48, 49, 51a, and corresponds closely to the reflection in v. 50, the teaching of the flesh and blood as the soul's nourishment, here introduced as a development of the teaching about the bread of life, probably did not belong to this occasion. It is difficult to suppose that Jesus would freely talk to his opponents about his Passion before he had made any announcement of it to his disciples. While it is possible that Jesus may in the upper room have expounded to some of the disciples the truth implicit in the words of institution of the Supper, it is more probable that a controversy of later days is here reflected. The last clause of v. 51 attaches this teaching to the discourse on the bread. The spiritual bread, which is contrasted with the material in the preceding discourse, now becomes his flesh, his atoning sacrifice. It is Jewish objections to Eucharistic teaching in Ephesus that are here being dealt with, and not anything that Jesus said, or that his hearers heard, in Capernaum. Jesus made eternal life depend on personal faith; here it is made to depend on participation in the Sacrament. This doctrine is neither the Witness' nor the Evangelist's but is due to the redactor (cf. intro., p. 1065a).

60-71. The Galilæan Crisis. This passage describes the crisis in Galilee, which took place soon after the feeding of the five thousand, when Jesus, according to Mt. 15²¹, found it expedient to withdraw "into the parts of Tyre and Sidon." Although the redactor regards the hard saying (v. 60) as referring to the previous discourse, yet the more probable reference is to the teaching about clean and unclean, which the disciples reported to Jesus had offended the Pharisees (v. 12). To this objection v. 63 would offer some sort of a reply; but v. 62 seems to have no relevance to the situation, and connects itself with the circle of sayings in 313-15 and 1220-36, which deal with the necessity of the exaltation of Jesus for the fulfillment of his vocation. The comment of v. 64 on Jesus' reference to the unbelief of some of his hearers restricts it unduly, and introduces a theological interpretation which the occasion does not justify. If the phrase from the beginning (v. 64) is intended to express a dateless knowledge, namely, that Jesus always knew who should betray him, then it contradicts the limitation of knowledge, which other evidence justifies us as ascribing to Jesus as a necessary condition of the reality of the incarnation. If it means that Jesus by his insight was quick to discover when the first thoughts of treachery entered the mind of Judas, then we may suppose that it was after the first announcement of the Passion (Mt. 16²¹) that Judas began to harbor the evil thought, and Jesus detected the change, for the second announcement (Mt. 17²²) includes as a new detail a reference to betrayal (here A.V. is to be preferred to R.V.). V. 65 simply repeats the thought of v. 44.

Vv. 66-71 may be regarded as the counterpart of the scene at Cæsarea Philippi (Mt. 16¹³⁻²⁰) only cast by the redactor into the mold of the rest of the Gospel. V. 65 recalls Mt. 16¹⁷. As the Gospel ascribes to the disciples a confession of the Messiahship at their first interview (141, 45, 49), and thus has antedated it, the situation here is represented not as an advance to a new conception, but as a danger of relapse from existing allegiance. Further, as the interest of the Gospel is in the truth taught, Peter's answer, Thou hast the words of eternal life, is a Johannine paraphrase of "Thou art the Christ." The words following, Thou art the Holy One of God, have more of a Synoptic ring. Again the announcement of the betrayal is antedated, as betrayal is mentioned only in the second announcement; and the change of feeling in Judas would be due to the first announcement of the Passion. The words themselves recall the rebuke of Peter, "Get thee behind me, Satan." If the view here presented, that the redactor is giving a confused account of the ministry in Galilee, of which he had imperfect knowledge, is rejected, then the alternative is that the Evangelist used Synoptic material in an arbitrary way.

CHAPTER VII

The first visit to Jerusalem was marked by the cleansing of the Temple (213-25); the second by the cure of the impotent man, and the controversy about the Sabbath (51-47 7 15-24); on the third visit (now to be described) the controversy regarding the authority of Jesus was continued.

1-14. The Feast of Tabernacles. When the brethren who clearly shared the disappointment of the multitude (cf. Mk. 321, 31-35) taunted Jesus to go to Jerusalem to declare himself openly as Messiah in the capital of the nation, the sacred city, he refused, as he knew his danger, and ran no risk unless at the Father's bidding, whose plan he must follow (cf. 24). The yet in v. 8 was probably added in later MSS. to avoid the appearance of contradiction with what follows. After their departure the divine indication must have come, and he went up, but for a time did not openly show himself. There was divided opinion about him, although fear of the rulers, known to be hostile, restrained open speech. Jesus must have been sufficiently assured of safety to justify his public appearance; the sequel to which is given in v. 25, as vv. 15-24 belong to the record of the previous feast in ch. 5.

15-24. The Close of the Controversy at the Previous Feast. (See also notes under 626-40.) There are three reasons for attaching this passage to ch. 5. (1) Jesus' appeal to the Scriptures (545-47) evokes the surprise at his learning, he not being a rabbi (v. 15). (2) Vv. 16-18 repeat the argument of 530-44. (3) V. 19 shows an apprehension of the hostile intention of the rulers, which explains Jesus' reluctance to go up at the next feast (vv. 7, 8); and the angry retort of the crowd (v. 20) shows that they were not aware of the rulers' intentions, as they afterward became (v. 13). (4) The cure on the Sabbath was the occasion of the hostility, and Jesus reverts to the cure and justifies his action (vv. 21-24). If the Sabbath law can be set aside that the rite of circumcision may be performed—much more may it that the whole man may be restored. A judgment which went beneath the appearance would not justify the intention to transgress in their anger the law against murder.

25-36. The Controversy at the Feast of Tabernacles. In this report we are able to trace the hand of an eyewitness. Note the knowledge that is shown of the varied and varying currents of opinion and attitudes toward Jesus. The multitudes (v. 12) consist of the pilgrims and those with whom they conorted in Jerusalem. The Jews are the hostile party (vv. 11, 13), and include the rulers (v. 26), the chief priests and Pharisees (v. 32; cf. Mt. 21⁴⁵ 27⁶², probably a description of the Sanhedrin, or supreme Jewish court). As the Pharisees were the democratic party, they could discover what the people were thinking more easily than could the Sadducees, the aristocratic. Some of them of Jerusalem (v. 25) refers to citizens who, though not themselves hostile, were aware of the plans of the rulers; the Witness himself may have been in contact with them. In 8³¹ Jews are mentioned, whose hostility had so far been overcome that they recognized his Messianic claim, but resented the suggestion that they had not yet found the truth that would make them free from the prejudices they still cherished regarding the nature of the Messiahship (v. 33). They are distinguished from those who fully believed in him (v. 30). These citizens of Jerusalem can explain the inaction of the rulers only on the assumption that those believe him to be the Messiah. They themselves have the difficulty that the Messiah is to appear suddenly (see Enoch and 4 Esdras), and this man's antecedents they know. Acknowledging that they know him, Jesus explains their continued unbelief by their ignorance of God, and his mission from God. This apparent blasphemy provokes an attempt to arrest, prevented only by the friendliness of the crowd, which is persuaded that even the Messiah could not do greater works. The growing popularity determines his opponents to carry out the arrest. Conscious of his danger, Jesus foretells his departure, soon, when he will be beyond reach. While he is thinking of his return to God through death, the people are so bewildered that the only conjecture they can make is that he may be intending a mission to the Jews scattered among the Gentiles, and even to the Gentiles.

37-53. The Last Day of the Feast. Here also there is proof of the trustworthiness of the record in the appropriateness of the imagery used. Jesus offers himself as the living water (v. 37), and later as the light of the world (8¹²). While in early times the Feast of Tabernacles or Ingathering at the end of summer lasted seven days (Deut. 16¹³), later an eighth day was added (Lev. 23³⁶). Water was brought from Shiloah, and poured out before the altar, to recall the gift of water in the wilderness (Ex. 17⁶); as this was being done Isa. 12³ was recited. On the eighth day this custom was discontinued, as that day celebrated the entrance into a "land of springs of water." Jesus uses this symbolic act to turn attention from the physical thirst to the spiritual thirst of man, and to give assurance of its satisfaction in himself to those who believe (the proper rendering of vv. 37 and 38 seems to be, "and let him that believeth on me drink"). No words of scripture correspond to the citation in v. 38, but Ex. 17⁶ tells of the water flowing from the rock, and Ezek. 47¹ promises a flow of water from the Temple as symbol of the Spirit given. There was a tradition that the Messiah or his forerunner would restore the gift of water as well as of manna (cf. 6³¹). The comment of v. 39, referring to Pentecost, is appropriate, even though it hardly expresses what Jesus was thinking. Only when Christ had risen was the fullness of life in him possessed. This assurance of Jesus led the people to discuss whether he were the prophet of Deut. 18¹⁵, or Jeremiah (cf. Mt. 16¹⁴), or even the Messiah. The Galilæan origin was a difficulty, since the Messiah was expected to be of Davidic descent and born at Bethlehem (Mic. 5²). Divided as was opinion, the feeling was favorable enough to make arrest dangerous. V. 49 exposes the attitude of the rulers to the people, and can be illustrated from other sources. The plea of Nicodemus for a fair trial is met by a contemptuous reference to Galilee as an unlikely home of a prophet, although Nahum and Jonah (2 Kings 14²⁵) both came from this district. V. 53 belongs to the next passage.

CHAPTER VIII

I-11. The Woman Taken in Adultery. It is certain that this story does not belong to this Gospel. It breaks the continuity of 7⁵² and 8¹²; the style and language are Synoptic and not Johannine. The textual evidence is against its authenticity as part of the Gospel (see R.V. mg.). It nevertheless seems to retain a true tradition; for the incident is congruous with Jesus' attitude toward sinners, and in view of its character was certainly not an invention of the early church. The purpose was to put Jesus in a difficulty; if he set aside the Law, he would lose favor with the people; if he decided for carrying it out, he would challenge the Roman authority, which had withdrawn from the Jews the right of inflicting death. His action did not decide this issue, but raised the question to a higher level; it challenged the accusers' right to condemn, and claimed for himself the right not to condemn. Why did Jesus stoop down and write upon the ground? (V. 6.) To show his disregard for his questioners, or to hide his own embarrassment, or to spare the woman? All are possible motives. An ancient MS. reads for when they heard it, "when they read it"; and this change is probably due to the legendary explanation that, when each man read what had been written by Jesus, he read his own sin. The sin of the woman is not condoned, as the last words show, although not condemned; but neither is it forgiven, as it would have been had penitence been shown.

12-20. The Light of the World: Discourse in the Treasury. The record of the last day of the feast is here continued. The second figure Jesus uses, I am the light of the world, is as fit as the first (cf. 7³⁷); during the Feast of the Court of the Women, where was the treasury (v. 20), was very brightly lighted. The claim to be the Light, however, would fitly follow the miracle of giving sight (ch. 9). It must be admitted that these chapters show a lack of continuity; but in this they may be reproducing the historical situation, the ebb and flow of opinion and feeling in the varied groups brought into contact with Jesus. Challenged by the Pharisees that this witness of himself is not true, Jesus asserts his own knowledge of himself as contrasted with his opponents' ignorance. His judgment is not according to human prudence (flesh), but according to divine insight, and is confirmed by the witness of his Father. Their taunt that he has not produced his witness is rebuked by a declaration of their incapacity to know him or his Father. Restrained by the public feeling, his opponents do not venture his arrest; the Evangelist expresses the situation in his own way: the appointed time had not yet arrived (v. 20).

21-30. Warnings of the Near Judgment. On a later day Jesus uttered a solemn warning that the day of grace would soon be closed by his departure. A more sinister suggestion than on the previous occasion (7³⁵) is made—even that he would commit suicide. This taunt makes him assert the contrast between their nature and his, involving their rejection of him, and consequent doom. The attempt by a question to force an open declaration of his Messiahship, which might be used as an accusation before the Roman authorities, is foiled by an answer about which there is much difference of opinion (v. 25). The R.V. mg. (cf. A.S.V. mg.) gives a rendering which has behind it the authority of the Greek fathers: "How is it that I even speak to you at all?"—a contemptuous gesture. Another suggestion is this: "I am nothing else than what I am saying to you," in other words, "Judge who I am from what I say." He does not fall into the trap set for him; but throws the responsibility on his hearers to show whether they can respond to the truth he speaks. The comment of v. 27 does not seem relevant. As such a response is not given, Jesus again solemnly declares that at his exaltation even those who do not believe now will confess him as Messiah, the Son dependent on, sustained by, and approved of the Father. These warnings elicited in some of his hearers a faith which was soon shown to be inadequate.

31-59. Controversy with "those Jews which had Believed." While it is difficult to discriminate, the severer tone of vv. 37-50 suggests that here Jesus turned from those who had a partial faith to his irreconcilable opponents. The assurance that the truth he taught would bring freedom was resented by the Jews, who prided themselves on their descent from Abraham. Jesus explains that it is not political freedom but freedom from sin's bondage that he as Son can offer. Turning to his opponents, he admits their physical descent from Abraham; but their intention to kill him and their opposition to his revelation prove that they cannot really be Abraham's children in showing a moral likeness to him. Their deeds point to another moral ancestry. The reference to fornication in v. 41 is probably not due to any of the current slanders about Jesus' birth, which were of later date, but fornication is used, as is also adultery, for any departure from God as in idolatry. Their claim of God as Father Jesus challenges without qualification, and he boldly charges them with descent from the devil, whom as murderer and liar they imitate. (The last clause of v. 44 may also be rendered "For a liar is also his father," a reference to the devil's father. By substituting Cain for devil in the first clause—cf. 1 Jn. 3¹²—the difficulty of assigning a father to the devil is evaded, and the devil is represented as Cain's father. Neither suggestion commends itself.) The challenge in v. 46, Which of you convinceth me of sin? may mean either that no moral offense could be proved against him, or that he could not be proved in error in what he had been teaching about sin. Pressing home his charge against them, that their unbelief proves that God is not their father, he provokes them to retort that he is a Samaritan (a deadly taunt) and even is possessed. Repudiating the charge, Jesus asserts his disinterestedness, and rebukes their attitude toward him. Turning (v. 51) again to those whose budding faith might be brought to bloom, he offers deliverance from death as a reward of discipleship. The opponents, however, again intervene. Such a claim proves demonic possession. Since the great men of the past are dead, does he claim to be superior to them? He disclaims any vain ambition; and if he claim any dignity, it is from fidelity to God.

This opposition inspires his confidence, and he declares that the prospect of his coming brought joy to Abraham (v. 56). In the apocalyptic literature such joy in the Messianic glories is ascribed to Abraham, even in his earthly life; even if Jesus knew this tradition he was probably thinking of Abraham in Paradise (cf. Lk. 16²² Mt. 22³²). The Jews, taking the words literally, dismiss the claim as absurd. (From the reference to fifty years, Irenæus inferred that Jesus taught till he was forty or fifty.) Jesus asserts his priority in time to Abraham; he claims eternal existence (v. 58). The Evangelist understands the words as meaning pre-existence, such as is claimed for the Logos in the Prologue. We must not interpret the words as meaning a continuity of consciousness from the former state through birth into the present; that would make the incarnation unreal. What we may assume is that in a swift intuition Jesus recognized that his relation to God, so certain and so intimate, was not temporal, but eternal. The opposition of men threw him back on God, and God gave him this assurance, when he most needed it. Such a claim so enraged the Jews that they sought to put him to death without any trial. The reading of the R.V. mg. and A.V. suggests an escape similar to that at Nazareth (Lk. 4³⁰), when his presence overawed. The less hostile multitude may have helped his escape.

In this controversy not only is the hostility of the Jews intensified, but Jesus is himself represented as assuming an attitude of ruthless severity, which for many reasons appears incredible. If he assailed his opponents as he is here represented as doing, it is no wonder that he aroused their hate. Severe he could be, as the woes on the Pharisees show, but the conclusion is inevitable that at this point the vehement devotion of a disciple has imported into the vindication of the Master's claims against contemporary opponents a polemic tone which was not characteristic of Jesus himself. The substance of the controversies we may regard as historical; but in the development of the themes the influence of the Evangelist's environment must be recognized.

CHAPTER IX

The teaching of ch. 10 is closely linked to the foregoing incident, and that teaching is assigned to the Feast of Dedication (10²²). The passage 10¹⁹⁻²⁹ attaches itself most closely to 9⁴¹, and leads up to the teaching in 10¹⁻¹⁸; while 10³⁰ follows more fittingly 10^{17, 18} than 10²⁹. These transpositions give us a greater continuity. Throughout the Gospels we are often confronted with evidence of disarrangement. The narrative in ch. 9 makes a convincing impression of historical reality.

1-12. The Healing of the Man Born Blind. (Mk. 8²²⁻²⁶.) The disciples (v. 2) need not be the Galilæan, but may be Judæan; would the fishermen be interested in the theological question asked? The sin before birth which is assumed as possible might have been committed in a previous existence, as some Greek thinkers held (Wisdom 8^{19f.}), or in the womb, as some rabbis taught. The problem was not resolved, but the truth was taught that man's need gives God's grace its opportunity, and Jesus as God's agent seizes the opportunity, as for him it will now be brief. While life remains, he sheds God's light on the world (the physical miracle serves as symbol of the more constant spiritual work). The use of means of cure recalls the mode in Mk. 7³³ 8²³, and points to an early tradition. Did too weak a faith in the recipient need thus to be encouraged? (See art., Miracles of N.T., p. 925a.) Siloam is the form used in the LXX; Shelah in Neh. 3¹⁵; Shiloah in Isa. 8⁶; the original meaning is sending forth, not sent (v. 7). The rest of the story is vivid realism.

13-34. The Trial of the Blind Man Now Seeing. The multitude first addressed themselves to the Pharisees, more accessible than the Sadducees, who probably were afterward called in, as the term Jews (v. 18) would include both parties. At first they try to shake the evidence for the cure, since a Sabbath-breaker could not have such power from God. The man asserts the fact, and confesses his faith in his healer as a prophet. Next, possibly at an informal meeting of the Sanhedrin, the parents are questioned, to get from them some contradiction of the fact that their son was born blind. That fact they testify, but from prudence decline to explain the cure; and throw back the questioners on their son. V. 22 is held by some scholars to be an anachronism, as in the time of Jesus not the synagogue but only the Sanhedrin could excommunicate; in Ephesus, however, at the time the Gospel was written the synagogue could pronounce the extreme sentence. A slip of memory, if there be such, on the part of the Evangelist, does not discredit the whole story. Once more the man is recalled, and adjured to tell the truth in the words Give glory to God (cf. Josh. 7¹⁹ Ezra 10¹¹). They assert their own conviction that Jesus is a sinner; this involves that the cure must have been wrought by Satan's help (Mk. 3²²). The man lets "courage rise with danger." He will not be drawn into discussions about matters regarding which the questioners are more competent than he, but of the fact of his cure he is sure. He refuses to be entrapped into a second recital, and asks if they desire fuller knowledge to justify belief. Abuse is their only argument, and growing bolder, he expresses his surprise at their inability to solve the problem, as it has been solved for him in the certainty that Jesus is God's agent, and not a sinner. With reviling he is driven out.

35-41. Faith and Unbelief. Jesus, having heard of this treatment, either seeks out the man, or by chance meets him, and tries to win him as a disciple by the testing question: Dost thou believe in the Son of man? (R.V. mg., the more probable reading). Ignorant of the meaning of the title, he is won when Jesus claims the title for himself. Jesus' judgment of the whole incident is: the man spiritually blind, but willing to be taught, has gained spiritual vision; the Pharisees claiming to know, hence unwilling to be taught, have become blind spiritually (cf. 317-21). Thus his Presence has here also proved to be judgment.

CHAPTER X

The rearrangement suggested in the first paragraph under ch. 9 above makes the sequence of events to be as follows. Violent difference of opinion was the result of the miracle (vv. 19-21). The opponents vehemently demand a confession of the Messiahship. Why they desired it, and why Jesus refused it, has already been shown. The reply is that he has in word and deed given sufficient grounds for faith, and that unbelief shows alienation of spirit. They do not belong to his flock (vv. 22-26); but he has a flock (the disciples, including this man) obedient to him, having security in him, because the divine omnipotence is its guarantee (vv. 27-29).

1-18. The Good Shepherd. How fittingly this leads up to the teaching about the Good Shepherd, which does not conform to the type of parable (v. 6) found in the Synoptics, but tends to become an allegory, although it may have had the strictly parabolical form; reflection may thus have transformed reminiscence. It appears as if two parables, one in which Jesus compares himself to the door of the sheepfold (vv. 7, 9), and another in which he describes himself as the Shepherd (vv. 1-5, 8, 10-16), are woven together. We may even distinguish within the second parable two, one dealing with the relation of the sheep to the Shepherd (vv. 1-5) and the other with the relation of the Shepherd to the sheep (vv. 8 10-18). As the door, Jesus declares himself to be the only Mediator of salvation and satisfaction for men.

The sheep (the true disciples) know, hear, and follow the Shepherd, but shun the stranger (thief or robber). A transition from the one parable to the other is made at v. 8 (omitting v. 9), and the two parables about the sheep and the Shepherd are linked by the thought of the sheepfold with that of the door in vv. 1, 3. Only the true Shepherd enters, and is admitted by the porter; the thieves and robbers climb in another way. The thieves and robbers are the teachers and leaders of the people, whom true disciples will not follow, as the new-won disciple had just shown (927, 28, 31-33), and who seek only their own ends and their own glory (cf. 544). With them Jesus contrasts himself as the Good Shepherd, who is devoted to the interests of his flock even unto death. In v. 15, the relation of the Shepherd to the sheep is likened to that of the Father and the Son (it is his intimacy with God that is the motive of the sacrifice no less than his care for his disciples; cf. v. 18). As Jesus contemplates that sacrifice, a larger flock than these Judæan disciples presents itself as the object of his solicitude. The sacrifice is voluntary, even though God desires it, and he approves it because it is freely made. It is thus that the unity of purpose of Father and Son is manifested (see v. 30, which follows v. 18 much more fittingly than it follows v. 29).

19-42. The Feast of the Dedication. The sequence of thought in vv. 19-29 has been indicated above; only some details need comment. The Feast of Dedication kept in remembrance the restoration of the services in the Temple in 165 B.C. by the Maccabees after three years' desecration under the Syrian king, Antiochus Epiphanes (pp. 755-7). It began on December 25 and lasted eight days. Peter spoke to the crowd in Solomon's porch (v. 23) after the cure of the lame beggar (Acts 3¹¹). The better attested reading in v. 29 in R.V. mg. seems exegetically impossible, unless the meaning is that in the disciples greater works than even those which he is doing will be done by the Father (cf. 142⁸). V. 30 does not affirm a metaphysical unity, but a moral, and we must not read the later creeds into the words. As the claim to do as the Father did was by the Jews regarded as blasphemy (517), so was this claim, and another attempt at stoning is made. The argument Jesus advances in self-defense (vv. 34-36) puts his claim to speak of his relation to God as he does on a less metaphysical basis. If men whom God has appointed as his agents can be addressed as gods (Psa. 82⁶) much more can one whom God set apart and sent into the world call himself without blasphemy the Son of God. He makes a last appeal for faith on the ground that his works confirm his claim. Escaping from their hands, Jesus retires for safety to Peraea, the scene of the Baptist's ministry. The ministry in this region is confirmed by Mk. 10¹ and Lk. 13³¹. The familiar scene recalled to some of his followers the witness of John, and faith was confirmed.

CHAPTER XI

1-44. The Raising of Lazarus. This narrative raises greater difficulty than any other portion of the Gospel; the problem of miracle is here presented in its acutest form; but that problem confronts us in the Synoptics no less than in the fourth Gospel (see art., Miracles of N.T., p. 924a). The feeding of the five thousand and the walking on the water are in the Synoptic tradition also; the turning of the water into wine is not more incredible than these nature miracles. The miracles of healing in this Gospel do not assume a more supernatural power than those in the Synoptic record. The restoration of Lazarus is not the only instance of the raising of the dead. The three Synoptics record the case of the daughter of Jairus (Mt. 9:18-26 Mk. 5:35-43 Lk. 8:49-56). Luke alone records the raising of the widow's son of Nain (7:11-17). The scholar betrays his modern naturalistic standpoint when he charges Luke with outbidding the common Synoptic tradition, since the daughter of Jairus had just died, and the widow's son was on the way to burial. Would the difference of time for the Evangelist enhance the wonder of the miracle? While v. 39 in this chapter does suggest a desire to magnify the greatness of the miracle, does a longer lapse of time, unless corruption has set in, make it more difficult to believe this miracle than those—if, indeed, we are dealing with miracles? To the explanation of v. 39 we must return; but meanwhile we may ask the question: Do we know enough about what death involves as regards the relation of soul and body to be able to say when, if restoration be at all possible, it becomes impossible? The record about Lazarus does not challenge the trustworthiness of the fourth Gospel more than the records of restoration from the dead in the Synoptics do theirs. Whether the Son of God incarnate, who was himself raised from the dead, could or could not work such a miracle is a problem which a commentary cannot attempt to solve, but the solution of which will depend on the Christology which any writer feels justified on all the evidence in holding. Speaking for himself, the present writer will not deny the credibility of this narrative.

Another difficulty in addition to that inherent in the nature of the miracle itself is the silence of the Synoptics. A miracle which according to the Gospel made such an impression on the Jews (v. 45), and which led the rulers to take counsel to put Jesus to death (v. 53), must, it is said, have been recorded by the Synoptists. But it has already been shown that the Synoptic record is almost exclusively concerned with the Galilæan ministry. Peter, whose preaching was the basis of the Synoptic tradition, is not mentioned as present in Bethany, or even when the news of Lazarus' illness came to Jesus. Had he been, would he not have spoken, as he was always ready to do? Thomas is the only one of the Twelve mentioned by name. The Synoptics, it is said, connect the decision of the rulers with the cleansing of the Temple, and the author of the fourth Gospel, having used that incident at the beginning, substitutes for it the story of this miracle. The Synoptics do not show that intimate knowledge of the Jerusalem situation which this Gospel shows (11:53); and in their ignorance of the other grounds of provocation of the rulers they fixed on the one which alone was known to them. Much more probable, however, is John's representation that the resolve to get Jesus out of the way had many grounds.

A careful examination of the narrative justifies these conclusions: (1) that the Witness was not present throughout, although he may have been at the grave, or in close touch with the sisters; (2) that his report was worked over by the Evangelist, who elsewhere shows a tendency to exaggerate the supernaturalness of Jesus' knowledge and power; and (3) that the redactor with his interest in the Galilæan disciples may have inserted the name "Thomas." Some of the grounds for this conclusion may be mentioned in examining the narrative in detail.

V. 2 points forward to 12:1-8 (cf. Lk. 10:38-42). V. 3, Lord, anticipates the post-resurrection title as in other places. V. 4 may mean either that Jesus did not anticipate death, or was confident that he could restore from the dead; while the first is the more probable, the second seems to be what the narrative intends. Compared with 9:3, 4 the emphasis on the glorifying of the Son of man seems improbable. The Witness reads the result back into the intention. Would one who loved as v. 5 assures us think at such a time of the credit the issue of the illness might bring to himself? While v. 6 gives the impression that the delay was due to the intention that death should take place, and so a greater miracle should be performed, it need not mean more than that Jesus was waiting now as always for the divine indication (cf. 2^a 76). When that came he obeyed, despite the danger pointed out by the disciples, because he is certain that as long as duty guides safety is assured until the appointed hour comes (cf. 94. 5). How Jesus knew of Lazarus' death we know not, unless in his waiting upon God the intuition needed at the moment came; what his intimacy with God made possible to him our psychology cannot explore; he conveys the knowledge to his disciples in figurative language, which shows his confidence in what God will do by him; he can speak of restoration from death as awakening from sleep. The declaration in v. 15 as in v. 4 cannot have fallen from the lips of Jesus. The opportunity of working a miracle which would confirm the faith of his disciples cannot have been so great a compensation to him for the sorrow of the two sisters as to justify gladness. Submission to God's will in the death of his friend, assurance that God's power would be so used through him as to turn sorrow into joy there may have been, but not so as to overcome his natural grief. Surely this Stoic pose which later theological thought assigned to him is inconsistent with what is recorded in vv. 33, 35, 38, and is much less attractive and impressive. The references to Thomas in 14⁵ and 20²⁵ are not inconsistent with the brave summons: a feeble faith can, when proved, be faithful (v. 16).

As burial followed death quickly, the four days (v. 17) indicate the time since the death. This is mentioned here to indicate (as Martha's words in v. 39) that corruption had set in; and thus to enhance the greatness of the miracle, as the restoration would involve that either the process of decay had been prevented, or was reversed. That the one or the other is impossible with God we cannot affirm, unless our point of view is wholly naturalistic. One way out of the difficulty may be mentioned, although with no assurance that we are justified in taking it. In v. 39, dead is printed in italics to show that the word is not in the Greek text; what stands there is, "he is in the fourth day," and this may have referred originally to the duration of the illness, and not the time of death. In that event, a misunderstanding of the expression could have started the tradition which ended in the words ascribed to Martha. If these words are authentic, at the most they express her surmise, and do not necessarily record a fact.

It is a relief to turn from all these difficulties which a commentary cannot honestly shirk to a narrative that for the most part can claim historical probability in its main features. Martha as the older is probably told first, and so goes out to meet Jesus. Her natural regret at his absence is compensated for by the confidence his presence inspires. The assurance of Jesus does not itself indicate restoration of bodily life, but recalls her to the higher life which death cannot affect. The current Jewish hope of resurrection (see arts., Inter-testamental Religion, p. 210; Religion of Israel, p. 173; Backgrounds, p. 846b), to which she thinks Jesus is alluding, does not offer her the comfort she craves. The assurance of vv. 25, 26 is in entire accord with the teaching of the Gospel. Through faith in Jesus men are brought into such a relation to God as assures eternal life (cf. the argument in Mk. 12^{26, 27} that relation to God assures immortality); for them physical death does not involve spiritual. Not able to understand, she is content to confess her faith in him as Messiah. Jesus' desire for a private conversation with Mary, who would have proved more understanding (cf. Lk. 10⁴²), was defeated by the number accompanying her (the Jews were the opponents of Jesus). Her complaint, which showed her faith, moves Jesus deeply, but he severely restrains himself, and is distressed lest he should break down (see v. 33, R.V. mg.). When he reaches the tomb his emotions overcome him (his sorrow for his friend and his sympathy with the sisters explain the tears). The bystanders are variously affected; some even mock; the grief, they think, must be feigned, since the occasion of it might have been prevented. In the renewed emotion, indignation at this unbelief may have had a part. Martha's remonstrance in v. 39 has already been discussed; it is met by the assurance that the issue will be for God's glory. The thanksgiving of Jesus for answered prayer (v. 41) suggests that not only had Jesus been waiting upon God since the news of Lazarus' illness reached him, but that probably all the miracles were answers to prayers (see Mk. 9²⁹ and cf. art., Miracles of N.T., p. 926b). As he required faith in the recipients of the healing, so he exercised faith as the agent of God in healing. V. 42 introduces the same discordant element as vv. 4 and 15. Was Jesus always, even in his intimacy with God, thinking of the impression to be made on men, the assertion of his claims? Rather, was not the cry Lazarus, come forth! a confession of triumphant faith that God had raised the dead, even as the cry "Peace, be still" (Mk. 4³⁹) that he had allayed the tempest?

45-57. The Consequent Decision of the Jews. Apprehending the danger of a Messianic movement as a result of the growing popularity of Jesus, and of a loss in consequence of such privileges as a nation as the Romans had left them, the rulers resolved that some decisive measures were necessary.

Caiaphas, "a worldly ecclesiastic," demands the death of one man rather than the ruin of the nation (v. 50). In this the Witness sees an unconscious prophecy of the universal salvation which should be secured by the death of Jesus; to him it seems fitting that, however unworthy, the high priest should be used by God for such an oracle. His minute knowledge of things Jewish forbids the inference that he regarded the high priesthood as an annual appointment. That year means the year so significant, because of the death. Jesus, aware of his danger, withdrew to Ephraim, a place thirteen miles north of Jerusalem in the wilderness of Bethaven. The people who came up earlier to prepare for the feast were wondering whether he would run the risk of coming to it himself.

CHAPTER XII

The last section of the Gospel, which begins with this act of homage, may be described as the Glory. Here the Gospel is often on common ground with the Synoptics.

I-II. The Anointing in Bethany. This passage is parallel to Mt. 26⁶⁻¹⁶ and Mk. 14³⁻⁹ (note); but not to Lk. 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰ (note), which refers to another incident, and is not a variant of the same (even though in John's record there is agreement in one detail as against Mark and Matthew, namely, that Mary anointed the feet, and not the head) since, as has already been indicated, the Witness and Luke derived their material from the same circles in or near Jerusalem (see intro., p. 1061). Mark (143) places this incident in the house of Simon the leper; he may have been a neighbor of the sisters or, as Luke (10³⁸) speaks of Martha's house, she may have been his widow. Mark dates the incident only two days before the Passion if Mk. 14¹ is a note of time for this incident also; but possibly the devotion of Mary is recorded just before the treachery of Judas (Mk. 14^{10, 11}) to throw the contrast into bolder relief. It is probable that John is right; and that the feast was held on the Sabbath evening.

The spikenard in v. 3 is explained in R.V. mg. of Mk. 14³ as follows: "Gr. pistic nard, 'pistic' being perhaps a local name. Others take it to mean 'genuine,' others 'liquid'" (cf. A.S.V. mg.). Here the murmuring is ascribed to Judas (in Mk. 14⁴ to "some"), and in this complaint a selfish motive is assigned to him: the Witness may have had independent knowledge of Judas, or in his hatred of the traitor may have been ready to believe any evil of him. In Mk. 14⁶⁻⁸ the defense of Mary is fuller, and its meaning clearer; what she had done was done in anticipation of his burial.

Here the meaning is: "Let her keep what remains of the ointment to be used at my burial"—a word of warning to his disciples of the impending tragedy. The hatred of the chief priests toward Jesus may have been extended to Lazarus, the cause of Jesus' increased popularity (vv. 10, 11). The fourth Gospel, being written so long after the event, can give the names more fully than could the Synoptic tradition.

12-19. The Triumphal Entry. This incident is told with less detail than by the Synoptists (Mt. 21¹⁻¹¹, notes). As it was for the most part a demonstration by the Galilean pilgrims, it may not have had the same interest for the Witness, a Jerusalemite. The greeting from Psa. 118²⁶ may have been addressed to all pilgrims; but it is made a Messianic declaration by the words even the King of Israel. How the ass was found is not told, as in Mk. 11¹⁻⁶; it may be because the Witness himself furnished it; but the quotation from Zech. 9⁹ is given (v. 15). Jesus accepted the homage as Messiah, and in riding on an ass indicated that he came not as a warrior King but as the prophet expected—"lowly". V. 16 is a characteristic comment of the Evangelist's; in the light of later days, events disclosed their meaning. Vv. 17, 18 show the importance which for the Witness the raising of Lazarus had; but the motive here assigned would affect only the Judæans; and v. 19 is another sign of how clearly he followed the development of the hostility to Jesus. The cleansing of the Temple is omitted because a similar act was recorded at the beginning of the ministry, and because the significance attached to it in the Synoptics is replaced by other considerations.

20-36. The Request of the Greeks. This narrative combines the interest in the Galilean disciples and the imperfect reproduction of Synoptic material, which characterizes the redactor's insertions (cf. intro., p. 1062a). The occasion of the group of sayings here brought together would be more probable in Galilee than in Jerusalem. After the request is made the Greeks are not mentioned, and Jesus declares the necessity of his death for the fulfillment of his purpose. While v. 24 recalls 1 Cor. 15^{36, 37}, it is a saying which is fitting on the lips of Jesus, who spoke the parable of the sower (Mt. 13¹⁻⁹). Vv. 25, 26 recall Mk. 8³⁴⁻³⁸. Only by sacrifice could he, or his disciples, fulfill their calling. Vv. 27, 28 seem to reproduce the import of Gethsemane, and the Voice experienced at the baptism (Mk. 1¹¹) and the transfiguration (Mk. 9⁷). But is it credible that before an indifferent or even hostile crowd, such a sacred scene of intimate communion with God can have been enacted?

Some manifestation, variously interpreted by the people, there may have been (v. 29); and to this the words of Jesus (vv. 30–32) may refer. In his exaltation by death there would be judgment on the world's unbelief, and overthrow of the power of evil in this world (on Satan, cf. Lk. 10¹⁸ Col. 2¹⁵); and the sphere of his influence would be extended (cf. 313, 14 682). The Evangelist's comment in v. 33 narrows the reference unduly; both resurrection and ascension are included. Such a declaration perplexes the multitude, as contrary to popular expectations of the Messiah based on the apocalyptic teaching (cf. p. 1015). With a final appeal to use the fast receding opportunity, Jesus withdraws. It is probable that vv. 44–50, a summary of the teaching that had been given, preceded vv. 37–43, the Witness' or the Evangelist's estimate, justified by prophecy.

37–43. The Results of the Ministry. The failure, despite the miracles as signs of a divine mission, is explained by prophecy, Isa. 53¹, the Messiah being regarded as the arm of the Lord; and also its deeper cause in spiritual insensibility (Isa. 69¹⁰). V. 41 expresses the current view of prophecy, as anticipation of future events. The failure was not total, but self-interest prevented some from an open confession.

44–50. The Summary of the Teaching. Belief in Christ is belief in God. While his coming is for salvation, to unbelief it proves condemnation; for the revelation rejected is divine, and its acceptance brings eternal life.

CHAPTER XIII

1–20. The Washing of the Disciples' Feet.

The story bears the signs of the eyewitness; possibly the beloved disciple was himself the host; and his telling of the tale is a confession of failure to fulfill one of the demands of hospitality—the provision of a slave to wash the feet of the guests, necessary to comfort in a hot and dusty country, in which sandals were worn (cf. Lk. 7⁴⁴). The failure may have been passed over in Peter's record (Mk. 14^{12–26}) out of consideration for a fellow disciple. The interpretation of Jesus' consciousness in vv. 1 and 3 is cast in more theological terms than would be the thoughts of Jesus; but he was conscious both of his own dignity and the humility of the act as a last service of love, rebuking the ambitions and rivalries of the disciples, which were a danger to the cause he was intrusting to them. V. 2 is inserted to show that even treachery could not quench his love. Peter's characteristic first remonstrance is met by a summons to present trust, an assurance of future understanding; the second by an indication of the symbolic character of the act; only as cleansed by him could the disciples remain one. The deed was sacramental as well as exemplary. Peter as usual rushes from one extreme to another, and is answered with a homely proverb, He that is bathed, needeth not to wash (v. 10, R.V. mg.). The thought of the traitor weighs heavily on the mind of Jesus. V. 11 seems an unnecessary explanation. Asserting his dignity as acknowledged by the disciples, Jesus points to the humility of his act as exemplary; setting an example often involves a moral pose; but here there was a moral necessity to bring about the change in the disciples, without which they would be unfit to carry on his work. The way to happiness for them is not that which they are now taking, but that of acknowledging and following him as Master, not deeming too servile what he by his own act has commended. Again his mind reverts to the traitor. From his insight no character or motive was concealed. In this treachery he recognizes the fulfillment of prophecy (Psa. 41⁹). The explanation of the reference to future events (v. 19) as a means of confirming faith seems unnatural on the lips of Jesus at such a moment of tense feeling. If it belongs to this context at all, v. 20 should follow v. 17 as carrying on the thought, that such service rendered to a fellow disciple is rendered to Jesus, and through him to God; but it recalls Mk. 9³⁷, where it is in an entirely appropriate setting.

21–30. The Traitor Unmasked. Some scholars would insert chs. 15 and 16 between v. 20 and v. 21. The failure of Judas was grief to Jesus (cf. 12²⁷); and, unable to be silent longer, he speaks plainly. Instead of the looks of amazement and inward doubts, the Synoptists record a question from each to Jesus (Mk. 14¹⁹, notes). Jesus' answer conveys no more than that the traitor is at the table. The fourth Gospel records a more definite intimation to one of those present—the host, who occupied the place of honor next Jesus, and whose presence there may have excited the jealousy, which the lowly service rebuked. Peter by a gesture induced him to ask the question. The position described is not one of special endearment, but the normal, where the guests reclined on couches round the table. By leaning back, this disciple could hear the answer as others did not. The giving of the sop, or handling of a choice morsel, was common at a meal. In itself, therefore, it did not serve as a sign, although the fact that it was given to Judas first was significant for the host, but probably for no other; would Peter or even John, the son of Zebedee (cf. Lk. 9⁵⁴), have allowed the traitor to depart? V. 27 presents a difficulty: did Jesus' action provoke the resolve, as the strong symbolic language suggests, or was a purpose long maturing at last made final? Jesus' dismissal is not an approval or command, as though he were using Judas as a tool that the divine purpose might be fulfilled; it is an acquiescence in a resolve which his insight showed was so fixed as morally to be the equivalent of the deed. The act produced a reaction (Mt. 27³), while a resolve hindered of fulfillment would have bred inward corruption; even for the traitor the love of Jesus acted for the best. Jesus' words were not understood; that some "business" was still possible shows that the feast had not begun. The night into which Judas passed from the lighted upper room was symbolic of his state.

31-38. The Parting Command and the Warning to Peter. Moffatt in his translation of the N.T. places chs. 15 and 16 after v. 31a, and it must be admitted that 13^{31b-14³¹} is a more appropriate close of the talk; 14³¹ indicates that Jesus rose from the table, and that the prayer (ch. 17) was uttered as all stood, ready to go forth to Gethsemane; other indications, too minute to mention here, point to some such sequence. Other arrangements have been suggested: the only one which need be mentioned is that chs. 15 and 16 should follow 13³⁵. In this arrangement Jesus, relieved in spirit by the withdrawal of the traitor, rose from depression to exaltation of spirit; in his passion, now so near, he anticipated his triumph, in which he would be honored, and God in him. But his triumph meant separation from his disciples. Using the term of endearment little children, he warned them how short their time together would be. They must compensate for his absence from among them by their love to one another, which will be a constant witness to the world of their relation to him.

The fourth Gospel is silent in regard to the Last Supper; the silence may be due to the absence of the Witness, who may have followed Judas to discover what he and also the opponents of Jesus were doing; or he may have disapproved of superstitious ideas that by the end of the century were attaching themselves to the ordinance (cf. 6⁶³), of which the insertion in 6⁵²⁻⁵⁸ (see notes there) gives an indication; or he may not have attached such importance to the ordinance as the church at an early date did. It is suggested that the new commandment (v. 34) refers to the institution, the purpose of which is to promote mutual love of the disciples. Peter's remonstrance against any separation leads to the warning of his betrayal. It is placed on the way to Gethsemane in Mk. 14²⁹, another indication that the present arrangement of the record is not the original and historical.

CHAPTER XIV

1-31. The Last Talk. In the talk and prayer (ch. 17) we have not and cannot expect to have a verbatim report. The characteristic vocabulary of the Witness and the Evangelist appears; reminiscence passes over into reflection, and comment is added. Pregnant sayings of Jesus were developed in the meditation of the Witness; and sayings from other contexts were attracted by association of ideas into this context. But that the substance of the teaching fell from the lips of Jesus we need not doubt. Could even a spiritual genius have developed these truths in his meditations, unless there were utterances of Jesus which served as the starting-point? The Jesus of these chapters satisfies religious aspiration fully.

The main current of the thought must be briefly traced. The sorrow of separation could be comforted by faith in him, and in God through him (the disciples began with trusting in their Master, and through that trust gained faith in God). There is room for them in the Father's house (heaven and earth are not distinguished, but as Jesus was himself departing from this world, he is probably thinking of the world unseen). Had they any doubts, he would have removed them by the assurance that the object of his departure is to prepare for the disciples. Yet the departure will be followed by a return (either at the Second Advent, according to the current eschatology, or at death; cf. 2 Cor. 5⁶⁻⁸). They surely understand now that his death is the only way for such preparation for them, and return to them. Thomas' protest of ignorance is met by Jesus' assurance that he himself, as truth revealing God and as life renewing them, is the mediator with the Father, bringing men to God and God to men; since the revelation of God as Father was so certain in him, that knowledge should be inevitable for those who knew him as they did. Misunderstanding the words have seen (v. 7) as referring to physical and not spiritual vision, Philip asks for a theophany such as Moses and the prophets experienced. Such a request shows failure to perceive that the union of the Father and Son had been such that the words spoken were God's, and the deeds done God's, so as to command faith. Great as had been the revelation in him, his departure to the Father would enable his disciples to accomplish a still greater work (v. 12; the limitation of the ministry in time and place is what is referred to here). But the relation to him of his disciples must be one of dependence in prayer, and obedience in love, if this greater work is to be done by them.

In v. 16 a theme is introduced which, present in the Synoptics, has a larger place in this Gospel, especially in these discourses, the gift of the Holy Spirit. The Baptist foretold that the Messiah would baptize with the Holy Ghost and fire (Mt. 3¹¹). Jesus recognized the working of the Spirit in his own ministry (Mt. 12²⁸), and promised it to the disciples (Mt. 10²⁰). After the resurrection, the descent of the Spirit as power from God was expected (Lk. 24⁴⁹ Acts 1^{4, 5}). In the Synoptics and Acts the Spirit is conceived as source of supernatural powers; in these discourses as cleansing, enlightening, and renewing grace, as also in Paul; but while in Paul sanctification is stressed, here it is illumination: God will give, in answer to Jesus' prayer, this invisible Divine Presence to be to the disciples what he has been, one called to the side of another to counsel and to help. As Christ is also called Paraclete (or Advocate) in 1 Jn. 2¹, it is evident that the Spirit's presence is not a substitute for Christ's but only makes that presence, and the Father's presence in him, more real. A condition of the realization of the presence, however, is love's obedience. Judas' inability (v. 22) to understand how a presence invisible to the world can be real to the disciples leads to a repetition of the condition—love's obedience. In relation to the present teaching the Spirit, who will continue the revelation (i.e., will be sent in the name), will recall it, and supplement it. V. 29 is one of those comments which betray the Evangelist's mind. The parting is close at hand, the Hebrew Shalom (peace) is given; but invested with what fullness of meaning! It is his very own peace, unlike any the world can give. With such an assurance, there should be not sorrow, but joy in his departure, the return of the Son to the Father, the greater. The hour of the final struggle with evil is at hand, and will not end in defeat; but the Father's summons to meet it is accepted.

There are here two thoughts for Christology: (1) the earthly life was a relative separation compared to the heavenly; and (2) the Son regards himself as dependent on and subordinate to the Father.

CHAPTER XV

1-17. The Vine. There may have been a parable of the care of the vinedresser for the vineyard (cf. Isa. 51-7), as of the shepherd for the sheep (10¹⁻¹⁸); but that has been allegorized, and the dominant thought is the dependence of the branches on the stem. The allegory is not carried out consistently, but literal and figurative sayings are interwoven. V. 2 seems to refer to Judas, who had cut himself off, as we should say; but whom God had taken away, as Jesus, ascribing all to the Father's will, thought. Ability for Christian service depends on communion with Jesus, as the source of truth and life. Assurance in prayer is also a result of such communion. The disciples will prove their discipleship, and bring glory to God by faithfulness. This communion is the reception and the response of love, a love like that of Father and Son, and shown, as is the Son's, by obedience. In such loving obedience the disciples can come to share the Master's joy. This loving obedience will be shown in the mutual love of the disciples for one another. He is giving the greatest proof of his love for them in his sacrifice. Although in v. 16 the thoughts of vv. 4, 5, and 7 recur, in vv. 13-16 another illustration emerges—that of friendship. He shows his friendship in his sacrifice; they in their obedience. No longer incompletely as to servants, but wholly as to friends, he fully discloses to them all he knows from the Father. The initiative in this friendship was not theirs, but his. V. 17 repeats v. 12. Throughout these discourses we have this constant movement around one central thought, suggesting that the Witness' mind kept revolving around certain sayings of Jesus which he remembered.

18-27. The World's Hatred. In contrast to the relation of the disciples to their Master and one another will be their relation to the world. As he is hated so will they be, because they do not follow the world's ways, but are walking in his way; they as servants can only expect what he has experienced. This persecution of disciples and Master shows ignorance of God, a culpable ignorance, as the persecutors have hated God's messenger, rejected his words, and the witness of his works. Here (vv. 21-24) recur thoughts often repeated in the controversies. This unjustified hostility too had been foretold (Psa. 35¹⁹). V. 25 seems to belong to the current Christian apologetic in Ephesus rather than to Jesus in the upper room; 16¹⁻⁴ follows on vv. 18-25, and vv. 26, 27 seem to break the continuity. The connection of thought, however, might be as follows: Despite all persecution, truth will prevail over error, since through the Spirit, whose function it is to impart the truth, and who comes from the source of truth himself, God will bear witness to Jesus; and as the channels of that Spirit, so will the disciples also bear witness, to whom his whole ministry has been known. The words used in v. 26, which proceedeth from the Father, have been made the basis of the doctrine of the procession of the Spirit. The Son is begotten, the Spirit proceeds; in the Greek view, the proceeding is from the Father only; in the Latin view, from the Son also; in a mediating view, from the Father through the Son.

CHAPTER XVI

1-4. The Warnings of Persecution. The chapter division here is a blunder, as these verses continue the theme of 15¹⁸⁻²⁷: a plain warning is given of the persecution which the disciples may expect, so that, forewarned, their faith may not fail. The reserve that had hitherto been employed must now cease, as the departure is near. This persecution will be regarded as a service acceptable unto God, because the revelation of God in the Son has been refused.

5-24. The Sorrow of the Disciples at the Departure. The reproach of v. 5 sounds strange after Peter's question (13³⁶), and Thomas' bewilderment (14⁵), an indication of the displacement of these two chs. 15 and 16. Their sorrow is offered the comfort that the departure will be for their advantage, as it is the condition of the fulfillment of the promise of the Spirit. Two reasons for this condition can be suggested: (1) the disciples could not experience the invisible presence till the visible had been withdrawn; and (2) the work of Christ in death and rising again had to be accomplished before the new life in the Spirit could become the possession of believers.

In the exposition here (vv. 7-15) the work of the Spirit is related to the world, to the disciples, and to Jesus himself. The relation to the world, i.e., mankind, indifferent and even hostile to God, is threefold: the Spirit exposes sin as shown in unbelief toward Christ, vindicates righteousness in witnessing to the triumph of the Son, and executes judgment in Satan's overthrow by Christ. The relation to the disciples is this: the Spirit will give the teaching which owing to their incapacity they cannot receive from Jesus himself; but the teaching will always be subordinate to that of the Son. The words in v. 13 give expression to the current appreciation of prophecy as prediction. The relation to Christ is one of subordination, as the Son's relation to the Father is primary. As the thought of v. 16 links up closely with the thought of v. 6, the conclusion forces itself upon one that this passage—as also the others dealing with the Spirit, which can even in the same way be shown to break the continuity—does not belong to the present context; and that it should be regarded rather as an exposition of Christian experience than a prediction of Christ's, one of the things the disciples could not bear, but into which the Spirit would lead them.

The reference of Jesus to his approaching departure (vv. 16, 17) bewildered the disciples, and he, aware of this, sought to relieve them by the assurance that, just as a woman's sorrow is turned into joy when the child is born, so will their sorrow at his departure be turned to joy on his return in a communion, in which they will have no perplexity to be removed, and in which all requests in his name will be met.

25-33. The Disciples Profess to Understand Jesus. The time comes, says Jesus, when there will be no need of figurative language (v. 25; parables, R.V. mg.; dark sayings, A.S.V.); but the Father will be plainly revealed. No need of his intercession, as the Father's love will be made manifest in response to their love and faith in him as God's messenger, who comes from and goes back to God. The avowal by the disciples of their clear understanding and full faith in him is followed by his warning that they will all forsake him, but the Father will still be with him. What he has taught has been necessary to give them peace in himself amid all the distresses they will meet in the world. In his conquest they may find the inspiration of courage.

CHAPTER XVII

The High-Priestly Prayer. In dealing with so sacred a theme the voice of criticism may appear an unwelcome intrusion; but for the understanding of the passage it must be pointed out that, even if the substance of the prayer was spoken by Jesus as he and his disciples stood ready to go forth to Gethsemane, the language is that of Witness or Evangelist. This prayer is in form more of a soliloquy than petition. On this occasion, the disciples were privileged to overhear his converse with his Father. While throughout reminiscence has been transformed by reflection, yet only in two places does the recorder obtrude himself. V. 3 is quite obviously a theological reflection, the term "Jesus Christ" distinctly points to a later date. So also vv. 12, 13 seem incongruous, especially the reference to the fulfillment of prophecy in v. 12. (The phrase son of perdition illustrates a Hebrew usage: it means one closely related to destruction, "a lost soul." Cf. 2 Thess. 2³—"the man of sin"; Mt. 23¹⁵—"a son of Hell.") The first part of the prayer refers to Christ himself (vv. 1-8); the second to the disciples (vv. 9-19); and the third to the wider circle of believers (vv. 20-26).

1-8. The Prayer of Christ on His Own Behalf. Conscious that the appointed time for the fulfillment of his calling has come, he prays that God may so honor him in becoming the bearer of life to all men (flesh—man as natural and mortal) that by him God himself may be honored. The finished task warrants the reward of the recovery of all that as Son he had eternally enjoyed. (Is this reference to pre-existence in v. 5 due to the theology of the Gospel, or does it express Jesus' self-consciousness? Cf. 858, and the note there.) For this Gospel the resurrection meant a recovery of what had been already possessed; for Paul it meant a gain of a further exaltation as reward for the humiliation (cf. Rom. 14 Phil. 29-31). Those whom God had given him (guided to him by the Spirit, cf. Mt. 16¹⁷) had received from him and had accepted the revelation of the relation of the Father and the Son.

9-19. The Prayer of Christ for His Present Disciples. Confining his regard to the disciples as his and God's peculiar possession, in view of his departure and their continuance in the world, he intercedes on their behalf for God's preservation of them in the revelation which has come through him, so that their unity may be even as that of Father and Son. His guardianship, now ending, has availed for all except the one disciple, doomed by his character to ruin. His intercourse with them has completed their joy; although it has brought on them the world's hostility. He prays not for their removal from, but their preservation amid, the evil of the world (probably the evil is thought of as personal, v. 15). Their separation from the world, like his, because of their relation to him will be completed by God's making them holy as he himself is by means of the truth in his revelation. Himself God's missionary, he makes them his missionaries. His consecration of himself is in view of their consecration of themselves to their mission.

20-26. The Prayer of Christ for His Future Disciples. From the messengers the prayer turns to those who receive their message, that their unity in the Father and Son, as pattern of theirs with one another, may be extended, so as to convince the world of his divine mission. As the Father honors the Son, so has he, the Son, honored believers with a mutual indwelling for the completion of their unity as evidence of his mission, as the channel to them of the same love as the Father gives the Son. For these believers, the Father's gift, he desires that they may share with him the honor, which his return to the Father will bring, a token of God's eternal love to him (cf. v. 5). The appeal is to God as righteous to reward those who in an unbelieving world did believe, so that God's love to the Son might be theirs in the presence of the Son in them.

It is possible only to trace the course of thought in this chapter without attempting to explain every detail, for here also meditation revolves around a few centers.

CHAPTER XVIII

1-11. The Arrest. Here, to the end of the Gospel, John follows the Synoptics (Mk. 14 43-50, notes). A minute comparison of the varying narratives need not be attempted, but attention may be called to the important differences. In this passage we are at once confronted with the question, Why does not John record the agony in Gethsemane? We need not rashly offer the explanation that the fact was inconsistent with his doctrine of the person, as he does recognize that Jesus was fully subject to emotion (1133, 35, 38 1227). If, as is here maintained, the source of most of the material is the report of an eyewitness, the simpler explanation is that he was absent, having hastened from the upper room to discover what steps were being taken by the authorities, and that he returned with the company sent to arrest Jesus. This company included a cohort (v. 3, R.V. mg.) of Roman soldiers as well as the Temple guards; and Judas served as guide to the place of retirement familiar to him. In this record Jesus does not wait for the traitor's kiss, the sign of identification given to the captors (Mk. 14 44, 45), but freely offers himself (this is in accordance with the characteristic of the Gospel to insist on Jesus' initiative; 143 24 47 56). There was no further need of the services of Judas. In some confusion at the boldness displayed, the soldiers drew back, and some may have fallen. As at Nazareth (Lk. 4³⁰), so here, the presence of Jesus may for a moment have overawed. Jesus' solicitude about his disciples gives the Evangelist occasion for pointing out a fulfillment of prophecy (v. 9). The name of the servant is not added as a bit of literary realism, but may have been known to the Witness. The words of Jesus in v. 11 recall the prayer in the garden (Mk. 14³⁶); and the Witness, having heard of the agony from some disciple present, may have misplaced them here.

12-27. The Jewish Trial. It is not easy to follow the course of events. If Annas, although no longer high priest, was an instigator of the arrest, it is not at all improbable that there was a private preliminary inquiry in his house, although no mention is made of it in the Synoptic tradition. The Witness, at home in Jerusalem, having free access to the priestly homes (v. 15), may have been present in the house of Annas, while Peter knew only of the public trial before Caiaphas. But conceding this possibility, there still remain these difficulties: (1) Why is the account of Peter's denial broken in two (vv. 15–18, 25–27), whereas the Synoptics give a continuous narrative? (See Mk. 14⁶⁶⁻⁷².) (2) If the high priest of vv. 15 and 19 be Caiaphas, as v. 13 states, how does v. 24 assert that he was sent from Annas to Caiaphas? (3) If, however, the high priest of these verses be Annas, not only is there an inaccuracy in the description, but Peter must have known of this inquiry before Annas, and the silence of Mark remains unexplained. The solution of the problem seems to be this: that the redactor has inserted the story of Peter's denial, and has done so unskillfully, bringing about a displacement, and that v. 24 should follow v. 14. The record in vv. 19–23 is not of this private inquiry in the house of Annas, but of the public trial before Caiaphas. If the Witness was another disciple (v. 15), as is here assumed, after obtaining admission for Peter, he entered the high priest's court himself, and was present at the time. The story of Peter's denial does not come from him, and the minor differences between the report here and the Synoptic record are easily explained by variant tradition or by the redactor's imperfect knowledge. Jesus' answer to the high priest in v. 20 agrees substantially with his remonstrance to his captors in Mk. 14⁴⁹. Sayings were remembered, not always their setting. The detail in v. 22 may be more accurate than the more general statement of Mk. 14⁶⁵. This last denial (v. 25) may have taken place just as Jesus passed through the court yard, and there may have been given the look which brought penitence (Lk. 22⁶¹).

28–32. The Transfer of the Trial to Pilate. The scene of the trial before Pilate was the palace (mg. praetorium), either Herod's palace in the western part of the city, or Antonia, at the northwestern corner of the Temple precinct (see Acts 21³¹⁻³⁷ 22²⁴—"the castle"). The reason given for the avoidance of defilement by entering a heathen's dwelling shows that the Passover was not passed, as the Synoptic records assume in regarding the Last Supper as the paschal meal; but that Jesus died when the paschal lambs were being slain. It is probable that the fourth Gospel is right. (See art., Chronology of N. T., p. 875b.) Avoiding a definite charge, the accusers are curtly dismissed; if it is a matter falling under their jurisdiction, let them attend to it. Determined on the capital sentence, which they are not at liberty to inflict, they insist that the charge is of sufficient gravity for the governor's notice. Here again the Evangelist sees a fulfillment of Jesus' prediction of crucifixion, since the Jewish method of execution was stoning (cf. Acts 7⁵⁹).

33–38a. The Private Examination by Pilate. This account is peculiar to the fourth Gospel, and the explanation is the same: the Witness had access to the governor as to the high priest. The interest of this Gospel in the truth may have colored the language in vv. 37, 38. Pilate's first question suggests that the Jews had made some more definite charge of sedition. Jesus in turn asks in what sense the term "King" is used, and assures Pilate that any Kingship he claims is no danger to Rome, since his supporters have taken no action to justify any suspicion. Asserting his Kingship in the realm of truth, he only provokes Pilate's scornful skepticism.

38b–40. The Attempt at Compromise. Deeming Jesus a harmless dreamer, and convinced of his innocence, Pilate tries to placate the Jewish fury by a compromise; having condemned Jesus he will release him in accordance with a custom at the feast. Luke (23⁷⁻¹²) records the previous attempt to transfer the trial to Herod. Mark (15⁸) represents the demand for the release of a prisoner as first coming from the people. While there is no direct evidence of such a custom, it agrees with the way Rome governed subject peoples. A papyrus of 85 A.D. contains the words, "Thou art worthy of scourging . . . but I give thee to the people." The people demand the release of Barabbas, probably a bandit patriot.

CHAPTER XIX

1–7. The Scourging and Mockery. Though acknowledged innocent, Jesus is scourged, usually the preliminary to crucifixion, and mocked by the soldiers, doubtless with a view to please the governor. Presenting him in his seemingly helpless misery, Pilate appeals to the compassion of the crowd. Whatever his offense, will not this content them? Instigated by the rulers the ominous cry is heard: Crucify him! Again trying to shirk responsibility, Pilate bids them wreak their own vengeance. Then the charge of blasphemy is made. Moved by his own superstition, or dreading Jewish fanaticism, he fears. (The message from his wife, Mt. 27¹⁹, may have added to his distress.)

8–11. The Second Private Examination. This second interview with Jesus within the palace is also peculiar to the fourth Gospel. Jesus' silence, a silence of judgment on the judge afraid to deal justly, irritates Pilate into an assertion of his authority, which Jesus meets with the reminder that all authority, as delegated, carries responsibility. Nevertheless, Pilate's sin is not so great as that of him by whom Jesus had been delivered (v. 11). It is uncertain whether Judas, Caiaphas, or Satan as instigator of all evil, is meant.

12-16. The Sentence Pronounced. Still more convinced of Jesus' innocence, and protesting his freedom from responsibility in the symbolic act of hand-washing (Mt. 27²⁴), Pilate is at last cowed into submission by the threat that, if he does not condemn Jesus, and passes over this charge of sedition, he may be accused of treason against the emperor. Preferring the counsels of prudence to the dictates of conscience, he passes formal sentence of crucifixion. (The derivation of the name Gabbatha is uncertain.) According to Mk. 15²⁵, Jesus was crucified at the third hour (9 A.M.). The sixth hour of v. 14 would be noon. The discrepancy has not been satisfactorily explained, either by ascribing to this Gospel another than the current reckoning of time or by appealing to the elastic notions of time in the East. (See art., Chronology of N.T., p. 874a.) A final despairing appeal to their patriotism is vain; as, to compass their end, they bow their heads to Cæsar's yoke. In their rage they even invoke God's judgment on themselves and their children (Mt. 27²⁵).

17-37. The Crucifixion. The statement that Jesus was bearing the cross for himself is characteristic; the independence of Jesus in action and passion is in this Gospel emphasized. It is unnecessary, however, to regard the statement, as some do, as a deliberate correction of the story of Simon of Cyrene (Mk. 15²¹). The omission of this story of Simon may also be due to the fact that some of the Gnostics asserted that Simon was crucified instead of Jesus. The Hebrew of v. 20 is probably Aramaic, the current language of the Jews, akin to the Hebrew. (See art., Backgrounds, pp. 842-3, and cf. p. 880a.) Pilate's refusal to amend the title illustrates the petulance of the feeble man. A coward in the great matter, he asserts himself in the small. It is conjectured that it was either when the nails were being driven into the hands and feet, or when the cross was being lifted up, that Jesus uttered the prayer for the forgiveness of his foes recorded by Luke (23³⁴), who also records (23⁴³) the assurance to the penitent thief of continued companionship through and after death. There is no ground for suspecting the fact in vv. 23, 24, even though there is this close correspondence with the words of the Psalm (22¹⁸). If his mother's sister (v. 25) was "the mother of Zebedee's children" (Mt. 27⁵⁶) and Salome (Mk. 15⁴⁰), it was fitting that the mother of Jesus should be intrusted to a nephew; but this assumes that the disciple whom Jesus loved was the son of Zebedee, an assumption against which reason has been shown (see p. 1065). If the Witness was the host in the Upper Room, and one who had a closer intimacy with Jesus, and if the mother of Jesus did not desire to return to Galilee, and especially to Nazareth to be exposed to mockery, and wished to linger in Jerusalem, it was fitting that such a charge was given to him and her. Even in dying, love was unforgetting. If the disciple led away the mother at that moment, his silence regarding the cry of desolation (Mt. 27⁴⁶ Mk. 15³⁴) does not prove his theological bias, but was due to the absence. So touching an incident need not be allegorized, as in the older commentaries, as referring to the relation of the Gentile churches to the Jewish church. Thirst was one of the aggravations of crucifixion; but the Evangelist invests an utterance, natural in the circumstances, with an artificial theological significance (v. 28). For hyssop we should probably substitute javelin. The Greek of the two words is closely similar. The last words here recorded (v. 30) express relief from suffering, confidence in a task accomplished. Luke (23⁴⁶) adds the prayer of self-committal to God as Father (cf. Psa. 31⁵). The demand of the Jews (v. 31) was based on Deut. 21²³; defilement especially at such a time must be avoided. The breaking of the legs was an act of mercy to hasten death. A spear thrust as an alternative to ensure death is quite a credible act. The physical result is declared by some medical testimony as also credible. The Evangelist's asseveration (v. 35) that the witness is true may have been made either to prove the reality of the death against a current heresy, Docetism (the heresy that Jesus' life in the flesh was all mere appearance, not reality), or in view of the symbolic significance afterward given to the fact (1 Jn. 5⁶). The facts being in themselves credible, there is no justification for regarding the statement as invented to prove the fulfillment of prophecy (Psa. 34²⁰ Zech. 12¹⁰). The record is, however, in contradiction with the words in the account of the institution of the Last Supper (1 Cor. 11²⁴), according to many ancient authorities. "This is my body which is broken for you" (A.V.), but R.V. reads "which is for you," following other MSS.

38-42. The Burial. Had Joseph not intervened, the body of Jesus would have been cast with the others into a pit (cf. Josh. 8²⁹ Isa. 66²⁴). He was a rich man (cf. Isa. 53⁹), and a member of the Sanhedrin (Mt. 27⁵⁷ Mk. 15⁴³). His act and that of Nicodemus showed how faith inspired courage. The details of the burial mark its temporary character.

CHAPTER XX

1-10. The Empty Tomb. (Mt. 28¹⁻¹⁰, notes.) John agrees with Luke in placing the appearances in Jerusalem, not in Galilee (as in Matthew, Mark and the Appendix to John—ch. 21). Mary Magdalene alone is mentioned; in the Synoptics "other women"; but the we of v. 2 implies their presence. Luke (24¹²) mentions Peter alone. Peter as always is swift in action; but the other disciple, probably younger in years, can be speedier of foot. The orderly arrangement of the grave clothes indicates that the body had not been stolen or removed, but that "the mortal had put on immortality," and had passed from the sensible to the supersensible sphere, leaving these behind in their former place. The comment in v. 9 indicates that there was no expectation, and that it was the appearance that first awakened the faith. (For further discussion, see art., Miracles of N.T., p. 930a.)

11-18. The Appearance to Mary Magdalene. Renan uses the fact that the appearance was first to Mary Magdalene as the basis of his explanation of the resurrection as due to subjective vision; a woman "out of whom went seven devils" (Lk. 8²) would be a violent demoniac, and in his judgment a fit subject for hallucinations. The phrase does not necessarily mean, however, that Mary had been insane. Moreover, the narrative itself carries the evidence of historical reality. The statement in vv. 11-18 is not in contradiction with that of vv. 1-10, as some scholars assume. For Mary may have returned alone to the tomb after, along with the other women, telling the disciples that it was empty; the word standing in v. 11 does not deny a possible departure and return; and the vision of angels in v. 12 may be accounted for by her highly wrought condition of feeling on account of the empty tomb (Lk. 24⁴ lends some confirmation to this trait in the story). The failure to recognize Jesus (cf. Lk. 24¹⁶) may indicate the change from the natural to the spiritual body (1 Cor. 15⁴⁴); but the familiar tone of the voice here (v. 16), the familiar gesture of the hands there (Lk. 24^{30, 31}), indicate a continuity despite change. The prohibition of the act of worship by touch (v. 17; cf. Mt. 28⁹) may mean that the old relation of sensible contact was over (yet Lk. 24³⁹ is a call to "handling" in relief of doubt); and the new spiritual relation must await the Ascension. The difference of the relation of Jesus to God, and that of his disciples, is emphasized in v. 17; would Jesus himself at such a time have emphasized it? Has not a later theological development here colored the record?

19-23. First Appearance to the Disciples. The record here calls attention to the fulfillment of the promises given in chs. 14, 15, 16. They are not left orphaned (14¹⁸); his bequest of peace is theirs (14²⁷); their sorrow is turned into joy (16²²); they are his missionaries as he is God's (17¹⁸); the Spirit for which he prayed he now imparts (16⁷). Lk. 24^{36, 39, 40} offers a parallel to vv. 19, 20, although in Luke the reality of the body for sense is emphasized. The authority to remit or retain sin (i.e. the penalty) is similar to the promise in Mt. 16¹⁹, although the reference there is to the declaration of what is allowed and what is forbidden, the exposition of the Law. How is this endowment with the Spirit related to Pentecost? Were the action and words here only symbolic prophecy, or were the apostles endowed with a privilege and authority peculiar to themselves, unshared by others? The second interpretation is maintained by those who hold the theory of apostolic succession. There is no proof, however, that only the Eleven were present, and such an action would not accord with Jesus' attitude generally. Here as elsewhere the Witness may have antedated.

24-29. Second Appearance to the Disciples. Despondency may have kept Thomas away; his doubt was not peculiar to him (Mt. 28¹⁷ Mk. 16¹¹⁻¹³ Lk. 24^{11-25, 38}), only it was harder to remove. The story is told to enforce the truth that the faith which springs from spiritual insight is superior to the faith which rests on sensible evidence, even although to overcome doubt that evidence is given (Lk. 24⁴⁰). The detail in vv. 19 and 26 is probably mentioned as an indication that the body was not subject to normal physical conditions, and yet could be made sensibly manifest. One cannot but feel that in Luke especially there is the tendency of a later time to emphasize this sensible evidence, an emphasis which Jesus' words (v. 29) rebuke. The questioning disposition here assigned to Thomas is quite in accord with what is elsewhere recorded of him (11¹⁶ 14⁵); although his exclamation in v. 28, if it is to be regarded as a confession of faith, goes so far beyond the early apostolic preaching that we must suppose it reflects the theology of a later age. An interesting sidelight on the utterance is the fact that the emperor Domitian first advanced the claim, according to Suetonius, to be called "Our Lord and God."

30, 31. Conclusion. The Evangelist here states his method and his position. He has selected from a larger mass of available material; but he does not indulge in the hyperbole of the close of the Appendix (21²⁵). Mark's interest is in the Messiahship of Jesus; and his narrative gathers around the confession by Peter (Mk. 8²⁹). Here a higher claim is made; the divine Sonship is the dominating conception, not that of the Logos in the Prologue. This theological interest is, however, not theoretical but practical. Through faith in this divine Sonship of Jesus eternal life—the complete and permanent satisfaction of man's spiritual nature—can alone be obtained. The theologian is also the evangelist.

CHAPTER XXI

This chapter is commonly described as the Appendix, and even those who ascribe it to the same author as the rest of the Gospel regard it as an addition of a later date. In the introduction (p. 1063) reasons are given for assigning it with other passages to a redactor, who wished to give the impression (although he could not offer the proof) that the disciple whom Jesus loved was John, the son of Zebedee; to assert the authority of Peter in the church; to deal with a difficulty due to the death of the beloved disciple, in view of words spoken by Jesus; and generally to bring this record into closer accord with the Synoptic reports. The evidence of the language lends support to the contention that the Appendix is not due to the author of the rest of the Gospel. The exaggerated statement of v. 25, and the attestation of the trustworthiness of the Evangelist and of the value of his work (v. 24), cannot have come from him. Setting aside these two verses, the Appendix falls into three parts: (1) the appearance at the Sea of Galilee (vv. 1–14); (2) the conversation with Peter (vv. 15–19); and (3) the question about the beloved disciple (vv. 20–23).

1–14. The Appearance at the Sea of Galilee. The resemblance between this story and that of Peter's call in Lk. 5^{1–11} (notes) is so close that, although direct literary dependence on Luke is excluded, the conclusion seems inevitable that we have variant traditions of the same event, less probable here than when it is placed at the beginning of the ministry. As to the fishes, the figurative saying at the call of Peter and Andrew about making them fishers of men (Mk. 1¹⁷) may by later tradition have been turned into the story of a miracle. The two sons of Zebedee are mentioned so that the identification of the beloved disciple with one of them may at least be suggested; but two other disciples are also mentioned, as the writer himself cannot be positive about that identification. There is no other evidence of a return of the disciples to their former calling after the resurrection; whereas it is probable that after the first intercourse with Jesus, as recorded in this Gospel (ch. 1), these earliest disciples did return till called to constant companionship. If a miracle did take place, it was one of supernatural knowledge, and not of power; the record does not demand the supposition that the multitude of fishes was created. (See art., Miracles of N.T., p. 923b). The beloved disciple has the quick discernment, but Peter, the swift action (cf. 20^{6–8}). As soon as he swims ashore he prepares the meal, unless the record is meant to indicate a supernatural provision by Jesus himself, for where could Peter get fish and bread? The number of fish has been very variously interpreted as symbolic—much learned trifling. V. 13 may be compared with 6¹¹: in both there is a Eucharistic reference. The term manifested in v. 1 and v. 14 is not used elsewhere in this Gospel in connection with the resurrection, but it is probably our best clue to the nature of the resurrection appearances.

15–19. The Conversation With Peter. While the previous narrative may be of doubtful historical authenticity, the conversation with Peter is undoubtedly of much higher value. The occasion for this incident is indicated in Lk. 24³⁴ and 1 Cor. 15⁵. On one of the earliest of his appearances on the day of resurrection Jesus restored the penitent to his apostleship. To the redactor we can ascribe the words connective with the previous incident in v. 15a. In view of the denial it was necessary that a confession should be elicited. The difference (in the Greek) of the words for love used by Jesus and Peter should not be overemphasized, although the word used by Jesus (agapein) means the more discriminating affection, and that used by Peter (philein) the more emotional attachment. Peter is grieved not that Jesus uses this word (philein) in the third question, but that he should think it needful to ask the question thrice. In restoring him Jesus sets him his task; both lambs and sheep are to be cared for, and teaching and feeding are both needed. The figure of the fisherman at the call is replaced by the figure of the shepherd; the one points to the evangelizing, the other to the pastoral function of the ministry. Devotion to himself is the qualification Jesus requires in his ministers. V. 18 need not be suspected as prophecy after the event, if the words refer to martyrdom, and not to the growing dependence of old age; 13³⁶ indicates Jesus' confidence that Peter's cowardice would be turned into courage, and he would be ready to "follow" even unto death. V. 19 is the redactor's comment, although the words themselves are open to the other explanation.

20-23. The Question about the Beloved Disciple. This question and its answer belong to another context in the view of the previous incident here taken. The saying of Jesus in Mk. 9¹ was understood as a promise that one of his companions would survive to the Second Advent. The disciple whom Jesus loved was generally believed to be the last survivor of the company. When he died, the difficulty was felt that the promise had not been fulfilled. The redactor here tries to remove the difficulty. He assumes, although on the evidence he cannot assert, the identity of this disciple with John, the son of Zebedee, according to the current tradition. His solution of the problem is that the promise was conditional, and not positive, wholly dependent on the will of Christ. The other explanation, that the Greek word here translated tarry, which has the same root as the mansions of 14², refers to abode in the intermediate state is too farfetched. Again in v. 23 there is the redactor's comment.

24, 25. Conclusion. The first part of v. 24 asserts the redactor's belief that the beloved disciple was the author of the whole Gospel. In this commentary he is identified with the Witness, of whom the Evangelist was a disciple (see intro., p. 1064). The we in the attestation may refer to the circle to which the redactor belonged, or it may be used as in 11⁴ to associate the other companions of Jesus with this eyewitness. The hyperbole of v. 25 compares unfavorably with the moderation of 20³⁰; its purpose is to explain how so much of the Synoptic material is here omitted.

CONCLUSION

1. The Relation of Criticism to Interpretation. The writer of this commentary cannot part from his work without adding some words to correct a false impression. A commentary on a writing like the fourth Gospel, which presents so many literary and historical difficulties, must needs be critical; and it is only justice to the reader that these difficulties should not be glossed over, but should be fully and frankly dealt with, as there can be profit from the study of the Bible only as there is knowledge of the truth. This necessary criticism carries with it the danger, however, that it may obscure the appreciation which any writer on the fourth Gospel must desire to transfer from himself to his readers. Scholars have busied themselves so much with these problems because they are themselves convinced that to this Gospel must be given a foremost place among the N.T. writings. To explain the differences from the Synoptic records as due not to an arbitrary handling by the author of the fourth Gospel of Synoptic material, but to the well-intentioned, although not adequately informed activity of the redactor, whose insertions break the continuity and cause displacements, is to remove a difficulty. To recognize displacements, and to restore the original order, is to make the course of events and the development of the teaching more intelligible. To show that the philosophy of the Logos, or Word, presented in the Prologue and in a few other passages, and traceable in theological comments throughout the Gospel, may be ascribed to the Evangelist allows us to discover as the precious core of the Gospel the historical testimony of the Witness to the divine Sonship of Jesus Christ, and the relation of believers to him as the satisfaction of every spiritual need and desire. That in this historical testimony we may and must distinguish the reminiscences and the reflections of the Witness does not lower its religious value; for if in the one we recover much of the earthly life which the Synoptics do not record, in the other we capture the continued activity of the risen Christ by his Spirit in a personal development, similar to that of the apostle Paul, and even if influenced by his, no less due to the same heavenly source. To take the historical testimony of what Jesus was, and of what he spoke to his disciples in his ministry on earth, and of what by his Spirit he made of a spiritual genius such as was this Witness, and relieve this of the repetitions and the vehemence of the controversies with the Jews, by transferring to the Ephesus of the end of the century from the Jerusalem of the time of Jesus not the fact or subjects of controversy, but the presentation of it, in chs. 5, 6, 7, and 8 especially, is for the writer at least an incalculable gain. To be able to place alongside of the Synoptic another equally trustworthy tradition of a ministry at successive feasts during a period of two years in Judæa is to secure a broader historical basis for the significance and influence of the earthly life of Jesus more congruous with his function as Founder and Head of his church. The measure in which on the historical evidence we can give distinctness to the beloved disciple, who could receive, and preserve, and develop the distinctive teaching of Jesus regarding his relation to God, and to believers in him, which the other disciples were incapable of understanding, is the measure in which we can enrich our own spiritual life by another inspiring companion, who, like Paul and with Paul, can show to us the glory, beheld by them, "full of grace and truth, of the only-begotten of the Father," the Saviour of all who believe. It is from such a motive and with such a purpose that even the literary and historical criticism of this commentary has been written.

2. Fundamental Truths of the Fourth Gospel. In closing let us try to recall some of the truths, in the knowledge of which is eternal life, which this Gospel enshrines. The divine Sonship of Jesus is presented to us, not as a theological abstraction, but as the historical reality of the personal experience and character, no less human than divine, and of the constant dependence, intimate communion, and complete submission of the Son toward the Father. As the gift of God's love to the world his mission is not condemnation but salvation for men, and nevertheless unbelief brings doom and faith brings life. This life is eternal because in quality it is like, as in source it is from, the eternal God himself. Accordingly, death has lost not only its terror but even its reality for those who through faith in Christ share this life in God. The current eschatology is transformed. The presence of the Son of God, provoking unbelief, or evoking faith, is the present judgment. The change from unbelief to faith, which is the passing from death to life, is present resurrection. The possession of the salvation which faith in him secures is present eternal life. (In Paul we can trace a similar development.) What the Father is to the Son, that the Son is to believers. He meets all their wants, and satisfies all their aspirations as the Bread from Heaven, the Water of Life, the Door, the Good Shepherd, and the Vine. Their relation to him ought to be, and ideally is, what is his to the Father, constant dependence, intimate communion, and complete submission. The mutual activity of Father and Son is love; the Son expects love from believers, and requires their love for one another. And as the unity of Father and Son is constituted by love, so are all believers to be made a unity in him. While his presence and activity are continued as risen Lord, yet it is no longer in any sensible manifestation, but by his Spirit, the Spirit of God, who as God's gift in answer to his prayer will make believers receptive and responsive to God's presence and activity in him, will preserve the memory of what he was, spake, and did in his earthly life, and will disclose in that teaching truths that they could not then receive. Understanding and experience will increase side by side. Does any other writing, even in the N.T., contain profounder truth about God, or sublimer grace for man?

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

By PROFESSOR ERNEST W. BURCH

INTRODUCTION

The Nature of the Book. The Acts, the fifth book in the N.T., offers the only extant account of the beginnings of the Christian Church. It is a historical work, based in part upon documents, in part upon oral tradition, and largely upon personal reminiscences of the author. (See below, Sources.) The position of Acts between the Gospels and the Pauline correspondence is well designed to explain how Paul came to prominence in the early church, although he was not one of the Twelve. The book is chiefly narrative in character, varied here and there by the introduction of speeches by important characters. A period of from thirty to thirty-two years is covered in twenty-eight chapters, thus necessitating omission of many facts that would be of interest to students of the early church. Some of these events are traceable in the letters of Paul, e.g., the mission to Illyricum (Rom. 15¹⁹), the difficulties in the churches of Galatia and Corinth, and the great collection raised among the churches of Paul for the Jerusalem saints (Rom. 15^{25f.} 1 Cor. 16¹ 2 Cor. 9^{1f.}).

Acts is the oldest handbook of Christian missions. It opens to modern students the initial pages of the great volume of Christian progress throughout the world. While to its author the book had as its chief aim the explanation of the expansion of Christianity, Acts opens to the modern reader to some extent the inner life and thought of the parent church in Jerusalem and expounds the view of salvation held by its great men. Most important of all, no doubt, is the contribution of Acts toward an understanding of the type of religious experience current in the earliest church.

No reader of Acts can fail to note how closely knit together were the people of "the Way" and the people of Israel during the first few decades of the history of the Christian religion. The men of "the Way" still remained within Judaism (31 21^{20b} 22¹⁷ 23¹ 24¹¹⁻¹⁸) and engaged in the old forms of religious worship, but in addition these saints became increasingly convinced that Jesus was the Messiah of God and that salvation was centered in him rather than in the institutions of Judaism. So Acts portrays the steps by which "the Way" at length separated from the parent religion and set out to conquer the world "in the name" of Jesus.

The Contents. Analyses of the contents of Acts incline either to a twofold or a threefold division. (See D. A. Hayes, The Synoptic Gospels and the Book of Acts, p. 304.) With some writers, the form of the Great Commission in 1⁸ is determinative of a threefold division, involving the successive stages of the church's development. A brief analysis follows:

Introduction. 1¹⁻²⁶—The Risen Jesus and the Apostles

I. The Church in Jerusalem.

21⁴⁷—Outpouring of the Spirit.

31⁴³¹—Acts of Peter and John.

432⁵¹¹—The Jerusalem Church.

512⁶⁷—Acts of the Twelve.

68⁸³—Acts of Stephen.

II. The Church in Syria and in Asia Minor.

84¹¹¹⁸—Acts of Philip, Paul, and Peter.

1119³⁰—Rise of the Gentile Question.

121²⁴—The Church and Herod.

1225¹⁵³⁹—Acts of Barnabas and Saul.

III. The Church in the Roman Empire.

1540¹⁸¹¹—Acts of Paul and Silas.

1812²⁸³¹—Acts of Paul.

The Author. Earlier criticism of Acts led to a doubt that Luke was author of the work, but painstaking and thorough study of the style and choice of words reveals good evidence (1) that the writer of the so-called we-sections (see below, Sources) is the same person who wrote the narrative in which they are imbedded, and (2) that the author of Acts is the author of the third Gospel. (See Harnack, Date of the Acts and the Synoptic Gospels.) The we-sections have been ascribed to a number of Paul's companions, but the evidence favors Luke himself as the eyewitness involved. The work as it stands is anonymous, like the Gospel, but the name of Luke was associated with both from an early date, and with this tradition the mass of evidence presented in the studies of Hawkins, Ramsay, and Harnack agrees. In the following commentary the name of Luke is freely used as that of the author.

The Sources. Much ingenuity has been expended upon the identification of different documents from which the author made up his work (by Spitta, Holtzmann, Wendt, J. Weiss, and others), and their able research has fully demonstrated the fact that written sources and possibly oral tradition were available for the work. Exact demarcation of these sources is made difficult precisely because, as shown in his use of sources for his Gospel, Luke puts the stamp of his own style upon the text of his source and engages in editorial abbreviation or expansion quite freely. (See art., Structure of the Synoptic Gospels, p. 868.) A relatively simple analysis of source material (which does not indeed reach the ultimate sources) is that offered by Professor Torrey, Date and Composition of Acts (1916), namely, the suggestion that in the first half of his book Luke translated into Greek a document written in Aramaic, while from 15³⁵ to the end of Acts the personal reminiscences of the writer (we-sections), supplemented by other eyewitness material, form the basis of the author's free composition.

The we-sections (16¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 20⁵⁻¹⁵ 21¹⁻¹⁸ 27¹⁻²⁸¹⁶) are thus named because the passages concerned are written in the first person plural (we, us) and so become differentiated from the surrounding text. It is quite generally believed that these passages formed parts of a diary kept by the traveler concerned, and that they were reproduced with little or no change. In all the portions of the journeys of Paul covered by these diary excerpts Luke was with the party. It has been suggested that other narratives are as intimately connected with the memory if not the observation of the writer, e.g., the scene in the jail at Philippi (16²⁵⁻⁴⁰), and the address of Paul at Miletus (20¹⁶⁻³⁸), the absence of the pronoun in the first person plural being inappropriate in the recital as here given.

The speeches in Acts offer occasion for theories as to special sources, although it scarcely seems necessary thus to account for them. Details of the style of some of the speeches are noted in the commentary. In no case, unless the long speech of Stephen in ch. 7 be the exception, is a speech in Acts more than a summary or outline of the address in question. If Torrey's plausible theory be accepted, the synagogue speech in 13¹⁶⁻⁴¹ goes back to another author than Luke. But Luke must have heard synagogue addresses which would in any case enable him to formulate the material transmitted to him. The Areopagus speech was not made in Luke's hearing, and it is to be assumed that Luke composed the summary in 17²²⁻³¹ from Paul's account of his adventures in Athens. No special speech-source is necessary for Acts.

The Date. It does not seem possible to fix an exact date for Acts. Its period is determined first of all by the date of the third Gospel. It must have been written after the Gospel (Acts 1¹), for the Gospel is "the former treatise." It may, indeed, be supposed that the present Gospel of Luke is a revised work, later than Acts, and that Acts was written in the early sixties, being brought up to the very date of writing, when Paul was still awaiting trial at Rome. (See Torrey, Date and Composition of Acts; Harnack, Date of Acts and the Synoptic Gospels; Hayes, The Synoptic Gospels and the Book of Acts.) It has also been suggested that since no letter of Paul is mentioned in Acts, the book must have been written before the Pauline correspondence had more than local circulation. This consideration, joined to the fact that in Acts no indication appears that Jerusalem had fallen, weighs somewhat heavily in the scale in favor of a date in the seventh decade of the first Christian century. These points, however, are not conclusive. The third Gospel does betray a consciousness of the fall of Jerusalem (e.g., Lk. 21²⁰), and since that Gospel is later than Mark (about 63 A.D.), and Acts is later than the third Gospel, Acts would fall somewhere in the eighth decade. The best position to assume, in view of all the facts, which prevent setting any hard and fast date, is to date Acts between 72 and 75 A.D. Much later dates have been proposed, in view of a possible use of Josephus by Luke. The tendency in N.T. criticism, however, is toward the earlier dates in cases like the present question, where both late and early dates have been proposed.

The Miracles in Acts. The narratives of the miracles in Acts are integral parts of the entire narrative and reflect, as do all the Bible miracles, certain tendencies of the time. Exorcism of demons and evil spirits plays an important part in these miracles (5¹⁶ 8⁷ 16¹⁸ 19¹³⁻¹⁸). "Signs and wonders" is a frequent phrase. Typical miracles are those of healing of diseases, but instances of the "punitive miracle" are not absent (12²³ 13¹¹; cf. 28^{4f.} and possibly 9^{8f.}). As in the Gospels, the narratives of miracles are offered to the reader as additional evidence of the power of the gospel, and at the same time chief emphasis is laid by the writer upon the message of the gospel and the personal ministry of Jesus through the apostles. To the writer of the book of Acts and to his first circle of readers the miracles need no explanation, no special plea. They were part and parcel of the early spread of Christianity. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 92^{f.}) is in a real sense the Magna Charta of the religion of Jesus Christ. We have here the story of the growth of the church from the little group of original disciples to an organization found in all parts of the Roman Empire. It brings us face to face with the gospel in action. It is a record of the actual incarnation of the teaching of Jesus. It is the Book of the Holy Ghost, whether it deals with the church in martyrdom, in conquest, in joy, in pain and toil, at home or abroad. It is the message of the Way of God.

The Message of Acts. The book of Acts

Literature: Furneaux, The Acts of the Apostles; G. H. Gilbert, Acts: The Second Volume of Luke's Work on the Beginnings of Christianity (The Bible for Home and School Series); Rackham, The Acts of the Apostles (the foregoing are all commentaries). McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, revised edit.; Hayes, The Synoptic Gospels and the Book of Acts; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveler and the Roman Citizen; B. W. Robinson, The Life of Paul; Hayes, Paul and His Epistles.

CHAPTER I

I-11. The Last Days of Jesus on Earth.

The "former treatise" is the Gospel according to Luke, which ends, as Acts begins, with the great missionary commission and the ascension of Jesus. The Gospel tells what Jesus did and what he taught. Acts narrates how the apostles and their successors carried out the Lord's last command. In Acts is found a more detailed account of the interval between the resurrection and the ascension. In Luke (see 24³⁶⁻⁵³) the impression is given that Jesus ascended almost immediately after his resurrection. Acts 1³ explains that Jesus remained forty days with his disciples. The period between ascension and Pentecost was thus ten days.

These forty days were made radiant by many appearances of the risen Lord, effectually proving the reality of his resurrection. As in the Gospel, the Kingdom formed the topic of his teaching (v. 3., see art., The Teaching of Jesus, pp. 911-3).

The place of the appearances was in or near Jerusalem. Nowhere does Luke record appearances of Jesus away from the Holy City. The apostles must await promised spiritual preparation. This would happen in Jerusalem (v. 4). Then only could the program of the apostles' mission be carried out.

The Ascension of Jesus is described (vv. 6-11) in greater detail than in Lk. 24^{50f}. Jesus talked of a new order to be brought in (vv. 6-8), while the disciples were looking for an old order to be restored. The new order cannot happen of itself. It must be brought about by men upon whom the Spirit of the Lord has come (v. 8). These men can then become witnesses with authority in the whole world.

The apostolic charge (v. 8) is perhaps the original form of the great commission, which appears in Mt. 28¹⁹ Mk. 16¹⁵ Lk. 24⁴⁷ and here. The substance is the same in all forms. In Acts this solemn charge to the apostles forms the theme of the book.

Jesus' last words (v. 8) were scarcely spoken when he disappeared from the apostles' view. The mode of the ascension of Jesus is not definitely described, for the obvious reason that the disciples themselves were under great emotional stress when they found that Jesus was no longer with them. The accounts of the event given the other disciples upon the return to Jerusalem would vary as greatly as do the narratives of the resurrection appearances in their surviving literary form. (See under Mt. 28, Lk. 24, Jn. 20-21.) In the tradition about the ascension as Luke received it, a cloud obscured the disciples' view of the departure of the Lord (v. 9), and as they instinctively looked into the sky for some token, they were reminded that such a course was vain.

The literary account of the ascension draws upon a large fund of current Jewish religious thought and imagery, to which is added an expression of the hope of Jesus' return, which was warmly cherished by the church of Luke's period (see pp. 846, 1366-7).

The ascension of Jesus marks a real turning point in the religious experience of the apostles. The last words of Jesus (v. 8) placed upon them a vast responsibility and opportunity. They sought more earnestly and directly the promised spiritual endowment. The ascension thus proved to be the logical and almost immediate preparation for the baptism of the Holy Ghost ten days later.

12-14. The Apostolic Prayer Circle. Until the women and Jesus' brothers are named (v. 14), the Eleven only are in the mind of the writer. These were living in an upper chamber, perhaps the "large upper room" of Lk. 22¹². This may have been the house of Mary, mother of John Mark (Acts 12¹²). Hither the eleven returned from Olivet (v. 12) and with the other disciples (v. 14b) engaged continuously in prayer. The brothers of Jesus are mentioned by Luke in the Gospel, 8^{19f}. (see Mt. 12^{46f}. 13⁵⁵ 28¹⁰ Mk. 3^{31f}. 6³.) In N.T. literature there is no fixed order in which the apostles are named. Cf. v. 13 with Mt. 10^{2f}. Mk. 3¹⁶⁻¹⁹ and Lk. 6¹⁴⁻¹⁶. Peter always heads the list. A conspicuous feature of the Jerusalem prayer circle is its unanimity. This oneness of spirit goes far in the explanation of the following events.

15-26. Matthias Takes the Place of Judas Iscariot. A larger group emerges in v. 15. Including the apostles, the women and the brothers of Jesus, there were six score. Peter as spokesman took counsel with this larger group, proposing that the apostolic circle, broken by the defection of Judas Iscariot, should be restored (vv. 15f.). Peter reviewed the treachery of Judas in guiding the foes of Jesus out to Gethsemane that fateful night, and quoted Scripture to justify filling his place (vv. 16-20). On the manner of Judas' death cf. Mt. 27³⁻¹⁰, where he is said to have hanged himself. The successor of Judas was chosen from among eyewitnesses of Jesus' ministry. The Eleven appear to have made the nominations, and the election was by lot, which fell upon the second nominee. Greater weight is put upon the prayer (v. 24) than upon the lot. The passage is no proof-text to justify a lottery.

I. CHAPTERS 2¹ TO 8³: THE CHURCH IN JERUSALEM

CHAPTER II

1-4. The Apostles Filled With the Holy Spirit. Pentecost, an established Jewish festival (the Feast of Weeks, see art., The Religion of Israel, p. 167a), proved to be the time when Jesus' promise (14f.) to the apostles was fulfilled. In the morning of this day (v. 15), the Twelve (11⁵⁻²⁶) were gathered together, perhaps in the "upper room," when a rushing sound was heard and seeming tongues of fire were seen, distributed among them. These are the lesser points in the experience. The important and abiding experience is that described by the words (v. 4) they were all filled with the Holy Spirit. Even the final statement about the speaking with tongues, spectacular as this was, does not have, in the mind of the writer, the importance of the baptism of the Holy Spirit. The promise (15, 8) specified the gift of the Spirit but mentioned no gift of tongues. Luke uses the expression "filled with the Holy Spirit" or its equivalent more than twenty-five times, while only twice, outside ch. 2, does he mention speaking with tongues.

The meaning of the phrase filled with the Holy Spirit should not be confused with the present-day doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The writer of Acts is not a theologian. In this book the phrase represents Luke's thought about the type of religious experience enjoyed by the men in the apostolic church. This experience (1) was based upon the certainty of the resurrection, (2) assumed the actual presence of Jesus with them in their daily life, (3) identified in some tangible way the achievements of the church with a practical inspiration, and (4) was validated by the presence of an enthusiasm and fervor that was not of earth. Even if the manner of expression changes from time to time, this apostolic experience must be affirmed of all genuine Christianity in all times. (See art., N.T. and Christian Doctrine, pp. 949-50.)

The book of Acts should be called the Holy Spirit book, for more than any other book of the N.T. it exalts and glorifies the Spirit. In the following pages of the book of Acts, the Holy Spirit is often imparted to others through the apostles. It seems likely that here only the Twelve were concerned in the gift of the Spirit and of tongues.

5-13. Effects Upon the People. The scene changed. The apostles left the seclusion of the house (v. 2), for the rushing noise and the speaking in tongues were heard by others. Many came together. Luke thinks of the permanent inhabitants of Jerusalem, who had come from widely distant parts of the Diaspora to end their days in Judæa. Others, visitors to the feast, may have been in the company. The fact that they heard intelligible speech in other languages than that of the Galilæans (v. 7f.) aroused their curiosity. Differing explanations were given. Some ascribed the phenomenon to strong drink; others were plainly impressed, but were without an explanation. It remained for Peter to give the true reason for the astonishing event.

14-36. Peter's Sermon. (1) The charge of drunkenness refuted. The charge that the men were intoxicated fitted none of the facts. But the Oriental must have some explanation of an observed phenomenon. Peter did not dwell on this, for it was plain that the day was too young for such a degree of intoxication. Then, the hearing of the various languages could not be explained by any state of the speaker (vv. 14f.). (2) The real explanation. Peter argued that in the events of the hour the beholders were witnessing a fulfillment of the prophecy spoken by Joel (228-32) which he quoted with slight change (vv. 17-21). The word of the prophet, Peter urged, was not here fulfilled for the first time. For in Jesus of Nazareth they saw the divine inspiration, having witnessed his miracles (v. 22), and on this day they saw the descent of the Holy Spirit upon his disciples (vv. 16-21). (3) The awful accusation. To crucify the Messiah, whom David celebrated in well-known words (Psa. 168f.), was a terrible deed! God rebuked this blasphemy by raising up again the slain Messiah, to whose resurrection this company of Spirit-filled men were witnessing (vv. 22-28). (4) The Crucified indeed the Messiah. Jesus was proved Messiah both by the prophecy of David (Psa. 168^{f.}) as to his resurrection, and by the testimony of men who recognized Jesus risen from the dead. Not David, but the Christ, is now at the right hand of power (vv. 29-36). A reference to Psa. 168^{f.} will show that Peter took considerable liberty with the meaning of the original.

37-41. Many Convinced and Converted.

The hearers appeared to be reasonable men. They were impressed by the manner of the speaker, supported by his fellow witnesses. Their conviction was so deep that it demanded immediate counsel from the speaker. What shall we do? met its answer, Repent, be baptized and receive the Holy Spirit in yourselves (v. 37^{f.}). These hearers were Jewish men, as were the apostles. They were entitled to the fulfillment of God's promise. The conditions laid down by Peter seemed to be, first, repentance, then baptism; i.e., they must take the right attitude toward Jesus Messiah and they must identify themselves with his movement, called, even thus early, the Way. About three thousand joined the movement that day. This may be taken to be the actual beginning of the Christian Church. Yet many stages of development awaited the infant community now just in its swaddling clothes.

42-47. Rise of the Community of Believers.

Into six verses Luke compresses his account of the community of those who followed Jesus Messiah. The apostles were authoritative teachers, this authority being evidenced by many miracles. Although those of the Way frequented the Temple, in groups (v. 46), they also met at home for their own love feasts. There developed a very close fraternity, which involved a community of goods (vv. 44^{f.}). The important and abiding elements of the life of these early believers were the apostolic teaching, unity in fellowship, and the observance of the Eucharist and prayer (v. 42). As an expedient for the relief of their needy brethren, property owners among them in some cases voluntarily sold their possessions and distributed the proceeds to the suffering. The superlatives (all things . . . to all) of vv. 44^{f.} are modified by later references to this community of goods (see under 432-37 51^{f.}). On the whole this communism is to be thought of as an experiment which did not last many years, yet which produced many examples of unselfish devotion and sacrifice. Even the experience of Pentecost was not designed to enlighten the leaders of the Way as to every detail of their organized church life. It became necessary at times to adopt new measures as problems arose (see under 61). In the sixth decade of the first century, when the Gentile churches were waxing mighty, the Jerusalem church was reduced to dire poverty and need. In this emergency their distant brethren ministered to the Jerusalem saints. But information about this missionary help, aside from the special contribution mentioned in 1129^{f.}, must be gleaned from the letters of Paul (see 1 Cor. 16¹ 2 Cor. 9^{1f.} Rom. 1525^{f.}).

CHAPTER III

Luke cites deeds of certain groups of apostles. He takes here Peter and John, the two names occurring together six times (31-43¹), while the name of Peter occurs separately three times.

1-10. A Lame Man at the Temple Door.

The first circumstantial narrative of a miracle of healing in Acts (cf. 22², 43) illustrates the power of the name of the risen Jesus in this Jewish Christian group. The formula, In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth (v. 6), like that on the lips of Paul (16¹⁸), occupies the point of emphasis in the story. Contemporary religious men, non-Christians, used names of demons and deities as formulae of exorcism or as instruments with which to inflict harm (see 1913^{f.}). Here it is not the mere pronouncing of the name of Jesus but the invocation of his presence and power that heals the lame man. In Oriental thought the name stood for the authority and for the personality itself of him who bore the name. The name indicated the character of the person, as in Mt. 12¹, where the name describes Jesus' character as Saviour. Supposedly, the early Christians inherited the common views as to the intrinsic power of a pronounced name, but assuredly they also believed that the personal ministry of Jesus effected their salvation, the cure of their ills, the exorcism of evil spirits and all other notable works.

The miracle of healing in this case (31-10) is wrought rather through the power of the spoken name (v. 10) than through contact with Peter, who expressly repudiates the thought that he had exercised any power upon the man (v. 12), although popular thought upon the subject often identified healing with such contact (even with the shadow of a person of authority, with handkerchiefs from his person, or with the edge of his garment; see 1912).

The writer of Acts writes his narrative in such a way as to convince his reader that he himself had no doubt that the restoration of the cripple was genuine. The cure was attested by popular identification of the man (v. 9) and by the tacit admission of the Sanhedrin that the miracle was irrefutable (414). Luke does not attempt to explain what really happened, for, like the people, he could but be filled with amazement at that which had happened (v. 10). (See under 9³²⁻⁴³ for further discussion as to explanation of miracles.)

11-26. Peter's Appeal to the People. As the people ran toward the apostles, impressed with the cure of the lame man, Peter made an appeal to them, first of all to correct their conclusion that the source of power was in him or his fellow worker (v. 12). In brief, he told them that their God, through his Servant Jesus, was showing his power before their eyes (v. 16) in the cure of the lame man. Peter reminded his hearers of the tragic mistake in the all too recent past, when Jesus was delivered up and denied (v. 13) by his own people. This accusation is softened by the fact that only since the death of Jesus and his resurrection had his Messiahship become plainly evident. The O.T. prophecies (Isa. 42¹ 52¹³ 53¹¹) showed that the fate of the Servant was to suffer (vv. 17, 18). Moses himself, so Peter argued, announced the human nature of Messiah, "a prophet like unto me" (Deut. 18¹⁵), and urged that this prophet be heard (v. 22). All the prophets from Samuel on (v. 24) had something to say about Him who should come. With this strong support from the past, Peter made his plea to his Jewish brothers: Repent! Co-operate with this new movement! Then God will bless you, his people, and bring in a new day! (Vv. 19, 20, 25, 26.)

In this appeal Peter showed his deep interest in the religion of his fathers and at the same time revealed a new and deep insight into the real meaning of the history of his people. The prophecies no longer represented to him words alone. Those prophecies were alive in the life of the Son of God, whom indeed the heavens had received for a time (v. 21), yet who was actually in touch with men who believed in him (vv. 19, 26).

CHAPTER IV

1-4. Peter and John Arrested. The response of the people to Peter's words was quite different from the reaction of the ecclesiastical authorities, for (v. 4) the former seemed convinced, as on Pentecost day. So many came into the Christian community that the total number reached five thousand (v. 4). But the group of leaders (vv. 1f.) who arrested Peter and John (v. 3) were chiefly concerned at the teaching of the resurrection, and in particular the case of Jesus. The party known as Sadducees (see art., Backgrounds, pp. 840-1; cf. pp. 210-3) did not accept the traditional teaching of the Pharisees as to the resurrection (see 23⁶⁻⁸). The reader cannot fail to commend the practical faith of the thousands who cast themselves upon Jesus in a sublime trust, thus receiving the pardon of their sins, in contrast with the purely academic and technical attitude of the Sanhedrin members.

5-12. Peter's Defense at the Hearing. The Jewish leaders arrested the apostles chiefly because of the teaching about the resurrection. At the hearing (vv. 5-7) the next day the question concerned their authority. In the language of the time the name stood for the essential personality of the one concerned. (See Gray, art., "Name," in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iii, p. 480.)

Peter's answer was singularly direct. It was no less than an inspired statement, for he was filled with the Holy Ghost as he spoke. As for the lame man, who was present (v. 10), health came to him through the name, i.e., through the personal power of Jesus. But the power of this name cannot be limited to the physical healing, for above all names that are invoked, the name of Jesus avails for salvation, said Peter (v. 12). The courage of the chief apostle in this presence is explained only through the meaning of Luke's phrase, filled with the Holy Ghost. (See under 21-4.) As Peter recalled the power of the name to save, he thought with shame of the cruel fate to which this same court sent Jesus. A bold figure conveyed his accusation, again directed at those in power. Jesus, the Cornerstone, was set aside by ignorant builders, but is now restored through an overruling power. Twice before (22³ 31⁵) had this accusation been voiced, but here for the first time (v. 10) Peter had the ear of the judges themselves. This bold directness itself produced the dilemma in which these leaders in Israel presently found themselves.

13-22. The Dilemma of the Sanhedrin. The facts assembled at the hearing were hard to reconcile. Peter and John were bold, when it was dangerous for them to be bold; they were not educated men; they had been Jesus' disciples; the healed man stood there before them; the people and the court knew the cure was genuine; but the influence of the Sanhedrin itself was in danger if the movement went on. The question was, What is the best policy?

The course pursued had all the weakness of the court's own position. They forbade the two apostles to speak openly in the name of Jesus. The stubbornness of the facts proved even less than the determination of the two apostles. Their words to the court were scripturally sound: A man must obey God first of all! We shall witness to those things which we know from experience. This, in effect, is what they said—and what thousands have said since. The dilemma remained. The cured man was of the people, who sided with the apostles. With wordy but empty threats the court dismissed the case.

23-31. The Followers of Jesus Encouraged. While Peter and John were before the court the brotherhood engaged in earnest prayer. This Luke believes to be a source of empowerment (13³ 16²⁵). Their prayer reads like a hymn, or like one of the psalms. Psa. 2 is in part quoted and the opening sentence has a verse from Psa. 146. Appropriately these Jewish Christians clothed their religious thought and feeling in O.T. terms.

The term Servant as applied to Jesus (vv. 27, 30) is chosen from the so-called "servant-songs" of Isa. 42:1-4 49:1-6 50:4-9 52:13-53:12 and suggests that very soon after the resurrection of Jesus these passages in Isaiah were given Messianic meaning by the Christians. The former translation, holy child (see mg.) obscures this fact. (See p. 664.)

The high points in this passage are: the great unanimity of the company, their sublime faith in prayer, their confidence in the triumph of the Kingdom, and their restraint in the face of this striking victory for their leaders and their cause. In those meetings of the primitive church the emotional values in experience were subordinated to the practical forwarding of the message. But the emotional experiences were to them real evidence of the presence of God.

Practical Working of the Community. This is described in 4:32-5:11. A paragraph following the story of Pentecost (2:42-47) gives a glimpse into the life of the followers of Jesus. Luke seldom offers any definite statement of the passing of time, but between 2:47 and 5:11 at least some weeks, if not months, must have passed. That Luke selects only incidents here and there is seen from the known fact that between the beginning of his book and ch. 12, the story of James' martyrdom, at least fourteen or fifteen years must have elapsed.

32-37. The Community Described. The group of believers early developed a social conscience. Poverty was to be banished through an equitable distribution of goods. The right to private property was voluntarily given up (v. 32) and provision for the comfort of all was made through the sale of real estate (v. 34) and the dedication of the proceeds to the common weal. It does not appear that all submitted to the rule, for Peter implied in his remark to Ananias (5:4) that it was proper to offer a part of the price received from a sale provided the brother stated that he was offering a part. The example of Joseph (vv. 36f.) is a case where the disciple chose to offer the whole amount. In 12:12 it appears that John Mark's mother still owned her house in Jerusalem. The writer considers this community of goods as a means to an end, not as a cardinal element in the growing Christian Church. The emphasis here (vv. 32-37) is upon the unanimity, the unselfishness, the brotherly love of its members, and upon the public ministry carried on (v. 33), marked as it was by power and grace. For Joseph (vv. 36, 37) see following paragraphs.

CHAPTER V

I-II. The True Disciple and the False. Jesus himself realized that the less worthy and the unworthy would come into the fellowship of his followers, and so taught (Mt. 13:47f. 18:17). So the event proved. Even if the common fund was administered for all, this was no guarantee against unfairness (see 6:1). If members did sell their houses and lands and contribute the proceeds, this could not exclude cases of hypocrisy. The examples cited (4:36-5:11) teach that, however much evil might arise within the church, the church would not tolerate it. The contrasting examples are those of Joseph Barnabas and of Ananias and his wife. The true disciple is described in two verses, while eleven are devoted to the hypocrisy of the false disciples.

The narrative of Joseph (Barnabas) implies that he voluntarily sold his field and as voluntarily brought all the proceeds to the common store. Others had done as much (v. 34b); in fact, it seems to have been the prevailing practice (as many as were possessors . . . sold them). Luke does not make invidious comparisons by devoting words of special praise to Joseph. He was a good man and he did a good deed with a good will.

More space is given to the cases of Ananias and Sapphira because of the sinister significance of the incident in those early days of the church. If Judaism prided itself upon its high moral teaching, Christianity set itself at once to the practice of high morality. The teaching of Jesus emphasized high ethical principles and the apostles took up the strain. The deed of Ananias and his wife was destructive. The brotherhood of this early community could not be spoiled from without, as the book of Acts shows. The life of the church was more seriously endangered by hypocrisy or treachery within. The story of Ananias and Sapphira leaves the distinct impression that in the early days of the church there prevailed a high ideal of honesty and unselfishness among the disciples. But the impression is further that of an excellent discipline, no small part of which was due to the spiritual insight of the apostles. As in the Ananias case, the apostles were quick and certain in their moral judgments. This led to a commendable respect for the leaders and to a heightened morale among the members of the community.

It is best to take this story of the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira as an account of a real happening in these early days. As in the case of other narratives touching the unusual, attempts have been made to explain its meaning as symbolical or at least as figurative. Some students, e.g., suggest that what really happened was that the guilty pair were solemnly excommunicated, and thereupon became "dead" to the church, and that this "death" was later taken by others in a literal sense. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 927b.) The deaths of the two persons concerned, however, are given as real deaths, sudden, awe-inspiring, and undesigned by the apostle, as far as the narrative shows. Peter does not prophesy the death of either person. The context (24³ 51³) teaches that men both outside and within the church were impressed, even fearful, at the many signs of power and authority vested in the apostles. This may have been a superstitious fear, but such an emotion has always a powerful effect upon the body. In view of this element in Luke's narrative it may be supposed that at Peter's stern rebuke (vv. 3, 9) these dishonest persons became so overcome by their emotional reaction that they died forthwith. The story of Ananias and his wife can be understood as that of a "punitive miracle" only on the supposition that Peter intended their deaths. This cannot be shown from the text.

12-16. Acts of the Twelve. Beginning with 51² and continuing to 67 we find described the "Acts of the Twelve." The Twelve as a group were, of course, active from the first, but here Luke turns his attention to the remarkable effects that followed a certain part of their public ministry. Not only the case of Ananias and Sapphira but the many miracles that accompanied the work of the apostles created a certain attitude of fear on the part of those outside the community (v. 13), although this did not in any way hinder the growth of the church itself (v. 14). It appeared to outsiders that a supernatural power was present in this group, and superstitious fear kept them aloof. Several things contributed to this attitude. The unusual boldness of these unlearned men (41³), their actual victory over the Sanhedrin (423f.), and the whole train of events since Pentecost, narrated only in part, had created a wholesome awe for the infant but mighty church.

While the author does not say that the shadow of Peter as it touched a sufferer had healing efficacy, he does say (v. 16) that the sufferers brought to the apostles were healed every one. This may be taken to include those of v. 15, who were brought into the street through which Peter might pass.

17-25. The Arrest and the Angel. At first the apostles attracted the attention of the high priest and Sadducees, i.e., only a part of the Sanhedrin (vv. 17-21a), but later (v. 21b) these called the entire council together to consider the matter. The resulting efforts of the Sanhedrin to silence the witnesses of Jesus appeared in the sequel to be as futile as before.

The naming of the Sadducees as the party of the high priest, and the mention of their "jealousy," introduce into the story the question of motive in the imprisonment of the apostles. As the narrative stands of the escape of the apostles at the hands of an angel, fact and explanation are mingled. The facts are the arrest of the apostles, their imprisonment, their escape during the night and their summons before the council. The explanation involves an angel (v. 19) who was the medium of a deliverance accomplished so skillfully that the prison was intact and the keepers unaware of the flight of the prisoners. The large number of prisoners involved made the unnoticed escape of the men inexplicable, except through angelic intervention. (See 127-10 for a narrative with even greater detail of explanation.) It is fair to surmise that during the night the apostles themselves discovered a way out of the prison and that their interest in their message led both to the desire to escape and to enter the Temple as soon as it was open, disregarding their own safety. Since they had been imprisoned under Jewish authority and guard, no such severe penalty was meted out to the custodians as in the case of Peter's escape (121⁹; see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 928b.) The apostles themselves had the assurance of a divine guidance in their actions (520, 29, 41) and the modern reader cannot do less than believe their confidence was based on experience.

26-40. The Apostles Again Warned and Beaten. The displeasure of the Sanhedrin was justified in their own eyes, for the apostles were disobeying the command they laid upon Peter and John (41⁸) only shortly before. The total defense of the Twelve here was that they were obeying a higher authority than that of the Sanhedrin (v. 29). It appears from the narrative that in reality the charge of responsibility for the death of Jesus weighed most heavily upon the Israelite Solons, for Peter solemnly repeated his awful accusation before the council (vv. 30-32).

The stoning of the apostles might have resulted, as later in the case of Stephen, had it not been for the counsel of the wise Rabban Gamaliel. Although the more zealous members no doubt labeled him an obstructionist and too conservative, the whole council accepted his policy. Gamaliel argued that whether the work was really of God or not they should await developments. If, as they supposed, the movement was one of enthusiasm only, it would soon be deflated. If, on the other hand, God were really speaking to these men, as they affirmed, it was not the place of the Sanhedrin to oppose it. Thus Sadducees led the opposition to the Messiah group and a noted Pharisee advised moderation. Presumably, the stripes (v. 40) were given as a punishment for disobeying the previous order of the council.

41, 42. The Ministry of the Word. It does not appear that the Twelve were again prosecuted by the Sanhedrin. They were popular in Jerusalem. Witness the caution shown by the men who arrested them in the Temple (v. 26) and the fact that later, during the persecution that arose upon the stoning of Stephen, the apostles remained in Jerusalem, although many of the Christians were scattered (81). The apostles did not compromise in the slightest degree. They continued to declare publicly that Jesus was Messiah (v. 42), and in private meetings they taught over and over the things about Jesus and the things that Jesus taught. These men, so unaccountable on all conventional standards, felt the thrill of martyrdom at its best (v. 41), for nothing counted with them except the glory of the Name Jesus.

CHAPTER VI

1-7. A Problem and its Solution: the Seven.

A single verse (v. 7) points out the rich results of the ministry of the apostles (54^{1f.}) in that the influence of the Word spread, and even a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. In the meantime certain adjustments had to be made in organization. The church could not become fully adapted to its enlarged membership all at once. Some of the members were not natives of Palestine, although they were all orthodox Jews. There appeared so much discrimination between the natives and the non-natives that the Twelve made an appeal to the church upon the matter, as follows (vv. 2-4): "The ministry of the word is the most important aspect of the work of the church, but unselfishness and brotherly love must continue to rule in the community. Now, it would be absurd for us to forsake our faithful public ministry, but it is also absurd that such differences should continue to exist. So elect seven well-qualified men to superintend the distribution of food and to see that unfairness is kept down." The Seven probably ministered to Hellenists alone. The ceremony referred to in the words, laid their hands upon them, is to be understood as a formal inauguration into office. The Seven received the Spirit long before (vv. 3, 6). Chief among them was Stephen. Usually, a man who is both good enough and able enough to control such a matter as this distribution of the common store is able also to deal in larger matters. No wonder, then, that Stephen both did his assigned work well, and took opportunity to support the apostles in their public ministry.

Acts of Stephen. These are described in 68-83. He is nowhere numbered among the apostles, but he was one of the "witnesses" (the original meaning of the English word "martyr") to Jesus as the Christ, or Messiah. His was the power that is traceable to the gift of the Holy Spirit (v. 8), and the violence with which he was assailed is strong testimony to the inability of his opponents to answer his logic. Resort to physical force is usually an indication that moral and intellectual defense is weak. Stephen was, as his name indicates, one of the Jewish men from outside Palestine. Luke introduces his story at this point to prepare for the appearance of Paul, the greatest of the Hellenistic Jews, and to forecast the victory of the cross in the Dispersion.

8-10. Stephen and the Synagogues. Stephen proved to be a man larger than his set task. The apostles could not leave their ministry to serve tables, yet Stephen found some time for the larger ministry after his steward's work was done. There were many synagogues in Jerusalem. The members of these congregations often represented places far away. For many had moved to Jerusalem from other parts, but unlike the Judean Jews, did not use the Hebrew Scriptures. Stephen and the other Hellenists worshiped, even prayed, it is likely, in Greek. There were probably two of these Greek-speaking congregations with which Stephen came into contact: the synagogue made up of Jews who were descended from men of the first century before Christ, who had been taken prisoners, carried to Rome and later freed, hence called Libertines. With these were associated people from Cyrene and from Alexandria. The second synagogue in question was made up of people from the country surrounding Ephesus, and from Cilicia, whose city, Tarsus, was the early home of Paul. It is entirely possible that Paul himself was an occasional opponent of Stephen. The miracles wrought by Stephen are barely mentioned by Luke, for they are not as important as the wisdom with which Stephen spoke and the evident power of the Holy Spirit (v. 10).

11-15. Before the Sanhedrin. Failing in their rebuttal of Stephen's arguments, the injured Hellenists tried to bring about the defeat of that hero through false dealing. They persuaded men to perjure themselves before the court (v. 11) to which they dragged Stephen on a charge of blasphemy and insurrection, much as their Judæan countrymen did with Jesus, not long before. The charge that Stephen had said that Jesus would destroy the Temple (this holy place), and alter the customs of the fathers, was a result of malicious misunderstanding. The charge presented, Stephen is asked to plead "guilty" or "not guilty," but instead of the simple answer, he defended his course in an elaborate address to the Sanhedrin (ch. 7).

CHAPTER VII

1-53. Stephen's Defense and Counter-Charge. This address, the longest speech in Acts, is the more difficult to understand because its method is so Oriental. Western minds do not follow lines at all like those along which Stephen's hearers and Luke's readers traveled. Briefly, Stephen recited the following facts, upon which he built his charge of guilt, addressed to the Sanhedrin directly but at the Jewish people indirectly: God called our father Abraham from the East, and he came at length into this land, but it was not yet his (vv. 2-5) except in promise. The possession of the land had to wait upon weary centuries before it could be fulfilled (vv. 6-19), for the people languished in Egypt until Moses arrived as deliverer (vv. 20-36) and led them out into the wilderness. The promise to Abraham was even then unfulfilled, and Moses foretold that another prophet like himself should come (v. 37) to make good the promise. So the congregation in the wilderness came into this land and Solomon built the Temple (vv. 38-47) although God himself does not dwell in a man-made house (v. 50).

At the climax of this résumé of Israel's temporal and religious history Stephen seemed entirely overcome by his feeling of shame for his people. How blind they had been! How meanly had they treated the great deliverer! How often in the past had their fathers persecuted prophets who tried to do them good! Most shameful of all, how wickedly had this generation betrayed a Saviour! Thus he cried out to them his agony, not so much in anger as in sorrow, but with pitiless, clear, incisive words: The Righteous One you have now betrayed and murdered (v. 52).

54-60. Stephen the Martyr. A surge of hate drove the council to an elemental outburst. Rules of order did not bind their action. One passion ruled—This fellow must die! Thus they wrote with their deed their involuntary approving comment upon his words. There and then the Sanhedrin killed another prophet. But Stephen was no longer of their courtroom; he was no longer of this earth; for even before the cruel stones fell upon his body the heavens were opened for him and he beheld the martyred Son of God. Yet in his heavenly vision he did not forget his fellow men, however deeply they sinned. They were still the people for whom that glorified Saviour died. His last words were a prayer, asking God not to lay this sin to their charge (vv. 57-60).

The hour of Stephen's death saw a new name entered on the roll of heroes of the cross. But the name was at first that of an enemy of the cross. Saul of Tarsus (81) stood by and approved the stoning of the first Christian martyr. (For the names Saul and Paul see under 139.)

CHAPTER VIII

1-4. First Mention of Saul of Tarsus. Up to this point Luke has set forth the progress of the Christian community in and about Jerusalem. With the appearance of Paul on the scene of Stephen's death and his entrance upon a career of bitter persecution of the disciples, the field of the witnessing to Jesus is widened, for the believers, scattered, proclaimed their message everywhere. The story of Saul is begun (81-4), but is interrupted for a time (84-91) to permit of a recital of the activities of Philip, one of the Seven.

II. CHAPTERS 84 to 165: THE CHURCH IN SYRIA AND IN ASIA MINOR

4-25. Philip in Samaria. The first movement in the widening of the circle of Christian influence arose through the activities of three men, Philip, Paul, and Peter, only one of them from the circle of the Twelve, no one of them like any other. They had this in common—that circumstances compelled each to take a chief part in the expansion of the Messiah movement. There is little reason to think that the persecution (83 91) carried on by Saul was a widespread influence. It was centered at Jerusalem and those who went so far only as Samaria were out of its power. Even the Twelve remained safely at Jerusalem (81, 14, 25 927).

Philip went to the capital city of Samaria, the O.T. Samaria, but since the days of Herod the Great called Sebaste (Greek for Augusta). More emphasis is laid upon the miracles of healing that attended his teaching than in the case of Stephen (68-10). This emphasis is called for in contrast to the sorceries of Simon the magician (vv. 9-11). This Simon became a convert to Christianity, for the statement Simon also himself believed (v. 13) can be understood only thus. But Simon did not easily acquire the Christian point of view. Vv. 14-24 contain a most instructive narrative of the way in which the new teaching was sometimes misunderstood. The apostles at Jerusalem sent Peter and John to Samaria to investigate the work done by Philip. Their approval of the mission was so hearty that on their way back to Jerusalem Peter and John preached to other Samaritan communities (v. 25).

This venture of Philip at Samaria is so instructive as to call for a statement of the following conclusions: First, the religious experience of these early disciples of Jesus had tempered their race prejudices. Luke has not introduced into his narrative a single note of surprise that Philip, a Jew, should thus fellowship with the people of Samaria. Second, the apostles at Jerusalem at this time had begun to act with authority (cf. 62) in all that pertained to the propagation of the message of Jesus. While Philip could baptize converts, none of the Samaritans received the Holy Spirit until the apostles prayed for them and laid their hands upon them. Third, the presence of the Holy Spirit in the community was evidenced in some very conspicuous way, for Simon, in his regenerate but uninformed state, was willing to invest in a power so evident to the beholder. Fourth, the mission of Philip, seconded by Peter and John, constitutes the first page in the annals of world-wide Christianity. My witnesses . . . in all Judæa and Samaria (18).

Few of the essential details concerning Samaritan Christianity are handed down by Luke. Another incident in the ministry of Philip turns attention toward the vicinity of Gaza.

26-40. Philip and the Ethiopian Eunuch. The men of the early church were sensitive to spiritual guidance, a facility which followed naturally from their effective spiritual preparation. An angel of the Lord directed Philip to take the road toward Gaza, an old Philistine city, southwest of Jerusalem. Philip was not divinely directed when he went to Samaria, as far as narrated, but in this instance his spiritual direction is explicit. The road concerned ran through uninhabited country (a lonely road, desert), where ordinarily few people would be encountered. The situation, then, was quite the opposite of that in Samaria. In other respects also this narrative is a counterpart to that of the Samaria mission. The subject of the story is evidently a proselyte, a man who lived far from Jerusalem, who came to the Holy City at stated times to worship. But he was not a fully instructed proselyte, although a student of the Greek Bible. From this translation Luke draws the Isaiah quotation, vv. 32f., which formed the text of Philip's discussion of the Christ. In the Samaria mission, the Holy Spirit came upon the converts after their conversion through the laying on of hands by the apostles. Here the eunuch is baptized, but nothing is said of the coming of the Holy Spirit upon him. The Samaritans would not come to the Temple to worship, but this man came from afar. The eunuch was really closer than the Samaritans to Judaism.

In terms of the charge of Jesus (18) the witness to the Messiah was now reaching the wider world. A part of southern Egypt was to hear the gospel as this eunuch returned. And tradition has it that the queen of Ethiopia (whose title, like that of Pharaoh or Caesar, was Candace) was baptized by this converted eunuch. Philip preached Jesus to the man, beginning from this scripture, which was Isa. 537 in the widely used Greek translation. A chief element of confidence in the new movement thus arose from the assurance that it was not a different religion from the old faith, in which they had been instructed, but that the Way led men to higher levels of religious experience than the prophets before Jesus had been able to point out.

One of the aims before the writer of Acts is to show that Christianity developed directly out of the religion of Moses and the prophets, and was in reality a higher and truer phase of that ancient religion.

CHAPTER IX

1-19. Saul's Conversion. The conversion of Saul of Tarsus from persecutor to missionary is so important to the author of Acts that he offers three separate accounts of it (cf. 223-21 and 262-23 with 91-19). As appears from Paul's own words, in Acts and in his letters (Rom. 719-25 81-4 Gal. 114 Acts 223f.), he was a religious man of high ideals, and withal, a man of high moral purpose. His conversion was not so much a transformation from an evil life to a good life as it was a transformation from one type of goodness to another. As a lover of the Law he had high ideals which he could not attain. Other men would have been satisfied where he fretted. Paul's was an active, restless, achieving nature. (For the change of name from Saul to Paul, see 139). No one can tell what definite influence Stephen's discussions had upon the conversion of Saul, but directly or indirectly Stephen must be held to some degree responsible for the persecutor's awakening. Saul was empowered by the Jerusalem authorities to extend the persecution of Christians to the Damascus synagogues (vv. 1f.) and was on his way to carry out the plan. This journey to Damascus was the occasion to which Paul often referred afterward as the revelation of Christ to him (see 1 Cor. 9¹ 15⁸ Gal. 1^{15f.} and cf. Acts 22⁹⁻¹¹ 26¹⁴⁻¹⁹). The actual experience of Saul on the Damascus road can be described in present-day terms as follows: As a result of reflection upon his errand, together with the occurrence of some striking physical event, the thought of the traveler was focused upon the person whom these men of the Way worshiped. Whatever the particular combination of events was, the apostle always thought of them as divinely arranged. Saul became so awakened to the living presence of Jesus in the world and before himself that he objectified that person when his own accusing conscience smote him for persecuting the followers of Jesus. This event on the road was not the conversion in fact. As in most cases, a human guide was needed, and Ananias, the disciple in Damascus, was that man (vv. 10f.). The first phase of the epochal experience was highly emotional (awakening, conviction, remorse). The second phase (three days, v. 9) involved reflection and prayer (v. 11). The last phase (vv. 17-19) brought instruction, encouragement, fellowship, and baptism. There can be no doubt that the gift of the Holy Spirit crowned this work of grace (v. 17).

The story of Saul's conversion explains in large measure why it was that a man not one of the original apostles should supersede all or any of the Twelve in importance to the Christian religion. Note the importance of the words addressed to Ananias (vv. 15f.): *He is a chosen vessel . . . to bear my name before the Gentiles. The things he must suffer for the sake of Jesus' name are partly described in their fulfillment in Paul's own words in 2 Cor. 11²³⁻³³, concluding with an experience which he had in that very city of Damascus. (See art., Life and Work of Paul, pp. 934-5.)* 20-31. Paul the Persecuted. Paul first appeared in Acts as a persecutor of the Way. He may even have belonged to one of the synagogues with whose members Stephen dealt so successfully. Immediately after his conversion Paul was found in the ranks of the persecuted, first in Damascus (vv. 20-25), then in Jerusalem (vv. 26-29), and perhaps even in Caesarea (v. 30).

Luke here offers a vivid picture of a man of the highest type of moral courage. A stubborn character could not have taken such a position before both friends and enemies. Saul was in danger of making enemies of his friends and creating suspicion in the minds of the disciples (cf. v. 21). The converted Saul actually repudiated his past, confessed publicly that he had been wrong, and set at work to retrieve his former misdeeds. In this, Saul of Tarsus sets an example for all Christians since his day. How well he supported by this act of courage his appeal to the Corinthians: Come out . . . be separate . . . and I will receive you! (2 Cor. 6^{17,18}.) Whether Saul's stay at Damascus was long or short (certain days, v. 19, many days, v. 23), Luke gives the impression that Saul wasted no time in raising his voice to defend the teachings that he had branded before as heresy. His message centered in the Messiahship of Jesus, that he is the Son of God (v. 20). At first his Jewish hearers found themselves more confused and astounded than outraged. Paul's coming as persecutor had been heralded, but now he defended the Way (v. 21). His method of proof from the Scriptures could not easily be attacked. Some of the Jews were convinced. If all had been so convinced, vv. 23-25 could not have been written. The unconvinced ceased wondering at Paul and took action. What logic could not do force might accomplish. Paul's friends sensed the danger and aided him in a night escape through the wall of the city, since the gates were being watched (cf. 2 Cor. 11^{32f.}).

The return of Paul to Jerusalem brought new experiences. The disciples had not heard of his remarkable conversion and feared his pretense as a trick (v. 26) until the good offices of Barnabas prevailed. Possibly Barnabas (v. 27) had been in Damascus and returned with Paul, thus being able to certify the events in Damascus. Both the church at Jerusalem and at Antioch valued the services of Barnabas highly, sending him on various missions that demanded tact and judgment (11²², 30 12²⁵ 13²), and he may have been sent to Damascus by the apostles at the time Saul set out upon his journey to that city. It is certain that the disciples in Damascus had timely information about him (v. 13). This was, at all events, the beginning of a comradeship between Paul and Barnabas that lasted until the affair of John Mark (15³⁹). The Christians of Jerusalem came to some understanding of the new preacher, but not so his former companions, the Hellenists. With these Paul now debated, trying to convince them that Jesus was Messiah, but history repeated itself and they proposed to do with him as Paul had willingly seen them do with Stephen. But the Jewish Christians aided Paul in an escape to Cæsarea, from which city he later returned to his home in Cilicia (v. 30).

The concluding note of this section (v. 31), referring to the peaceful outcome of the persecution that had its rise at Stephen's death, closes for the present Luke's account of Paul. He turns to Peter's activities, especially in forwarding the spread of Christianity out to the uttermost part of the earth (18). In v. 31 Luke mentions the church in Galilee, although he has not written a word as to its rise.

32-35. Peter at Lydda. Hitherto in Acts the apostles have been at Jerusalem. Here the fact emerges that Peter made journeys throughout all parts, no doubt to supervise the growing work, just as he and John went to Samaria to aid Philip (814). A brief account of his visit to Lydda illustrates one way in which Christianity was forwarded, namely, through a miraculous cure. There was a church at Lydda (v. 32), yet none of those saints had healed Æneas. Peter called upon him to arise, and straightway he arose (v. 34). Throughout the region the impression was so deep that all . . . turned to the Lord. The statement is probably rhetorical, since some, of course, would remain unconvinced. For in the story of Tabitha which follows (vv. 36-43) the statement occurs that as a result of her restoration to life many believed on the Lord (v. 42). If merely the performance of miracles were to convince men, surely the raising of a dead woman would be more convincing than the cure of a palsied man, even though he had been bedridden for eight years!

36-43. Peter at Joppa. While Peter was at Lydda, the church at Joppa, about three hours' journey away, met with a severe loss in the death of a useful member, Tabitha. Peter was called to Joppa and came promptly (vv. 36-39). Luke does not say whether Tabitha was young or old, married, single, or widowed, but her ministries had been deeply appreciated by the widows of the congregation and they were the chief mourners in the upper chamber (v. 39). Like Jesus, when he raised Jairus' daughter from the dead (Mk. 539-43), Peter dismissed the mourners and addressed the woman: Tabitha, arise (v. 41), and she sat up. In the Master's case, no prayer is mentioned (Mk. 5), but Peter prayed (v. 40) before he bade the dead woman arise, thereby showing his sense of dependence upon the Lord in this time of need. The similarity between "Tabitha, arise" and "Talitha, cumi" (Mk. 541), often commented upon, is but accidental. A favorite method of interpreting such narratives as that of the restoration of Tabitha is to assume that the subject of the miracle as narrated was only seemingly dead. So in the present case, the easiest answer to the question, Was Tabitha really dead? is that the overworked disciple had fallen into a state of coma, from which Peter's voice aroused her. This would be in reality to raise her from the dead, for if left in this state she would no doubt soon be dead in fact. If, however, the attitude of the writer of Acts be sought, it must be sought through an understanding of the narrative as it reads. The conviction of the writer is that Tabitha actually died, that the disciples believed that Peter could do something in the emergency, and that through his prayer and faith God himself brought life again to her body. In the study of all such narratives it is well to bear in mind that when the author is not an eyewitness he is dependent upon others for their understanding of an event, thus perhaps does not himself know all the facts in the case as it occurred. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 924a.)

CHAPTER X

1-48. Peter and Cornelius. Cæsarea was more than forty miles north of Joppa. The former was an important city, often mentioned in Acts (840 930 101. 24 1111 1219 1822 218. 16 2323. 33 251) as important to early Christian history. In Cæsarea were at least five "bands" or cohorts of soldiers, and Cornelius, the captain of one of these, became the first Gentile convert through the influence of Peter.

Cornelius was doubtless a Roman citizen but was deeply impressed with the Jewish religion. His whole "house," i.e., his family and slaves, were believers in the one true God, and no doubt took part in synagogue worship. It appears from the sequel that Cornelius had not become a proselyte in fact (113; cf. 1028, 45), hence was considered as a pagan outsider. Even the Christian apostles at Jerusalem were at first in doubt as to whether Peter should have even gone into the house of Cornelius.

The simultaneous visions of Peter and Cornelius were not mere coincidences in the thought of Luke. Each vision emphasized and clarified the other. With Peter, religious scruples, well entrenched in his Jewish consciousness, had to give way. The entire episode is exceedingly instructive to one who seeks light upon problems of internationalism and inter-racial contacts in the present time.

In these early days precedents were continually being established. Not only did a chief apostle hold fellowship with a Gentile, but he saw men outside the Jewish church receiving the Holy Spirit (see under 214). The reader wonders whether Peter had any difficulty with his conscience when he conceded that these Gentiles should be baptized. The event was epochal in the history of the Way for three reasons: (1) The Christian belief that salvation was for Jews alone were modified. Here a chief apostle abandoned the exclusive attitude of his orthodox brothers. (2) The ceremonial distinctions between foods was seen to have no decisive analogy in the realm of persons. This passage does not annul the Jewish food laws, but it does make the brotherhood of men in the gospel actual. (3) A decisive precedent was established for the extension of Christianity into the Roman Empire.

CHAPTER XI

1-18. Peter's Fellowship with Gentiles Explained at Jerusalem. The rumor that reached Jerusalem produced among the apostles an unfavorable attitude toward Peter. It is not said that he was summoned, but when Peter came to Jerusalem he was asked to explain his irregular behavior (vv. 1-3). Peter had taken with him to Jerusalem the six men from Joppa who witnessed the events at Cæsarea, and appealed to them during his testimony before the apostles (v. 12). Peter did not deny that he ate with Gentiles. He had lodged the messengers of Cornelius (1023) and he had entered a Gentile house (1024f.), which violated the rules governing an orthodox Jew's life. Rather than deny the facts, Peter frankly admitted them and cited a higher authority than custom to justify him (v. 17).

In the interview, the apostles took no exception to evangelizing Gentiles; they raised no question as to the baptism of Cornelius; thus it is not fair to define the issue merely as a race question. If Cornelius had been a circumcised proselyte, and if all the scruples of the Jewish religious man had been observed, the occurrence might have attracted no attention. The issue was one of religious particularism, narrow to an outsider but protective to the insider. From the story of Peter's defense of his course with Cornelius the modern reader learns how reluctant the first Christians were to understand that the religion of Jesus was like new wine which could not be contained within the old wine skins.

Peter told his story in full and Luke repeats it quite at length (vv. 5-15) in much the same words as are found in 109-32. He omits the detail of lodging the messengers (1023) but states explicitly that he entered into the man's house (v. 12). His appeal to the fact that the Holy Spirit fell upon the Gentile company was too powerful to refute. The apostles may not have been convinced, but they could not object. Not even the Sanhedrin wished to come into opposition with God (539). So the apostles here (v. 18) held their peace and confessed: Then to the Gentiles also hath God granted repentance unto life.

19-21. Gentiles Converted at Antioch. When Stephen was stoned and Saul began to persecute those of the Way (81-3), many followers of Jesus, like Philip, escaped to other parts. These fugitives kept on declaring in the synagogues their faith in Jesus Messiah (v. 19b) and carried their mission efforts beyond Samaria to the coast (Phœnicia) and to one island at least (Cyprus). They were heard of as far north as Antioch in Syria.

Whether all these missionaries were Hellenistic Jews or not cannot be known. Certain Hellenists (of Cyprus and Cyrene) were the first to vary from the practice of preaching to Jews only (v. 20b) when they came to Antioch. (On the church at Antioch see under 131.) The instant success of this movement was marked by large accessions of Gentiles to the church. The context implies that these converts were received into fellowship with Jewish Christians without submitting to the rite of circumcision. This fact definitely raised the Gentile question on a much larger scale than in the case of the individual Cornelius.

22-26. Barnabas and Saul at Antioch. In Jerusalem, up to this time, the admission of uncircumcised Gentiles into the church was regarded as irregular and, in fact, an impossible proceeding. The case of Cornelius and those with him was the only Gentile conversion on record, if it be admitted that his conversion occurred before the Antioch movement began. Hence when the saints at Jerusalem heard that large numbers of Gentiles were being received (v. 21) they sent a trusted man to inspect the work and report (v. 22).

Barnabas was chosen because of his long connection with the church (436f.) and perhaps because he was a native of Cyprus, who would have influence with the Jews of the Diaspora (see pp. 847-9). He had done well on other such missions. (See note under 927.) Luke speaks high words of praise for him, and briefly but positively hints in this section that this was by no means the least of his successes. Barnabas, convinced that the work was of the Lord, went to Tarsus and invited Saul to help him, and together they worked for a year in Antioch, building up that church remarkably. The name Christians, used to designate Jesus' disciples, probably originated outside the church, and its use may at first have been ironical.

Nothing is said of the report given by Barnabas to the Jerusalem church, but it must have been favorable. That it was not approved by all the Jewish Christians appears from succeeding events (15^{1f.}), but it is most likely that the apostles accepted the Antioch movement as inevitable and right. (See notes on the conference at Jerusalem, ch. 15.)

27-30. Generosity of Antioch toward the Jerusalem Church. The words in these days (v. 27) mean that the visit of Agabus took place about the time of the revival of vv. 21-26. Agabus represented a group of men in the early church called prophets, often associated with apostles and teachers. The prophet was possessed of such gifts of the Spirit that he could interpret the Lord's will to others. Agabus was a well-known prophet of the time and appears again in 21¹⁰. His prophecy of an impending famine was fulfilled at least in part, although no famine that affected all the inhabited world in those times has left any trace in history. The Antioch saints recalled this prophecy of Agabus when the shortage of food came in Judæa (between 40 and 50 A.D.) and dispatched Barnabas and Saul with their offering. The contribution would be in the form of food rather than of money (v. 30).

CHAPTER XII

The Church and Herod. In Herod, the church met a new kind of opposition—the opposition of the purely political authority. The purpose of ch. 12 is to show how triumphantly the Way continued as a live movement in spite of difficulties, opposition, persecution, and even the death of some of its leaders. The Sanhedrin had tried repeatedly to stop the teaching of the Cross; the special groups within the Sanhedrin did their best to hinder the disciples; inner dissension scarcely showed its head before it was checked (5^{1f.} 6^{1f.}); at last Herod took a hand, with what fatal results to himself!

1-6. James Killed and Peter Imprisoned. Herod Agrippa I ruled over all Palestine from 41-44 A.D. The death of James took place near the end of Herod's reign. Compared with the detail found in Stephen's story, this account is brief. The chief interest of the writer lay in what pertained to the spread of the gospel into the Gentile world. Stephen had an important influence upon this movement. Peter, also, whose story here is recounted, had weight in the program of world-Christianity. As in the case of Jesus (Mk. 142), it was felt to be inadvisable to execute Peter during the feast (vv. 3-6). But Herod took unusual precautions with his prisoner. Sixteen men were assigned, four for each watch of the night; two soldiers were in the cell with Peter constantly, the other two posted outside. To make assurance doubly sure, Peter was chained to his two cell-companions. In the meantime the entire Christian group of Jerusalem had assembled in a service of prayer for Peter. It is hardly probable that the church expected his release (v. 15), since James had paid with his life for his faith.

7-10. Peter Delivered from the Prison. An angel of the Lord is often mentioned in Acts (519 826 1223 2723) to express the Christian belief in God's active interest in his own.

The narrative of the escape of Peter from prison is an excellent example of the way in which literary accounts of unusual events use a large number of details to hold the interest of the reader and to intensify the supernatural element believed to reside in the occurrence. As the church had developed the narrative, Peter was sleeping soundly in his perilous situation. When summoned, he did not need to hurry. He could dress for the street. The chains falling off of themselves and the gate opening automatically are similarly impressive details. In an instance such as this, the actual facts do not lie on the surface of the narrative. But the narrative expresses the implicit faith of the church in Providence and in the power of God exercised in the interest of the growing community of believers. Through this miracle narrative one gets a glimpse of the strenuous prayer life of the early Christians (v. 5), of the tenacity with which the members of the church clung together in emergencies (v. 12), of the caution with which the disciples surrounded themselves when meeting (vv. 13-16), and, in general, of the developing consciousness of the Christian Church. An event to which others may have given a "natural" cause was properly regarded as "supernatural" by the intense religious consciousness of the church. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 928a.)

11-19. Peter at the Home of John Mark. While Peter was in prison the church was praying. Peter instinctively turned in the direction of this meeting-place, evidently a house of considerable size, accommodating a goodly number, fitted with an outer gate, where a maid, Rhoda, was stationed. The fact that Rhoda recognized the voice of Peter suggests that she was a disciple.

Jewish belief in a guardian angel attendant upon each person led the company to suppose that the maid saw only Peter's angelic shadow. But the loud and continuous knocking soon admitted the flesh-and-blood apostle. Peter stayed just long enough to tell his story, then went away, to what city or town is not known. Peter's message to James, the brother of Jesus (v. 17b; cf. 114), implies the latter's leadership in the church. Later (15¹³ 21¹⁸) James is found to be actually the head of the Jerusalem church. It is unpleasant to read that four soldiers paid with their lives for the disappearance of Peter (vv. 18f.), a penalty demanded by Roman discipline.

20-23. The End of Herod. Herod spent only the feast time at Jerusalem. His home was at Caesarea. An event that occurred some time after his return from Jerusalem was closely connected with Herod's death, brought about, as the church believed, through a stroke divinely inflicted (v. 23), when he accepted the worshipful but hypocritical plaudits of the people. Herod had persecuted the Christians because he found that this gave him popular favor (v. 3). The author of Acts uses this event as a commentary upon the power of the church to resist its persecutors.

24. Continued Success of the Gospel. Luke frequently closes a section of his narrative with a brief paragraph as to the state of the church (242 432-35 67 931 165 and other similar places). Here the single statement is made that the church, persecuted by Herod, bereft of one of its apostles, still increased in power and numbers.

25. See under 13¹.

CHAPTER XIII

1. Leaders in Antioch. (See also 12²⁵.) The acts of Barnabas and Paul form the theme of 12²⁵–15³⁹. The story of the so-called first missionary journey of Paul, which begins with 13⁴, is prefaced with a summary account of the spiritual leadership at Antioch. Among its members were prophets and teachers, but no apostles. The latter were, until the appearance of James as leader in Jerusalem, at the head of the mother church. The Twelve did not seem to impress Luke with their powers of leadership, for his account of the development of the Gentile church traces all the initiative and power of the movement to Antioch rather than to Jerusalem. Hence the importance of this list of names. Five men are mentioned, three of whom are unknown, apart from their mention here. Luke's omission of their stories does not show that they were inactive; e.g., no details of the tour of Barnabas with Mark in Cyprus (15³⁹) have been handed down, notwithstanding its general importance. So, in the case of each of these three, Symeon, Lucius, and Manaen, heroic stories might probably have been told. Their exploits are omitted because at this particular time the divine choice fell upon Barnabas and Saul. Luke's story is of these two. The omission, however, is not without its own significance. These three men are types of that vast host of "unsung heroes of the Cross" upon whom, from that day to this, the spread of the gospel has so largely depended.

The church at Antioch in Syria may have been nearly as old as that in Jerusalem, but it was totally different in its type of Christianity and in world-outlook. Acts teaches that the Antioch church was the instrument used by the Lord in making Christianity a world religion. The men of the church at Antioch were less hampered by Jewish narrowness, partaking, as they did, of that liberality that characterized the Jews of the Dispersion. This church became the center of "foreign missions," as their movement would be called to-day. Yet it is instructive to note that the people of Antioch made no invidious distinction between work abroad and work at home. The Holy Spirit sponsored both (vv. 2, 4). The spirit of the Antioch church was liberal in every good sense of the word (112^{7f.}). It showed throughout a fraternal attitude toward Jerusalem and other churches (15²), and readily received the brethren sent to Antioch for special work (112^{2f.} 1530-35). In those days there was place for both the conservative and the liberal type of churches, and the modern reader learns through Acts that co-operation between the two types rather than selfish competition builds the Kingdom upon earth.

2, 3. The Call of Barnabas and Paul. In a few words these verses report a most important and decisive Christian meeting. The saints at Antioch devoted themselves to a prayerful inquiry as to whom the Lord would select to carry the gospel of Jesus abroad. A deep solemnity pervaded all. Fasting, prayer, laying on of hands, and all the religious devotion bound up in the phrase ministered to the Lord (v. 2), formed their religious exercises. In some unmistakable way, the choice fell on Barnabas and Saul, in that order. The principle followed here is one which the church can never afford to neglect, namely, that those who are set apart to lead its work shall have the manifest approval of the Spirit of God.

4-12. The Mission to Cyprus. The guidance of the Lord is emphasized in the phrase sent forth by the Holy Ghost (v. 4; cf. v. 2). Seleucia was the seaport of Antioch in Syria. Cyprus is an island of the Mediterranean, whose eastern end lies about sixty miles from the Syrian coast and whose northern shore is some forty-six miles south of Cilicia. The island at that time had a large Jewish population and a number of synagogues. Salamis (v. 5) was a city near the eastern end of the island, while Paphos (properly New Paphos) was about one hundred miles west of Salamis. The journey through the whole island (v. 6) surely involved much missionary effort in the synagogues on the way.

At Paphos the proconsul, Sergius Paulus, became a convert to Christianity (v. 12) not only through the victory of Paul over the magian, Bar-Jesus, but through the real worth of Paul's message. For Sergius Paulus was an intelligent man (vv. 7, 12), looking with open mind for new truth. His invitation to Barnabas and Paul to discuss their message with him led Bar-Jesus to antagonize the missionaries (v. 8). The English word sorcerer means to the present-day reader something other than the word "magian", (cf. Mt. 21, "magi," plural). The parenthesis in the text (v. 8) indicates that sorcerer or magian (see mg.) is the translation of Elymas, not that Elymas is the equivalent of Bar-Jesus (v. 6). Thus the proper name of the man was Bar-Jesus, while he claimed magus, or was given that name, as his title. The story of Bar-Jesus the magian is to be accepted at its face value, not as a figurative representation of Judaism as persecutor of Christianity, nor, again, as a picture of the apostle himself, "blinded" before his conversion. The narrative presents an excellent example of the punitive miracle (cf. 12²³ and the expectation implied in 28⁴). The theory underlying this form of miracle was that through his representatives on earth God visited punishment upon men, usually for evils done, but sometimes with a view to their repentance (as in 98^f). The punitive miracle is not to be confused with such events as the visitation of dumbness upon Zacharias (Lk. 120). In the case of Bar-Jesus the blindness was temporary (v. 11). During the period of darkness the magian might see the true light. The use of the narrative here is to show what salutary effect the incident had upon Sergius Paulus (v. 12). (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 927a.)

This point in the story of Paul is selected by Luke as a fitting opportunity to explain the double name of his hero. He offers the explanatory note (v. 9) that Saul is also Paul, i.e., both names are truly his. Nothing in the text indicates that at this time Saul assumed the name of Paul, much less that he took the name of his distinguished convert, Sergius Paulus. As a Roman citizen and free-born (22²⁸) Paul bore not only one Latin name but three. (See Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, pp. 208-214; and Deissmann, St. Paul, first edit., p. 93.) Roman law or procedure would require Paul to use his Roman name, although usually his associates knew him by his Aramaic name, Saul.

13. Paul, Barnabas and Mark. The events at Paphos proved so significant for Paul that Luke from this point on prefers the order, Paul and Barnabas. A transition phrase is Paul and his company in v. 13. The name Barnabas is placed first in 14¹² 15¹², 25.

From Paphos to Perga of Pamphylia meant a sea voyage of about one hundred and seventy-five miles, in a direction a little west of north. John Mark left the party here (v. 13b) for reasons which are subject only to conjecture. 15³⁸ offers to some a ground for the opinion that Mark showed cowardice, but this seems a harsh verdict upon slender evidence. Perhaps Mark had undertaken the journey with a definite understanding that Cyprus only was to be visited. The estrangement between Paul and Mark was not permanent (2 Tim. 4¹¹). It is not certain that no work was done in Perga. Luke's interest or his lack of information leads him directly to Pisidian Antioch, where occurred the first conspicuous instance of direct appeal to Gentiles (13^{46b}).

14, 15. In the Synagogue at Antioch. It was the custom of Paul to address his fellow countrymen first whenever he entered a city. "To the Jew first" was with him a principle, but experience added to that "and also to the Greek" (Rom. 1¹⁶). No doubt Paul entered heartily into the synagogue service. After the Scripture reading, the rulers of the synagogue invited the visitors to address the people if they would. Paul took up the word. The only synagogue address of Paul reported in Acts follows.

16-41. Paul's Address to the Jews of Antioch. The first part of the address is somewhat similar to the speeches of Peter (21⁴⁻⁴⁰) and Stephen (72-53) in that the speaker calls to mind how God chose Israel and cared for them throughout the national troubles, down to the time of David (vv. 17-22). The introduction of Peter's Pentecost sermon appropriately quoted the prophecy of Joel about the outpouring of the Spirit (21⁷⁻²¹ Joel 22^{8f}), but then Peter came to "the patriarch David" (22^{8f}), whose words forecast the coming of Messiah. Stephen began with Abraham (72^f), and after showing that Moses foresaw a greater prophet than himself (73⁷) came down to the time of David and Solomon in his survey of Messianic prophecy (74⁵⁻⁴⁷). Peter at Pentecost emphasized the "resurrection of Christ" (23¹) in Davidic terms; Stephen, in his last words, accused his hearers of being the betrayers and murderers of the Righteous One (75²), whose coming all the prophets foretold; Paul, in the Antioch synagogue, reminded his hearers of the goodness of God in saving Israel from Egypt and in giving them the land of Canaan, then in leading them through the time of the judges to Saul the king and on to David, of whose seed God, in his goodness, brought unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus (vv. 16-23).

Like his predecessors in Acts, Paul preached Jesus from the text of the old Scriptures. The Jewish training of the apostle taught him to show that he preached a religion in no way alien to the religion of the fathers. In the course of time, he assured them, the old promises had been fulfilled and it was the duty of the Jewish man who prayed for the coming of Messiah to recognize that Messiah had come and his prayers were answered (v. 33). The Messiah was Jesus, raised from the dead (vv. 34-37). The coming of Messiah meant something to the old religion in that a personal redemption supplanted the function of the law. Heretofore justification had been sought through the law (v. 39), but now through this man is proclaimed remission of sins (v. 38).

Paul closed his sermon with a warning from the Scriptures. His hearers should not be like the despisers described by Habakkuk (Hab. 15) who shut their eyes to the work of the Lord in their midst (vv. 40f.).

42, 43. Antioch Impressed. The effect of this address was uniformly favorable. All wished to hear Paul speak the next Sabbath (v. 42). On the day of Pentecost the words of Peter produced a sincere conviction in the minds of the hearers (237f.), for the movement was then just launched. When Stephen spoke before the Sanhedrin his words precipitated his own death, but lodged unerringly in certain minds and later bore fruit. Here in Antioch, remote from the scenes of Jesus' death, Paul brought real news as well as good news to the Jewish people. It took a little time for persecution to start, following private discussion of the address in the synagogue. Barnabas was not the chief speaker, but both he and Paul spoke at length and more informally to the interested Jews and proselytes, urging them to continue in the grace of God, i.e., in the spirit of the foregoing, to seek the favor of God by falling in with his ways and by accepting Jesus as Messiah and Redeemer (v. 43).

44-52. The Mission Opposed by the Orthodox Jews. A different synagogue service was held in Antioch on the second Sabbath after the arrival of Paul and Barnabas. No report of an address is given, and it is doubtful if either missionary was offered a chance to expound the Scriptures.

The element of novelty brought an unusual number to the synagogue service (v. 44) while the augmented congregation provoked the regular leaders to jealousy. These leaders have something to be said for them, in that they were responsible for decorum and for sound teaching. They lacked the background which a knowledge of the Christian movement could give them. On the other hand, they cannot be justified in the method which they used to muzzle the two apostles. The phraseology implies a disorderly scene in the synagogue. Private discussion had brought out the unconventional elements in the teaching of these two men. In that the rulers of the synagogue contradicted the things which were spoken by Paul (v. 45) their statements were rightly called blasphemy by Luke, for they would thus deny the Messiahship and the resurrection of Jesus.

The two apostles felt some strict necessity upon them compelling them to offer their gospel first of all to Jews (v. 46). However, they felt released from that necessity after the Jewish people in Antioch had rejected them. They were free to preach directly to heathen men. This situation prevailed, of course, for the people in Antioch alone. In each place yet to be visited, the Jews must have first chance (see 141 1613 171-3, 10 184 2817-28). Paul supported his decision to turn to the Gentiles by a quotation from Isaiah, in which Messiah was addressed as a light of the Gentiles . . . unto the uttermost part of the earth (v. 47; cf. Isa. 496). Throughout the Acts the Christian preachers based their message soundly upon the words of Scripture, mostly upon the prophets. The response of the Gentile population was spontaneous (vv. 48-50), and the Church in Antioch very probably consisted chiefly of other than synagogue members. The disciples who were filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost (v. 52) were the residents of Antioch and vicinity (v. 49) who responded to the preaching of Paul and Barnabas.

A genuine element of the Jewish theology of these early missionaries appears in the phrase as many as were ordained to eternal life (v. 48), the writer having, perhaps, in mind the idea of a book of life, in which even names of Gentiles might be recorded. (See Fairweather, art., "Development of Doctrine," in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. v., p. 293.) The fact of foreordination is assumed frequently in the N.T. (Rom. 828f. Eph. 141f. 11 1 Pet. 11f.). Several weeks of activity are represented in the statement that the region was evangelized (v. 49), yet all this time opposition was increasing toward the apostles' work. In this opposition even prominent women (v. 50) appeared in connection with the city authorities. These women were probably proselytes, whose social position gave them influence.

Luke does not specify the accusation against the apostles. Some form of political charge is probable. Whether formally tried or not, the two apostles found themselves compelled to leave Antioch and seek still other Gentile territory. In characteristic Jewish fashion Paul and Barnabas shook off even the dust of Antioch from their feet (Luke 95), a witness against their adversaries, not against the disciples (v. 52), whom they left in full enjoyment of their Christian experience.

CHAPTER XIV

1-4. Iconium. (See also 13⁵¹, 52.) The power of the apostles' preaching is witnessed in Iconium, as in many other places, by the large number of converts won within a short space of time (v. 1). Iconium was a city of importance about eighty or ninety miles southeast of Antioch. The synagogue was the first mission field and results similar to those in Antioch followed (v. 2). The opposition did not grow to decisive proportions for some time (v. 3), and in this interval a good work was accomplished. In Iconium the authorities did not play a prominent part in the expulsion of the apostles. Mob violence was threatened, apparently under the strong influence of the Jews, for the mob proposed to stone them.

5-21a. Lystra and Derbe. The work at Lystra began with a miracle, not with a synagogue service (v. 8; cf. 13⁵, 14). A cripple sat in some open public place, perhaps at the city gate (v. 13), or in a market-place, where the unfortunate begged for a living. No plea was made by the lame man, except the signs of wistful faith (v. 9), which Paul perceived. Most miracles of healing in the N.T. have as their condition faith on the part of the subject. (See art., N.T. Miracles, p. 925.) The population of Lystra were polytheists, following the gods of the Roman pantheon (vv. 11-13), hence it was obvious to them that some of their deities were appearing in human form. Paul, because he made the address (vv. 9, 12), was believed to be Hermes, the messenger and herald of the gods. The view that Paul's personal appearance was unattractive at that time cannot be supported by this incident, but is, rather, discredited, for Hermes (Mercury) was represented as of fine face and figure, e.g., the Hermes of Praxiteles (but cf. 2 Cor. 10¹⁰). Barnabas was doubtless older than Paul, perhaps appeared to be a leader, hence was designated Jupiter (Zeus). Yet no certainty as to the personal appearance of the apostles can be based upon a hasty (and erroneous) guess made by the Lystrans.

The Christian work done in Lystra, as far as reported (vv. 5-18), was slight enough. No conversions are indicated, but the mention of the disciples in v. 20 argues that Luke passed over the details of the evangelization of Lystra in the interest of his detailed story of the miracle wrought upon the lame man. On Paul's second visit to Lystra he found Timothy among the disciples of that city (16¹), and there is reason to suppose that before the Jews of v. 19 came to interrupt the work Paul and Barnabas had built up a Christian community in Lystra. That this is not mere surmise is witnessed by vv. 21b, 22, where we read that the presence of disciples in Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch demanded the hazardous return over the route by which the apostles had come to Derbe.

The Jews who came from Antioch and Iconium were orthodox members of the synagogues in those places, and were among the opponents of Paul and Barnabas when they began their preaching among them (13⁴⁵ 14⁵). At Lystra, as at Iconium, these antagonists sought to stone the two missionaries, and here at Lystra succeeded in stoning Paul (v. 19). It is not known how Barnabas escaped. After his well-nigh miraculous return to life, Paul, with Barnabas, left for Derbe the next day. At least that interval was necessary for recuperation after the terrible ordeal of stoning (v. 20b). The work at Derbe was successful. Luke relates no miracles, describes no synagogue service, and gives no names of converts. Paul and Barnabas spent enough time there to make many disciples (v. 21). This general statement of success implies that Luke's sources offered no extended account of this part of the mission.

21b-24. The New Churches Revisited. Nothing speaks more eloquently for the character of these preachers of the cross than the accomplished plan to return from Derbe through Lystra and Iconium to Pisidian Antioch, in the face of acute danger to themselves. Their work had been too abruptly broken off, and if left to themselves the converts would be apt to fall away under stress of persecution. An important contribution to church history is found in the statement that elders were appointed in every church (v. 23). Paul himself does not use the term "elders" in his letters. Instead, he speaks of "them that are over you in the Lord" (1 Thess. 5¹²), "apostles, . . . prophets, . . . teachers" (1 Cor. 12²⁸), "bishops and deacons" (Phil. 1¹). The elders would be men chosen because of maturity, judgment, and Christian experience, to act as a sort of official board. In the absence of trustworthy information about the office it may be supposed that the term represents no standardized church official. We certainly ought not to read back into the names "deacons," "elders," and "bishops," the meaning they came to have in later ecclesiastical developments. (See discussion of this question in intro. to 1 and 2 Timothy, pp. 1277–8.) The substance of the apostles' message on this organizing tour was heroic (v. 22), for the disciples faced suffering as the price of loyalty to the kingdom of God. The N.T. witnesses throughout to this theme as a dominant note in early Christian preaching (Mt. 10:17–22, 34–39 Mk. 13:9–13 Heb. 10:32–36 Rev. 6–9). The we of v. 22 is not analogous to the pronoun in the so-called we-sections. (See under 16:10f. 20:5f. 21:1f. 27:1f.). The clause (v. 22b) represents a bit of vivid indirect discourse, and the we includes the apostles in all the hazards of the Way.

25–28. Gentile Mission Justified at Antioch in Syria. The journey of Paul and Barnabas through Cyprus and Asia Minor was an experiment which was the fruit of the spiritual impulse that seized the church at Antioch (132f.) after many Gentiles had become members of that church. The Antioch church was therefore eagerly awaiting the report of the apostles. V. 24 adds some unnamed churches to the list of those established by Paul and Barnabas on this journey, for the expression passed through (v. 24a), so frequently used in Acts (8:40 11:19 13:6, 14 16:191), connotes rather extensive missionary activity.

Attalia (v. 25), about twelve miles southwest of Perga, was a new point in the itinerary of the apostles. On arriving from Cyprus (13:13) Paul's party had come directly to Perga, which was six or seven miles from the sea. On the return journey Attalia offered better possibility of transportation. The voyage back to Antioch in Syria did not include Cyprus.

The arrival of the party at Antioch occasioned a special assembly, at which meeting the report of the missionaries was given in full (v. 27). The door of faith unto the Gentiles which God had opened means that Gentiles were now to be admitted to the fellowship of the church without submitting to Jewish rites and without entering the Jewish church. This was one point in question when the tour was undertaken, and it became a policy in which all the Christian Church did not at once concur. To the church at Antioch the report of Paul and Barnabas offered proof that God himself approved the policy.

CHAPTER XV

1, 2. Circumcision of Gentile Converts Demanded by Some. A bitter and lengthy controversy is here summarized in two sentences. As a whole, the church at Jerusalem had from the first adhered closely to all Jewish services and beliefs, adding to their Jewish faith their new faith in Jesus as Messiah. From their point of view, the new departure of the church at Antioch was irregular, so with the best of motives some of the Jewish Christians from Judæa went to Antioch to correct the supposed error by urging that unless Gentile converts were circumcised they could not be saved. The resulting difference of opinion formed a real danger to the new Messiah movement (v. 2a) which could be warded off only through an understanding between the conservatives and the forward-looking parties. A conference on the question was therefore proposed.

3–12. The Question Taken to Jerusalem. At least two sessions are described, the first (vv. 4f.) being made up of the church generally, a rather large gathering. The apostles were present, but also the elders and other members, one group being particularly named (v. 5), the Christian Pharisees. Here stronger claims are made than at Antioch (cf. v. 1). No complete account of this meeting appears, for between vv. 5 and 6 the account of one meeting ends and that of the second begins. The second meeting (vv. 6–21) was smaller, consisting only of the apostles and elders (v. 6) with Barnabas and Paul. The multitude of v. 12 means the membership of that group, equivalent to "the rest of them." James, the Lord's brother, appears (v. 13) as an important official, whether as apostle or as elder is not stated. James voices the decision of the conference.

The outcome of the first meeting is not announced. The second meeting of the apostles and elders was called to decide the question (v. 6) after hearing the facts. At first (whether in the presence of Paul and Barnabas is not certain) there was a general discussion, which had no decided outcome (vv. 6, 7a). In view of this uncertainty, Peter rehearsed the story of his visit to Cornelius and the latter's conversion (vv. 7b–11), dwelling particularly on the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the Gentiles. As before (cf. 11:18) the plain narrative of Peter formed an unanswerable argument (v. 12). Peter claimed that he was the mouthpiece of God to the Gentiles (v. 7); that God imparted the Holy Spirit in witness of his favor to the Gentiles (v. 8); that with Gentiles and Jews alike, the inner experience came through faith (v. 9); hence it would be making a trial of God (cf. 5:9), i.e., laying one's own life liable to the wrath of God, to overlook the plainly expressed will of the Father in this matter. The words are strong, justified by a critical situation. It is significant that Peter adds: but we believe that we shall be saved . . . in like manner as they (v. 11), making the experience of the Gentiles the standard for that of the Jew. The conventional mind of Peter's brethren would not easily assent to this emphasis, but none of them had an argument in return (v. 12a). The contrast between grace and the burden of legalism (v. 10) was noticed again and again in early Christian circles (Gal. 2^d 51; cf. Mt. 23^d).

13a. The Decision of James. The appeal of Peter was supported by Barnabas and Paul (v. 12), who gave a graphic account of their contact with the Jews and Gentiles of Cyprus and Asia Minor. The signs and wonders (v. 12) include all the evidence of God's presence with them, not merely such miracles as the healing of the lame man at Lystra. The meeting proceeded in an orderly way toward its close, the only evidence of violent debate being found in v. 7. After Peter, Paul, and Barnabas had spoken with such effect (kept silence, v. 12; held their peace, v. 13), James arose to pronounce the decision of the assembly. There is no record of a vote. James had the authority of a leader. Jesus was his brother (see under 11²⁻¹⁴), and had appeared to James after his resurrection, perhaps at his conversion (1 Cor. 157). At this time (Acts 15) James had come to be the leader at Jerusalem, superseding even Peter, who before stood at the head of the list of apostles. (See under 11⁵⁻²⁶.) In v. 14 Peter is referred to under the name Symeon, the Aramaic form by which the apostle would best be known in that intimate circle. The experience of Peter is more impressive to James, for he does not mention Paul and Barnabas by name. Yet his decision touches chiefly the problem raised by the work of Paul and Barnabas rather than by Peter's experience with Cornelius. Strangely enough, the book of Acts reports no further activities of Peter among the Gentiles. (Cf. Gal. 211-14.) The explanation is to be found in the author's desire to focus attention upon Paul. The decision of James, in his own words (v. 28), is not a private opinion, but a conclusion supported in some definite way by indication of divine approval (cf. v. 19, my judgment is). James and the others of the assembly saw in the events certified by Peter, Paul and Barnabas clear evidence of God's will (cf. 11¹⁸.)

13b-21. The Address of James. The mind of James could become reconciled to the new point of view only when he found a passage of Scripture to support it. The meaning of the passage was revealed to him by the events now taking place, an experience that is continually being repeated. The new thing was that God had made a people for himself from among Gentiles, as Peter had told. And, lo, in Amos it is written that Messiah will return and build up the fallen tabernacle of David, and the nations (Gentiles) shall seek the Lord (vv. 16-18). That the mind of James was in reality comforted by this statement of the prophet is reflected in his words (v. 19). As noted above, the whole proceeding cannot be explained as a private judgment of James. Yet James was the one whose voice was most decisive in the matter.

The text of the decision (vv. 23-29) is in substance, although not in order, the same as vv. 19-21, the words of James spoken to the council. As James presented it orally, his judgment was that converts from paganism ought not to be asked to submit to circumcision (v. 20), but that they should submit to certain other restrictions that partook of rather a moral view, although in part they seem to be food laws. These restrictions were: (1) urging the non-use of flesh that had been offered to idols and abstention from idolatry, corresponding to the second commandment; (2) freedom from sexual sins; (3) avoidance of flesh from animals or birds that were strangled; (4) omission of blood from the diet. The two latter prohibitions overlap yet are not identical. These words are addressed to pagans whose familiarity with blood in heathen ritual might lead them to offend Jewish Christians in their city unless warned that such practices were inadvisable. V. 21 explains this still further. The Mosaic law was familiar to synagogue attendants throughout the world. The restrictions, excepting that concerning fornication, were chiefly advisory in the interests of Christian harmony. This principle of voluntary abstinence for the sake of others is still valid.

22-29. A Conciliatory Document. The question arose as to how to carry out the results of the conference. Should Paul and Barnabas, with others (v. 2) who had brought the question to Jerusalem, take back the account of the decision of James and the other leaders at Jerusalem? A better plan was to select other delegates from Jerusalem to accompany the Antioch brethren (v. 22) and with them to acquaint the church at Antioch with the terms of the decision. Such a policy was not uncomplimentary to Paul and Barnabas, as appears from the high tribute paid them in v. 26 and from the report of high satisfaction at Antioch with the decision and with the policy of the Jerusalem church (v. 31).

The document containing the text of the decision bears the form of a typical letter, beginning with Greeting (v. 23) and ending with Fare ye well (v. 29). The specific address of the letter includes non-Jewish converts in Antioch and the surrounding parts, including all Syria and Cilicia. The points emphasized are: (1) the Judaizing Christians of 15¹ are in no way authorized by the Jerusalem church to insist on circumcision; (2) it is the unanimous view of the leaders at Jerusalem that Barnabas and Paul are notable heroes of the faith; (3) Judas and Silas, as our representatives, will assure you of our sincere views in this matter; (4) not only do we agree that circumcision is unnecessary for you Gentiles, but we declare that the following constitute the only restrictions that should be put upon you as you enter and continue in the church: (a) avoid the use of food that has been presented in heathen temples; (b) do not use blood, which represents the life; (c) likewise, do not use strangled things for food, another offensive use of blood; and (d) keep yourselves from sexual immorality.

In this formal letter, the items of restriction are grouped in such a manner as to put the food-rules together. The fourth item, fornication, is a strictly moral precept. In view of v. 21, it is clear that these four items do not constitute a system of moral procedure, but they form the basis of a program which will result in harmony between the Jewish and Gentile portions of the church, in particular between the Jewish Christians of Judæa and the increasing number of Gentile Christians.

30-35. Favorable Impression at Antioch. The letter, borne by the delegates from Jerusalem, was read publicly before the assembled Christians of Antioch. These would doubtless include Jewish Christians as well as Gentile converts. Judas and Silas (v. 32) confirmed the assurance of v. 27 and in addition to repeating the story of the apostolic council went on to preach and exhort the Antioch church, i.e., they exercised their gift as prophets (cf. 13¹) in the church. The effect of the letter upon the Antioch church was favorable. The impression given by vv. 30-33 is that the victory was on the side of the Gentile Christians in the struggle for liberty from the yoke of ceremonial requirement, centering in the demand for circumcision. True, the letter expressly avoided the use of the term "circumcision," and the same is true of the report of the proceedings at Jerusalem (vv. 4-21). Both the debate and the letter emphasize the liberty of religious experience as the test of God's approval and the approval of the church. The restrictions within the letter protect the Christian group from inner conflict over relatively unimportant points.

As a witness to the significance of this decision at Jerusalem and the visit of Silas and Judas with Paul and Barnabas, the program of the church at Antioch went forward with renewed vigor (v. 35). Luke does not pause long upon the details of Christian life at Antioch, for his interest lies with the propagation of Christianity throughout the empire, especially by Paul, who was particularly responsible to this missionary church. (See 132^f. 1427^f. 1822^f.)

The entire episode referred to as the conference at Jerusalem is instructive for all who seek progress in moral and spiritual reform, even to-day. No great achievement has been wrought except through reasonable compromise, for with the best of men truth does not dawn clearly all at once. As the Christian Church has gradually outlawed slavery and is now making serious efforts to outlaw war, along with the contemporary struggle in various countries to establish effective prohibition of alcohol as a beverage, the essential principles of the struggle for freedom on the part of the Gentile churches have been raised and used to good effect.

III. CHAPTERS 15⁴⁰ TO 28³¹: THE CHURCH IN THE ROMAN EMPIRE

The so-called second missionary journey of Paul begins at 15⁴⁰ and merges into the third journey at 18²². Paul himself is not authority for this conventional arrangement of his travels, but the division is convenient and is generally followed. The analysis here preferred follows the hint given in the title of the book of Acts, thus entitling the sections of the narrative after its chief dramatis personæ. (See intro., "Contents.") The opening section of this third part of Acts deals with the acts of Paul and Silas (15⁴⁰-18¹¹).

40, 41. Barnabas Superseded by Silas. The last grand division of the book of Acts describes the expansion of Christianity out into the empire, even to Rome itself. In the first phase of this mission Silas takes the place of Barnabas beside Paul. As the text stands, v. 34 is omitted (see mg.). The time interval between vv. 33 and 40 is long enough to permit Silas to return to Antioch after being dismissed (v. 33) following the work of grace in which Judas and he ministered with the others. If v. 34 is accepted, Silas was not among those dismissed.

At some time following the events of vv. 32-35 Paul initiated the plan to revisit the churches in every city. Barnabas proposed to take John Mark with them, but here for the first time it appears that John's withdrawal from the party at Perga (13¹³) aroused Paul's displeasure. Upon John Mark the two apostles could not agree, and their disagreement decided the fate of the proposed tour. The itinerary was divided, Cyprus being the objective of Barnabas and Mark, Asia Minor being Paul's destination. Barnabas, who has been mentioned fully twenty-four times thus far in Acts, appears no more in the narrative. The silence of Luke is not to be construed as a denial that Barnabas carried on extensive missionary work thereafter. Luke's interest is in Paul almost solely from this point forward. The partial nature of Luke's account of the rise of Christianity in Anatolia is seen in v. 41. The churches which were confirmed, i.e., strengthened by further organization and teaching, are not mentioned by name, and accounts of none of these churches of Syria and Cilicia are found in Acts. They may have been established by Paul earlier, or by other Christians who had their first instruction in the faith at Jerusalem (cf. 8^{1, 4}).

CHAPTER XVI

1-3. Timothy Chosen as Helper. Paul and Silas came to Derbe and Lystra, which had been the outermost places reached on his first journey with Barnabas as companion. The Christian groups there are meant by the term the brethren (v. 2; cf. 15⁴⁰). Among the Christians of Lystra was one Timothy, a disciple of excellent reputation, son of a Jewess who was a disciple, Eunice by name (2 Tim. 1⁵), and of a Gentile father, who was probably not a disciple. His name is not known.

The Jewish Christians of Lystra demanded that Gentile converts be circumcised. Paul, to satisfy this demand, had Timothy submit to the rite before going out to the work. In this Paul exhibited a truly compromising attitude, complimentary to him and of noticeable aid in his missionary work. If Paul had been disappointed in John Mark, quite the reverse can be said for Timothy. He remained the loyal supporter of Paul to the end.

4-8. Roundabout Through Asia Minor. One duty of the apostles on this journey was to publish the letter containing the decision of the Jerusalem authorities as to the status of Gentile converts in the church. The letter was addressed to the Gentile Christians of Syria and Cilicia (15²³) but naturally was of interest to all Gentile Christians. Although he delivered the apostolic letter to these churches, Paul had his own way of dealing with meats offered to idols and the diet question in general, as his letters show (Rom. 14¹⁻¹² 1 Cor. 10¹⁴ 11¹). Paul does not refer to the decree from Jerusalem in any extant letter.

The passage (vv. 4-8) is greatly compressed. The activity of Paul on this itinerary was enormous and extended over some weeks. It is possible that the cities Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium, in the province of Galatia, were visited. If, as is likely, Luke himself joined the party of Paul at Troas (vv. 10f.; note we, us) this would explain the brevity of this section, compared with the story so rich in particulars that follows. (On the location of the Galatian churches see under 18^{22, 23} and cf. introduction to Galatians, p. 1207b.)

The events that correspond to the expressions the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not and forbidden of the Holy Ghost (vv. 6f.) are personal experiences exceedingly vivid and real, clear and unmistakable in meaning, but not further explained for the reader. In this Book of the Holy Ghost it did not seem necessary to explain an experience which was fundamental in the life of the church that first read the book. The writer means to show that Paul was divinely directed through unmistakable indications to the city of Troas, there to receive further revelation which should lead the apostle across the sea to Macedonia. Or it is possible that we have here an example of the interpretation of an apparently incidental circumstance in the light of the results to which it led. Whatever prevented the apostles from going to Bithynia, it made possible their going to Macedonia. That involved the spread of the gospel to Europe. The original hindrance may therefore well be attributed to a special divine interference.

9, 10. The Call into Macedonia. The climax of the series of providential events that determined Paul's route is found in the dream, according to which a Macedonian stood before the apostle and urged him to come into Macedonia. The added words and help us identify the man of the vision with a needy company who did not know Paul by name yet who were earnestly desiring the spiritual life which he preached. Primarily, no doubt, the writer has in mind certain Greeks whose interest in Judaism was aroused but who had not found in it the satisfaction they craved. Such persons would be ready to hear and to respond to Paul's message, for it was his rule to speak first in the synagogues, where such interested Gentiles would be found.

11-15. Arrival in Philippi. The first of the we-sections begins with v. 10 (see intro.). Most of the journey from Troas was by water, across the Aegean Sea. Philippi (v. 12) was seven or eight miles from Neapolis, which served only as a way-station. Philippi became important in Paul's life and work. He returned to it again and again, and one of his finest letters was addressed to the church in that city. Philippi had been a Roman colony since 42 B.C. The size of the city is probably overestimated in the phrase (v. 12), the first of that district. Paul found no synagogue building, but instead a place by the river where the relatively few Jews and proselytes met for prayer, if not for more formal services (v. 13). The we frequently found in this paragraph indicates that Luke was in the company. Lydia, who became the first convert to Paul's Messianic gospel, was not a Macedonian at all, but was from Thyatira, a city of Asia Minor (Rev. 21^{8f.}). Her family were all baptized with her (v. 15; cf. v. 33), and she urged Paul to accept her hospitality. (See H. J. Cadbury, Luke's Interest in Lodgings, Journal of Bib. Lit., 1926, pp. 305-322.)

16-18. The Rise of Opposition. Paul's early experiences in Philippi were with women. It is supposable that no men were at the riverside service. Not until Paul came into conflict with certain commercialized interests did the men take account of him. Just what effect this lack of masculine interest had upon Paul's faith in his man of Macedonia is not indicated. Perhaps it acted as a test of his faith. It is a characteristic of the Gospels and Acts to note that beings of the demonic world were sensitive to the presence of an inspired person. Mark notes repeatedly their response to the character of Jesus (Mk. 12⁴ 31¹ 57). So here (v. 17) the possessed maid cried out that these men were God's servants. The description of the "gift" of this woman emphasizes her ability to prophesy, i.e., to forecast events. The actual ability possessed may have been ventriloquism, which, in the opinion of her contemporaries, carried with it uncanny powers. It was not that this person had insight enough to declare them servants of God that led Paul (v. 18) to exorcise the spirit of divination, but because she became a nuisance through her repeated attentions to him and Silas.

19-24. Imprisoned Without Trial. The group that controlled the ventriloquial maiden became aroused over their loss of profits (vv. 21f.) and forcibly brought the apostles before the praetors, or magistrates. Luke does not make it plain that a trial of any sort took place. If a fair examination of Paul and Silas had been made, the fact that Paul was a Roman citizen must have come out, especially in view of the charge that he was teaching customs . . . not lawful . . . to observe, being Romans (v. 21).

Philippi did not have a large Jewish population (note lack of a synagogue), hence the probable existence of anti-Jewish views which made the summary action more agreeable to the magistrates. It was as Jews, not as Christians, that Paul and Silas were persecuted. Popular indignation was invoked (v. 22) against Paul and Silas, who alone are concerned in the arrest and imprisonment. For some reason not known Luke and Timothy were not taken before the magistrates. Before being imprisoned Paul and Silas were beaten with rods (vv. 22f.), many stripes, not the thirty-nine of Jewish regulation, being inflicted. This instance is the only one described of three such punishments endured by Paul. (See 2 Cor. 11²⁵.) The imprisonment of the two followed. The stocks which held their feet was a means of torture as well as of confinement.

25-29. Midnight in the Philippian Jail. The apostles counted it a joy to suffer for the cross of Christ (cf. 5⁴¹) and poured out their feelings in song and prayer (v. 25). The remark that the prisoners were listening to them implies, first of all, wonder, then belief that these men were no ordinary evildoers. Then the earthquake followed, accompanied by the loosening of the bonds of all. The failure of the other prisoners to escape may be ascribed to their interest in the two apostles (v. 26).

The attitude of the jailer himself changes rapidly between vv. 27 and 29. At first the jailer's natural conclusion was that the prisoners had escaped through the open doors (v. 26b), in which case his own life was the forfeit. (See 12¹⁹ and 27⁴².) Upon hearing Paul's voice, assuring him that all were still there, the jailer was awe-struck. These men were being supernaturally protected and all his superstitious fears were aroused (see 5¹⁹ and 12^{1f.}).

It is probable that the number of prisoners was small. The jail was dark, and Paul's knowledge of the situation is accepted by the author as an example of that insight which often showed itself in the apostle's life (as in 27¹⁰, 22^{f.}, 31^{f.}).

30-34. The Second Conversion in Philippi. It is probable that Paul's converts in Philippi numbered more than Lydia and her household together with the jailer and his family; but these two notable instances are all that Luke offers, notwithstanding he is here using a we-source. The mention of the brethren in v. 40 implies a Christian community already formed at the time of Paul's departure.

The conversion of the jailer is briefly but graphically narrated. His question, What must I do to be saved? (v. 30) must not be given too much religious meaning, nor must such meaning be wholly denied it. The man was greatly upset mentally, had within a few minutes seriously proposed suicide, had had all his fears of the supernatural aroused, and faced these men whose presence in the jail had clearly brought about the earthquake, for so he would believe. The content of the question (v. 30b) concerns first of all his rescue from mental distress, as shown by the words, trembling for fear (v. 29). Paul seized the opportunity to explain his message of salvation through faith in Jesus, the words of v. 32 indicating the more elaborate exposition of his text, Believe . . . and thou shalt be saved (v. 31). Paul took the man's own word, "saved," and deepened its content.

The baptism of the jailer and his family followed immediately after the jailer had washed the wounds of the two. This may have been one of the rare cases when Paul himself baptized (cf. 1 Cor. 14-17), although Silas may have officiated. It is difficult to make out these baptisms as instances of immersion. Christian faith is here characterized as believing in God (v. 34).

35-40. A Conclusion Favorable to the Apostles. It is only fair to the prætors of Philippi to believe that overnight they reconsidered their hasty action, taken at the instance of prejudiced men (v. 22f.), and thus ordered the jailer not to detain Paul and Silas. A dramatic scene followed the announcement of their message to Paul. For up to this point the author of Acts has withheld the information that Paul was a Roman citizen, an honor and privilege shared also by Silas. At least two Roman laws, the lex Valeria and the lex Porcia, protected the dignity of a Roman citizen against even privately inflicted blows, and these Romans had been beaten publicly! To this was added the indignity of punishment without trial (v. 37). The action of Paul in requiring as much publicity in connection with their release as had attended their imprisonment was not egotistical. He had in mind the dignity of his cause as well as that of his Roman citizenship. The departure of Paul from Philippi followed the release from prison. He took only time to give some earnest instruction to the brethren (v. 40) who, perhaps, made Lydia's house their meeting-place.

CHAPTER XVII

1-9. In Thessalonica. The next city in which Paul and Silas paused was Thessalonica (modern Saloniki), a little over one hundred miles southwest of Philippi. The apostles could make the journey in about four days, unless they paused in Amphipolis and Apollonia, of which there is no record. Luke uses the same word translated here passing through in Luke 81, a passage which describes extensive preaching and teaching on the part of Jesus. An analogous situation is found in the statement of Paul (Rom. 15¹⁹) that he had preached as far as Illyricum, while no record of labors in that region (modern Albania) is found in Acts. The narrative of Luke often passes deliberately over items that have become known to modern scholars in other ways. An example is the Galatian controversy (see introduction to Galatians, (p. 1208), about which Luke is silent.

In Thessalonica there was a synagogue (v. 2), and Paul followed his custom of first declaring his message to his countrymen in their own place of worship. In Thessalonica it is probable that only Paul and Silas were together. Timothy is mentioned in connection with Berea (v. 14), and in 1 Thess. 3¹ Paul speaks of sending Timothy back to Thessalonica to see how they prospered. This may imply that the Thessalonians had some previous knowledge of Timothy. (Cf. 1 Thess. 3².) The book of Acts does not offer full information about the movements of all the members of Paul's party on the way from Philippi to Corinth.

Thessalonica became an important Christian center, but few particulars are given in the story of the rise of this church. For three Sabbaths (v. 2) Paul used his synagogue privilege, after which he was doubtless excluded by the Jews moved with jealousy (v. 5), and, as in other places (187 199), found a separate place of meeting for the disciples of the Lord. The apostles lodged with Jason (vv. 5, 7), but it is not certain that his house was the meeting-place. Vv. 2f. indicate the substance of the synagogue preaching of Paul, but his message before the disciples was more elaborate, as reflected in the Epistles to the Thessalonians. In the synagogue Paul always began with the lesson from the Scriptures (O.T.) and identified Jesus of Nazareth with Messiah (vv. 3f.).

The method adopted by Paul's Jewish adversaries is noteworthy. The Jews were of the opinion that their influence with the authorities was limited. So they stirred up a number of common loafers of the city, Macedonians, to join them in raising a disturbance against the visiting apostles (v. 5). The aim was to bring these men, who, it was loudly charged, were upsetting things (v. 6), to the people, i.e., to the properly constituted court. In Corinth, later (181²), when the Jews tried to obtain a verdict from Gallio, they were not even heard. The plan in Thessalonica succeeded partly. These Jews did not find Paul and Silas, but they took Jason and some others (v. 6) before the court, where they found it expedient to give bonds (v. 9) to keep the peace, whereupon Jason and the others (the brethren of v. 10) advised Paul and Silas to leave town. The authorities may have made it a condition that the apostles should not remain, as the prætors at Philippi had done. The Christians of Thessalonica sent the apostles away by night, lest another scene should ensue.

10-14. In Berœa. Nothing indicates that Timothy was at Thessalonica (see vv. 1-9), but at Berœa (modern Verria), forty odd miles southwest of Thessalonica, the three were surely together (v. 14). Had Paul to deal only with the Jews of Berœa, open-minded as they were (v. 11), his success might have been even greater. Paul's most serious hindrance lay in the Jews who followed him up after his expulsion from Thessalonica. In the synagogue of Berœa the apostle was having a successful work (v. 12) when there arrived from Thessalonica some of his Jewish foes. These adopted their old tactics of setting the town against Paul (v. 13). Taking advantage of his former experience, Paul left the city of Berœa, thus providing the brethren with the continued labors of Silas and Timothy until a message from Paul at Athens (v. 15) directed their further movements. In Berœa the attack of the Jews was centered upon Paul.

15-21. Athens Visited. From Berœa to Athens Paul traveled first by land, then by sea (v. 14). The brethren from Berœa probably accompanied Paul as far as the nearest port, thence he proceeded, not alone but with some unnamed escort, to Athens. He speaks of being at Athens alone when writing to the Thessalonians (1 Thess. 3¹). In his epistle above referred to Paul shows that Timothy (and perhaps Silas, see v. 15) came to him in Athens, thence went to Thessalonica. When Paul left Berœa none could tell just where he might go. His movements had to be secret and no doubt were uncertain even to himself. The mission in Athens, while it claims considerable space, was not successful. No church was established, as far as recorded. A few souls believed (v. 34), but the total atmosphere of Athens was such as to make its inhabitants immune to the message of Paul. The apostle never indicated a desire to revisit the city. The Athens visit, however, is notable in that Luke has preserved a record of the address made to some of the distinguished Athenians. This address is usually referred to as the address on Mars' Hill. It is more correctly described as the address before the Council of the Areopagus. This speech was delivered after Paul had been some time in the city, for he had preached in the synagogue on the Sabbath (v. 17a) and during the week had spoken with those whom he met in the market place (v. 17b). As Paul became better known, the philosophers encountered him and passed their criticisms (v. 18). Some took Paul's reference to Jesus (a masculine noun) and to the resurrection (in the Greek a feminine noun, anastasis) to mean that he was preaching a male and female deity respectively. Thus their surmise that he was a setter forth of strange gods (v. 18). All in all, it seemed well to give the visitor a more formal opportunity, hence the invitation to address the Council (v. 19). This proceeding was in no way a trial of Paul, although he spoke before a high court. The Stoics and Epicureans (v. 18) wished to discover whether the new doctrine that he taught was worthy of their consideration. For this reason the more formal session was provided (vv. 19-21).

22-34. The Areopagus Address. The idols in Athens stirred Paul's Semitic soul to its depth. It is not in contradiction to this feeling, but because of the proper control of it, that Paul began with a reference to a particular altar or monument that he had observed, with the inscription: To an unknown god. The example furnished Paul with an appropriate text from which to expound his message. The words in v. 23b do not reflect upon the intelligence of the worshippers in this case. The words in ignorance mean that the worshiper is not able to identify the god concerned. Deissmann (St. Paul, first edit., Appendix II, pp. 261f.) points out that under a regime of polytheism a worshiper could not be certain which of his protecting deities had been a chief aid. Hence the inscription upon the altar, erected in commemoration of a deliverance: To the god whose name is not known.

The Athenians wished an exposition of Paul's message. That message concerned the one true God, who made all the world and all men, and who called all to repent before the Day of Judgment. At the very close of the address a reference to the resurrection introduced a favorite Pauline theme. The tone of this address is remarkably conciliatory and winning, its content is closely condensed, its thought unitary. It has been objected by some that its style is not that of Paul, and this objection has weight. Doubtless all the speeches in Acts in their literary form owe something to the author of the book (see p. 1095a). The substance of what is here said could very well have been said by an educated Jew like Paul to cultured Athenians. The opinion here maintained is that the speech represents substantially an address actually delivered by Paul before the Court of the Areopagus, notwithstanding the phraseology is that of the author. The actual address must have been much longer. In condensing an address the reporter must use phraseology of his own. The sense of the address is as follows: Athenians, I observe that you pay great attention to matters of religion. You erect altars even to deities whose names you do not know. For myself, I am sure there is only one God, and he is the Creator of the world and of men. Such a God cannot live in builded temples, but he can be found anywhere by men who really seek him. This is the more true since he made us all of one blood. It is time for all to see this truth, to seek the one true God and to be saved in the Last Judgment. The crowning assurance of the truth of what I say is found in the fact of human resurrection.

The point to which his hearers took exception was the mention of the resurrection (v. 31). Many wanted to hear Paul further, either then or another day (v. 32b). The actual fruitage of souls was disappointing (v. 34). One of the converts was a member of the Court which Paul addressed (vv. 19, 22). The other convert named was a woman, of whom nothing further is known than her name, Damaris.

CHAPTER XVIII

A Year and a Half in Corinth (vv. 1–11). The two large cities in Achaia (Greece) visited by Paul, Athens and Corinth, were quite different in almost every respect. Corinth, with harbors both on the east and the west, invited and received the commerce of the world and well-nigh all sorts of men. It was a cosmopolitan city indeed. (For description see W. M. Ramsay, art., "Corinth," Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. i, pp. 479–483.)

1–3. Paul, Aquila and Priscilla. Early in his stay at Corinth Paul found a devoted couple, kinsmen, as he would call them. These Jewish people had been recently (49–50 A.D.) expelled from Rome and had settled in Corinth. Later they were to become Paul's helpers in Ephesus (vv. 18f.). Like Paul, Aquila and Priscilla worked on tent cloth. Having a common trade and similar interests, Paul took lodgings with them, probably remaining with them during his stay in Corinth.

4. Paul in the Synagogue. Following his unvarying custom, Paul worshiped in the synagogue each Sabbath and proclaimed his message of the crucified Messiah. (See 1 Cor. 123 22.) At first this activity of Paul was accompanied by less directness and force than usual. The rupture with the Jews did not occur until Paul was fired with enthusiasm by reassuring news from Macedonia (vv. 5f.).

5–11. The Church in Corinth. V. 5 is a striking commentary upon a certain trait of Paul, illustrated in his own words, 2 Cor. 212f., where the apostle says that he could not do his best work while he was concerned so deeply about the Corinthian church and its troubles. Here Luke points out that only after the arrival of Silas and Timothy in Corinth with good news from Philippi and Thessalonica did Paul really have freedom in his preaching in the synagogue. Fire struck fire and the Jews contradicted Paul (v. 6) as they of Antioch had done (1345). The apostle then declared his mission to the Gentiles, meaning that he would preach the gospel to all men, whatever their race, and at once withdrew with those who believed in the Lord Jesus Christ to a separate meeting-place (v. 6). The movement carried with it the ruler of the synagogue, Crispus (see 1 Cor. 114), who was succeeded by one Sosthenes (v. 17). The number who now made up the Christian Church in Corinth was not small (v. 8b), neither was the opposition light. At a time of discouragement Paul was reassured in a vision (v. 9) that he should keep boldly on, for the church must grow to still larger numbers. No further account of the work appears, but the promise of divine protection was made good during a year and a half of constructive activity. The experience has often been repeated since. Power to "see the invisible" is God's gift to his servants, to keep them resolute amidst difficult circumstances.

Acts of Paul. The other apostles now drop into the background, and the rest of the book is occupied entirely with the acts of Paul (1812–2831).

12–17. Paul's Enemies Repulsed by Gallio. The opposition against Paul developed slowly in Corinth. After the first outbreak in the synagogue (v. 6) the Christian group continued peaceably under Paul's direction. The change of proconsul, the Roman ruler of the province, some year and a half after Paul began his work in Corinth (vv. 11f.) gave the orthodox Jews, as they supposed, a good chance to obtain judgment against Paul. V. 12 describes the action taken by the synagogue under its leader, Sosthenes, whereby Paul was brought before Gallio, the new proconsul. Paul, it was charged, incited men to worship contrary to the Jewish Law. Literally Roman law permitted Jews to exercise their religion according to Jewish law. (See Josephus, Antiquities, bk. xiv, ch. 10: 20, 21.) Thus the religion taught by Paul, it was thought, could be shown to be contrary to Roman law for the reason that it was a non-Jewish religion. Gallio, however, took an unexpected course. He caught at once the note of theological discussion and positively refused even to entertain the charges against Paul. The case did not develop even as far as a plea of Guilty or Not guilty (v. 14), for Gallio expelled all from the courtroom before Paul was arraigned. In precise terms Gallio pointed out that the Jewish authorities themselves should pass upon such technical points. In this Gallio showed a certain regard for the Jews. The scene which occurred directly after the refusal of Gallio to hear both sides of the controversy was participated in by Gentile on-lookers, who took their cue from the attitude of the proconsul (v. 17). The Sosthenes here mentioned cannot be identified with the person mentioned in 1 Cor. 11.

In Corinth Silas had doubtless been Paul's helper most of the time, but from 185 on no further mention is made of him. It may be concluded that Luke is narrating the acts of Paul and Silas from 1536 to 185, where Silas is last mentioned. Paul alone figured as the intended victim of the Jews who haled him before Gallio. Certainly from this point forward to the close of his book (1812-2831) Luke has only the acts of Paul in mind. With 1823 begins the so-called third missionary journey, which had for its purpose not so much the founding of new churches as the further strengthening of those already founded. If Paul did enter new territory during this period, Luke does not indicate it.

18-21. From Corinth to Antioch by Way of Ephesus. The departure of Paul from Corinth did not occur until some time after the discomfiture of his opponents. He used his advantage in prosecuting the work in the Corinth church (v. 18a). When he left by vessel from Cenchreae, Priscilla and Aquila accompanied him. Either Paul or Aquila, presumably the latter, as the order of words indicates, had taken some sort of vow that involved the cutting of his hair (not a genuine Nazirite vow, which could be consummated only in Palestine). The purpose of Luke in offering this item of information, however ambiguously, may be to show that Paul was not, as his enemies averred, encouraging Jews to forsake all Jewish rites. In 2126 Paul himself undertakes a thoroughly Jewish ceremony. The first appearance of Paul at Ephesus (v. 19) evoked a favorable response on the part of the Jews of the synagogue (v. 20), who urged him to stay longer with them. But the apostle felt that it was now time to report in person at Antioch, to which church he was responsible for his work. So, promising to return to Ephesus (v. 21), he left on a vessel bound southward, made his way to Cæsarea, thence to Jerusalem (went up and saluted the church), then on to Antioch. (The expressions "went up" and "went down" refer to the altitude of Jerusalem as compared with that of the coast and of Antioch in Syria.)

22, 23. Preparing for a New Journey. The some time (v. 23) spent at Antioch in Syria was presumably given to a recital of his labors, to making plans for further visitation, and to the work at Antioch among the Gentiles. On leaving Antioch, Paul's route led him through a good part of Asia Minor (note upper country 191), most certainly involving visits to all the churches previously established. V. 23 is most compact, covering as it does months of time, inestimable effort on the part of the apostle, and many unspecified Christian triumphs. The expression region of Galatia and Phrygia (cf. 166) has given rise to extensive discussion, and the whole question as to the location of the churches of Galatia hangs upon the correct solution of the meaning. An opinion expressed above (under 164-8) is here reiterated, namely, that the Galatia in question is the province of that name, whose cities, Ancyra, Tavium, and Pessinus may have been visited by Paul and Silas during that part of the second missionary journey so inadequately reported in 164-8. An acceptance of this opinion carries with it an obligation to find the churches of Galatia farther north than Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. (On the Galatian question consult Moffatt, Introduction to the Literature of the N.T., pp. 90-101. Also introduction to Galatians, p. 1208.)

24-28. Apollos at Ephesus and Corinth. In the meantime the work at Ephesus had been going forward, perhaps under the direction of Aquila and Priscilla (although Luke prefers to give the name of Priscilla first). Paul calls her Prisca (Rom. 163 2 Tim. 419). During Paul's absence there arrived at Ephesus a learned Jew named Apollos. Afterward he became a figure at Corinth (v. 27; 1 Cor. 112 36, 22). The story of his Christian experience is of interest. The paragraph on Apollos (vv. 24-28) is too brief to be understood fully, yet certain outstanding facts are clear. Apollos was an orthodox Jew of the finest type, probably a disciple of Philo, a learned Jew of Greek sympathies in Alexandria, eloquent (his learning is indicated in the context) and effective in discourse, and well read in the Scriptures (v. 24). Apollos was familiar with some gospel material known to Luke himself, hence Luke's statement that Apollos taught carefully the things concerning Jesus (cf. Lk. 13). He had also been taught orally (v. 25 mg.). At this point the omission of information is puzzling. Apollos was baptized after the manner of John Baptist, Luke's own understanding of John's baptism being found in Lk. 37-14. In Lk. 316 John Baptist says that the mightier One who follows him will baptize "with the Holy Ghost and with fire." It should follow in vv. 25f. that Apollos was baptized (as were the twelve men of 195) and that he received the Holy Spirit. But these statements are not made about Apollos. Luke does say that when Apollos began to speak publicly in the synagogue Priscilla and Aquila took him aside and expounded unto him the way of God more carefully (v. 26).

The argument from silence should not be used to discount the plain teaching of Acts that Christian experience was validated by the unmistakable presence of the Holy Spirit. (See under 21-4.) It seems best to hold that Apollos was rebaptized in the name of Jesus and that he received the Spirit. The expression in v. 25, fervent in spirit, refers to a personal characteristic, not to a spiritual gift or charism.

The brethren (v. 27) is an expression implying the presence already of a Christian community in Ephesus. (Cf. 115 930 151, 3, 22, 32 1640 and similar places.) The spiritual equipment of Apollos, together with his other gifts and graces, made him particularly effective in further work at Corinth (v. 28) to which city he had gone with the blessing and recommendation of the Ephesian saints.

CHAPTER XIX

1-7. Paul and Disciples of the Baptist. On his return from inner Asia Minor (upper country, v. 1) Paul came upon a dozen men who believed (v. 2) and were therefore reckoned as Christians, yet they did not possess the indispensable gift of the Holy Spirit. For they adhered to the John Baptist movement, which from the days described in Lk. 716f. had continued as a separate religious movement. John Baptist was in doubt as to whether Jesus was really He for whom they were looking, and probably his followers still looked for a different Messiah (see Lk. 718f.).

Like Apollos, these men knew only the baptism of John, they had received no instruction about the Holy Spirit, by which they meant that they had not heard that the Holy Spirit was present in human experience. Their prophet, John Baptist, did not live to see his own prophecy (Lk. 316) fulfilled.

Paul showed these men that John baptized with repentance in mind, urging his hearers to believe on him which should come and that Jesus of Nazareth was the very one of whom John spoke. They had already believed (v. 2) on Jesus; now they were baptized in his name (v. 5). The Holy Spirit fell upon them only after Paul had laid his hands upon them (817; cf. 66). Their experience was similar to that of the men on whom the Spirit came at Pentecost (see under 21-4), in that they spoke with tongues (cf. 1046.) They also prophesied, i.e., in modern terms, they gave personal testimony. The coming of the Holy Spirit, therefore, meant a quickening of the spiritual life, which was attributed to divine agency.

This passage is to be regarded as a bit of history of the apostolic age which we are incapable of fully understanding precisely because of its fragmentary nature. In Luke's sources, no doubt, it had a context which has not been preserved with it. The passage was far more intelligible to the first readers of the book than it is to a modern reader.

8-12. Synagogue and Church in Ephesus. The friendly relations between Paul and the synagogue in Ephesus continued for three months after his return. The substance of Paul's teaching is described as the things concerning the kingdom of God (v. 8b) which is the equivalent of the Way (v. 9), more fully expressed above as the way of God (1826). The exact cause of the rupture between Paul and the synagogue does not appear. There arose public contradiction that could not turn out at all helpful (v. 9); so Paul, no doubt reluctantly, took with him the followers of Jesus and withdrew to one of the schools of Ephesus. For two years he met the brethren daily in the School of Tyrannus, thus obtaining such an extensive hearing that it could be said, at least rhetorically, that all Asia was evangelized (v. 10). No extensive account of the work is rendered, although Luke says (v. 11) that miracles accompanied Paul's ministry, chiefly healing of diseases and exorcism of evil spirits. These wonders are described as out of the ordinary (v. 11f.), i.e., not such works as were wrought by men like Simon Magus (89) and Bar-Jesus (136), or by the strolling Jews of the context. Magic was universally practiced in the East, as the following context illustrates from Ephesus itself (vv. 19f. See intro., "The Miracles in Acts").

13-20. Christianity and Magic at Ephesus. These verses give a graphic account of the struggle between the Way and a prevailing system of magical incantation. The critical phase of the struggle appeared when the devotees of magic tried to appropriate a Christian formula (v. 13b). It is difficult for a modern citizen of the western hemisphere to understand how closely the Way seemed to the pagan to approach his own system and principles. Precisely when the Christian missionary appealed to the reality of the spiritual world (as Paul in 1 Cor. 210-16) it appeared to the pagan that he was invoking his own world of spirits (or dæmons). In the passage under consideration (vv. 13-20) Luke shows how even certain Jews who practiced the prevailing magical cult were shown conclusively that Christianity was not a new form of magic, but a spiritual power whose source was in the person Jesus. (See Mt. 1227 for Jesus' own reference to the exorcism of evil spirits by the Pharisees; also see Josephus, Antiquities, bk. vii, ch. 2: 5 for an interesting example of exorcism through the name of Solomon.) The point of the narrative lies in its significance for the growth and prestige of Christianity at Ephesus. The value of the magical books burned in testimony to the power of the gospel (v. 19) was almost ten thousand dollars, or two thousand pounds sterling, which in those days was a very large sum.

21, 22. The Plan to Visit Rome. A period of growth in comparative rest from conflict (vv. 20f.) gave Paul an opportunity to plan still wider conquests. He must visit Macedonia and Achaia on his way to Jerusalem, then go west to Rome. Part of this plan came to pass, although the manner of his journey to Rome was not foreseen. Paul spent more time in Ephesus than the two years mentioned in v. 19. (In 20³¹ the total stay of the apostle in Ephesus is named as three years.) In ch. 19 only two years and three months are accounted for. The indefiniteness of after these things (v. 21) and about that time (v. 23) easily provides additional time in Ephesus. Note also the period indicated in v. 22b, stayed in Asia for a while.

23-41. Christianity and Commercialized Religion in Ephesus. The conflict with magic was more easily decided than was the conflict of the Way with the commercial aspects of Diana worship in Ephesus. In his Gospel Luke shows a deep interest in the teaching of Jesus that touches upon the lure of material profit (see Lk. 12¹³⁻²¹ 14¹⁸⁻²⁴ 16¹⁻¹³), and in Acts he includes available narratives that illustrate the antagonism of materialism to the spiritual aspects of the gospel. The story of Demetrius and his fellow-workers is characteristic.

The growth of Christianity in Ephesus had turned some of the worshippers in the great temple of Diana (Artemis) away from their devotion to that goddess, and the profits of Demetrius and his guild were endangered. These silversmiths made small models of the temple, which pilgrims bought to offer to the goddess and in some cases to carry home with them as keepsakes, or to use as amulets. After the sobering incident of the bonfire made with magical papyri, these artificers plotted to turn the leaders of the Christian movement out of town (v. 25). The chief accusation of Demetrius was laid against Paul (v. 26), and that too because he had well-nigh converted the province of Asia (cf. v. 10). Appealing to the instinct of self-preservation, Demetrius worked up a high degree of mob spirit (vv. 28, 29, 32, 34) which seized alike upon the religious sanction and upon race prejudice as its motives. Paul was not present at any time during the uproar. The friendship of the authorities and the plea of the brethren kept him out of the mob scene (vv. 30f.). An attempted speech of a certain Alexander (probably not the coppersmith of 1 Tim. 120 and 2 Tim. 414) was drowned by the senseless roar of the crowd, and not until the town clerk himself (vv. 35f.) spoke with authority did the mob break up. This official denied that these men (v. 37, probably some of the Christians of Ephesus, here unnamed) were temple-pilferers, as the words of Demetrius implied. Neither had they said anything against the goddess. If any had complaint to bring, the courts were at hand. With these words and other admonitions the town clerk dismissed the assembly. Not long afterward Paul left for Macedonia (see v. 21).

CHAPTER XX

1-6. A Grand Circuit from Ephesus through Macedonia and Greece. After the tumult in the theater Paul made seemly haste to leave Ephesus. In sixteen verses (vv. 1-16) Luke describes months of labor and weary miles of travel by sea and land. In 2 Cor. 18, 15f. 212f. 75-16 Paul so describes his travel plan that this journey can be traced first to Troas, thence to Philippi and Thessalonica and other Macedonian churches, where he spent some time, writing at least 2 Cor. 1-9 (see intro. to 1 and 2 Corinthians). Thence Paul went to Corinth for a stay of three months (v. 3), after which the change of plan was made (v. 3b) which took him back through Macedonia, across again to Troas, and thence by land and water to Miletus, very near to Ephesus (vv. 15f.), thence on to Tyre (213), whence he made his way to Jerusalem.

The book of Acts narrates none of the distressing circumstances in the Corinthian church which are reflected in Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians. The omission makes it possible for Luke to compress into this small space a journey of Paul's which was perhaps as filled with emotion as any of similar length in his career. The evangelization of Illyricum may have occurred during the time indicated in v. 2, when he had gone through those parts. In his sources Luke probably did not find any information about this part of Paul's work. (Another possibility for the Illyricum mission is between vv. 12 and 13 of ch. 17.)

The Jews of v. 3 are probably they who brought Paul before the bar of Gallio (1812f.). Many surmises are possible at the size of the bodyguard of Paul as he went from Corinth through Macedonia to Asia Minor. The plot against Paul's life (v. 3) offers an adequate occasion for protection. Seven men, from Macedonia, Asia, and Lycaonia, accompanied him, probably from Corinth to Philippi.

While Paul remained there the seven went across the sea to Troas and there awaited him. Luke also accompanied Paul, at least from Troas on, for the second we-section begins at v. 5 and continues to v. 17. Of the seven mentioned in v. 4, Sopater and Secundus are named nowhere else; Gaius is not to be identified with others of that name in the N.T.; Timothy, Tychicus and Trophimus are mentioned by Paul himself as helpers; and Aristarchus is the same as in 19²⁹ and Philm. v. 24. The extra time spent in Philippi was due to the celebration of the Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread (v. 6), which Paul wished to observe with his Jewish friends in Philippi. (See art., Religion of Israel, pp. 169-70.)

7-12. The Meeting at Troas. No account of the founding of the church at Troas has been preserved but the city is known to be important to early Christianity. (See 16⁸ 2 Cor. 21² 2 Tim. 41³.) The apostolic party numbered at least nine (vv. 4f.), and with the brethren at Troas, gathered for the Eucharist, no wonder the upper chamber was crowded. Eutychus, about whom nothing else is known except that he slept during an exceptionally long sermon (v. 9), fell from the window in which he was sitting and was supposed to be dead. Paul, however, on investigation (v. 10), assured the anxious friends that he was alive, and the meeting went on. The lad is "picked up for dead," as we should say. Luke is not narrating an instance of raising from the dead, or it would have been so stated in definite terms, as in the case of Tabitha, where (9³⁷, 41) the author states first that "she fell sick and died," and that the apostle "presented her alive."

The important contribution of this story (vv. 7-12) is its glimpse into the community life of a primitive Christian church. The memorial Supper of the Lord was not yet made a formal sacrament. It was called breaking bread. It was the custom to meet on the Lord's Day, the first of the week. The agape (love feast) was accompanied by a discourse, in this case preceding the breaking of bread (v. 7) and also following it (v. 11b). Here the entire service was at night, no doubt because the day was a day of business and the Christian brethren met after their day's work was done.

13-16. Troas to Miletus. For some reason not now understood, Paul walked across the peninsula on which Troas is situated, and met the ship and his companions at Assos, on the southern side of the peninsula. The plan was made by Paul himself (v. 13) and may have been dictated by a natural desire to be alone for awhile.

Vv. 14f. indicate the route of the ship as it skirted the shore of Asia Minor. The plan of Paul to be in Jerusalem at Pentecost (seven weeks after leaving Philippi, v. 6) led to the choice of a vessel that did not touch at Ephesus, for to stop there would oblige him to lose time, thus endangering his plan (v. 16).

17. Paul at Miletus. From Miletus, south of Ephesus (see Ramsay, art., "Miletus," Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iii, pp. 368f.), Paul sent for the elders of the church (cf. above, p. 1112b) to come to him. On their arrival, which must have been at least the second day after Paul reached Miletus, these officials were addressed by Paul. The substance of what he said is found in vv. 18b-35. He closed with a most beautiful and much quoted saying of Jesus which is not found in any of the Gospels.

18-35. The Address of Paul. The address here given while Pauline in substance is in the style of the author of the book of Acts. (See intro., "Sources.") In this respect, the report resembles in particular that of Paul's address to the Athenians at Mars' hill. See under 17²²⁻³¹, and cf. the long prayer of Christ in Jn. 17.

The address does not have such clear and logical sequence as, for instance, the address at Athens (17²²⁻³¹), but, rather, presents fragments of more abundant material which Luke found in his sources. The address is intensely personal in tone. Superlatives abound, as all lowliness of mind (v. 19); I shrank not . . . (vv. 20, 27); the whole counsel of God (v. 27); I ceased not . . . night and day (v. 31); I coveted no man's silver (v. 33). These statements, strong but true, are presented in the words of a sympathetic friend and advocate, and from the point of view of the writer's time. In this address Paul refers to plots of the Jews (v. 19b), although the author has not given any account of such in Ephesus. It would be remarkable indeed if the Jews, orthodox or Christian, had not tried to interfere with the work among the Gentiles in Ephesus.

A few additional items appear about the type of work carried on. Not only in the school of Tyrannus (19⁹) but from house to house Paul had taught (v. 20). There is possibly a clear and primitive distinction between God and Jesus Messiah in v. 21. Repentance was exercised as toward God; faith, on the other hand, was directed toward Christ. Repentance and faith were the two notes in the initial message of Jesus himself (Mk. 11⁵. Note gospel of God, Mk. 11⁴ and cf. Acts 20^{24e}). The ministry of Paul had been without partiality, including Jews and Greeks (v. 21), and the whole message (v. 27) had, of course, been given to all. Summing up (v. 25), Paul's message had been that of the kingdom, as that of Jesus had been during his last days on earth (13).

At this time Paul had a clear conception of the dangers facing him, even to the point of foreboding death (vv. 22f.), and the brave note in his declaration that he did not prize life itself as the chief thing (v. 24) is quite in line with his words in Phil. 1²¹⁻²⁴ 3¹⁰ and with Jesus' words in Mt. 10²⁸ addressed to the Twelve. The writer of Acts does not introduce into the speech any information as to the actual outcome of events. He reserves this for his concluding chapters, thus leaving, it is believed, the essential message of Paul to the Ephesian elders, with only changes in the style. Thus here, as elsewhere in Acts, is found a dependable report in substance of what was said.

Vv. 28-30 constitute a solemn charge to the bishops (or overseers) of the flock, declaring their responsibility to God and pointing out dangers from without and from within which would certainly arise. The bishops are the same as elders, i.e., the officials whom Paul is addressing. The term "elders" does not occur in this sense in the letters of Paul outside the pastoral Epistles, but the word "bishops" appears in Phil. 1¹. The duties of bishops changed with time, and at a later date the office by that name was differently regarded. The meaning of the term in Paul's mind and in that of the author of Acts corresponds somewhat to the meaning of "class-leader" in the early days of Methodism, stressing oversight and personal responsibility for religious instruction (see intro. to 1 and 2 Timothy, pp. 1277-8).

The grievous wolves of v. 29 may be referred to in 1 Tim. 13, 20 6³¹. Deliberate and mischievous evil is indicated in the term. An invocation solemnizes this charge to the elders of Ephesus as Paul commends them all to God and the word of his grace (v. 32), and to him who is able (rather than "which is able"), thus emphasizing the personal presence of the gracious God with the flock.

36-38. The Tender Farewell of Paul. Oriental custom marks the manner of Paul's leave-taking, but the words of the passage leave no doubt that the emotion was real, not simulated. The greatest source of sorrow with the Ephesian disciples was the finality of the farewell.

CHAPTER XXI

1-6. From Miletus to Tyre. The entire passage 21¹⁻¹⁸ forms another we-section (see 16¹⁰⁻¹⁸ 20⁵⁻¹⁷ 27¹⁻²⁸ 16). This third we-section begins at Miletus (v. 1), where the second ended (20¹⁵). The indications are to the effect that the address of Paul was taken from another source than the diary. (See intro., "Sources.")

Vv. 1-6 contain an account of the route from Miletus to Tyre and a short, vivid story of a sincere but disregarded warning given to the apostle at Tyre.

Quite certainly the same vessel bore Paul and Luke from Miletus to Ptolemais. Change of cargo occasioned the stay of a week at Tyre, during which time warnings were sounded in Paul's ears repeatedly: Do not go up to Jerusalem. Notwithstanding inspired men thus spoke (v. 4, through the Spirit), Paul persisted in his plan. No small part of his persistence was due to his responsibility for the collection (Rom. 15²⁶ 1 Cor. 16¹ 2 Cor. 9^{1f.}) about which, however, Acts is silent, except possibly for the one statement of Paul (24¹⁷). The motive of Paul's persistence is given (20¹⁶) as his determination to celebrate Pentecost that year at Jerusalem.

The church at Tyre is here first referred to, although the expression the disciples (v. 4) implies a well-known group. This church was probably established soon after the martyrdom of Stephen.

7-14. Paul at Cæsarea. The sea voyage ended at Ptolemais, the first port after Tyre. From Ptolemais to Cæsarea Paul and Luke doubtless went on foot. They remained but a day in Ptolemais, where another church already existed, with whose members Paul seems to have been acquainted. At Cæsarea familiar names reappear. Paul stayed with Philip, whose story in 8⁴⁻⁴⁰ reveals that he had been for years a resident there. The prophet Agabus (v. 10) was originally of Judæa (11²⁸) and at Antioch in Syria foretold the famine in the reign of Claudius.

The events in Cæsarea might well have caused Paul to change his plan, but he proved to be unchangeable. It is not said that the four daughters of Philip made any definite prophecy at this time (v. 9). But Agabus came with certain information as to the attitude of the Jews in Jerusalem toward Paul. He acted out his prophecy in O.T. fashion (vv. 10f., and cf. Jer. 19 and Ezek. 4), prefacing his action with the solemn formula: Thus saith the Holy Ghost—an authentication which was as strong as could be offered. Paul did not deny the validity of the prophecy (v. 13) but declared that he was willing even to die. This Agabus had not foretold.

The passage gives the distinct impression that not alone the delivery of a sum of money, nor the fulfillment of a personal desire to celebrate a Jewish festival at Jerusalem drove Paul on in his course. It was nothing less than a principle which must be defended that led Paul to risk life itself in his attempt. Here is something closely akin to the determination of Jesus, some thirty years before, to go up to Jerusalem. Luke (951) says that Jesus "steadfastly set his face" to go to Jerusalem. Paul's sacrifice was just as real, even though he did not at that time lose his life. Paul literally gave up his life for the Gentile cause—for the principle involved in his empire-wide mission. It is motive and purpose that give a deed its moral significance. The Christian community at Casarea saw the sublime purpose in their hero. The author of the we-source identifies himself with the company who breathed that sacrificial prayer: The will of the Lord be done!

15-17. On to Jerusalem. Here is portrayed the loyalty of the brethren at Casarea to Paul. Some of them went with him for a part of the journey toward Jerusalem, a two-days' trip altogether (cf. 2331-33). If it were certain that the author of Acts knew about the collection which Paul was bringing up to the Jerusalem saints, it could be supposed that these brethren formed a sort of bodyguard to protect him and the collection from thieves. Since we know from Paul himself that he gathered funds from the Gentile churches for the saints at Jerusalem, the assumption here that Paul needed protection is well warranted, whether Acts carries any account of the collection or not. The travelers were probably mounted. Paul's party lodged with Mnason, one of the early disciples, for the one night spent on the way to Jerusalem (v. 16), or (as others read it) the Casarean brethren accompanied Paul all the way to Jerusalem, and Mnason was his host while he was in the city. The presumption is, however, that a sister of Paul lived in Jerusalem (see 2316) in which case Paul would lodge with her. This gives the preference to the former interpretation.

18-26. The Advice of James. The Christian church in Jerusalem gave Paul a welcoming hand, and the day after his arrival Paul sought out James, the head of the church there, to make his report. Paul had not been sent out by this church, but the apostle knew their interest would be excited by his account of the spread of the Christian movement. James regarded the movement from the conservative, Jewish side, but gloried in Paul's achievements (vv. 20f.). The church at Jerusalem, still composed of Jewish people, was in doubt as to the loyalty of Paul to the law (v. 21). It was desirable to convince them that they were misinformed. James did not doubt Paul, yet felt that the burden of proof rested upon Paul himself. Hence his proposal that Paul pay the expenses of four men who had undertaken a Nazirite vow. This would compel the presence of Paul in the Temple and also would require him to submit to the Mosaic ordinances in question (vv. 22f.).

The Jews whom James had in mind as opponents of Paul were Christian Jews (v. 20) and presumably resided at Jerusalem (v. 22). It turned out that certain Jews from Asia (v. 27) incited the mob against Paul, and these were probably not Christian Jews. The whole story of this peril which Paul survived teaches how loyal the Judean Christian church remained to Judaism throughout at least the first generation. Men may have the Christian spirit, and still cling to some of the customs of their native "culture."

False information had been spread among the Jews concerning Paul. He was painted as a renegade who made it his business to turn people away from Moses and the Law (v. 21). The report, James halfway admits, may have arisen from the message sent to Gentile converts to Christianity (1522f.), the import of which he repeats here (v. 25). The proposal of James involved no compromise on Paul's part, interfered with no principle, offended his conscience in no way, so he readily acceded to it. The four men were presumably members of the Christian church of Jerusalem (v. 23). Seven days of ceremony were involved in the discharge of the vows in question, and it began to appear that the advice of James was well given. The sequel proved the reverse.

27-36. Seized by the Jews: Rescued by the Romans. Paul was not known by face at Jerusalem even at this time, for he had been there infrequently and for only brief periods. Jews from Ephesus (Asia, v. 27) recognized both the apostle and Trophimus (v. 29) of Ephesus, the latter an uncircumcised Christian. It was charged that Paul had introduced Trophimus into the Temple unlawfully. This charge, no doubt false, yet loudly made (v. 28), was sufficient to arouse against Paul a strong feeling based on both racial and religious grounds. He would have been assassinated had not the guard of Roman soldiers in the neighboring Tower of Antonia, attached to the Temple, rescued him from the Jews.

The mob (v. 30) tried to get Paul outside the sacred area to carry out their murderous plan. It would be illegal to lynch him in the Temple! It was a large crowd that attacked Paul, although the report that all Jerusalem was in confusion was a rhetorical exaggeration. It was the duty of the Romans to keep the city clear of such uprisings. The captain of the guard supposed that he had to deal with a genuine insurrectionist, which accounts for the unusual precaution taken (two chains, v. 33). The mob had responded to the fanatical cries of the Asiatics without really understanding the case, thus no coherent account of the cause of the attack could be given (v. 34). This had its favorable aspect for Paul, since it became necessary to remove him to the Tower for examination. The Jews had ceased their beating of Paul on the arrival of the soldiers, but they did not cease their verbal abuse as he was being taken away (v. 36). The menace of the crowding mob was such that the soldiers actually carried Paul (v. 35).

37-40. A Favor Asked and Granted. Paul was by no means a passive prisoner. As soon as possible he addressed the captain in Greek: May I speak? The captain's reply shows his surprise that Paul did not address him in Aramæan, the language of the Judæan Jews. The situation invited further questions and favored the prisoner at least for the moment. Paul explained that he was a citizen of Tarsus (v. 39), but it does not appear why he withheld information about his Roman citizenship until later (22²⁵). Even in his earnest desire to speak to the people in his own defense Paul could not resist the impulse to speak well of his home city (v. 39). It was not agreeable to Paul to be mistaken for an Egyptian Jewish criminal whom the guard supposed he had arrested (v. 38). Josephus tells of this Jew, whose home was in Egypt, and who gathered many followers (Josephus says 30,000) in an abortive attempt to capture Jerusalem. The attempt occurred during the procuratorship of Felix, somewhere between 52 and 60 A.D., but, of course, before Paul's arrest, which occurred probably in 58. Paul asked leave to address his pursuers, and, his request granted, turned on the stairway (v. 40) and, using the familiar language of the Judæan Jews, began to speak.

CHAPTER XXII

1-21. Paul's Defense. No merely selfish motive led to the request of Paul. A few words might quiet the tumult. He might reassure them as to the new movement, about which they were so misinformed (21²¹). All that Paul would have said is not known, for his address was rudely interrupted at the mention of the hated word Gentiles (v. 21) and no further opportunity to address the Jews of Jerusalem ever again offered itself. His address as here given contains the second account in Acts of the apostle's conversion (cf. 9-9 26¹²⁻²³.)

The crowd obeyed his gesture for silence (21⁴⁰) and became attentive when they heard the Aramæan language. I am about to offer you my defense, Paul declared (vv. 1f.). This was quite necessary, for many of those present thought he was an enemy of all that was Jewish, perhaps that he himself had no right to be in the Temple. Their law threatened death to all who entered the holy place illegally. The address first established Paul's Jewish nationality and education (v. 3), then gave an account of his eager and zealous persecution of the Way, even in distant cities (vv. 4f.), and narrated vividly the vision on the road (v. 6) and the subsequent experiences (vv. 7-13), until Ananias of Damascus interpreted the experience as one granted by the God of the fathers (v. 14), whereupon Paul had returned to Jerusalem (v. 17) and was praying in this very Temple, when God spoke to him in a vision, declaring that he was to go to the Gentiles. Here the address broke off. Had he been allowed to go on, no doubt Paul would have recounted some of his conquests on heathen soil which had so stirred and convinced the more enlightened Jews (see 14²⁷, 21^{19f.}). His later words in 26¹⁸⁻²⁰, 22, 23 form the substance of such a sequel as might have appeared after v. 21 had Paul not been interrupted.

In detail, the address was admirably designed to conciliate the Jews. Paul's religious training had been at the hands of a great master, in the Holy City itself, in full accord with tradition. Paul was as fully in sympathy with the ancient Law as any of his assailants, and he knew it better than most of them (v. 3). He had felt as they did against the followers of Jesus and had persecuted them, to which the high priest himself could witness (vv. 4f.). True, the speaker was no longer a persecutor of the Way, because God himself had shown through an undoubted vision that he should become rather the apostle of the new movement (vv. 6-21). A comparison of this account of Paul's conversion with 9³⁻⁹ shows no more than one discrepancy of note. In 9⁷ "the men . . . with him stood speechless, hearing the voice but beholding no man." Here (v. 9), Paul says: They that were with me . . . heard not the voice of him that spake to me. The verb "to hear" often bears the sense of "to understand," as in 1 Cor. 14² Mk. 4³³, where the same verb is variously translated in R.V. Luke would see no real discrepancy between his accounts. He meant to say that Paul was the only man in the company who heard intelligible words. So also the statement (26¹⁴) that all had "fallen to the earth" collides verbally with the expression, "the men . . . stood speechless" (9⁷), yet the author is satisfied to let them stand unharmonized. It is fair to say that in all essentials the three accounts of Paul's conversion fully agree with one another.

22-29. Paul in the Tower of Antonia. At mention of the Gentiles the Jews uttered incoherent cries (v. 22a). Some who phrased their horror declared that Paul was not fit to live. In their frenzy they threw garments about and filled the air with dust (v. 23), typical Oriental expressions of rage and horror. If the Roman officer did not understand Paul's Aramaean speech, the outburst of the Jews convinced him that torture alone would elicit the facts (v. 24). Paul would surely have been beaten with the thongs (v. 25) had he not made known his Roman citizenship.

The centurion conferred a favor upon the tribune (chief captain) when he promptly reported Paul's question (v. 26). The tribune, who had already broken the law in ordering Paul to be bound, found to his surprise that Paul was free born, i.e., had the right of citizenship by virtue of his father's citizenship, while he, Claudius Lysias (23²⁶), had purchased the privilege (v. 28). But the discovery that Paul was a Roman did not explain to Lysias why the Jews had so nearly killed him. To obtain the facts he decided to inquire of the highest court of the Jews.

CHAPTER XXIII

1. Paul Before the Sanhedrin. The Sanhedrin summoned (see 22³⁰), Paul addressed them forthwith. The council was expected to explain to the Roman officer the nature of Paul's offense. The conclusion that the Jewish authorities themselves were none too clear about the charge against Paul is based on their desire to hear Paul before writing their decision. Such a decision would be an official document, which, if the situation required it, Lysias could forward to Rome. Not only here, but in chs. 24–26, the Romans appear in great doubt as to how to phrase the charge against Paul. At times they confess that he is technically guilty of no fault (25²⁵ 26^{31f.}).

2–10. Paul Again Rescued. The council meeting was called by the Roman captain, who kept watch over the proceedings (v. 10). Paul's address was never completed as planned, for he no sooner affirmed that his conscience was clear (v. 1) than the high priest commanded attendants forcibly to silence him. This indignity Paul resented (v. 3) with such forceful words that he found himself in contempt of court (v. 4) from which situation an apology rescued him for the moment. But Paul still stood upon his rights to a fair trial (v. 3b). Why Paul did not know that the presiding officer was high priest is unaccountable (v. 5). The versatile apostle immediately changed his course and addressed the assembly again: I am being tried because I believe in a resurrection! (V. 6.) This threw the Pharisees and Sadducees into active discussion, and although the Pharisees in the council moved to exonerate Paul (v. 9), the Sadducees (the majority) so set upon the prisoner that he was forcibly rescued again by the Roman guard and carried to the Tower (v. 10). From this deliberative body Lysias saw he could expect no great light.

11. Encouraged by a Vision. To Paul, visions were real appearances of God or of his messengers. They revealed to him the will or purpose of God (see 16⁹ 18^{9f.} 27^{23f.}). As in the present case, times of discouragement or of crisis were occasions for visions. The night after his second rescue from his would-be murderers the Lord (Jesus) reassured Paul that he should at length see Rome.

12–32. Paul Secretly Transferred to Cæsarea. A plot to assassinate the apostle was discovered by Paul's nephew and made known to Claudius Lysias (vv. 16–21), who had become friendly toward his prisoner. Lysias bound the lad to secrecy and at once made preparations to transfer his prisoner to the protection of the governor, Felix, at Cæsarea (vv. 22–24). The proposal of the council (vv. 14f.) was never actually made to Lysias.

A strong body-guard composed of four hundred foot-soldiers and seventy horsemen escorted Paul to Cæsarea. From Antipatris (about half-way to Cæsarea, at the foot of the Judæan hills, northeast of Joppa), the seventy horsemen went on with Paul while the infantry turned back to Jerusalem. The letter of Claudius Lysias to Felix is the second typical Greek letter given in Acts (see 15^{23–29}). The conventional word Greeting opens the letter in each instance, but here the concluding formula, Farewell, does not appear in the best texts (but see mg.). The letter itself (vv. 26–30) is in direct and precise style. Lysias says that he rescued Paul because he had learned that he was a Roman (v. 27), which scarcely corresponds to fact. The text of the letter is an admirable summary of the events detailed in 21^{27–23} 24. The last statement in the letter (v. 30b) concerns directions given to Paul's accusers after his departure from Jerusalem.

33–35. Imprisoned at Cæsarea. The guard delivered Paul safely at Cæsarea and presented the letter of Lysias to Antonius Felix, the procurator. No ceremony marked the event. Formal inquiry was made as to Paul's residence, quarters were assigned him in the Prætorium, and the formal hearing was deferred until the arrival of the accusers. The citizenship of Paul was recognized, his rights were safeguarded, and Roman law was for the time satisfied.

Paul spent two years in Cæsarea under Felix (24²⁷) and a further period, not well defined by Luke, under Festus (see 25:1-3, 21, 271). The period of imprisonment in Cæsarea was probably much in excess of two years.

CHAPTER XXIV

1-9. The Judæan Jews at Cæsarea. The high priest, with selected members of the Sanhedrin, prepared to win the good graces of Felix through the offices of a professional orator, Tertullus (v. 1). The hearing began on the fourth day after Paul's arrival. The speech of Tertullus is conventional, too full of flattery for the reader but not for the particular hearer addressed. History does not agree with Tertullus that Felix was a good ruler. (See Josephus, Antiquities, bk. xx, ch. 8: 5-8; Jewish Wars, bk. ii, ch. 13: 2-6.) The charges of Tertullus against Paul were as extravagant and as general as his praise of Felix (vv. 5-8). The case for the accusers was closed by a general approval of the words of the orator (v. 9).

10-21. Paul's Defense. Using no compliments, but recognizing the experience of Felix in the law, Paul stated the points that proved his innocence. He left Cæsarea for Jerusalem less than a fortnight before (v. 11). The time was inadequate for such wrongs as were charged against him. The real accusers, those Jews from Asia (21²⁷), Paul urged, did not come down to Cæsarea (v. 19), yet all they could testify to would be the fact that Paul was in the Temple, engaged in worship, and that, too, after bringing alms and offerings to the Jews (v. 17). Turning to the accusers present (v. 20) Paul demanded that they show evidence to support their charges. The only real cause for complaint was, Paul declared, that he said, in the presence of the council: I am being tried because I believe in a resurrection! (Cf. 23^{6b}.)

22, 23. Felix Delays a Decision. The legal reason for postponing a decision in Paul's case lay in the absence of Claudius Lysias (v. 22b), but a secondary reason is found in the fact that Felix knew about the movement called the Way. (See 92^b 199, 23 224 2414; cf. 1825f. the way of the Lord.) This insight enabled Felix to discern the injustice of the charges against Paul. Felix showed Paul favors, admitting his friends to visit him (v. 23) and permitting a degree of freedom. That other Roman officials treated Paul thus indulgently is shown in 28¹⁶, 30f.

24-27. Two Years of Imprisonment. Felix did not forget Paul, yet in the two years that followed the hearing at Cæsarea (vv. 1-21) his decision was still undeclared. The first of a series of private hearings is detailed in vv. 24f. Paul took the opportunity to impress Felix with the ethical message of Christianity, emphasizing righteousness, or the right way of life, self-control, a cardinal Christian virtue, and the judgment or the great day of decision, when the Judge of all men would delay his decision no more (v. 25). The message made Felix tremble, but his cupidity overcame his fears. He still hoped for a bribe from Paul to hasten his favorable decision (v. 26). The expensive litigation in which Paul was engaged must have cast the apostle upon his own resources. If, as surmised, Paul worked his way during the two years in Rome (see under 28³⁰), he may also have done this in Cæsarea. Or he may have inherited money.

The successor of Felix, Porcius Festus, found Paul after two years still a prisoner, officially neither guilty nor innocent (v. 27); Felix had left him thus to placate the Jews, having his own advantage in mind.

CHAPTER XXV

1-12. The Appeal to Cæsar. As the new procurator of Judæa, Festus promptly visited Jerusalem (v. 1) seeking the good will of the Jews. When Paul's old enemies requested a new trial at Jerusalem Festus diplomatically refused (v. 4), possibly suspecting their sincerity. A week or more later (v. 6) in the presence of his accusers (v. 7) Paul had his first hearing before Festus. The charges, as deduced from Paul's answer (v. 8), were that he had transgressed the Jewish law, that he had defiled the Temple, and that he was politically dangerous. When Festus showed a disposition to transfer him to Jerusalem for trial (v. 9) Paul took strong ground in his own defense, and demanded a decisive trial before Cæsar as his right (v. 11b). This demand was disconcerting both to Festus and the Jews, yet their course had made it necessary. The sequel shows with what difficulty Festus formulated a charge of sufficient definiteness and weight to justify his transfer of the prisoner to Rome. After conference with his legal counselors it appeared that the appeal was admissible (v. 12), and Festus acceded to Paul's demand.

13-22. Agrippa Hears About Paul. Somewhere near the beginning of the procuratorship of Festus, Marcus Julius Agrippa II made an official visit at Cæsarea. With him was Bernice, his sister (and also sister of Drusilla, the wife of Felix). During the visit Paul's case was discussed, perhaps because Agrippa had a deep interest in Jewish questions. Festus asked counsel of Agrippa, reviewing the details of the case as he knew it (vv. 14b-21), whereupon Agrippa professed a desire to hear him

(v. 22). Festus promptly arranged a hearing for the next day.

23-27. A New Hearing Opened. The hearing before Agrippa was not a trial, but an occasion of great pomp, which notables (v. 23b) attended to counsel with Festus as to how to frame the accusation against Paul. (See the opening words of Festus, vv. 24-27.)

CHAPTER XXVI

1-23. Paul Addresses Agrippa. Although Festus officially presided, Agrippa signaled Paul to speak. Agrippa alone was addressed. Paul expressed a genuine satisfaction at the prospect of declaring himself before a man who was familiar with Judaism (v. 2). For he was about to show that in his adherence to the Way he was not, after all, disloyal to the principles of his ancestral religion (vv. 3, 7). V. 5 in no way affirms that Paul's Pharisaism was of the past only. In 23⁶ Paul said: "I am a Pharisee," which was as though he said: "Religiously, I am orthodox." (Vv. 6f.). In regard to the particular question of the resurrection (v. 8; cf. 25¹⁹), Paul affirmed the soundness of his position. His crusade as persecutor of the Way (vv. 10f.) furnished the occasion for the real appearance of the risen Jesus to him (vv. 12-15; cf. 93-5 226-8). Paul had persecuted Christians in other foreign cities than Damascus (v. 11), although Acts gives no account of these expeditions. Paul said of the Christians whom he persecuted to death that he gave his vote against them when they were condemned (v. 10). Practically, the same statement occurs in 8¹, "Saul was consenting to his death" (cf. 2220). No evidence appears here to show that Paul was at any time a member of the Sanhedrin. According to a reliable tradition, supported by the gospel narrative of Jesus' trial, the Jewish court was not allowed to affix the death penalty upon any criminal.

In vv. 12-18 is an expanded narrative of Paul's conversion experience, showing some verbal differences, yet with no essential discrepancy. Here no command to go into Damascus is expressed, but the words in vv. 17f. remind one of the words of Ananias (915f.), spoken to Paul the third day after his vision. (See under 221-21.) The mention of the Hebrew language (v. 14) is peculiarly intimate. The deepest religious experiences are best expressed in one's mother tongue. So the revelation to Paul seemed to be expressed in Aramæan, the language especially dear to Jewish hearts (cf. 222). Paul would naturally explain to Agrippa his motive for missionary work among the Gentiles, since his contact with Gentiles was a grievance to the Jews (see 2121 245). Hence

Paul briefly describes his loyalty to the vision in Damascus, at Jerusalem and in Judæa (v. 20) and among the nations (Gentiles), offering this course as the basis of the attack and the charges of the Jews (v. 21), notwithstanding which, affirmed Paul, I am honestly declaring only that which the Jewish faith holds (vv. 22f.). Here Paul quotes no O.T. text to support his statement that Moses foretold the resurrection of Messiah. He uses the term Moses for "the Scriptures" generally, and is thinking possibly of Isa. 53. The thought is that of v. 6 at the beginning of his speech.

24-29. Festus Interrupts the Prisoner. Although the belief of Paul in the resurrection was not new to Festus, the address (of which Luke has given a mere outline) seemed to move the governor, who interrupted the speaker to accuse him of raving (v. 24). The self-control of the apostle appeared adequate in his polite address to the most excellent Festus (v. 25) as he protested his complete sanity, pointing out the wealth of facts which must have convinced Festus himself. Then Paul appealed to King Agrippa, rightly assuming his loyalty to the Hebrew prophets (vv. 26f.), and would have pursued his advantage had not Agrippa in turn interrupted the apostle with that protest so difficult of interpretation: Paul, with few words thou art indeed persuading me to be a Christian (v. 28). This is the plainest sense of the text in the best MSS. The words may be ironical or they may have been spoken seriously. Surely, no one can doubt that Paul himself hoped for the conversion of Agrippa. With the insight into Judaism that Agrippa had it would not be impossible for him to become persuaded that Jesus was Messiah. The answer of Paul supports this plain interpretation. In substance the answer of Paul was: "Under any circumstances I earnestly wish that Agrippa and all others here were sharing my experience, excepting only my experience as prisoner."

30-32. A Private Judgment. Paul was not permitted further to speak. The evidence sufficed to enable Festus to formulate an official accusation, and the prisoner had directed his address too searchingly at King Agrippa. The latter fact caused the abrupt ending of the hearing. Agrippa did not become a Christian, but his words (v. 32) indicate a sympathetic attitude toward Paul. Both Festus and the king agreed (v. 31b) that only Paul's appeal to Cæsar warranted his being kept a prisoner. It is not certain that Paul would at this time have been liberated if he had not appealed, although it was apparent even to Felix, before the appeal, that Paul was no criminal (see 2427).

CHAPTER XXVII

1-12. Embarked for Rome. The last two chapters of Acts contain one of the most circumstantial accounts of travel on the Mediterranean Sea in the first Christian century known to modern readers. Although Luke has given no account of any other voyage of Paul, the apostle's own statement (2 Cor. 11^{25b}) accounts for much of his insight and experience shown during the dangerous moments of this voyage. The long section 27¹-28¹⁶ comprises the fourth and last we-section. Some weeks or even months after the hearing before Agrippa, arrangements were perfected to send Paul, with a number of other prisoners, on to Rome. The centurion, Julius, who with a detachment of soldiers (see v. 42), had the prisoners in charge, probably commanded one of the five cohorts stationed at Caesarea. Since no vessel sailing directly for Italy was at hand, a convenient ship, hailing from Adramyttium, on the west coast of Asia Minor, and homeward bound, was used for part of the voyage. Paul had at least two companions, Luke, the author of the we-narrative, and Aristarchus of Thessalonica, who accompanied him voluntarily (v. 2). The course of the vessel was first north, along the coast to Sidon (v. 3), where Paul was allowed the privilege of disembarking to enjoy the hospitality of friends. This is the first mention of the church in Sidon, although in the neighboring city of Tyre (21^{3f.}) Paul had been entertained on his way to Jerusalem. A stay of several days may have been made at Sidon. From Sidon the course lay north of Cyprus, then west between Cyprus and Cilicia (v. 5) to obtain protection from opposing winds (v. 4), to Myra, on the coast of Lycia (see map). The ship of Adramyttium from this point could not be of further use. Her destination lay to the north. A ship from Alexandria, in Egypt, on the way to Italy, carrying passengers (v. 37) and grain (v. 38), was chosen by the centurion for the completion of the voyage (v. 6). Thus the party continued the voyage westward along the shore of Asia Minor, meeting unfavorable winds (v. 7) and suffering delay. From Cnidus, at the southwest corner of Asia, the course changed to the southwest, toward the island of Crete. The wind made impossible the desirable course directly westward. After a difficult time the ship reached the place called Fair Havens, near the city of Lasea, on the south coast of Crete (v. 8). A long stay in this harbor added to the delay already experienced, and October came, for the Fast (v. 9) was already gone by. (Yom Kippur, 10th of Tisri, Lev. 16²⁹⁻³¹ 23²⁶⁻³².) The conditions always made navigation after this season dangerous. Between November and March shipping was at a standstill.

At this point (v. 9) Paul appeared as adviser to the ship's officers, probably through the friendly Roman centurion, Julius (v. 11). On the basis of his own experience on the sea Paul strongly advised that they remain for the winter in Fair Havens, at the same time criticizing the policy of delay that had prevailed (v. 9b). Not only the master of the vessel had to be consulted, but the owner himself, who was on board (v. 11). These both opposed Paul's advice, and the centurion, who was actually in command (cf. vv. 42f.), ordered the vessel put to sea. The objective was Phoenix, a port near the southwest corner of Crete (v. 12). Phoenix would offer a more comfortable harbor for the winter. The difficult expression looking northeast and south-east is believed to mean that the land inclosing the harbor sheltered vessels from winds blowing from those directions.

13-15. The Storm. The departure from Fair Havens was under favorable conditions. But the gentle south wind (v. 13) was only a "weather-breeder." The course toward Phoenix was toward the northwest, and although the high land would protect the vessel from the north wind for part of the way, some open water threatened them when crossing the Gulf of Messaria. (See Ramsay, art., "Phoenix," Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iii, p. 862.) If Phoenix stood on the site of the modern Lutro, at least twelve hours would be required for the voyage, long enough to arouse apprehension in the mind of an experienced traveler. Phoenix was not reached. Soon after the ship left Fair Havens cautiously sailing along the shore (v. 13b), it encountered a severe windstorm (v. 14), probably a "northeaster," as the context shows. The force of the Mediterranean winds and waves was terrific. This large vessel (see under v. 37) was unable to face such a wind as Euraquilo and was driven before it (v. 15) until it came under the shelter of a small island, Cauda (or Claudia, mg.), which lies twenty miles south of Cape Matala, the southernmost promontory of Crete (v. 16), around which cape the vessel had sailed soon after leaving Fair Havens.

16, 17. The Ship Re-enforced. Under the lee (on the south side) of the island of Cauda two necessary precautions were taken. First of all, the small boat, usually lashed to the stern above the water level, was brought on board. The difficulty encountered (v. 16) was due to the fact that the boat was filled with water and also because, even in the more quiet water, this operation required strength and patience. This boat was later (v. 30) sacrificed when the sailors lowered it under false pretense. The second precaution involved strengthening the ship itself against the stress of wave action and shifting cargo, which would bring unusual pressure upon the keel. Ropes were bound around the vessel, under the keel and over the deck (v. 17), the ropes being lowered over the bow and carried back to the desired point, then lashed tight.

The direction of the wind was such that the ship's crew feared lest the gale should drive them upon the Syrtes Major, fearful sandbars along the north African coast (v. 17b), and to guard against this the spread of sail was reduced; i.e., only storm sails were used. The words they lowered the gear (v. 17b) may mean that a sort of drag was employed to retard the motion of the vessel.

18-26. The Peril and the Vision. Despite all precautions, the outlook for the people on the boat was dark. Much water was taken on board and the slow process of bailing had little effect. Pumps were then unknown to navigators. The second day of driving before the wind found the crew throwing overboard some of the cargo, to lighten the vessel (v. 18). On the third day with their own hands (v. 19), i.e., aided by the passengers, the ship's company threw out even things like utensils, perhaps baggage (see mg., furniture). Even the mariners were lost when neither sun, moon, nor stars appeared for days to determine their location (v. 20). As the storm still continued, all became despondent and even lost desire for food (v. 21a). If Paul had his despondent period, as is possible, he became full of hope when an angel of God appeared to him. Immediately (v. 23, this night) the apostle brought his message of cheer to his companions, but not without a note of triumph over those who had rejected his advice. Loss of property is inevitable, he said (v. 22), but no life will be the price of reckless adventure. An angel of my God appeared to me to-night assuring me that I shall yet appear before Caesar (v. 24). We shall not be cast on the Syrtes, but upon an island (v. 26). The precise method in which this divine message came to Paul can only be conjectured, but the event proved the truth of his belief.

27-44. The Shipwreck. Two weeks after leaving Fair Havens, one night the lookout detected signs of land (v. 27) and hove the lead repeatedly to discover how rapidly the land was drawing near to them. The depth of water decreased so rapidly that they feared being cast upon the rocks in the darkness and cast out four anchors from the stern, hoping they would hold at least till daylight (vv. 28f). The anchors could not be cast from the bow, else the ship must have foundered in the trough of the sea as it swung around. Paul, alert as any on the vessel, intercepted the plot of the sailors to escape in the boat (v. 30). With the boat cut away (v. 32) nothing could be done until dawn. Here Paul again assumed the rôle of adviser and urged that food be prepared, since their fast had endured for the fortnight (v. 33). They had not gone without food entirely for that period, but it had been sparsely and irregularly served. With a word of cheer to the ship's company (v. 34b) and offering thanksgiving to God before them all (v. 35), Paul took food and they all followed his example. The number of people on the vessel is impressive—a total of two hundred seventy-six (v. 37). After the meal the desire to be active in some way was satisfied when they took part in the final lightening of the ship, throwing overboard the rest of the cargo (v. 38), a task begun twelve days before (v. 18). This was desirable since they must drive the ship as near as possible to land when the hawsers were cut. The outcome justified the measure. At early dawn, no one recognized the land before them. Noting a bay with a beach, the steering oars, which had been tightly lashed, were made ready, the foresail was hoisted, the hawsers at the stern were cut and the steersman directed the course toward the beach (vv. 39f.). Lightened as the ship was, still the prow struck upon a sand bar and held fast while the stern began to break up under the battering of the waves (v. 41). Nothing now remained but to make for the shore as each one could. Disorder did not prevail. The centurion gave orders which were obeyed by all; the prisoners with all others either swam or drifted on planks to the shore, and when the muster-roll was called all were found safely on land (vv. 42-44).

CHAPTER XXVIII

1-10. The Winter on Malta. The island proved to be Malta, an island about eighty miles south of Sicily. The inhabitants are here called barbarians because they did not use the Greek language. The English word "natives" is quite exact, without implying that the Maltese were uncultured. The expression no common kindness (v. 2) reveals the expectation of less hospitable treatment and records the gratitude of the rescued. Paul found himself gathering twigs for fuel, and, thus engaged, was bitten by a viper. The phrase fastened on means "thrust his fangs into." The sequel plainly shows that in the judgment of the onlookers the snake was of a poisonous variety, for (v. 4) they expected a fatal outcome. Paul did not share their fear; his demeanor was calm as he disposed of the snake, and his own expectation was fulfilled. The event emphasizes Paul's implicit trust in God, which cast out all fear. The quaint philosophy of the Maltese as expressed in their change of point of view, was not peculiar to them (vv. 4-6). Human experience testifies that justice does not always triumph promptly. Their later conclusion that Paul was a god resembled that of the inhabitants of Lystra (14¹²). Here (v. 6) it is not said that Paul rebuked the people for their view. The sojourn of the apostle in Malta is sparingly described. The centurion, his soldiers, the crew, the master and the owner of the ill-fated vessel are all disregarded. Aside from Paul's remarkable escape from the serpent, another miracle is narrated (v. 8), and other miracles of healing are mentioned (vv. 7-10). (On these miracles, see art., N.T. Miracles, p. 926.) Publius, the ruler of the island (representing the Roman government), extended generous hospitality to Paul and Luke (we), and perhaps to Aristarchus. It would be strange thus to honor a prisoner, who must have been chained to a Roman soldier according to regulations. The incident of the snake may have given Paul this prestige. (See 24²³ 27³ and note the manner in which Paul's advice, certainly not unasked, had been received by the Romans, 27¹⁰.)

It is Luke's purpose, in narrating the wonders that accompanied Paul's activity in Malta, to exhibit the inherent power of the gospel even in a wholly un-Jewish environment. From Jesus' day the apostles had practiced the healing of diseases.

11-15. The Voyage to Rome Ended. For three months Paul and his companions enjoyed the hospitality of the people of Malta, awaiting the opportunity to make their way to Rome. Another vessel of Alexandria, which had made a more fortunate choice of a harbor in which to winter (v. 11), would transport at least the prisoners, for the centurion was bound to deliver them all safely at Rome. The sign of the vessel was, after the manner of that time, an image or painting on the bow. In this case it consisted of Castor and Pollux, "the twin," favorite deities of seamen (v. 11).

The first port out of Malta was Syracuse, on the southeast coast of Sicily (v. 12), where a stay of three days, for trade or waiting for a favorable wind, ensued. Thence the route lay between Sicily and the tip of Italy, with a stop overnight at Rhegium (after one day, v. 13). A favoring wind took them to Puteoli, somewhat over two hundred miles north of Rhegium. This was the destination of the vessel, and the rest of the journey to Rome was by land (v. 13b). At Puteoli they found brethren (v. 14), i.e., Christians, who wished to entertain Paul for a week. Whether this wish was fulfilled or not rested with the centurion. And so we came to Rome (v. 14). Thus briefly is the fulfillment of Paul's desire to see Rome expressed! The sentence is anticipatory, for Puteoli was one hundred and thirty miles from Rome and the we-writer yet describes the welcome offered to Paul by the Christians of Rome, some of whom came out forty miles to meet the apostolic party at the Market of Appius, while others waited at the Three Taverns, thirty miles out of the city. This tribute touched Paul very deeply. He had written an important letter to these Christians several years before, but had never seen them.

16-31. Paul in Rome Two Years. Acts gives no account of the trial of Paul at Rome. Certainly, the trial had not taken place after two years (v. 30), during which time Paul lived under relatively comfortable conditions, renting a house (v. 30), calling in various people whom he wished to see (vv. 17, 23, 30), but chained to a soldier guard (vv. 16, 20). The fact that Paul was able to hire his own dwelling indicates that he had means. It is possible he continued to work at his trade. The generous treatment accorded him arose possibly from the service that Paul had rendered during the voyage, but more likely from the nature of the report and accusation sent by Festus. In the light of the verdict at Cæsarea (26^{31f.}) there is no reason to suppose that Paul's trial resulted in his execution. Probably after the long delay to which almost all processes of law are subject, then as now, Paul was set at liberty for further activity (cf. p. 1275b). One incident of that two years, narrated by Luke (vv. 17-28), is weighty. Paul improved his earliest opportunity to meet the prominent non-Christian Jews of the city and present to them his gospel. He could not go to them, but they came to his dwelling. The edict of Claudius issued some ten years before (18²) was no longer in force, and the Jewish synagogues as well as the Christian church in Rome were active as before. On the third day of his stay in Rome the leaders, probably the rulers of the synagogue, were thus addressed by the apostle (vv. 17b-20):

"I am a prisoner here through the accusation of my fellow countrymen, although I am fully innocent of any wrong to them, or of any violation of our law. I am in the custody of Rome in self-defense, for I was compelled to appeal in order to save my life, not that I accuse my own folk. For the Romans would have set me free, but the Jews objected." *It will be noticed that here Paul placed the decision of Festus and Agrippa before his appeal. The narrative of Luke does not so place it (see 2424-27 259-12 2630-32).

The Jews answered: "You are, of course, a member of this sect against which we hear so much said. However, we have not had any report, oral or written, about you. We shall be glad to hear your views from your own lips" (vv. 21f).

A day was then set, upon which a much larger number of Jews came to hear Paul (v. 23a), who explained his view of the kingdom of God and quoted from the Law and the prophets to support his claim that Jesus is the Messiah. The session lasted all day (v. 23). This mission of Paul, carried on under such remarkable conditions, resulted in a division of his hearers. Some believed, others did not (v. 24). To the latter Paul delivered a parting shot as they withdrew, probably with some feeling: "You deserve to hear that rebuke administered by Isaiah to your fathers (see Isa. 69f.). For the prophet knew that the people to whom he spoke would not really hear nor clearly understand. They were preoccupied with their own affairs. Their ears were deaf. It was as if they were afraid they would hear and profit by the inspired words. Since you will not believe the message," said Paul, "take comfort in the thought that the Gentiles will hear. And the Gentiles shall hear this word!" (Vv. 25-28.) The mg. of v. 29 records the statement that the Jews left Paul disagreeing among themselves.

The Conclusion. It has been thought by many that the closing paragraph of the book (vv. 30, 31) is abrupt and unfinished. Some argue from this that Luke carried his story as far as his material permitted, i.e., that he wrote Acts early in the 60's while Paul was still a prisoner at Rome. This is hardly in accord with what is known about the date of the Gospel, which must have been written earlier than Acts. (See art., Formation of N.T., p. 857a; cf. also pp. 1022-3.) The closing paragraph of Acts is no more abrupt than the corresponding paragraph of Luke's Gospel. The style of the writer, not a shortage of material, dictates the form of the conclusion. (Cf. Lk. 2450-53.)

Paul paid his own expenses while in Rome (see under 24²⁶), as had been his rule throughout his ministry. As he last appears in Acts the apostle was quite free to preach, teach, and receive visitors without hindrance from the Romans or from the Jews (vv. 30f.).

ROMANS

BY PROFESSOR C. ANDERSON SCOTT

INTRODUCTION

Place of the Epistle Among Paul's Writings.

This Epistle stands first among Paul's writings in our N.T., but that is not because it is the earliest of his letters which have come down to us. According to the generally accepted dates there are five earlier Epistles: two to the Thessalonians, two to the Corinthians, and one to the Galatians. This Epistle owes its position to the early recognition of its outstanding importance, and possibly to the importance of the church to which it was addressed. It is distinguished from the others by a comprehensiveness of treatment, a breadth of application, and a general objectivity of outlook which give it more the character of a treatise than of a letter (cf. p. 941). That it was the work of the apostle Paul there is no reason to doubt; any denial of his authorship which has been made may be reckoned an eccentricity of criticism. It was written from Corinth at a date which is variously estimated by different authorities between the years 54 and 58 A.D. Paul was by this time "in the late afternoon of his career." He had been for more than twenty years a missionary of the gospel, and had only some six (or ten) years of his course to run. Concerning the first fourteen years of his life and activities as a servant of Christ we know little or nothing. Then he suddenly emerges from obscurity (cf. Acts 11²⁵ 13^{1f.}), and from that time onward, through the Acts and through his Epistles, we have an opportunity of knowing his career and his character, to which antiquity offers but few parallels.

The Church at Rome. In writing to the Romans Paul was writing to a church which he had never visited, one in whose founding he had had no part. And down to the end of ch. 14 the style and tone of the letter are in harmony with this fact. He writes as a stranger would write to strangers, making no allusion to anything particular in their history or circumstances. That he uses Greek in writing to a community at Rome need not surprise us in view of the fact that it was only at the end of the second century that the language of worship at Rome was changed from Greek to Latin. There has been much discussion as to the composition of the church at Rome, some having maintained that its members were wholly or predominantly of the Jewish race, others that they were wholly or predominantly of Gentile origin. It is now agreed that both Jews and Gentiles had contributed to its membership, and that neither section greatly predominated.

Purpose and Character of the Epistle. The discussion on the composition of the church at Rome had significance for its bearing on the purpose and character of the Epistle. So long as the impression prevailed that the letter was polemical in character it was important to ascertain which of the two sections of the community Paul was arguing with or against. But it was probably an initial mistake to regard the letter as polemical or even controversial. It is really declaratory and persuasive. Its purpose is to declare the great mercies of God in Jesus Christ, to show both the necessity and the validity of a salvation the sole conditions of which are the free grace of God and the response of faith in man, and then to draw practical inferences for the conduct of those who had accepted the unsearchable riches of Christ. And so far as persuasion enters into the apostle's purpose, it is not (in the first eight chapters) either Jewish Christians, or Gentile Christians whom he has in view, but the Jews, or a typical Jew, who had not yet believed. The Epistle is written under the strong consciousness of the wonderful work which God had wrought in providing for men, both Jews and Gentiles, a righteousness which was not their own, but with a subconsciousness that the Jews as a whole were still standing aloof. This leads him time and again to be diverted from the direct current of his thought to consider an objection which is raised or might conceivably be raised by the Jew. Such objections are, "But we do not need righteousness like the Gentiles." "But we have our own divinely appointed means of securing righteousness, through the Law." "But Abraham was only justified because he showed his faith by his works." "But are you not encouraging men to remain in sin?" Or, "Are you not coming perilously near to treating the Law itself as if it were sin?" With each of these objections Paul deals patiently and hopefully. It is so clear to him that since the death of Christ a new era has begun, that all the Jew had ever hoped for and more is now open to his acceptance on the sole condition of faith, the faith which becomes operative by love, uniting the believer to God in Jesus Christ, that he cannot conceive how men can be blind to it. From every such excursion he returns to his theme, The Gospel as a Divine Force unto Salvation, a message of free and emancipating forgiveness, the full contents of which he expands in ch. 8. But the sub-theme which has also been present to his mind again asserts itself, and the problem of the Jew and his future has to be faced and settled (chs. 9-11) before he can proceed finally to show how salvation finds expression in life, conduct, and character. The letter differs from some other Epistles, like those to Corinth or Galatia, in that it does not reflect or respond to anything specific in the circumstances or the internal life of the community which he is addressing. It differs also in that we find here a sustained and continuous treatment of one great theme, salvation, its root and its fruit. But it does not differ from any of the others, in that the motive of it is the positive exposition of the mercies of God in Christ (cf. pp. 855, 936-7, 941).

Problem of the Closing Chapters. The last two chapters raise problems of their own, which will be found clearly set out and authoritatively discussed in Lake's Earlier Epistles of St. Paul. There is a considerable amount of ancient evidence, and that of a varied character, that this Epistle circulated toward the end of the second century in two forms or recensions. One of these stopped at 14²³, with or without the doxology, 16²⁵⁻²⁷; the other was in the form preserved in our N.T. There is also early evidence of the existence of a text which omitted the words "in Rome" in both places where they occur in ch. 1, thus leaving the Epistle without any indication of the church to which it was addressed. This textual evidence finds confirmation when the contents of chs. 15 and 16 are examined. In 15^{14f.} we feel for the first time that the apostle is addressing a definite group of people and his travel-plans, which are there explained, point to Rome as their probable abode. 16¹⁻²³ stands by itself. It has long been felt to be very unlikely that Paul should have in Rome so many acquaintances as those to whom he here sends greeting. And it is not only that he knows their names; with many of them he has evidently been in close personal contact. Two of them have shared with him in some imprisonment. Others have worked with him. The mother of Rufus has been "a mother to me also." The reference to Epænetus as the "first-fruits of Asia" would be more natural in a letter to Asia than to Rome. Moreover, vv. 17-20a strike a note of concern and warning for which the rest of the Epistle leaves us quite unprepared, and uses a tone of authority which is hardly to be expected if Paul were writing to Christians who had never seen him. It is highly probable that in this chapter (16¹⁻²³) we have preserved a note sent by Paul to the church at Ephesus in order to commend Phœbe to its care, and reflecting in the many greetings it contains his affectionate interest in individuals whom he knew there, as well as (17-20a) his anxiety about certain dangers which he knew to be threatening that church.

There remains the problem of ch. 15. Bishop Lightfoot (though he still maintained that 16¹⁻²³ was part of the original letter) thought it probable that Paul, having written and sent the Epistle as we have it to Rome, subsequently adapted it as a letter suitable for sending to other churches by cutting out ch. 15 and 16¹⁻²³, and also the words "to Rome" in ch. 1. It is a serious objection to this theory that there is such obvious continuity of thought between ch. 14 and the opening section of ch. 15 that it is hardly credible that the writer himself would make the division at 14²³. A much more natural point would be 15²¹.

Granted that there were two recensions, a more probable theory is that put forward by Lake, namely, that the shorter one (chs. 1-14, with or without the doxology at the end of our Epistle) was the earlier, and that it was prepared as a general or circular letter for the benefit of several churches; and that at a later period Paul turned it into a letter particularly addressed to Rome by adding chs. 15 and 16¹⁻²³ and inserting the words "to Rome" in ch. 1. The continuity between chs. 14 and 15 would be simply explained if we supposed that, having read, or having had read to him, the closing portion of the earlier recension, Paul felt moved to connect the new matter with the old by a few sentences recapitulating the argument of the preceding section.

Analysis of Contents. As to the analysis of the Epistle, the common division into two parts, Doctrinal (chs. 1-11) and Practical (chs. 12-16) is unfortunate if it is allowed to obscure the complete continuity between the two. Here, as always, Paul felt and showed the interlocking of theology and ethics, of doctrine and practice.

I. 1-7. Introduction and Salutation.

8-17. Thanksgiving for the conversion of the Christians at Rome, leading up to the theme of the Epistle, the provision and communication of a divine righteousness.

18-32. The divine wrath is already being experienced, as may be seen in the condition of the ungodly world which has sunk deeper and deeper in moral degradation.

- II. 1-16. But the same principle applies also to the Jew, and by the same principle he also falls under condemnation.
17-29. For the Jew, no less than the Gentile, has failed to keep the Law.
- III. 1-8. Objections and difficulties which might be raised by the Jew.
9-20. Conclusion that guilt is universal, and so, therefore, the need for a divine righteousness.
21-31. How this righteousness has been secured and conveyed, "from faith to faith."
- IV. 1-25. Does not the case of Abraham point the other way? No, for his faith was manifested before he was circumcised.
- V. 1-11. Justification is to lead to peace with God, to life upon a new plane, upon which the process of salvation is to advance to completion.
12-21. The effects claimed for the obedience of Christ illustrated from the admitted effects of Adam's disobedience.
- VI. 1-14. Sin is incompatible with the new life; its dominion has been broken.
15-23. Subjection to sin is unreasonable for men who have been emancipated by Christ.
- VII. 1-6. An illustration from the obligations of marriage.
7-13. The true purpose and function of the Law.
14-25. The discord within himself, as well as between him and the Law.
- VIII. 1-11. The supremacy of the spiritual over the material.
12-17. The privileges of the Christian, Sonship and Heirship.
18-27. Even present suffering is but the condition of future glory.
28-39. The contents and certainty of the Christian hope.
- Excursus: The Problem of the Jew, chs. 9-11.
- IX. 1-13. Within Abraham's stock itself there has been selection.
14-33. Objections which might be raised by the Jew.
- X. 1-13. The simplicity and directness of the Gospel.
- 14-21. Israel cannot excuse itself as not having heard the Gospel.
- XI. 1-12. Israel's rejection neither complete nor final.
13-24. The Gentiles are seriously warned against self-complacency.
25-36. God's purpose of mercy toward all men.
- XII. 1-2. The ethical principles of salvation: general introduction.
3-21. The natural attitude of Christians to one another.
- XIII. 1-7. Christians and the State.
8-14. Love the fulfilling of the Law.
- XIV. 1-14. The duty of toleration for those of a too scrupulous conscience.
15-23. Further duty of those who are strong to abstain for love's sake, even from things permitted.
- XV. 1-7. General precepts and encouragements.
8-13. The work of Christ first for the Jew, then for the Gentile.
14-21. Direct address to the Romans; Paul's activities and success in the Gospel.
22-33. Paul's plans for the future.
- XVI. 1-2. A note commending Phœbe.
3-16. Greetings.
17-20. Sudden introduction of serious warnings.
21-23. Greetings from Paul's companions.
24-27. Doxology.

The exposition of the Epistle in the following pages follows this analysis section by section.

Literature: Useful commentaries on the English text are those by Handley Moule (in the Expositor's Bible and in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges), by A. E. Garvie (in the Century Bible) and by Bishop Gore. The last is specially to be recommended. For those who read Greek, Sanday's commentary in the International Critical Commentary is of great value. For expositions of Romans in books not strictly commentaries, see the relevant sections in Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity; Sabatier, The Apostle Paul (Eng. trans.); D. Smith, The Life and Letters of Paul; Hayes, Paul and His Epistles; C. Anderson Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul.

CHAPTER I

1-7. The Writer and Those to Whom He Writes; His Qualifications; and His Subject; the Gospel of God and Jesus Christ. "Paul

... to those [in Rome] who are beloved by God, grace be unto you and peace from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ." So runs the salutation proper. But it is expanded into a long paragraph by several additional clauses. Paul begins by presenting, as it were, his credentials to people to whom he is not personally known. He is a thrall of Christ Jesus, as Moses had been "a servant of God" (Psa. 105²⁶) and as John also calls himself (Rev. 11); the word describes an abiding inward relation of dependence and obligation. He is an apostle by calling, set apart like Jeremiah of old (Jer. 15), but set apart unto the gospel of God (15¹⁶), having had bestowed upon him the grace for apostleship, that he might bring the nations into the obedience that belongs to faith (cf. Eph. 5²⁶, "holiness which springs from truth"). He reminds those to whom he writes of their standing as Christians. They are "Christ's by calling," "beloved of God," and "God's people by calling." He prays that theirs may be the grace and the truth which have their source alike in the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ.

The emphasis upon calling is to be observed. In all cases it is "effectual calling," not merely an invitation, but one which has taken effect. Not, however, that these Christians are already saints in the modern sense of the word. Paul uses the word here, as almost always, in the sense which it has in the O.T., where it means "set apart for," or "belonging to God," "having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his." It is part of the message of the gospel that those who are "saints" in this sense will ultimately become saints in the other sense (cf. 1 Pet. 1¹⁶).

The gospel of God to which he has been set apart is something the promise of which has been revealed of old through the prophets and is found in the Scriptures of the O.T. This refers not so much to particular texts and passages as to the whole trend of prophecy in the O.T. revealing the character of God as One who will indubitably redeem his people (cf. 3²¹). The gospel of God is concerning his Son, who according to his physical constitution was descended from David, but who in accordance with the Spirit of holiness, which was his, had been instated as Son of God with power. The emphasis is upon with power (v. 4). The Son of God (8³, 3²) had lived on earth in weakness and humiliation; since the resurrection he had been manifested in power. This is in accordance with the apostle's belief that there had come to Christ at the resurrection a great accession of glory and power (Phil. 2⁹⁻¹¹). He is from henceforth Jesus Christ our Lord, bearing the name that is above every name, and receiving the homage and obedience which men otherwise owe to God alone.

In Rome (v. 7). See intro., p. 1135a,

8-17. Thanksgiving for the Conversion of the Christians at Rome; Paul's Eager Desire to Preach the Gospel at Rome also, the Gospel being Something which, so far from being Ashamed of, He is Eager to Proclaim Everywhere; for It is a Divine Force, Producing Salvation.

As in nearly all his Epistles Paul follows up the Salutation with Thanksgiving (Galatians is an exception). By the whole world he means, of course, the world as then known; but even so there is an obvious rhetorical exaggeration. (Cf. 1 Thess. 18.) At the outside it was in the lands fringing the Mediterranean that the news had spread that there were Christians in Rome. Still, the report of their "faith," their acceptance of the gospel, has gone far and wide, and fills Paul's heart with thanksgiving. This finds constant expression in his prayers. He takes God to witness of this, and also of his anxious desire to visit Rome and see them face to face. Could that take place, he might be able to bestow on them some spiritual gift, and certainly he and they would be encouraged by recognizing the true Christian character, each of the other (v. 12), and the apostle might be able to gather some harvest of souls at Rome, as he had already done in other Gentile cities.

The closing words of v. 13 make it clear that there was in the Christian Church at Rome a considerable element drawn from Gentile or heathen sources as well as Jews (see intro., p. 1135a).

Paul's debt to Christ makes him a debtor (v. 14) to men of all types, of all races. It did not matter whether they were cultured Greeks, or rough barbarians, learned or ignorant, he was ready to preach to all. Neither in the presence of high culture nor before great learning was he ashamed of the gospel. For to all alike it was a Divine Force producing salvation. There he strikes the keynote of this section of the Epistle, divine righteousness, a righteousness which is characteristic of God and is by God bestowed on men.

"For therein a divine righteousness is being revealed, on the ground of faith, to faith" (v. 17). Paul here announces the theme which is to be explained and defended in 118-725, and developed in all its fullness in ch. 8. He strikes the keynote which is heard again at 3²¹, "But now apart from law a divine righteousness has been revealed," and again at 51, "Therefore being justified on the ground of faith, we have peace with God," and once more at 81, "There is now therefore no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus." These sentences, all referring to the same fact of experience, mutually illuminate one another, and taken together leave no doubt as to what the apostle meant by "the righteousness of God."

Taken by itself this very important phrase is capable of several diverse meanings, due to the versatility of the genitive in Greek. The best supported of these are (a) the righteousness of God as an abstract quality of the divine nature; (b) a righteousness valid before God, one with which God is satisfied; and (c) a righteousness which comes from God. The probability is that no one of these by itself does justice to Paul's meaning. The third, however, finds support in 10³, where Paul contrasts the righteousness of God with man's "own righteousness," and even more expressly in Phil. 3⁹, "not having my own righteousness, the righteousness which is on the ground of law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness that comes from God, resting upon faith."

What Paul has in mind, therefore, is a righteousness which is characteristic of God, which is valid before God, but which is emphatically a righteousness now being conveyed to men by God (v. 17). This is borne out by several considerations. (1) In the first place, it harmonizes with a notable usage of certain writers in the O.T., according to which the righteousness of God is brought into close connection and parallelism with the salvation of men. Thus we have in Psa. 98², "The Lord hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he openly shewed in the sight of the nations"; Isa. 56¹, "My salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed" (cf. also Psa. 35²⁴, 28 Isa. 62¹). The Jews looked on the righteousness of God in a very practical way. It was something that was to be shown, displayed, vindicated, in the deliverance or salvation of his people. It was conceived as something bound up in his faithfulness to his promises, and so with the salvation he had promised. (2) Secondly, this accords with the true meaning of the words which follow. This divine righteousness "is being revealed" in the sense that God's righteousness is being demonstrated in the salvation of his people, but it is being so revealed because it is reaching his people in the form of salvation. That which had formed a principal element in the Jewish hope of the future was already, in a far higher form, being manifested in the experience of those who believed on Christ. For this interpretation of the phrase alone admits of a satisfactory explanation of the words from faith to faith (A.V.). Other explanations, such as "starting from a smaller quantity of faith to produce a larger," or "everything is of faith from first to last," are obviously inadequate. The words mean "on the ground of faith and to faith," the verb ("is revealed," A.V.) involving the idea of conveying or communicating. (3) Finally, no other interpretation makes the quotation from Habakkuk relevant to the foregoing statement. As spoken by the prophet the words had meant that the just should escape, save his life, by his faith or faithfulness. For Paul to live meant to be saved in a higher sense. But the quotation loses all point unless what it illustrates is a statement to the effect that a man is or can be saved. We may paraphrase v. 17, therefore, thus: "For therein [in the Gospel] a Divine righteousness, no merely human one, is being communicated to faith on the ground of faith."

18-32. The Coming of a Divine Righteousness Illustrated by the Present Manifestation of the Divine Wrath. The paragraph falls into three sections dealing successively with the responsibility of men for their refusal to recognize the being and the demands of God (vv. 18-23), and with the progressive judgments by which they had in consequence been visited (vv. 24-27; 28-32).

The proof of the arrival of divine righteousness must of necessity be mainly internal and spiritual. It is otherwise with the operation of the divine wrath, the effects of which are only too open to observation. By the Wrath (35 59 121⁹ Eph. 5⁶, etc.) Paul does not mean anger as the continuous reaction of God against sin so much as the expected letting loose of that anger at the Judgment. The Jewish expectation of the future included not only righteousness—salvation—for some, but the manifestation of the Wrath, a day of judgment, for others. And Paul, who in v. 17 has proclaimed that the one is already, through Christ, within reach of men, claims as a proof of it that the Wrath also has moved forward so as to come within the range of present experience, as may be seen from the punishments which godless men are undergoing (see p. 846b).

For they are responsible for their godlessness. Even apart from revelation, such as has been enjoyed by the Jews, men can have a sufficient knowledge of God to act upon it. Paul here claims—indeed, asserts—the possibility of a natural religion. Men, however (he is thinking of the Gentiles), have been wilfully blind to the evidences of God, and have refused to render him either glory or thanks. They have suppressed living truth with iniquity, so that, baffled in their speculations and darkened in their understanding, they have sunk into idolatry and substituted for the spiritual glory of God images of men or beasts or reptiles.

Wherefore (v. 24). It is important to observe that what follows is asserted to be the working of the divine judgment, the punishment of folly and sin. And the punishment takes, as so often, the form of men's being allowed to plunge deeper and ever deeper into sin. God handed them over (vv. 24, 26, 28; cf. Acts 7⁴²).

The threefold repetition of the words introduces increasingly detailed descriptions of the degradation which had fallen upon an idolatrous world. Paul is keenly aware of the close connection of religion and morality, of idolatry and immorality. Having emphasized their connection in vv. 25, 26, he proceeds to show how the immorality takes concrete form in sexual enormities, such as are condemned not only by the revealed religion of the Jews but by the common judgment of mankind (26, 27); and in the last section (vv. 28-32), pursuing the analysis still further, he gives an appalling catalogue of the types of conduct and character which have resulted from this denial of God and reckless indulgence in disgraceful passions. There has been deliberate rejection of God (v. 28), and now behold its consequences in a society in which these are the ruling dispositions, and these the prevailing types of character. The catalogue is remarkable, like similar catalogues in the N.T. (Mk. 7²⁰⁻²² Gal. 5¹⁹⁻²¹), for the way in which it condemns, along with conduct which is condemned in common by any and every moral code, dispositions, or conduct which non-Christian codes treat with indifference or altogether ignore. Of such are "envy," "feuds," "slanderers," "insolent," "supercilious," "callous," "ruthless."

When these are studied (along with the parallels above mentioned) two inferences occur. The one is that Christianity involves a positive, comprehensive and high ideal of character very different from that which results from the mere avoidance of that which is forbidden; and the other that by laying a ban on these and such-like tempers and dispositions God has taken the human personality in all its aspects and in all its relations under his protection. "They that behave in such ways are worthy of death."

CHAPTER II

1-16. The Application of the Principle to the Jew, and His Condemnation Thereby. The Jew may be supposed to have been listening with much complacency to this indictment of the heathen society in the midst of which he dwelt, its idolatries and its immoralities. Paul now turns suddenly round upon him (cf. Amos 2⁶), and (without naming him, until v. 9) declares that he also has no defense.

The Jew is misled by two things. (1) One is the very kindness and forbearance of God who "is not swift to mark iniquity," to visit unrighteous men with final retribution. The Jew failed to read the purpose of that forbearance, which was intended to lead him to repentance (v. 4). He was apt to trace it to some good qualities in himself. It is true that the Jew does enjoy special privileges (31. 2). But these do not release him from moral obligation. On the contrary, the Jew no less than the heathen has to face the Day of Judgment, and, so far as the goodness of God is not leading him to repentance, he is actually accumulating against himself the divine wrath which will then burst forth (v. 5). Every man will then be judged according to his deeds. The classification will then be not Jew and Gentile, but those who have done evil and those who have done good. Eternal life will be the portion of those who have shown steadfastness in well-doing, wrath and indignation that of those who, acting in a hireling spirit, have yielded themselves to iniquity (vv. 7, 8). The hireling spirit is the spirit of those who serve God for wages, for reward, taking a mean view of their relation to God (cf. 6²³). The same thought is repeated with yet greater emphasis in the two following verses.

(2) Paul next touches on the second mistake which the Jews are making. "There is no favoritism with God" (v. 11). It is true that he has "loved Jacob," chosen Israel, bestowed special privileges on the Jews. But to infer from that that they or their forefathers deserved this favor of God, or that they were in any sense free from the moral requirements which God laid upon the heathen, was to make a fatal mistake. There is no such distinction as the Jew imagines. The Law, though it is a mark of his privilege, is at the same time that by which he will be judged, as certainly as the heathen will be judged to whose case the written Law cannot be applied, because to him it has not been revealed. Even Gentiles, who are assumed to be without law, do in some measure recognize what God requires of men, and so "are a law unto themselves," or, as Paul puts it in v. 26, "they observe the just requirements of the law" (cf. 9³⁰). They do to some extent conform to what is demanded by the written Law. This they do by nature, which does not mean "by their own unassisted powers, without the help of God," but "without the help of any special revelation."

Such Gentiles have the witness of their own consciences to the fact that they do obey an unwritten law (v. 15) when their thoughts coming to light in mutual discussion pronounce either a favorable or an unfavorable verdict on their conduct. These verses (14, 15) either represent a long parenthesis, or v. 16 has become displaced (so Moffatt), and should be read after v. 13. In any case, it carries on the thought of that verse, and its reference to the Judgment. It was no novelty in Paul's Christian message that God would judge the secret conduct of men, for that was understood by the Jews. What was new in his message was that the Judgment would be carried out by Christ, acting as the Representative of God (2 Cor. 5¹⁰; cf. Mt. 25^{31f.}).

It is interesting to compare the apostle's opinion of the non-Jewish world and the possibility of Gentiles either doing right or receiving credit for it with the opinions which were current in orthodox Jewish circles. There even good works and a good life were pronounced valueless in one who was uncircumcised. If such an one prays to Jehovah, his prayer is not answered. If he commits sin and repents, that does not help him. No virtue is of value in the sight of God unless the man who practices it is a Jew by circumcision. Compared with such opinions which prevailed in his time, Paul's view is much more liberal. He predicts "glory and honor and peace" for everyone who does good, no matter whether he be Jew or Gentile (v. 10). How far he would carry the same principle in reference to Christians and non-Christians is difficult to say. "Between 118 and 320 Paul has nothing to say about Christians." His attention throughout this passage is concentrated upon the Jew, his difficulty in understanding his own need of a divine righteousness, his objections based upon the privileges of the chosen people and on the classical case of Abraham. What the apostle has to say about the fate of the Gentiles is drawn from him by the necessity of insisting that Jews and Gentiles will be judged on the same principles. It does not follow, however, that he would regard these principles as invalid when the heathen came to be contrasted with Christians. He is quite definite in asserting that "all of us [Christians] must appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each may receive the things he has done with his body . . . whether good or evil" (2 Cor. 5¹⁰). And no doubt he would hold that the heathen also are to be recompensed according to the good they have done as well as according to the evil, having, in varying degrees, the light of conscience for their use of which they may fairly be judged.

17-29. The Inconsistency and Danger of the Jew. Paul now presses home upon the Jew (who is now directly addressed for the first time) the inconsistency between his religious claims and the breaches of divine law of which he is guilty, and shows that these claims lose all validity when they are not connected with righteous living.

He begins by setting out in a long list the grounds on which the Jew bases his confidence in God (vv. 17-20). He relies on the Law; he prides himself in God; he flatters himself that he "distinguishes the things that matter" in religion. Some of the phrases which follow ("a light to those who are in the dark," "the trainer of those without wisdom," "the instructor of infants") may echo the actual language of complacent Judaism proclaiming its superiority to the Gentiles.

The long sentence breaks off unfinished (v. 20). The charge has developed on lines which are too general. It is to be made as personal as may be. The irony becomes scathing. Glaring types of inconsistency are pilloried, theft and adultery by men who actually teach the Ten Commandments. The reference to the robbing of heathen temples is not uncalled for. There is an allusion to the practice in Acts 19³⁷, and also in Josephus. Here, however, it seems unnecessary, being covered by the general reference to theft; it has, moreover, the appearance of an anticlimax. That appearance is removed, however, when we recognize that this particular type of offense reveals something more than readiness to flout a written law. When he who loathes idols (v. 22) enriches himself by robbing their temples, he displays a want of religious good feeling, a flippant recklessness, which is an even truer index of character than the actual breach of written law. Compare the charge laid by Amos against Moab that he "burned the bones of the king of Edom to lime" (21). Such action belongs to a type which Paul stigmatizes as what is "unseemly," "not fitting"; and it is covered by the word translated foolishness in the list of things which, according to our Lord, "defile a man," i.e., disqualify him for fellowship with God. The quotation from Isaiah (52⁵) in v. 24 is taken not from the Hebrew but from the LXX, which by inserting "because of you" changes a charge against the oppressor of Israel into one against Israel itself.

V. 25 is important for our estimate of Paul and his teaching. "Circumcision has its value," if it is accompanied by obedience; on the other hand, willful transgression actually cancels it. Paul is no violent revolutionary. He recognizes value even in the ceremonial Law, at least for the Jew, as well as validity for the contents of the moral law (Rom. 7¹²). This must be borne in mind when we find him proclaiming that Christ is "the end of the law" (104). By that he meant that the legal system had been superseded as a means of obtaining righteousness. But the contents of the moral law remained as a guide to those who through faith in Christ had exchanged a legal for a filial relation to God. And, for a Jew, even circumcision was not without value, provided he held it in due subordination to moral effort and achievement—a position which is not without its bearing on the apostle's estimate of the sacraments, and particularly of baptism. That also had its value; but it was an ancillary one (v. 27). So far was the absence of circumcision in a good-living Gentile from disqualifying him from religious privileges, that he would actually sit as judge over him who in spite of having both a written code and circumcision showed himself a transgressor of the Law.

The closing verses (28, 29) sum up the thought of the paragraph in terms of a metaphor which had been current since the time of Deuteronomy (10¹⁶; cf. Jer. 44 9²⁶ Ezek. 44⁹), when the people had been called on to circumcise their heart; i.e., no longer to be content with outward circumcision, but to cleanse their hearts and purify their wills. It is the first appearance in the Epistle of the idea of a spiritual Israel, one whose qualifications are not racial or ritual but moral and religious.

CHAPTER III

1-8. Possible Objections and Difficulties.

Here, as not infrequently, Paul shows himself singularly sensitive to what may be going on in the minds of those whom he is seeking to convince. It is possible, of course, that some of the objections with which he proceeds to deal had actually occurred to his own mind when he was facing the implications of salvation by faith. The arguments and counter-arguments are best brought out by a paraphrase. If all this is true, says the Jew, then what advantage has the Jew over the Gentile? "Much advantage in every way," replies Paul; "first of all, the Jew has been intrusted with the utterances of God, including the promises to Israel." "Exactly," answers the Jew (v. 3), "but are you not arguing that because some Jews have been guilty of bad faith, their bad faith overturns the faithfulness of God, causing him to depart from his promises?" "By no means," says Paul (v. 4). "If it comes to a question of the truthfulness of God, that would not be affected though every man were false. What does the Psalm say?" "Well, then," replies the Jew, "that means that our want of righteousness serves to throw into relief the righteousness of God. Is it not, then, unjust in God to punish us for that, by bringing on the Judgment?" To which Paul answers: "I was speaking as a man may. Of course not;

God cannot be unjust, for, if so, how is he to judge the world?" (V. 6.) "Nevertheless," persists the Jew (v. 7), "as you say the effect of my falsity is to enhance the truthfulness of God and so promote his glory, why am I to be haled to judgment as a sinner? And is it not a natural inference that we may do evil that good may come?" (v. 8)—"as, indeed," so Paul adds here on his own account, "we are insultingly accused of saying. People whose reasoning leads to a conclusion like that deserve the condemnation which falls upon them."

It may be felt that not all the apostle's arguments are as conclusive as we could wish, and the closing words of the paragraph may strike us as almost the abandonment of argument. But it is not so. Paul, whether he was arguing with himself or with some imagined opponent, felt that the case put up for the defense of the Jew had led step by step to a reductio ad absurdum. "If that be the issue to which your argument brings you, the suggestion that we may do evil that good may come, then the verdict of conscience is swiftly and inevitably pronounced against you, and inferentially against the whole string of arguments on which your immoral conclusion is based." Men may play with intellectual doubts and difficulties about God and his government of the world, but these questions are not to be solved by pure intellect alone. When reasoning on these subjects brings men within measurable distance of a conclusion which conscience unhesitatingly condemns, it is good evidence that the reasoning has been wrong.

9-20. Guilt is Universal, and so also the Need for a Divine Righteousness. Paul now summarizes the conclusion from the discussion which began at 1¹⁸. Confronted by the Judge who calls every man to account for the deeds done in the flesh, the Jew is not in any better position than any other man. All, whether Jew or Gentile, are under the dominion of sin, as, indeed, can be abundantly shown from the O.T. Some of the quotations are verbatim from the original; some have been slightly shortened and altered. In v. 19 the Law, as occasionally elsewhere (cf. 1 Cor. 14²¹), refers to the O.T. as a whole, including here the Psalms and Isaiah. The Jews being obviously within the ambit of the Law must accept as a description of themselves what is the judgment of the older revelation generally. In fact, the real purpose of the Law is to bring about the recognition of sin (4¹⁵ 5²⁰; cf. Gal. 3¹⁹). The conclusion of the whole matter therefore is that no human being can expect acquittal at the bar of God on the ground that he has merited it by observance of law.

21-31. How the Divine Righteousness is Secured and Conveyed. The ground is now cleared. The necessity for the coming of a divine righteousness has been shown. Paul can now return to the exposition of the theme announced in 117, namely, that, in fact, such a righteousness is being revealed. He begins by repeating it; now, as things are, under the new dispensation of Christ, the very thing which is universally required by human nature has been displayed. And it is a righteousness which has nothing to do with law; it reaches all those who believe, through their faith in Christ. It is a righteousness to which the Law and the Prophets bear witness; that is to say, it is in accordance with the whole trend of the earlier revelation, and in particular with God's repeated promise of salvation. This righteousness reaches all who have faith in Christ, for (emphasizing once more the all-important fact) all have sinned and both lack and feel the lack of the glory of God. The glory of God (v. 23) embodies a conception which, like not a few others, we find in the N.T. at the point of transition from a material to an ethical significance. In the O.T. and in the post-canonical writings it stands for the physical radiance radiating from the presence of God. It is seen resting on Sinai (Ex. 2416), over the tabernacle (Ex. 4034) or the lid of the ark (Psa. 801). A reflection of this glory was traditionally believed to have shone on the face of Adam before the Fall, but to have been lost by him after it. And post-canonical writers predicted as part of the privileges awaiting the righteous in the New Age that they would again be clothed in the glory of God. But as increasing emphasis came to be placed on the character and the ethical attributes of God his glory was interpreted in terms of his majesty and goodness. And ultimately it came to connote moral splendor of character, "full of grace and truth" (Jn. 114; cf. Eph. 16 316). It is best to regard these sentences (vv. 22b, 23) as parenthetic, and to recognize that in v. 24 Paul picks up the thread from v. 22a, and declares concerning all those who believe that they are justified freely; the righteousness which is not their own but God's is theirs, and that without price. It is theirs by the free bounty of God, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. That redemption, as we learn from other references in Paul, was deliverance from all the shifting servitudes to which man had become subject, from the domination and fear of evil spirit-forces (Gal. 43 Heb. 214), from the bondage of the Law (Gal. 45) and from the tyrannous domination of sin (Rom. 83).

So far the paragraph has dealt with the fact that a divine righteousness has been displayed and conveyed to men, so as to justify all who believe, in entire independence of the Law, and apart from any other condition except faith on the part of man and the undeserved mercy of God. This is important for the interpretation of the pregnant passage which follows.

Whom God (publicly) set forth (v. 25). It is clear that the apostle was profoundly impressed by the crucifixion as a spectacle. A description of it seems to have formed part of his proclamation of the gospel (cf. Gal. 31 1 Cor. 22). There is, indeed, something in the manner of his references to the blood of Christ which would be explained if he had been an actual witness of the scene, a mingling of horror at the fact with wonder at its meaning. Note, however, the comma which in R.V. (cf. mg.) now separates the words by faith from in his blood. It is all that a translation can do to mark the important fact that Paul does not, as the A.V. would lead us to suppose, connect the reconciling efficacy of Christ's death with "faith in his blood." There is, indeed, no case in the N.T. where "faith in" or "believe in" stands for faith in a concrete object (not even Mk. 115). It always refers to faith in a person. The words "in his blood" must therefore be connected either with propitiation, or more probably with set forth; and their meaning may be represented by such a phrase as "suffering unto blood" or "as a blood-stained victim." Christ, who is thus publicly set forth by God upon the cross, is described as one who is or who becomes through faith a propitiation. The word Paul used is itself an adjective, and the substantive "propitiation" is arrived at by supplying what seems the most natural word (if any word is to be supplied at all) namely, "sacrifice." It is, however, possible and on the whole more natural to take Paul's word as an adjective qualifying the relative "whom" (for such a combination we may compare Philm. v. 15). It would then be translated "as one having propitiatory power" (so Denney), or, if we keep close to the etymological meaning of the word, "one with power to restore friendly relations."

The traditional interpretation of v. 25 is not obscurely indicated in R.V., which substitutes because of the passing over of sins done aforetime for the A.V. "for the remission of sins that are past." And it comes out even more clearly in the rendering of Moffatt's translation, "in view of the fact that sins formerly committed during the time of God's forbearance had been passed over." It is further emphasized by the use of the word shew (Moffatt, "demonstrate") in place of the word "declare." The meaning of the verse according to this interpretation is that in order to demonstrate his own righteousness, which had been impugned in consequence of his overlooking sins in the past, God set forth his Son as a propitiatory sacrifice to satisfy his justice, and so to manifest his righteousness even when he treated as righteous those who were sinners.

The traditional interpretation is, however, not the only one which is possible, and it is doubtful whether it is the right one. The chief reasons are as follows. (1) It involves the assumption that hitherto God had conspicuously failed to punish sin, and so to manifest his righteousness. For this there is only very inadequate support in Scripture, and, on the contrary, there is much evidence that in all periods God was understood to punish the sins both of the Jews and of the Gentiles. (2) It involves the assumption that God's righteousness had in consequence been challenged or impugned. Of this there is no evidence. (3) It involves a sudden change in this verse of the meaning attached to the "righteousness of God," and the introduction of a meaning different from that in which the apostle has been employing it from 1¹⁷ onward. It is righteousness as an abstract quality of the divine nature which is understood to have been challenged, and now to be demonstrated, whereas Paul is interested in it, mainly if not wholly, as a quality of the divine nature which reaches men in the form of justification or salvation. (4) The "propitiation" provided by the sacrifice of Christ must be understood to be absolute, something independent of any condition provided by man. Yet the words "by faith" clearly suggest that it is something conditioned by faith on man's side. To explain that it was something absolute in reference to God though conditioned in the experience of man would be to read into the simple words more than they will bear. (5) The word "display" ranges with "is being revealed" (1¹⁷) and "has been manifested" (3²¹) as referring to a manifestation of divine righteousness which makes its arrival in the experience of men. It is a "display" which has for its result what is experience in 8¹, "there is now no condemnation to those that are in Christ Jesus." (6) The words translated "because of the passing over of sins done aforetime" do not necessarily refer to a passing over aforetime; they may equally well mean "with a view to the passing over now" (so Lietzmann).

A survey of the whole verse in its context suggests that the O.T. analogue which was before Paul's mind was not any of the Levitical sacrifices but the brazen serpent (Num. 21^{4f.}). Moses at the command of God lifted up the serpent on a pole. So was the Son of man lifted up, set forth upon the cross by God. The serpent was itself a visible likeness of the evil from which Israel was suffering. So Christ was made "in the likeness of sin's flesh," "was made sin for us," identified (short of consent to it) with the root-evil of human experience. The children of Israel were called on to gaze upon the symbol of their enemy, to see it vanquished. Men were called on to behold Christ crucified, to see in his death the doom of sin, and the demonstration of the love and mercy of God, and, when they accepted the message of the cross with the hearing of faith, to find the healing of their hurt and reconciliation to God.

We may then translate or paraphrase the verse thus: "Whom God set forth a victim unto blood as one able to effect reconciliation through faith, unto the bestowal of God's righteousness, with a view to the passing over of former sins in the forbearance of God, unto the bestowal of his righteousness in this present time, that he may be himself righteous and also pronounce righteous him who founds on faith in Christ." The last words sound like a conscious echo of Isa. 45²¹ (cf. 58 2 Cor. 5¹⁹).

All human claim to merit righteousness, any claim of the kind which the Jew was in the habit of making, is then finally excluded. That Paul proceeds to speak of the law of faith (v. 27) does not mean that faith involves or imposes a law of its own. Far from it. He uses the word "law" here (as in 8² Gal 6²) in the sense of a governing principle, somewhat as we speak of the laws of nature. A man may be pronounced righteous altogether apart from the performance of any legal obligation (v. 28). That does not mean that there is no moral obligation imposed upon the Christian or to be fulfilled by him. Paul would have had no difficulty in agreeing with James that "faith without works is dead." The question for him was, and it was one of tremendous importance, Which comes first? The Jew at his best thought of himself as obeying in order to be saved. Paul's contention was, You must be saved in order to obey. So he can meet the question, whether by his doctrine of salvation by faith he is not overturning the Law, with the firm assurance that he is actually establishing the Law, not as a system for securing righteousness but as to its abiding contents. As there is only one God, he must be the God of Jews and Gentiles alike, and can deal with them only on one and the same principle; and the single principle which applies to both of them alike can be faith only (vv. 29, 30a).

CHAPTER IV

I-12. The Case of Abraham. It might be supposed that Paul had now made his point, proved the universal need of righteousness, the impossibility of man providing that righteousness for himself, and the revelation through the gospel of what alone can meet the need, a righteousness bestowed by God. He might now proceed to the triumphant exposition of "all the good things that are ours in Christ" as we find it in ch. 8, the chapter which, with the possible addition of ch. 12, represents the crowning purpose of his writing. But again his sensitiveness to the point of view of others leads to a digression. What about Abraham? Abraham was indeed, on the surface at least, a strong case for the Jew to appeal to. He was the Founder of the People, the Friend of God; and his life had been marked on more than one occasion by conspicuous obedience to the will of God. "When he was called, . . . he went out not knowing whither he went"; "when he was tried, he offered up Isaac" (Heb. 11:8, 17). And the fact that the writer to the Hebrews traces his obedience on both occasions to "faith" (though he uses the word in a different sense from that peculiar to Paul) is evidence that these works of obedience were regarded as proofs of his faith. On this it would not be difficult to found an argument that in this classical instance justification had followed on a combination of faith and works or on works alone, as, indeed, we find it in the First Book of Maccabees: "Was not Abraham found faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness?" (Cf. Jas. 2:21, 22.) Paul faces the possibility of such an argument, and admits, If Abraham was, as perhaps you say, justified on the ground of merit, then, of course, he had a ground of claim (contradicting 3:27). But it cannot be really so from the point of view of God; for Scripture itself connects his justification with his faith, and says nothing about his works. Indeed, the text tacitly excludes any question of merit. For if justification was granted in answer to faith, it was granted out of grace and not as something which had been earned. The text in Genesis could in fact apply only to a case where all idea of earning righteousness by merit had been abandoned (v. 5). The verses quoted from Psa. 32 are relevant in so far as their silence as to any condition on the side of man suggests that the divine forgiveness was unconditioned, in other words, of grace.

Paul now takes a further point (v. 10). He raises the question, At what period in Abraham's history was he thus reckoned or acknowledged to be righteous? Was it before or after his being circumcised? This was of crucial importance because the typical illustration of "works of the law" at least on its ceremonial side was circumcision. It was the ceremony of ritual purification by submitting to which the Jew became "a debtor to do the whole law" (Gal. 3:10); he placed himself upon a footing of compact with God. Had the acknowledgment of Abraham's righteousness been made after his circumcision, it would have been possible to argue that the keeping of the Law was at least included in the conditions of his justification. But exactly the reverse was the case. It was while he was as yet uncircumcised that he was acknowledged to be righteous. And, in fact, his circumcision was a sign or seal placed upon that righteousness which was already his by faith. He is therefore the prototype ("father") of those Gentiles who believe though not circumcised, and are therefore justified; as he is also the prototype of those (Jews) who do not rest on their circumcision (cf. 2:17) but imitate the faith which he displayed while still uncircumcised.

These verses have an important bearing on a theory which has often been advanced in some quarters with great confidence. The theory is that Paul taught a "sacramental religion" in the sense that for him the sacraments were not merely "efficacious signs," granted to and strengthening faith which had already provided the sufficient condition of salvation, but did actually and in themselves (ex opere operato) secure and convey the bestowal of the new birth or of immortality. In this way Paul is understood to have metamorphosed the Christianity of Jesus and given it the character of the Greco-Oriental mystery-cults (see p. 851). There are many reasons for regarding this theory as unproven and unsound; but these verses in themselves are sufficient to show the unsoundness. The Christian analogue to circumcision is, of course, baptism as a rite symbolizing purification and admission to the redeemed community. And there can be no doubt that all Paul had to say about circumcision he would say equally about baptism. Like circumcision, baptism "had its value" (2:25), but, like circumcision, it had no value except for a new creature.

13-17. A Third Point: Abraham's Stock Universal and Spiritual. The argument here becomes difficult to follow. The clue to it is at the end (vv. 16, 17), where Paul quotes Gen. 17:5, "a father of many nations have I made thee," and draws the inference that Abraham is "the father of us all," i.e., of all of us believers, whether Jews or Gentiles. It followed that some (the Gentiles) must be his "descendants" not in the physical sense but in a spiritual; and the inheritance which was to be shared by all alike must devolve on the principle of grace (not "compact"), on the ground of faith (not the keeping of the Law), if the promise was to be fulfilled as it was made "to all his stock" (v. 16). This repeats only more clearly what has been said in v. 13, where the emphasis is on to his stock. If it were to be such as founded on the Law who were to be heirs of the world, then faith would have been nullified and the promise rendered valueless. For the Gentiles, part of Abraham's stock (v. 17) were obviously unable to fulfill the condition. We find here again the idea of a second Israel, Israel according to the spirit contrasted with Israel according to the flesh. V. 15 is a parenthesis pointing out how different is the function of the law from that of faith. Its ultimate effect is to produce wrath; for only when there is law is there also contravention of law or transgression, such as produces wrath in God (513, 20 Gal 319).

18-25. How Abraham Manifested His Faith.

At the close of the last paragraph Paul has touched upon the particular circumstances in which Abraham displayed his faith, his acceptance of God's word in connection with the promise that he should have a son even in his old age. God in whom he believed has been described as one who both restores the dead to life and calls non-existent things into being. And Abraham's confidence in such a God had been conspicuously manifested when he accepted the promise that his descendants would be as numerous as the stars in the sky, setting against the hope or natural expectation of man the hope which rested on the word of God. In view of the advanced age both of himself and of his wife such a prospect appeared quite hopeless. Nevertheless, his faith in God showed no weakening. When confronted by that promise he did not waver (v. 20; cf. Jas. 1⁶), but glorified God by his confidence that he would perform what he had promised. And the fact that on this occasion his faith was reckoned to him for righteousness was recorded not for his sake alone but for ours. For exactly the same principle applies now. Abraham's faith was in a God who calls non-existent things into being; ours is in a God who raised our Lord from the dead. But in our case no less than in his, faith in the same God is reckoned as a ground for being accounted righteous.

V. 25 stands somewhat apart from the line of argument which has been developed in the paragraph, rounding it off with a slightly rhetorical touch. It would be a mistake to suppose that Paul is drawing any significant distinction between the death of Christ and his resurrection in respect of the reasons for the one or the results of the other. That death and that resurrection are for him but two moments in one tremendous event.

Point of View of This Chapter. It must be remembered that throughout this chapter Paul is dealing expressly with the Jew and from the Jewish point of view. The faith of which he has been speaking is faith as the Jew understands it, faith in the sense in which it meets us in the O.T., a taking of God at his word, which involves trust in him as he is known. Now, faith in that sense is an element in Christian faith, but it is not the whole, even as the justification of which Paul speaks is not the whole consequence of faith in God as he is known to us in Christ. For he is now known not only as one who restores the dead to life, but as one who "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." And faith in consequence takes on an added quality and a new meaning. In its restricted sense it might lead to a justification which was no more than a sterile acquittal. In its expanded sense—the faith which "is made operative through love" (Gal. 5⁶)—it becomes something the effect of which does not stop short of reconciliation to God.

CHAPTER V

I-II. Justification Completed by Reconciliation. Once more Paul strikes the keynote which we have heard in 117 and 321; but now he feels himself at liberty to develop his theme. Being justified by faith, as he has shown so fully and so persuasively in the preceding chapters, let us not omit the next step; let us have peace with God. Let the effect of Christ's sacrificial death have full scope, not stopping at justification or remission of sins, but including in our experience peace with God, forgiveness in the deep sense of restoration to fellowship, reconciliation. For Christ and our faith in him are to bring us on to a new footing with God, a new platform or plane. We are to be lifted above the old level of legal compact and of servile obedience to the written code that killeth and are to rejoice in the hope of that same glory of God, the lack of which we have so deeply felt (323).

Vv. 3-5 are parenthetical. The full glory of God is not yet ours, for we are not yet fully conformed to the image of his Son. And on the other hand, tribulation is still the portion of the Christian no less than of other men (Jn. 1633 Rev. 1⁹); but in that also we can proudly rejoice. For we have in the love of God the secret of an alchemy by which tribulation is transmitted into a sure and certain hope. The steps of that process are plain to see. Tribulation produces endurance, endurance testedness, the consciousness of having been tried and having stood the test; and testedness produces hope. By hope Paul again means something other than an inclination to expect the best; it approaches very nearly to "conviction," or "faith" in the sense of the writer to the Hebrews. The fact that this hope shall not be disappointed is guaranteed by the love of God by which, through the action of the Spirit, our hearts have been flooded. Everything that happens to the Christian happens within the atmosphere of the divine love, or upon the plane of the divine grace; so that even tribulation becomes something in which we can proudly rejoice.

In v. 6 Paul picks up the thread from v. 2, and in words which speak for themselves reminds his readers of the central fact of the gospel. As Christ came "not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance," so he died for men who made no claim to righteousness. It was just conceivable that one man might be willing to die for the sake of another who was good and lovable. The wonder of divine love was that Christ died for the ungodly and the unlovable. And precisely because it was so incredible for one who knew himself to be ungodly that he should be the object of love to a holy God, the purpose of Christ's death was to confirm beyond all doubt this unbelievable fact, and not only to confirm it but to press it home upon his heart (v. 8).

Justification (v. 9) and reconciliation (v. 11) are not for Paul interchangeable terms, neither do they describe the same factors in Christian experience. They are connected with and describe different ways of regarding man's wrong relation to God. "Justification" looks at that wrong relation from a forensic point of view. Sin is transgression, violation of law. The sinner is under condemnation. He can be justified or receive "remission of sins" by the working of the sovereign will of God. He is then acquitted, pronounced not guilty or righteous. And it is conceivable that the process should stop there with the removal of guilt and condemnation. But Paul also saw more deeply into the true meaning of sin. He saw it not merely as a transgression, which could be overlooked or pardoned, but as something which vitally affected the personal relation between God's children and himself, which "estranged them from the life of God" (Eph. 4¹⁸), made them suspicious of his goodness, unbelieving of his promises, hostile to his purposes and even to himself. This was a situation which could not be dealt with even by a sovereign act of God, or by any arrangement external to the sinner himself. It called for the operation of some mighty force, whereby the sinner could be induced to throw away his hostility, his suspicion, his shrinking from God, whereby he could be not only justified but reconciled.

And Paul saw this force also in the cross. In two successive verses (8, 9) he touches on these two aspects of Christ's work in relation to sin, and emphatically connects that work in both its aspects with the death of Christ. We have been justified by his blood, or (as the preposition ought probably to be given the local sense) "in the conditions created by his death." The phrase is a highly condensed summary of what we have already had expounded in 3²⁵. God had set forth Christ as a victim unto blood, and the result to which that led was that God now justified those who founded upon faith in Christ. Much more, then, argues Paul, we shall be saved from the Wrath through him. The insertion by R.V. of the words of God, which are not in the text, obscures Paul's point, and also not unnaturally raises the question whether that is not already included in the justification. The phrase is eschatological in its outlook, and expresses the assurance that those who are justified will through Christ be saved in the Day of Judgment. But, more than that, those who, equally through his death, have been reconciled, will be saved by his life, his life as a risen and glorified Saviour. Once more Paul passes from the forensic to the ethical and the personal. Those who have been reconciled have "Christ in them the hope of glory" (Col. 1²⁷; cf. Gal. 2²⁰). He is their life (Col. 3⁴). By the power of the living Christ who dwells in them they shall be saved as they progressively approximate to the knowing and the doing of the will of God (Phil. 2¹³ Jn. 15⁵). Nay, more; not only have we this double confidence as those who have been justified and reconciled, but we pride ourselves in God (v. 11) through Jesus Christ, through whom we have received and accepted the reconciliation. The Christian "rejoices or prides himself in God" even as the Jew does (2¹⁷), but with new and far better reason.

12-21. Effect of Christ's Obedience Illustrated by the Effect of Adam's Disobedience. Once more the clue to a somewhat complicated argument is found in a clear summary of it toward the end of the paragraph. There v. 18 may be rendered, "so then, as one man's transgression resulted in condemnation passed upon all men, so did the righteous act of one result for all men in a righteousness which leads to life." The first of these statements Paul takes for granted; it embodies an opinion which had come to prevail among the Jews as to the consequences entailed upon all his descendants by the disobedience of Adam. Upon that accepted proposition Paul bases his inference as to the participation by all who are by faith united to Christ in the consequences of his obedience. But the working out of the argument suffers in clearness, first, from the necessity he feels to distinguish between those who lived before and those who lived after the giving of the Law as to the nature of their responsibility; secondly, by his desire to show that the effect of Christ's obedience is not only parallel to that of Adam's disobedience but vastly greater (vv. 15–17), and, thirdly, by his failure to complete the opening sentence.

In v. 12 Paul is thinking of sin as an external force, quasi-personal and active prior to any lodgment it acquires in human nature. The disobedience of Adam has opened the door for the entrance of this hostile force into humanity. And through the door thus opened has passed Death, also conceived as an external force, one of the spirit-forces of evil (cf. 1 Cor. 15⁵⁶, where death is represented as using sin as a sting wherewith to stab men). And so death passed upon all men, all men became subject to it. It is true, as is commonly said, that Paul has not before his mind the distinction we commonly draw between physical death and spiritual death. He is thinking of death in all its forms and manifestations. But the emphasis here at least is upon death as the cutting off of human life from God. This is seen when we come to vv. 17 and 21, and find that the condition introduced by Christ which counteracts this death, and operates on the same principle, is a condition of life, meaning not physical life, but life that is "eternal." It is further borne out by the passage in 77-11, where the parallelism of thought, though not exact, is sufficiently clear. "Sin sprang to life, and I died," obviously not in the sense of natural death. Compare also, "ye who were dead in your trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2¹). Death in every sense had imposed itself upon all men, for that all sinned (v. 12). This is the right translation, the rendering in the Latin Vulgate ("in whom, scil. in Adam, all sinned") being one which has had unfortunate results in Christian theology. But the phrase is not adducing the reason why death passed upon all men; that has already been given earlier in the verse. "Inasmuch as all sinned" calls attention to the fact as proof of the statement that moral death had seized mankind. Sin was thus in the world, lodged in human nature prior to the giving of the Law; but it was not reckoned (cf. 7⁸⁵); men were held responsible for conforming to such moral principles as were within their knowledge (2¹²); but they were not condemned as violators of a written code. Nevertheless, they were under the rule of death, even though they had not, like Adam, broken an express command. Their universal experience of being under the dominion of death was due to their connections with Adam; and in that he was a type of the Christ who was to come. For the bond with him which it was for faith to establish would secure for them, apart from any personal deserts, the reversal of the condition of death and the righteousness which leads to life.

But the case of Adam and the consequences entailed upon his descendants by his act of disobedience, though a good illustration, is, after all, an inadequate one (vv. 15f.). The gift which comes to men through Christ's supreme act of obedience is of transcendent scope. (Moffatt's translation should be consulted here.) It counterbalances not only the single transgression of the one man Adam but all the transgressions of all individual men since Adam. If it was due to the transgression of one man that death reigned over human nature, how much more certain was it, not merely that life should now reign, but (with a striking breach of the parallelism) those who accepted the free and abounding gift of righteousness should themselves reign in life. Having summed up the argument of the paragraph in v. 18, Paul repeats it in a slightly different form, one which further illuminates his point of view. The transgression of Adam is now clearly defined as his disobedience, and the righteous act of Christ as his obedience; and the results in both cases are that the rest of men receive a certain status, in the one case the status of sinners, in the other the status of righteous. The imagery is wholly forensic. If we may not say that the ideas of personal moral guilt and of personal moral righteousness are absent, they are at least far in the background. Paul is thinking of the relation of men to God in terms of a status into which they had been introduced, in the one case by the transgression of Adam, in the other by Christ's great act of obedience, but in both cases the status is something to be voluntarily accepted. Once more (v. 20) he touches on the function of the Law (cf. 3²⁰ 4¹⁵ 7⁸, 10, 12 Gal. 3¹⁹); it is to bring transgressions to light in all their copiousness, to show that men have not only the status of sinners but the habit of sinning, in order that for the reign of sin in death might be substituted the rule of grace which leads to eternal life through Jesus Christ (v. 21).

CHAPTER VI

1-14. Sin Incompatible with the New Life.

A new question, though one of the same class as 3^{6a}. If the result of sin is to give opportunity for the manifestation of God's abundant grace, does it not follow that we should continue in the practice of sin? It is a captious question, yet Paul deals with it seriously, for it gives him the opportunity of showing the indissoluble connection between the experience of the believer in Christ and a life of purity and high moral endeavor. There is, indeed, he suggests, something irrational in the idea that Christians should live under the power of sin, because they have already died to sin (v. 2). The significance of this important phrase is to be learned from v. 10. Christ when he died, died to sin. The thought springs out of Paul's conviction as to the reality and the completeness of the resurrection. Christ came "in the flesh," "born of a woman," truly and completely man. And the flesh in which he came was sin's flesh (cf. v. 6, 83); that is to say, it was the human constitution of man, as that had come to be since Adam's transgression, an appanage of sin. This "flesh" or physical constitution of man, like everything else that God made, had originally been "good." But historically it had come to belong to sin (51²), to be under sin's dominion (71⁴). And Christ, being truly in the flesh as it had then come to be, felt the full force of sin's power, the full brunt of its attack. His experience of sin was in all respects identical with that of man, save in one respect, namely, that he never consented to it (2 Cor. 52¹). Among the things which happened at his death upon the cross was this, that he stripped the flesh from off himself (Col. 21⁵) and in so doing escaped from the power of sin; in fact, "died to it." And the faith by which men were united to Christ was of such a character that they too died to sin, died from under its authority, were henceforth free from its dominion. But Christ not only died but rose again, rose to live unto God (v. 10). And, once more, faith-union with him had a similar result for those who believed. They were made alive "together with Christ" (Col. 21³). They had passed through an experience which made it simply irrational to continue under the power of sin.

Now, of this experience Paul saw a vivid picture in baptism. Those who had gone down beneath the waters of some pool had in their memories an acted picture of having died, even been buried with Christ; and the emergence from the water which followed was an unforgettable witness to the fact that they had become partakers of the higher life; they were alive unto God. For (v. 5) introduces further confirmation of what has gone before. What follows is an attempt to bring out the same double truth by means of another metaphor, one which we find more fully developed in Jn. 151¹. It is a vital union in which Christians are united to Christ, a union like that of the branches with the vine; and if they have shared in his experience of dying to sin they must share in his experience of new life. "If we have grown into him by a death like his, we shall grow into him by a resurrection like his" (Moffatt). "Union with Christ at one point (his death) is union with him altogether (and therefore in his resurrection)" (Denney). But (this metaphor not proving plastic in his hands) Paul goes on to add a third, our old man was crucified with him (v. 6; cf. Gal. 22⁰ Eph. 422). The experience into which we have entered corresponds to that of Christ upon the cross; there he died to the dominion of sin, inasmuch as the body which belonged to sin was destroyed; and that also is the result of our being crucified with him. To have carried through this metaphor consistently Paul should have pointed out that for us also as well as for Christ this "crucifixion" was followed by entrance into a higher life. But he changes the form of the thought and expresses the ultimate consequence of the faith-union in terms of freedom from servitude to sin. In v. 7 he is probably quoting a proverbial Jewish saying, one which corresponds to our "death clears all scores." It is hardly to be supposed that he means that death itself procures the remission of sins, as R. V. would suggest. Both words, "sins" and "justified," must be understood in a rigidly concrete and forensic sense. He that is dead has received a quittance from Sin; he has escaped from Sin's jurisdiction. In v. 6, body of sin means body that belongs to Sin; cf. 72⁴, "body that belongs to Death," and 83, "flesh that belongs to Sin." V. 8 repeats in plain language the truth which is illustrated by these metaphors, at the same time throwing the emphasis of the life-experience into the future; we believe that we shall live with him. This does not throw any doubt on the conviction hitherto expressed that the life will continue and be perfected in eternity. Deliverance from the power of Sin implies deliverance from the rule of Death. It is for Christians to hold firmly to the lesson of their experience that they are now dead to sin and alive unto God through Jesus Christ (v. 11).

We should note in this paragraph the variety of metaphors which Paul employs to illustrate the double experience of dying to sin and living again to God: (a) baptism, in which they pictorially die and are buried with Christ; (b) the vital union of the parts of a tree; and (c) crucifixion itself. Under each of these figures Paul attempts to visualize the completeness of the union with Christ which faith effects, and that not only in general but in the particular aspects of union with him in his death to sin and his living to God. It was possible to visualize all these illustrations, and to convey them by the use of metaphorical language. But only one of them, namely, baptism, was it possible to pictorialize in action. The symbolism of the others was necessarily confined to words. But the way in which Paul brings them together in this passage illustrates the fact that baptism also was a symbol. It was a symbol in action, but did not otherwise differ from the rest. That is to say, there is no indication here that Paul understood that the rite of baptism in itself conferred any new status, or the new life. It was a word made visible, a seal and symbol of the fact that the believers had already through faith been united to Christ in his death and in his life.

In v. 12 Paul turns from argument to precept. He has refuted the objection raised in v. 1. It is for the Christians to whom he writes to put in action the conclusion he has established, to refuse any authority over themselves to Sin, to avoid any yielding to the passions of the lower nature. They are to cease using their members as instruments of wrongdoing, and to make them over to God as instruments of righteousness; Sin is no longer to lord it over them. The word righteousness (v. 13) appears to be used here (possibly for the first time) to describe not status before God but righteousness of conduct and character. These closing verses also introduce us to the paradox which Paul neither fails to perceive nor shrinks from stating, the paradox of a salvation which is real and complete at the moment of believing and yet requires to be worked out with fear and trembling. However real may be the experience of having died with Christ, the old man is not wholly dead. Christians are still in the flesh, "in the world" though not "of the world." Those who are dead to Sin have to guard against the revival of Sin's tyranny. What makes all the difference is that they start by being reconciled to God.

15-23. Subjection to Sin is Unreasonable for Men Who are Free in Christ. Paul now urges the same argument from a slightly different angle. It is contrary to reason that those who have been made free by Christ should be subjects of Sin; alternatively, there has been a change of masters, and the very subjection to Sin which Christians have known in the past is to be from henceforth the measure of their subjection to Christ now.

The thought that Sin is no longer to lord it over them has led him at the end of the last paragraph to proclaim: "Ye are no longer under law, but under grace. But"—to paraphrase the fuller explanation of this in vv. 15-23—"the Law forbade sin. Are Christians, therefore, to sin because they are no longer under the dominion of the Law? Not at all. Remember that to whomsoever you yield yourselves as submissive thralls, whether it be Sin or whether it be God to whom you yield obedience, the submission is complete. And there can be no doubt in your case. For God be praised that when you were thralls of Sin you gave heart-felt allegiance to the form of teaching to which you were committed. I am using human language because of the weakness of your human nature. For just as you had yielded your members to serve impurity and lawlessness, so now you have yielded them to serve righteousness that you might become holy. At the time when you were thralls of Sin, righteousness had no control over you. Now, what kind of harvest did you reap then? Nothing but what now fills you with shame. For what these things lead to is death. But now that you have been freed from the dominion of Sin and made thralls of God, you are finding your harvest in holiness, and what lies before you is eternal life. For the wage paid by Sin is death, whereas the free gift of God is eternal life."

The three-fold contrast in v. 23 is very impressive. There is the contrast between the two masters, Sin and God; the contrast between the two terms of engagement, contract issuing in wages paid and grace issuing in a gift freely bestowed; and the contrast between the things a man ultimately receives, death and eternal life.

CHAPTER VII

1-6. An Illustration From the Obligations of Marriage. "It is only when a man is alive that he is subject to law. You, to whom I write, know this, for you are familiar with the Law. So, for example, a married woman is bound by law to her husband so long as he is alive. But if the husband die, she is released from the husband-law (the law concerning husband and wife). So long, therefore, as he is alive, she will be reckoned an adulteress if she passes over to another man. But should he die, she is exempted from that law, so that she does not become an adulteress by belonging to another man."

Up to this point (v. 4) it is the wife who being released by the death of her husband provides an illustration of the Christian's emancipation. Here, however, the illustration becomes somewhat confused. We should expect Paul to draw the inference that the Law being dead, Christians are exempt from its authority. But for that he substitutes the idea that Christians have died to the law. It is by the body of Christ that they have so died, i.e., by the death of Christ and their participation in it; for he died to the Law in the same way as he died unto sin. But if the Christian thus owes his release from the Law to the death of Christ, the result of that release is to bring him into a new relation with the risen and living Christ.

Thus we may paraphrase: "In the same manner you also through the death of Christ have been released from the Law; you have been made dead to it, so that you now belong to another, to him who was raised from the dead, in order that the harvest of our lives might be for God. For when we lived on the material plane, the passions which lead to sinful acts, being stimulated by the Law (v. 7), were active in our members, so that the harvest of our lives was a harvest for death. But now we have been released from the Law, having died to that wherein we were once imprisoned, so that our service is rendered now within the sphere of spirit and not of a written code."

7-13. The Purpose and Function of the Law. Paul has already touched more than once the question, What was the function of the Law? It "produces wrath" (4¹⁵). It has been introduced in order that transgressions may abound (5²⁰; cf. Gal. 3¹⁹). But what he has just written, proclaiming triumphantly that Christians are dead to the Law, raises the question in an acute form, especially as he has already shown that they are dead to Sin. He seems, therefore, to have brought the Law into the same category as Sin itself, inviting the question, Is the Law Sin? To which he answers: "Not at all. It was only through the Law that I came to a knowledge of Sin. If it were not that the Law said, 'Thou shalt not covet,' I would not have known wrong desire. But Sin (personified as before) seized the opportunity which the Law offered, and produced all manner of evil desire in me. So long as there is no law, sin is dead or dormant (cf. 4¹⁵ 5¹³). So I lived at one time independent of law, innocent in a sense but only because ignorant of God's will. But when I became acquainted with the commandment, Sin sprang to life and I died (cf. 5¹²). And so the commandment which was intended to lead to the higher life, actually led in my case to death. For Sin, seizing the opportunity offered by the commandment, deceived me (as the Serpent deceived Eve), and slew me. But this was no part of the original purpose of the Law. And in spite of the use which Sin has made of it, it remains true that the Law is holy, that is, belongs to God; and the commandment is holy and just and good."

NOTE ON PAUL AND THE LAW

Paul has been accused of glaring inconsistency in his language about the Law and in his practical relation to it. On the one hand he asserts its divine origin and character, its high ethical quality, as in v. 12, and its function as a tutor to bring men to Christ (Gal. 3²⁴), and he sometimes practices some of those ceremonial requirements which we should expect to be the first to be abrogated (Acts 16³ 18¹⁸ 21^{18f.}). On the other hand he appears to reckon the Law among the spiritual foes of man; it is something to which Christians have to die as they die unto Sin; and "Christ is the end of law for righteousness to everyone that believes" (10⁴). The inconsistency is, however, more apparent than real. It disappears when we recognize the distinction which was clearly present to the apostle's mind. That is the distinction between the Law as a system whereby the Jews had learned to expect that they could establish a claim upon God's favor, could earn his forgiveness and secure a righteousness of their own, and the Law as the expression of the moral ideals which God set before his people. We must remember also that in recent generations the Law as a whole had been exalted into a kind of palladium of the Jewish race, having an intrinsic supernatural quality which almost led to its replacing God. It was the Law in this aspect, and especially as a system in which men trusted to establish a righteousness of their own, that Paul dreaded, criticized, and proclaimed to have come to an end in Christ. Yet he saw it as something which had been perverted from its original purpose, though something which had not lost its original character. And even for the ceremonial law or some parts of it he retained a genuine respect ("circumcision has its value" 2²⁵), even as he continued to regard the moral ideals of the Law as valid, provided always the observance of neither the one nor the other was understood to establish a claim upon God. The Jew thought that if he kept the Law he would be saved. Paul taught that man must be saved in order to keep the Law (see above, notes on 3²⁷⁻³⁰).

14-25. The Discord within Himself as Well as the Discord Between Himself and the Divine Law. Was it possible that this thing so good in itself had produced this result, that Paul found himself "dead in trespasses and sins"? Not at all. Once more it was Sin that was responsible. Sin had made use of this good thing to produce that death, so that its sinful character might be abundantly manifest through the commandment. "For we know that the Law belongs to the world of spirit; but I am a creature of flesh, and one who has been sold to be a subject of Sin. I do not know my conduct for my own. For it is not what I want but what I hate that I do. And as things are, it is not I who do the deed, but Sin which has taken up its abode within me. For I know that there dwells in me (I mean, of course, in my corrupt nature) nothing good. I have the longing for high things, but when it comes to doing them, No! For I do not do the good thing I wish to do; rather do I do the evil thing I do not wish to do. But if this be so, then it is no longer I that do the deed, but Sin which has taken up its abode in me. This, then, is the rule that I find working, that when I wish to do right, the wrong thing lies ready to my hand. My inner man consents cordially to the law of God; but I perceive another rule in my members which is not the law of my mind but holds me captive to the law of Sin which prevails in my members. So, then, with my mind I am subject to the law of God, but with my flesh to the law of Sin. [This last sentence, v. 25b, appears to have got displaced, and should probably be placed here after v. 23.] Unhappy man that I am! who shall deliver me from this body which belongs to death? God can; thanks be to him through Jesus Christ our Lord."

It is not necessary, even if it were possible, to decide whether Paul is describing his experience before his conversion or after it; or, again, whether all the features of the description are drawn from his own experience or some of them from observation. At the same time Paul was under no illusion that the struggle was over even for one who had believed on Christ. What we have here, made for the first time in human history, is the penetrating analysis of moral struggle, the struggle between the higher and the lower natures in man, and the acknowledgment of its hopelessness apart from the redeeming power of God. Paul writes in the present tense, but he is really projecting his mind back to the period before his conversion, when he had found the promise held out by the Law or on behalf of the Law a hopeless deception. It was not able "to make alive" (Gal. 3²¹). For it was overruled by the indwelling power of Sin. The flesh, which was the seat and organ of Sin, was too strong for the mind, even though that was convinced of the beauty of goodness. And though it was true that the situation was changed from one of despair to one of hope through faith in Christ and its consequences, the old antinomy had not wholly disappeared. It was still necessary to "slay the deeds of the body" (8¹³), "the members that are upon the earth" (Col. 3⁵), to put off the old man, and put on the new (Eph. 4^{22f.}). And if we hear throughout the greater part of the paragraph the cry of every man who has found himself confronted by conscience with the moral demands of God and discovered his inability to meet them while he is cut off from the life of God, we hear in the last verse the triumphant assurance of victory to those who are in Christ.

CHAPTER VIII

1-11. The Supremacy of the Spiritual Over the Material. Once more, and for the last time, Paul returns to the theme with which he set out in 1¹⁷ (cf. 3²¹ 5¹), There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. This expresses in a negative form the result of the divine righteousness which is being revealed, the meaning of the justification which the coming of the righteousness implies. But now Paul, having dealt with successive difficulties and criticisms which presented themselves to his mind, is free to expand his theme without any further digression. And the first thing is to connect the experience of acquittal with the further experience of life by the Spirit and on the spiritual plane. He begins by exhibiting the antithesis between the material and the spiritual, and the supremacy of the spiritual over the material. There is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus (see below), because they have been emancipated from the Law which procures condemnation, the law which leads to sin and death (cf. 2 Cor. 3⁷ 9); and what has secured their freedom is the spirit-principle that leads to life in Christ Jesus. We note that the word law is used in two different senses in the same verse (v. 2). In the first case it refers not to any positive or external law, similar to the Law of Moses, but to an internal regulative principle, the influence of the Spirit exercised along definite lines. When the Law had proved itself a failure, as Paul has shown, especially in the previous chapter, God had intervened and introduced a new method whereby the righteous requirements of the Law might after all be fulfilled (v. 4). And what he had done was nothing less than the sending of his own Son, in the likeness of Sin's flesh (i.e., of the flesh that had come to belong to Sin) and in connection with Sin (i.e., to deal with Sin).

These last words introduce us to a new way of conceiving salvation, in terms of the antithesis between flesh and spirit, and the experience of being lifted from the lower to the higher. This Paul now proceeds to develop in vv. 5f. Those that are wholly material take the material point of view, but those that are spiritual the spiritual. The material point of view is death; but the spiritual point of view is life and peace. For the material point of view is enmity against God, because it neither is nor can be submitted to the law of God, and those who are wholly material cannot be pleasing to God.

Those who are in Christ Jesus (v. 1). This very significant phrase meets us here for the first time. The possibility of Paul's using it, and the significance he attaches to it, depend upon two considerations. In the first place, he conceives of Christ in glory in terms of spirit, exempt from all conditions of space and time, and therefore as a sphere or atmosphere within which men may dwell, one in whom they may "live and move and have their being" (Acts 17²⁸). Secondly, Paul equates the spiritual fellowship, the Body of Christ, the church in that sense, with Christ himself (cf. 1 Cor. 12¹²), in such a way that the idea of members of the fellowship being also "in Christ" became easy and natural for him.

Sinful flesh (v. 3) in R.V. conveys a wrong impression. The words mean "Sin's flesh," and Paul is not referring to any quality or disposition in the physical constitution of Christ, but to the fact that it was like the physical constitution of mankind in general, in that it had come to be under the dominion of Sin. Condemned sin (v. 3) is not strong enough. It might mean no more than the expression of strong disapproval. Better "pronounced the doom of Sin." Sin was thenceforth deposed from its autocratic power. The ordinances of the law (v. 4), i.e., the Law's just requirements. For though the Law as a system has come to an end, its moral requirements are still to guide the conduct of the Christians.

The distinction between the flesh and the spirit is best expressed for us in terms of the distinction between the material and the spiritual; and when Paul here asserts the incommensurable superiority of the spiritual he is reproducing the teaching of his Master, when he insisted repeatedly on the incommensurable value of the soul and also of the kingdom of God, that is to say, the spiritual side of life in its individual and its corporate aspects.

Christians have their being on the plane of spirit; in this sense they are "spiritual" (v. 9). The new life which was due to faith in Christ, a participation in his spiritual life, was a life no longer on the material, but on the spiritual plane, and was guaranteed by the fact that the Spirit of God made his abode in the believer. No one can claim to belong to Christ unless he has the Spirit of Christ. But if Christ has made his abode in you, then the body or lower nature is dead because of sin, but your spirit is alive (v. 10) to bring forth the harvest of righteousness. Sin may not have wholly died out from the body, but the body has lost its controlling power; that has passed to the spirit now quickened and re-enforced by the Spirit of Christ. And if the Spirit of Him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you, then He who raised up Jesus shall also bring to life your bodies which are marked for death through his Spirit that dwells in you (cf. 6⁵ 1 Cor. 15⁴⁴ 2 Cor. 4¹⁰).

NOTE ON PAUL'S CONCEPTION OF THE SPIRIT

Paul's conception of the Spirit found here and elsewhere shows marked development from that which we find in the O.T. and even in the earlier parts of the N.T. There the Spirit of God is looked on, along with the Word of God and the Wisdom of God, as a Divine Force, belonging to God, proceeding from God, and carrying out the purposes of God. To the Spirit are specially assigned, though not exclusively, the quickening of life, the enhancement of natural human powers, and the bestowal of prophetic inspiration; but it is always as a non-personal organ of God's will. The same conception meets us in the synoptic Gospels, and even in the narrative of Pentecost. But in the case of Paul something has happened, which can best be described by saying that as Jesus had revealed the Father, so also he revealed the Spirit. The Spirit is now understood to have the same character and qualities as Jesus, to act and influence in the same way as Jesus had acted and influenced men. We find now ascribed to him self-consciousness and self-direction, qualities which we recognize as connoting personality. He is spoken of as a person. And while it cannot be said that Paul ever ignores the distinction between the Spirit and Christ, even the spiritual Christ in glory, it is equally true that he treats them as interchangeable in the practical experience of men. He traces various aspects of Christian experience now to the one and now to the other (cf. v. 26 with v. 34). Of this we have striking illustration in these verses where the indwelling of the Spirit, of the Spirit of Christ or the Spirit of God, evidently refer to one and the same experience. (For a fuller discussion, see Lewis, Manual of Christian Beliefs, ch. 10.)

12-17. The Privileges of the Christian, Sonship and Heirship. Such experiences as have just been described carry their own imperative. Those who have been raised to the plane of spirit are bound to live on it. What has in one sense been accomplished (cf. 6⁶) in another has still to be worked out. It is those who are governed by the Spirit of God who are really sons of God. The spirit you have received is not a spirit of servitude, renewing your old dread of spirit-forces of evil, but a spirit of sonship which leads us to address God as Father. And to our own conviction is added the witness of God's own Spirit that we are indeed the sons of God (1 Jn. 3¹ Jn. 1¹⁰). In this quiet way Paul introduces what is probably the highest conception of Christian experience and of Christian privilege. An overwhelming sense of sonship together with an overwhelming sense of brotherhood which the Spirit creates within the fellowship—in these two experiences we have the heart of Christianity. And the new relation of sonship is so genuine that it carries with it the privileges of inheritance (Gal. 47). It involves a partaking in the heritage of God (cf. 1 Cor. 29^{f.}), a partaking which we share with Christ, on the one condition that we share also in his suffering.

18-27. Even Present Suffering is but a Condition of Future Glory. "The suffering of the present life is not to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed in us. For that glory is not for ourselves alone, but will involve something for which all created being is waiting on tiptoe, the revelation of the sons of God. For creation indeed has been subjected to hopeless futility, not of its own will, but because of him, namely, God, who so subjected it in hope; for not merely humanity but the world of created being shall be set free from the bondage of corruption, and brought into the liberty of the children of God, whereas, as we know, it sighs and throbs with pain up till this present time. And that is true also of ourselves, even though we have the Spirit of God as a first-fruits of our glory. We also sigh within ourselves waiting for the perfect realization of sonship, when our body also is delivered. For that is the hope unto which we have been saved. Hope, we must remember, is always for something not yet realized; and if we continue to hope for that, then we wait for it with patience. And, besides, we have the Spirit helping to sustain our weakness. We know not what to pray for as we ought; but the Spirit himself pleads for us with sighs that are beyond words. For God, the searcher of hearts, knows what is the mind of the Spirit, that he pleads for us in accordance with the purpose of God."

Sons of God (v. 19). We should naturally expect "the revelation of the Son of God." But the phrase is in harmony with Paul's doctrine of a redeemed humanity as the perfected self-realization of Christ (Eph. 123), whose manifestation would be part of and equivalent to his own (Eph. 413). The whole creation (v. 22). The phrase suggests to us pre-eminently though not exclusively the world of nature and of inanimate being; to Paul it probably stood mainly though not exclusively for the world of sentient being, including the spiritual forces in the unseen (cf. Eph. 310). Redemption of our body (v. 23), i.e., through the transforming of the natural body of flesh into the spiritual body of the life to come (1 Cor. 1544). The Spirit himself maketh intercession (v. 26). The same function is predicated of the Spirit here as is predicated of Christ in v. 34.

28-39. The Contents and the Ground of Christian Hope. Paul assumes that the man who accepts the love of God which is commended to us through the death of Christ, will love God in return, and proclaims that with all such God co-operates for their good. He then further defines these in view not of man's response to God, which might be fluctuating, but of God's choice and calling, on which he does not go back (cf. 1129). The goal toward which the Divine purpose (v. 28) moves is variously described as bringing them into conformity to the image or character of Christ, and as causing them to participate in the glory, the moral splendor, of God. And the certainty of this result rests ultimately not on any human choice or action, but on the timeless knowledge and will of God, which had found its first expression in the divine calling (cf. 16, 7), and then in the bestowal of the divine righteousness (2 Tim. 219 Jn. 1516). From this fact alone the Christian is to draw the strongest possible comfort and encouragement. With God upon our side, it does not matter who is against us. And of that we have the conclusive proof in that he was willing to sacrifice his own Son (cf. Gen. 2216). After that we may well believe that there is nothing which is truly for our good that he will not give us. Who has the right to challenge those whom God has chosen? (Cf. 144.) Our business is with God; and he is the one who pronounces acquittal. Who has the right to condemn? We have to do with Christ, and he is the one in whose death, resurrection, and ascension we see the "power of God unto salvation." Planted on such a foundation the Christian can securely face everything that menaces either happiness or life. For none of these things can separate us from the love of Christ (v. 35).

Some authorities read here "the love of God"; and this is what we should expect from the context, as it is also what we find in v. 39. But, as Chrysostom put it, "it is so much a matter of indifference to Paul whether he mentions Christ or God." The quotation from Psa. 4422 in v. 36 is a parenthetic illustration of the danger which God's people may incur from the sword of the enemy. The thought now moves on to the climax. None of the things which menace happiness or life can separate us from the love of Christ. But there were believed to be worse foes of man than these, namely, the Forces which were understood to rule human life from the start, "elemental spirits of the world" (Gal. 43), "spirit-forces of evil in the unseen" (Eph. 612). Fear of these was poisoning human happiness and destroying human freedom, creating a real bondage of dread (cf. v. 15). (See Glover, Jesus in the Experience of Men, ch. 1.) Paul looks round the whole world of ghostly enemies of man, including even angels (for they too might be foes of God and man), and proclaims their helplessness to destroy the Christian's relation with God.

I am persuaded that neither Death nor Life, not Angels or Principalities or Powers, not the Powers of the Empyrean or the Powers of the Abyss, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

This is the culminating point of the Epistle. We feel that in a real sense it was for this it was written, to pass on to Christians conscious of being faced by many hostile forces the triumphant assurance which for Paul was rooted and grounded in the fact of the gospel: "We are more than conquerors through Christ who loved us."

CHAPTERS 9 TO 11: EXCURSUS ON THE PROBLEM OF THE JEW

Paul has brought to a most impressive conclusion his account of "the good things that are ours in Christ." He is now ready, we should suppose, for the exposition of the ethical implication of salvation which we are to find in chs. 12-14. But the very wonder of all that has been passing through his mind recalls this sad and perplexing fact, that his own nation the Jews, as a whole, have failed to respond to the message of the gospel, have ruled themselves out of its privileges. And he turns aside to devote the next three chapters to the discussion of this problem, Why does it appear as though God had rejected Israel?

General Considerations Bearing on the Problem. In studying these chapters in detail it is well to bear in mind certain general considerations which emerge in the course of the argument and must affect our understanding of the details. (1) There is, first of all, the general conclusion to which the whole argument moves; "so all Israel shall be saved" (1126), and "God hath shut up all unto disobedience, that he might have mercy upon all" (1132). (2) Paul lays the foundation for his answer to the main question by pointing to the fact that a principle of selection has been at work from the beginning of Israel's history. It began, indeed (though Paul does not mention this), when Abraham was chosen and called out of a world that knew not God. It was illustrated in the choice of Isaac and the passing over of Ishmael; and even more strikingly in the choice of Jacob and the passing over of Esau. (3) This selection depended on the sovereign will of God; it was something against which no human protest or cavil could be admitted. (4) The selection was to privilege and responsibility in this world; and it was not (as the Jews thought) absolute and unconditional. (5) The purpose of the selection was that through those selected blessing should ultimately come upon those who were passed over (cf. Gen. 1818). (6) The position of those who were passed over was that of the Gentiles, which he dealt with in 261. They did not participate in the privileges, but they had open to them the alternatives described in 28-11.

It should be added that the question which at once occurs to us, What was the ultimate fate of those who passed away before the saving purpose of God was accomplished? does not appear to be touched on by the apostle. It is, indeed, to this fact that our difficulty in appreciating his argument is largely due. (See also p. 1159b.)

CHAPTER IX

1-13. Within Abraham's Stock Itself There Has Been Selection. (Cf. preceding paragraphs on the problem of the Jew.) Paul begins by emphasizing the poignancy of the situation, his own insistent grief, and the manifold privileges which the Jews have enjoyed. After the most solemn asseveration of his sincerity he says in effect: The wish was in my heart that I myself might be banned from Christ for my brethren's sake. What privileges have been theirs! Adoption, the Shechinah, the Covenants, the Legislation, the Worship and the Promises; the Father too, and the Messiah, at least on the human side. And it is no true explanation of Israel's position now to say that God's word of promise has failed. The fact is that all along there has been a principle of selection at work. Not all who belonged to Israel according to the flesh have belonged to the true Israel. Not all the descendants of Abraham have been his "children," and so heirs of the promise. For example, the promise was limited to the descendants of Isaac; the descendants of Ishmael were passed over. It follows that the privilege of being God's children does not depend on physical descent (cf. Mt. 39), but on God's promise. Jacob and Esau provide an even clearer case of selection; for even before they were born God had chosen Jacob and passed over Esau, when he said that Esau the elder should serve his younger brother (Gen. 2523).

Who is over all (v. 5). According to the punctuation of R.V. and most authorities, these closing words of v. 5 refer to Christ, and involve the ascription to him of the divine name. It is, nevertheless, more probable that we should put a full stop after "flesh" (cf. mg.), and see in the words that follow a benediction upon God such as was very common in Jewish writings and is actually found in 1²⁵ and 2 Cor. 11³¹.

Jacob have I loved (v. 13). The sentence is from Mal. 1², 3, and a careful examination of the passage shows that the prophet is speaking not merely of the individuals Jacob and Esau but of the nations to which they had severally given rise (Israel and Edom). He traces back the present condition of these peoples to the original choice of Jacob and passing over of Esau. The original selection of Jacob had approved itself in the divine favor which Israel continued to enjoy. The original passing over of Esau, whereby he and his descendants were left in the position of "Gentiles," had issued in a condition which could only be interpreted as due to the disfavor, anger, hatred, of God. For the use of the word hate in the sense of "treat as if he hated" cf. Lk. 14²⁶.

14-33. Two Objections Which Might Be Raised by a Jew. If God thus chooses one and passes over another in entire indifference to character or qualification, does he not act unfairly? To this objection Paul replies by referring the Jew to familiar passages in the O.T. He cannot call God unjust if he acts in accordance with the principle there revealed. Speaking to Moses God had declared that his mercy followed his sovereign choice (Ex. 33¹⁹), so that it does not depend on human will or effort but solely on the divine will. Conversely, Pharaoh was one on whom in the exercise of the same divine sovereignty God had brought hardening of heart. Paul states this in uncompromising terms, being concerned only at the moment to assert the irrefragable independence of the divine will. Nevertheless, it would appear from what follows that had he been asked whether Pharaoh was responsible for the conduct which is described as due to the hardening of his heart (cf. Ex. 8³² with Ex. 9¹²), he would have replied in the affirmative. His position on the question of predestination and free will was probably that common to the Pharisees, which is thus described by Josephus: "All things are governed by fate, yet they do not take away from men the freedom of acting as they see fit; for their idea is that it has pleased God to mix up the ideas of Fate and man's will, so that man can act viciously or virtuously" (Antiquities, bk. xiii, ch. 5: 9).

This leads to a second objection: Why, then, does God continue to hold man responsible, seeing that no one can resist his will? It cannot be said that Paul refutes this objection. He is content to repel it as one which the creature has no right to raise against the Creator. And he illustrates this by referring the objector to familiar passages in the O.T. (Isa. 45⁹ Jer. 18⁶). "When the chosen material (i.e., the Jews) would not mold to the high purpose for which the Potter was fashioning it, who shall complain if he diverted it to lower uses or threw it away to destruction, and produced out of his stores other vessels which he had already prepared and destined for glorious functions (that is to say, the Gentile Christians)?" (Gore.) The truth is that "to this objection there is no answer, and it ought to be frankly recognized that the apostle does not answer it. The attempt to understand the relation between the divine will and the human seems to lead of necessity to an antinomy which thought has not yet succeeded in transcending" (Denney).

But what if God, though desirous to display his wrath, has tolerated most patiently the objects of his wrath, ripe and ready to be destroyed? (Moffatt.) And what if his purpose has been to make known the wealth of his glory (v. 23) in the case of the objects of his mercy, that is to say, ourselves whom he has called, Gentiles as well as Jews? Had not Hosea predicted the calling to be God's people of those who were not his people (Hos. 2²³ 1¹⁰). And had not Isaiah with his doctrine of the remnant, which was at once the heir and the agent of salvation (Isa. 10²² 1⁹), recognized the working of the principle of selection in the later history of Israel?

30. Drawing a provisional conclusion, Paul falls back upon facts, the facts of observation. Gentiles, some of them, had accepted what Israel had refused. It was not an answer to the problem, but it opened the door to one (11³⁰, 31). Gentiles who had not consciously pursued righteousness had laid hold of it, while Israel, always in pursuit of a law which was to produce righteousness, had never caught it up. And the reason was that what Israel sought to earn by merit the Gentiles were ready to accept on the ground of faith. Then even the Messiah himself had proved nothing better for Israel than a stone on which they stumbled (Isa. 8¹⁴), and not one on whom to believe would, as Isaiah had foretold in another passage (28¹⁶), put a man beyond the reach of shame.

CHAPTER X

1-13. The Simplicity and Directness of the Gospel. We see here the dawning of hope for Israel in the apostle's heart. He could not have expressed his heart's desire and prayer for Israel's salvation had he looked on its rejection as due to an immutable decree. And he proceeds to explain more fully than elsewhere the fundamental mistake of the Jews. Failing to recognize the righteousness that comes from God, and still seeking to establish a righteousness of their own, they had refused to bow their wills to the divine righteousness. Yet it was a mistake, for (v. 2), on the one hand, Christ had put an end to law, to any legal system as a means for obtaining salvation, by securing righteousness for everyone who believes; and, on the other hand, the condition for securing life (v. 5) which Moses had laid down in Lev. 18⁵ is one not possible to be fulfilled (cf. Gal. 3¹²). What, however, is the testimony of the righteousness that rests on faith? Paul boldly personifies that righteousness, and makes it say in effect: "There is no need to ask these despairing questions, Who will go up to heaven for us?—namely, adds Paul in parenthesis, to bring Christ down; or, Who will descend into the abyss? namely, to bring Christ up. For the message that matters is close beside you; nay, it is in your mouth, and in your heart. And that," adds Paul, "is the message that leads to faith, the message that we proclaim. For if you confess with your mouth Jesus as Lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you shall be saved. Does not the Scripture itself say, No one who believes on him shall be put to shame? (Isa. 28¹⁶.) And that holds good of all; for there is no difference between Jew and Gentile, for the same Lord is Lord of them all."

6-8. Three phrases in these verses are echoes rather than quotations from Deut. 30^{12, 13}, which appears to have been a favorite passage with the Jews. Moses had applied them to the Law; Paul applies them to the gospel. The main idea is that the gospel is within immediate reach of men; but Paul works in with this the thought that it is needless to seek for Christ either above or below; for Christ has already come from above, and he has already been brought up from the dead.

9. The open acknowledgment of Jesus as "Lord" appears to have been the one necessary condition for baptism and admission to the sacred society. Believe in thine heart. Faith is something that goes beyond intellectual assent; it is "a specific state of emotional nature" (cf. Lk. 24²⁵).

13. To call on the name of the Lord is commonly used in the O.T. as a synonym for worshipping Jehovah, the word "name" describing a person as he is known. The sentence in Joel 2³² predicates deliverance for the true worshiper of Almighty God. It is highly significant that Paul evidently predicates the same for those who call upon the name of Christ, i.e., accept him as Lord in the same way as men under the old dispensation had accepted God.

14-21. Israel Cannot Excuse Itself as Not Having Heard the Gospel. The paragraph begins with a series of rapid questions which are supposed to be put by a Jew seeking to make excuse for his people not having yielded to the gospel. And to these questions Paul gives a summary answer, but what he evidently feels to be a sufficient one, in the sentence quoted from Isa. 527. That is to say, he contents himself for the moment with drawing attention to the wide dispersion of missionaries of the gospel into all the countries which come into consideration. It is not true, he would say, that the Jews have not had opportunity to hear the message of Christ. What is true is suggested by another sentence from Isaiah (53¹). They have heard, but have refused to believe. But the fact remains that faith follows upon hearing, and hearing upon the proclamation of the message about Christ. In v. 18 Paul harks back to the main question, Is it true that Israel has not heard? Why, the whole world has heard; so great has been the number of the preachers. Only the familiar language of Ps. 19⁴ can do justice to the situation; "their voice has gone out to the ends of the earth."

Having dealt with the question, Have they not heard? Paul raises a further one—Is it true that Israel did not know? (V. 19.) And he answers it with three quotations from the O.T. to the effect that if it were so, it could not be for lack of warning. As far back as Moses it had been announced that God would give Israel cause for jealousy against a nation that was not his people, stirring them to anger against those who could not be credited with religious sensitiveness (Deut. 32²¹). And Isaiah had declared even more boldly that God would manifest himself to peoples who did not inquire after him (Isa. 65¹); whereas the situation in regard to Israel was that God was continuously stretching out his hands toward a people who were disobedient and contentious (Isa. 62²). God had all along been pleading with Israel, but in vain.

CHAPTER XI

1-12. Israel's Rejection Neither Complete nor Final. In this paragraph we see the light of Paul's hope for Israel growing stronger and clearer. Has God, he asks, altogether thrust away his people? Not at all. He, Paul, is himself a case to the contrary, a Jew of pure descent, who has found salvation in Christ. The situation is, indeed, like to the one recorded in that passage of the O.T. known as "Elijah" (v. 2, cf. mg.). There we learn how the despairing prophet laid before God his complaint against Israel (1 Kings 19¹⁰), and added "and I only am left," only to receive the divine assurance that it was not so, that there were actually seven thousand who had not "bowed the knee to Baal." In like manner there is even at the present time a remnant of those who are selected by grace (v. 5); and if by grace, then obviously not on the ground of merit, for in that case grace or unmerited favor would have lost its character. It follows (v. 7) that though Israel as a whole has failed to attain the object of its quest, a remnant or section of the people has attained it. As for the rest, they have forfeited their sensitiveness to the message of God. It was not that God had rejected his people (cf. v. 1); but Israel as a whole had rejected itself by proving unworthy of the destiny to which it was called, to be a blessing to all peoples. And so it had incurred judgment, not only by seeing the opportunity pass over to the Gentiles, but by being allowed to sink to the moral level of those who knew not God.

This explains the quotations which follow, where the language which in Isa. 29¹⁰ and Deut. 29⁴ is used of the heathen is now applied to the Jews, and the even fiercer denunciation in Psa. 69^{22, 23} is given a similar direction. Israel, no less than the Gentiles, must undergo the utter judgment of God (cf. 1 Thess. 2¹⁶). The question in v. 11, Did they stumble so as to fall (irrevocably)? is, however, at once vigorously repelled; and then follows an explanation of their stumbling which connects its results with the gracious purposes of God. The failure of Israel has opened a door to salvation for the Gentiles, whereby the Jews themselves may be stimulated to follow their example. And if wealth has come to the world through their failure, and to the Gentiles through their grievous loss, how much greater will be the gain when they too are replenished with the grace of God.

The horizon is clearing. Israel cannot escape the penalties of its obstinacy and culpable refusal. It has lost its status, and punishment must fall upon its sin. But the casting off of Israel has not been complete. Neither is it final. God's calling, the offer of salvation, has passed over to the Gentiles. But their joyful acceptance of the gift of God in Jesus Christ will be an example and a stimulus to the Jews. So that there is new ground of hope of their coming into the Kingdom, to the further enrichment of the Gentiles and even of mankind itself.

13-24. The Gentiles Are Seriously Warned Against Self-complacency. Attentive consideration of Paul's argument up to this point might have the effect of giving the Gentiles a sense of superiority to the Jews, as they might draw the inference that they had taken the place of the Jews in God's favor, and then proceed to make the same mistake as the Jews had done. Conscious of this, Paul turns now to address the Gentiles. To begin with, they must not think, for all his eagerness to be the Apostle of the Gentiles, and to make good their claim, that he had ceased to magnify his wider ministry which included Jews as well as Gentiles; that still moved him to seek to stir up his flesh and blood, his own countrymen, with a view to saving some of them (v. 14). For if, as he has just shown, their temporary rejection is a step toward the reconciliation of mankind, their being received back into God's favor would be nothing less than a veritable resurrection (v. 15). There is already a nucleus of believing Jews, and as the heave-offering of old was understood to consecrate the whole mass from which it was taken (cf. Num. 15²⁰), as the branches of a consecrated stem themselves became consecrated, so the mass of the Jews, Paul trusted, would be drawn into the circle of grace.

The reference to the stem or root and the branches (v. 17) introduces the famous simile of the olive trees, the garden olive and the wild olive, symbolizing the Jews and the Gentiles. The apostle recalls passages in the prophets in which Israel was spoken of as God's olive tree (Jer. 11¹⁶ Hos. 14⁶). Some of the branches have been broken off. The Gentile who was originally no other than a wild olive, has been grafted into God's olive, and become partaker of its rich sap. But "beware of scorning those branches which have been cut off. If thou dost congratulate thyself, remember that it is not thou that supportest the root, but the root that supports thee. The Gentiles might plume themselves, saying, 'These branches have been broken off in order that I might be grafted in.' Quite true. They were broken off because of faithlessness, and you owe your position to faith. Be not uplifted in your mind, but be careful. God will not spare you any more than he spared the branches which belong naturally to the olive. Mark well the kindness and the severity of God. Those who fell have felt his severity; you experience his kindness, but only if you continue to dwell in that kindness; otherwise, you also will be cut off. Moreover, those old branches, if they depart from their faithlessness, shall again be grafted in. For God is able to do that (cf. Mk. 10²⁷). And, indeed, it is all the more probable that those who naturally belong to the tree should be again grafted into their own olive, in view of the fact that you were cut out from the naturally wild olive and grafted into the fine quality olive in a way contrary to nature" (v. 24).

Paul's unconquerable love for his nation and his conviction that God's gracious purpose toward it remains unchanged nowhere find stronger expression than here. So far is "Israel" from being finally rejected that it is into Israel that the Gentiles are to be ingrafted. Even the Gentile-containing church for whose establishment and upbuilding Paul is giving his life, is not to be any new or independent creation; it is to be a spiritual Israel, continuous with the "church in the wilderness" of which Stephen had spoken (Acts 7³⁸), which had now been baptized with the Spirit of Christ, and was now the new people of God, united to him in the new covenant.

25-36. Conclusion: God's Purpose of Mercy Toward all Men. As a further argument against self-complacency on the part of the Gentiles Paul reminds them again of "this open secret" (mystery, v. 25), that the insensibility which has overtaken Israel is only partial and that it has a limit of time. It is to last until the fulfillment of the Gentiles be come, or, better, until the appointed number of Gentiles have entered in (cf. Mt. 7¹³ Lk. 13²⁴), and so Israel as a whole shall be saved. Paul now illustrates this conclusion by a series of phrases from Isa. 59²⁰ 27⁹ Jer. 31³³ and again Isa. 27⁹. The first phrase he boldly adapts to suit his purpose by writing shall come out of Zion, where the Hebrew has "shall come to Zion" (the LXX differs from both). The Jews are from the point of view of the gospel treated by God as enemies for the sake of the Gentiles; from the point of view of the original selection they are still beloved of God for the sake of their forefathers. They are still beloved of God, for God does not go back on his gifts or his calling. And that will be seen when Paul's hope is fulfilled. For just as the Gentiles were at one time disobedient to God, but have now had mercy shown to them in consequence of the disobedience of the Jews, so the Jews have now fallen into disobedience because of the mercy which they saw the Gentiles enjoying, in order that they in their turn might have mercy shown to them. For God has concluded them all alike under disobedience (cf. Gal. 3²²), Gentiles (v. 30) and Jews (v. 11), in order that he might have mercy upon all. The contemplation of this conclusion of the whole matter fills the apostle's heart with the amazement and thankfulness which find expression in v. 33. The thought that God's ways are past finding out is illustrated by another composite quotation from Isa. 40¹³ and Job 41¹¹ (though for the latter Paul appears to follow a text unknown to us). For, he concludes, throwing back his thought to v. 32, all things have in him their Source, their Sustainment and their Goal.

26. All Israel shall be saved. The phrase is neither to be expanded to include every Israelite, nor limited to the spiritual remnant. The situation contemplated is when that remnant or first-fruits shall have consecrated "the whole lump," the fullness of the Gentiles, the number which corresponds to the purpose of God.

Retrospect of Chapters 9, 10, and 11. As we look back over these chapters one thing becomes clear, namely, that the process of thought which they embody has brought peace to the soul of the apostle. The agonizing anxiety with which he had contemplated the position of Israel (92. ³) has given way to rejoicing confidence in God and in his purpose of mercy. In working out the process for ourselves we see as the essential thing the moving of the apostle's mind from the purely intellectual to the religious standpoint. The problem which is insoluble when looked at as a problem for the mind alone comes to be, not solved, but soluble, when studied in the atmosphere of faith. Paul does not provide any satisfactory solution of the antinomy between divine foreknowledge and human responsibility, between divine sovereignty and the moral freedom of men. But if he does nothing to reconcile these intellectual contradictories, he does much to reconcile us to the acceptance of them as bound to find a synthesis in the revealed character of God. For that character as revealed in Jesus Christ leaves no uncertainty as to the purpose of God, namely, to have mercy upon all men. Human history, says Paul in effect, must be read in the light of that purpose. And so reading it, Paul sees the outline of the divine method. It is a method of selection, selection of individuals, of groups and of nations, to be agents of his gracious purpose toward mankind. It is therefore a selection for duty as well as for privilege. And persistent refusal to recognize the duty while resting in the privilege leads to the suspension though not the canceling of the selection. It was this suspension which had befallen the Jews, and the selection had passed over to the Gentiles. But it is theirs on the same conditions. It may be forfeited for the same reasons. Man's moral freedom works within the ambit of the divine will. That will neither crushes the human will nor destroys its responsibility. We may not derive from Paul's teaching here any authorization for saying that every man is to be saved; but only that it is the will of God to have mercy upon all. Neither may we derive any authorization for saying that any man is already finally rejected. Paul has singularly little to say that bears directly on the case of individuals. There is little beyond the reference to Pharaoh. He throws his thought into the form of generalization, studying the divine method on a large scale. But his main concern is with the passing over of the Jews and the admitting of the Gentiles to favor. And when he has recognized how these things also are part of the gracious purpose of God toward all men he is lost in admiration and wonder. (See p. 1155.)

CHAPTER XII

1, 2. The Ethical Implication of Salvation; General Introduction. It is only for convenience that we describe this as the second main division of the Epistle. It forms an integral part of Paul's purpose in writing. He had no use for religion or theology which did not translate itself in terms of character and conduct. So the word therefore has great significance here. In the three chapters immediately preceding Paul has dealt with a subject in which his own personal interest is keener even than that of those to whom he writes. Now that he passes on to expound the ethical implications of salvation, the principles of Christian motive and Christian conduct, he recalls the contents of chs. 1-8, in which he has analyzed and exhibited the mercies of God. And it is in view of these that he now appeals to his readers to present their bodies a living sacrifice. "Therefore" forges the link between the doctrinal and the ethical teaching of the Epistle. By "bodies" Paul suggests all the activities of the earthly life; and the consecration of these he describes as a living sacrifice, and "your spiritual or immaterial worship." Henceforth, God neither seeks nor requires material sacrifice of any kind. That has been completely replaced by the joyful surrender to him of human hearts and wills. Christians, therefore, are not to pattern themselves on the present order of things, but to accept such a change in themselves, a change of mental outlook, that they will be able to discern the will of God—what is good and well-pleasing and ideal.

3-21. The Natural Attitude of Christians in Their Relations to One Another. Paul is about to describe the kind of temper and the forms of conduct which are natural and becoming in a Christian. He throws his teaching into the form of precepts, and the precepts become useful guides to the individual; but they are addressed to the community as a whole, and to the individual in his relation to the fellowship or sacred society of which he is a member. It is seldom indeed that Paul contemplates the individual as an isolated unit. Nearly always he thinks of him as a member of the Christian Community. For the faith-union by which he is united to Christ is also a love-union by which he is united to his fellow believers, and it is in this fellowship that he is to find the full opportunity for the realization of his new personality. That is why in vv. 4, 5, after laying down the first requirement of modesty, Paul emphasizes as a motive for that modesty the common life of the Body of Christ, a common life shared by many members, each of whom has his own function, each of whom is related to every part as well as to the whole. On every such member he urges, in the first place, modesty in his estimate of himself, taking for his standard no human qualifications he may possess but the degree of faith which God has granted to him. There is something individual in the quality of each man's faith; and corresponding to that is the particular grace-gift which is assigned to him. To that also is to correspond the use he makes of it (v. 6), whether it be public speech (prophecy) or personal service (ministry) or teaching or comforting or giving. He that ruleth (v. 8) should probably be rendered "he that hath a concern for the church"; as in 1 Thess. 5:12 and 1 Tim. 3:21, let one who attends to the general interests do so with diligence. And in general let the love upon which the whole structure is rooted and grounded be free from insincerity.

In vv. 9-21 Paul passes from the spiritual grace-gifts and the proper use of them to recount the general characteristics of the Christian's attitude, specially toward those "of the household of faith." And here we have to observe not only the specific echoes of our Lord's own teaching in the Sermon on the Mount (vv. 14, 19), but how closely Paul reproduces the spirit of that teaching, while throwing it into many various forms. We have to register this phenomenon, explain it how we may, that although Paul was not himself a disciple of Jesus, and although the record of Christ's teaching was not yet available in the Gospels, the Christian man as Paul describes him is not distinguishable from the portrait of the ideal man as we should construct it from what we know of our Lord's teaching. The ultimate basis of this harmony is the common recognition that "love is the fulfilling of the law"; but even then there is something very striking in the harmonious application of the principle.

There is little in these verses that calls for interpretation. The following alternative renderings of some phrases are offered as either clearer or more exact than R.V.: 12. Read let your hope be a joy to you (Moffatt). 13. Read sharing in the necessities of God's people; chasing opportunities for hospitality. 16b. Read drawn into fellowship with humble folk. 17.

Observe the admission of the opinion of others as at least a subordinate standard for the conduct of the Christian (cf. Mt. 17²⁷). 19. Read make room for the Wrath, i.e., allow the judgment of God to take its course. 20. Quoted from Prov. 25^{21, 22}; the closing words may be paraphrased as by Moffatt, "in this way you make him feel a burning sense of shame." 21. "Evil is all around the Christian, and it is a strong man armed. But the Christian has with him the forces of good, which are yet stronger; and by no partial withdrawal, but by the active exercise of good, he is to win the victory over evil" (Gore).

CHAPTER XIII

1-7. Christians and the State. The question of the relation of God's people or the church to the state was an important one, though not so difficult in Paul's time as it afterward became. It had already been laid before Jesus by the Pharisees, who framed what seemed to them a dilemma by which he could not fail to be caught. "Is it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar or not?" And Paul's handling of the subject is in close correspondence with the purport of our Lord's reply, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's." The claims of the state are to be recognized within its proper sphere. But Paul proceeds to assign reasons for this which are not included in our Lord's reply. "The existing authorities have been ordained by God" (v. 1).

The principle is a true one, and yet not absolute in its application. Paul's experience of the state, and the experience of the church, had been up to this time only favorable. Nominally a republic, the Roman state was now governed under republican forms by an emperor. And so far as subject peoples were concerned, the Roman administration was marked by wisdom and tolerance. The Jews in particular enjoyed great internal freedom and certain special privileges. Paul's natural instinct, therefore, was to credit the state with good intentions, and also with a wise administration of justice. And the state had not hitherto displayed hostility to the Christians; still less had it indulged in any organized persecutions. On the contrary, it had on more than one occasion interfered to protect the Christians from the Jews by whom they were frequently attacked and rabbled. It was in full confidence in Roman justice that Paul appealed to Cæsar. And in 2 Thess. 2⁵⁻⁷ he acknowledges the function fulfilled by the Roman state in restraining for the time being the activities of Antichrist.

In these circumstances it was not difficult for Paul to acknowledge the civil authorities of his time as ordained of God. Only a few years had passed, however, before the situation was entirely changed. The cruel persecution under Nero marked the beginning of an alteration of the attitude of the state to the church. That strange amalgam of religion and politics, the cult of the Roman emperor, suddenly acquired great importance; and Christians who refused to worship a man as god were branded as enemies of the state (cf. intro. to Revelation, p. 1365). Rome was already "drunken with the blood of the saints" (Rev. 17⁶); Antipap had perished at Pergamum (Rev. 21³); and every considerable town in Asia Minor was a place where Satan had his throne, the Temple of Rome and the emperor, who was hailed as "our Lord and our God" (see Jn. 20²⁴⁻²⁹, note).

In this changed situation the Christians were compelled to revise their judgment of the state. And Paul leaves room for such revision. His words are to be understood of the civil authorities as he knew them, and the functions of justice which he saw them to be discharging. His teaching here is wrongly applied when it is taken to mean that all existing authorities of any kind and character are divinely appointed. Paul himself suggests the test. When they are a terror not to the worker of good but to the evildoer, when they administer even-handed justice, they are ministers of God within civil life, and Christians are bound to show them all due respect and provide them with all reasonable support.

8-14. Love the Fulfilling of the Law. Leave no debt unpaid, saving, of course, the debt of love, which is one that never can be fully paid. Christian love has been defined as "the identification of self with God's interest in others"; and where it is present, it puts it beyond possibility that we should inflict injury on our neighbors of any form or kind. So the second table of the Law is summed up in "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This was one of the two commandments of which Jesus had said that on them hang the law and the prophets (Mt. 22⁴⁰); and once more the apostle reproduces his Master's teaching. He proceeds (v. 11) to enforce it by calling attention to the brevity of the opportunity in view of the expected early return of Christ. "Remember the character of the time. The day which is to see the completion of our salvation is nearer than when we believed. The light of that great day is even now dawning. It behoves us, therefore, to comport ourselves with dignity, not in reckless or riotous living, not in factions or envious bickerings. On the contrary, see that you enrobe yourselves in the Lord Jesus Christ, and pay no attention to the demands of the lower nature."

Again, it is seen to be part of the Christian standard of conduct to behave with dignity and self-respect. Many things which cannot be classed as sins, things which are not forbidden by any law, are nevertheless to be shunned by the Christian as inconsistent with this ideal.

CHAPTER XIV

1-12. The Duty of Toleration for Those of a too Scrupulous Conscience. Paul now proceeds to examine the application of the universal law of love to certain special problems which arose in the intercourse of Christians with one another. It was not difficult when the fellowship was met together for worship to realize the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, to feel the throb of mutual affection between the brethren. But when the worship came to an end, when the brethren separated to meet again in ordinary social intercourse, personal idiosyncrasies made their appearance on one side or on both, which tended to destroy the fellowship, producing discussion, discomfort, and even disunion. It is with this in view that Paul in 1 Cor. 13¹³ prays that the love which is characteristic of God may continue with members of the community. Here the special case which he singles out is that of those who are weak in the faith (v. 1). The "faith" to which Paul now refers is not religious faith, the faith in God through Christ whereby men are saved, but the fruit of such faith in clear vision and firm conviction as to the mind and will of God. And by those who are "weak" in the faith he means those who have not a sufficiently strong grasp upon spiritual realities to claim their complete freedom in Christ and to cease, because of their assurance on other grounds, the practice of asceticism or the observance of lucky and unlucky days.

Paul takes his first illustration from food and the distinction between foods which were ritually clean and unclean. In the law of Moses much attention had been given to this subject; and much of the religious observance of a pious Jew consisted in punctilious avoidance of such kinds of food as Moses had forbidden. The Essenes, as it would appear, had gone a step further, and regarded it as a religious duty to abstain from all kinds of flesh food. In this they followed the example of the Pythagoreans in the Greek world. Indeed, religious vegetarianism was, as it still is, quite common in the East. The watchword of these schools of thought was "Touch not, taste not, handle not" (cf. Col. 2²¹). Now, our Lord in his teaching as to the true character of sin had started from a destructive criticism of this whole point of view. Nothing, he said, absolutely nothing that reaches a man from without can "defile" him, that is to say, render him unfit for public worship, disqualify him for communion with God. With this teaching he "cleansed all meats" (Mk. 7¹⁹), i.e., abrogated the distinction between what was clean and unclean. And this teaching had been confirmed to Peter in the vision which he had on the roof of the house at Joppa (Acts 10^{9f.}).

Nevertheless, there were evidently those in the primitive church who could not shake off the idea that it was wrong to eat certain kinds of food, or, at any rate, that there was merit in abstaining. There is always a type of mind to which asceticism makes a strong appeal. But this raised a very practical question in connection with the daily social life of the Christians. How were those whose grasp on spiritual realities was strong enough to enable them to treat all such matters as unimportant to behave to those scruplers whose "faith" was not so strong? The answer, in the first place, is that the strong are to welcome the weak, but not to contentious discussions (v. 1). The one who feels free to eat anything is not to despise the one who abstains; neither is he who abstains to criticise the one who claims freedom in such matters. The important fact is that both alike have received the welcome of God. Moreover, the weak or overscrupulous man must remember that it is the servant of another that he is criticising (v. 4). He is Christ's servant, and it is to the judgment of his Master alone that he is amenable. Paul's own opinion is clear enough from 14¹⁴ (cf. 1 Tim. 4⁴). He ranges himself along with those who are strong in the faith.

The second illustration of such unnecessary scruples is taken from the superstitious observance of special days (v. 5). The reference may be to Jewish festivals, or Paul may have in mind Gentile forms of superstition according to which certain days or dates were connected with certain of the planets, or the elemental forces which ruled the world (Gal. 4^{9, 10}), and men shaped their conduct on these days accordingly. In this case the same rule applied. Each man was to be held responsible for his own conviction and for acting upon it. These were not matters on which it was necessary that the community should think or act alike.

From this Paul passes back, as he so often does, to general considerations (v. 7), his conviction being that if men could but realize clearly and continuously their relation to Christ, these problems of conduct would solve themselves. The truth is that no one of us Christians is an isolated individual (v. 8). In life and in death alike each one of us belongs to the Lord. It was, indeed, to this end that he both died and came to life again, that he might be the Lord of the dead and of the living. For Christians to criticize one another in matters such as these is to take up an attitude of independence toward one another which is incompatible with their common life in and for Christ. And, further, it is inconsistent with the humility which becomes those who must all alike appear before the judgment seat of God (v. 10). Elsewhere (2 Cor. 5¹⁰) Paul speaks of "the judgment seat of Christ," even as in Phil. 2¹⁰.¹¹ he applies to Christ the language of Isaiah (49¹⁸ 45²³) which the latter here uses of God. It is in this way that Paul gives the clearest indication of the place which he assigns to Christ, and also shows that the soil in which his thought is rooted is not any Hellenistic speculation or the Oriental mystery-cults, but the O.T.

The sum of the matter is that those whose faith makes them independent of ritual prohibitions and superstitious precautions should not give the cold shoulder to the weak, but welcome them to the fellowship, showing patience and toleration. To the weak and scrupulous Paul appeals with much more elaboration of argument that they should refrain from criticizing those who claim to exercise freedom in matters of external observance.

13-23. Further Duty of Those Who Are Strong, to Abstain for Love's Sake. After giving general application to the principle that Christians ought not to criticize each other's conduct in such matters, Paul turns again to those whose faith is strong enough to set them free from scruples and from self-imposed asceticism and urges them not only to welcome these weaker brethren, but for love's sake to waive the exercise of their own freedom. For the weaker brother to see his fellow Christian indulging in food or drink which he, the weaker, thinks wrong, is to cause him real distress, and even, it may be, to expose him to temptation. It is quite true, as the strong would argue (and Paul will have no mistake about it), that all such practices have ceased to have meaning or obligation. Christ has said so (Mk. 7¹⁹). The enlightened Christian conscience says so. Still, there are those who are not enlightened. And if they still look on such things as meat or wine as causing defilement, then these things act so in their case. If by your ostentatious enjoyment of food which he thinks to be forbidden you cause your brother pain, then it is not love that guides your conduct.

Paul appears here (vv. 15, 16) to direct his attention to food of a special kind, such as meat that had first been offered in sacrifice to idols, and his teaching here finds an instructive parallel in 1 Cor. 8⁷⁻¹³. He that is strong in his faith knows that no idol is anything and he can eat any kind of meat without raising any question as to where it came from. But the weak brother, when he sees him do so, may not only be shocked; he may be tempted to do the same, even though it be against his conscience; for he is not so sure that "the idol is nothing"; and so he may be ruined in his Christian life. Do nothing, says Paul (v. 15), to bring disaster on your brother, for whom Christ died (see discussion of this phrase below). And, in general, "do not let what is right for you get a bad name." After all, the kingdom of God has not to do with either enjoying or refraining from certain meat and drink; it has to do with righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit. And he who in this way shows himself to be a true servant of Jesus Christ is well-pleasing to God, and also approves himself to human opinion. So, then, we set our ambition on what makes for peace and mutual upbuilding. Do not, merely to gratify your own taste or appetite, undermine the work of God.

It is true, he repeats, that all things are clean (v. 20); nevertheless, it is bad for a man to eat with offense to his conscience. It is fine, on the other hand, neither to eat meat, nor to drink wine, nor to do anything that causes your brother to stumble. You are rightly thankful for your greater enlightenment; but keep it as something between you and God. He is a fortunate man who does not expose himself to criticism by what he approves. The freedom of the Christian man is to be used with caution; it does not mean license. On the other hand, he who eats, though he is not sure that it is right, has been condemned already.

Once more Paul has shown how thoroughly he has apprehended the mind of Christ. "Judge not that ye be not judged"; "whatsoever thing from without goeth into a man, it cannot defile him"; "but lest we should cause them to stumble" (Mt. 7¹ Mk. 7¹⁸ Mt. 17²⁷)—it is of these principles that Paul gives an exposition and an application.

For whom Christ died (v. 15). There is something striking in the simple and unpremeditated way in which Paul, here and in 1 Cor. 8¹¹, brings in this allusion. It is for him an incontrovertible fact and one of immeasurable importance. It is a fact which has changed life for everyone who has accepted its message, and one which should govern the attitude of every Christian to every other Christian, and, in a wider sense, to every other man. The phrase is one which caught the imagination of the past in a way we should do well to recover.

To give one example: When there was a rebellion in Norfolk, England, in the sixteenth century, led by a man called Kett, and a government official alluded to Kett's followers as "these villains," Kett answered, "Call not them villains for whom Christ died."

Special attention should be given to the changes in R.V. of certain words in vv. 20, 23, which as they stand in A.V. have caused no little difficulty and misunderstanding. Paul does not say "all things are pure" (A.V.), but "all things are clean," meaning that the ritual distinction between clean and unclean has disappeared. And he does not say, "he that doubteth is damned" (A.V.), though his words have often been quoted in that form. He says that he who is in two minds (cf. Jas. 16) as to whether it is right or wrong to eat some particular food, comes under condemnation by the act of partaking. He is condemned by his own conscience.

CHAPTER XV

1-7. General Precepts and Encouragements.

The new paragraph opens with a summary of what has just been said (cf. 13⁸). We who are strong in the faith ought to bear with the weaknesses of those who are not strong. Noblesse oblige. To please ourselves is not our duty. Let each one of us seek to please his neighbor. But that does not mean just to do whatever that neighbor likes. It is assumed that the same ideal is accepted on both sides. For such conduct we have a supreme example in Jesus himself. He was conspicuous as one who did not please himself. This does not refer mainly, if at all, to the fact that Jesus was unselfish, not seeking personal satisfaction, or honor or wealth or power, the things which men commonly seek. It refers, rather, to the example of Jesus in its bearing on the matter in hand. He was not self-centered. He did not open his fellowship and his friendship only to those who agreed with him. Rather was he perpetually breaking through barriers which were erected between him and other men by differences of taste, feeling, disposition, outlook, or character. Had he been one who pleased himself, he could have found excuse in nearly every case for holding aloof, but the question of liking, of harmony of opinion, never occurred to him as conditioning his relation to men. He pleased not himself.

On the contrary, there might be applied to him the words which a psalmist had spoken of himself (Psa. 69⁹): "For all words which have been so written were written for our instruction" (cf. 2 Tim. 3¹⁶). These ancient scriptures did not fulfill their purpose in their own time or for the old covenant. God intended them for Christians, who need their teaching. The burdens of life are so many, its requirements on their patience so constant, that they find it hard to maintain their hope. Yet what is the O.T. full of? Lessons of endurance and encouragement (Gore).

In v. 5 the words according to Christ Jesus are emphatic. They suggest at once the standard for the common mind for which Paul prays and the direction of its purpose. The words might be rendered, "May the God from whom come the endurance and the comfort grant unto you minds at harmony with one another and with Christ Jesus." If this be granted, they will in a body and with one voice glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

To the glory of God (v. 7). This is commonly taken to mean "for the greater glory of God," and connected (note the comma in R.V.) with both the foregoing clauses. And, of course, the greater glory of God is the ultimate issue both of the life of Christians and of the work of Christ in any of its aspects. But the rest of the verse seems hardly to give sufficient motive for the introduction of this idea; and while it is quite legitimate, it may be preferable to take the words as describing the admission of Christians by Christ "into the glory of God," the moral splendor of the divine character which men had forfeited through sin (cf. 3²³).

8-13. The Work of Christ first for the Jews, then for the Gentiles. It is difficult (though it is attempted by most commentators) to fit vv. 8-12 into the context in which we find them. It has been said that "in what follows we have the expansion and proof of the idea that God's glory (the glory of his faithfulness and mercy) is the end contemplated by Christ's reception alike of the Jews and of the Gentiles" (Weiss); that "we have here the conclusion of the argument begun in 14¹; probably the relations of the Jews and Gentiles were involved directly or indirectly in the relations of the weak and the strong" (Hort); that Paul "writes to remind the Gentiles that it is through the Jews that they are called, [and to remind] the Jews that the aim and purpose of their existence is the calling of the Gentiles" (Sanday and Headlam). None of these interpretations would seem to emerge naturally from Paul's words. But a paraphrase which would do justice to them would be as follows: "Welcome one another, for though the ministry of Christ was to the people of the circumcision because God would keep his promise, yet it led to the Gentiles glorifying God."

It is not easy to perceive the relevancy of the O.T. quotations which follow; only that the second (Deut. 32⁴³) brings the Gentiles into combination with the Jews, and the third (Psa. 117¹) summons the Gentiles to take their share in the praises of the Lord, and so anticipates their being brought to "call upon his name" or worship him. If, however, the purpose of these verses is to enforce the unity of Jews and Gentiles, so justifying the summons to "receive one another," it does seem to fulfill that purpose in a very obscure way; and while the introduction (v. 8) is very abrupt, and difficult to connect with v. 7, there is an equally abrupt transition between v. 12 and v. 13. Moreover, Dr. Rendel Harris has pointed out how Paul here suddenly returns to the use of a Book of Testimonies, a collection of texts from the O.T. arranged under headings, of which he appears to have made free use in chs. 9-11. And there is much to be said for Harris's suggestion that those verses really belong to the discussion carried on in these chapters, and have somehow fallen out of place. In that case v. 13 would form the natural conclusion to v. 7, and possibly the conclusion, so far as it has come down to us, of the Epistle in its original form (see intro.).

14-21. Direct Address to the Romans; Paul's Activity and Success. On the connection between the rest of this chapter and the Epistle as a whole see intro. (p. 1136). At this point the appearance of a personal touch is unmistakable. Paul is persuaded, he as well as others who have better acquaintance with the church at Rome, that the Roman Christians, as well as others better known to himself, are fully supplied with goodness and provided with spiritual knowledge of every kind, so that they are well able to give advice to one another. He has used a certain freedom in writing to them, desiring to refresh their memory, because of the function graciously intrusted to him by God. And that is "that I should be the minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles, fulfilling a priestly duty in respect of the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might prove acceptable, being consecrated by the Holy Spirit" (v. 16).

This verse (16) contains three striking illustrations of the figure of speech which the Greeks called "the unexpected." Three times does Paul give a startlingly unexpected turn to the thought, and in each case the turn is suggested by a single word. Two of the three words (ministering and offering) have definite association with the sacrificial system, and the third to which such an association may attach may be said to acquire it here from the context. That word is minister, which may mean no more than "public servant" or even "servant," but in connection with worship has a definitely technical sense. It is "exactly the word that would be used of the discharge of the priest's office in the Temple" (Sanday); and it is used here, says Thayer, of Paul likening himself to a priest. But his is a priesthood of an extraordinary kind. He is conscious of being a priest but—a priest of the Gentiles. The word ministering definitely means "ministering in sacrifice" (so R.V. mg.). But again the contents of this ministry in Paul's case is something hitherto unheard of; it is nothing else than the gospel of Christ (strictly here of God, but for their identity cf. Mk. 1¹ 11⁴); it is that which Paul handles in his priestly ministry. The word offering leaves even less room for variation in meaning; it refers to the offering up, the culmination of the sacrifice. But once more the unexpected falls like a blow. The matter of the offering is not anything of the kind used under the old dispensation. It is not even the "praise and thanksgiving" in which later writers of the O.T. had seen a sufficient and superior form of sacrifice. The matter of this sacrifice is nothing else than the Gentiles themselves (cf. 12¹), who having been united into a living body of Christ have further been consecrated by his Spirit.

The evidence of a priestly consciousness in the apostle cannot be gainsaid. But it is a priesthood of an entirely new order, dealing with a sacrifice of an entirely new kind. Paul was probably thinking of occasions when it was his privilege to preside at a celebration of the Lord's Supper, when, after he had been the instrument of the Holy Spirit in leading the brethren to realize their oneness in Christ, to realize themselves as forming a true body of Christ, and to participate in the cleansing of the Word and the consecration of the Spirit, he had led them to the solemn offering up of themselves to God as the climax of their worship. It is to this genuine though immaterial ("spiritual") sacrifice that we probably find further allusion in 1 Pet. 2⁵.

What we call Sacerdotalism has been the result of the perversion and materializing of this wholly spiritual and ethical conception, in which all the passages in early Christian literature which appear to connect the idea of sacrifice with the Lord's Supper find their true explanation. All such allusions have in view this self-presentation to God of the living Body of Christ, the church. The idea is found persisting down to the time of Augustine, who says, "The sacrifice itself is the body of Christ, which is not offered to them, for they themselves are it." And, again, "This is the Christian sacrifice, the many become one body in Christ"—material sacrifice of every kind had been utterly abolished. Even the personal body of Christ was offered, and could be offered, only once. But his living body, of which he was a part, could offer itself continually. It was thus, in presenting themselves to God as a living sacrifice, that Christians fulfilled the condition of spiritual worship. And the clue to all the early allusions to sacrifice in connection with the Lord's Supper is found in this phrase, "the offering up of the Gentiles."

"I have therefore in things pertaining to God my proud satisfaction in Christ Jesus. For I will not venture to tell of anything except what Christ has wrought through me to bring about the submission of the Gentiles both in word and in deed, what he has wrought in the power of signs and wonders, and of the Holy Spirit" (vv. 17-19). The power of the Holy Spirit had been manifested in connection with Paul's preaching, and in forms which could only be described as signs and wonders. Paul's claim that God worked miracles through him cannot be overlooked. It is confirmed in 2 Cor. 12¹², where he appeals to such things as proofs of his apostleship, and reminds the Corinthians that they had taken place within their observation. If, according to Headlam's definition, "a miracle means really the supremacy of the spiritual forces of the world to an extraordinarily marked degree over the merely material," the religious mind will have no difficulty in believing that such things took place. (See art., N.T. Miracles, pp. 927-9.)

V. 20 introduces us to a self-imposed rule to which Paul evidently attached great importance. So free was he from personal ambition and from sectarian narrowness (cf. Phil. 1¹⁸) that he studiously refrained from intruding upon ground where the work of evangelizing had already been done by others. Here he illustrates by two lines from Isaiah (52¹⁵) his method of going only to those who have not yet heard the gospel.

22-33. Paul's Plans for the Future. He announces that his ultimate purpose is to journey to Spain; and he looks forward to visiting Rome in passing. But meanwhile he has to complete a very important task. Many of the churches under his care have been busy for a long time past (cf. 2 Cor. 9²) making collections for the benefit of the poorer Christians at Jerusalem. And now that the collection is complete, Paul must first go thither in order to hand over their bounty.

Wherefore in v. 22 refers back to v. 19. It is because of the many openings and calls he has had in the East that he has been hindered these many times from visiting Rome. But now he sees no longer any opening in these countries for the pioneer work to which he is resolved to confine himself, and he casts his eye on the furthest west. His projected visit to Spain will give him the opportunity he has desired these many years of visiting Rome on the way. (As to whether the journey was ever made, see p. 1275.) He will see them and they will speed him on his way, after he has satisfied at least in part his longing to see them. The sentence in v. 24 should have closed with a repetition of his intention to visit Spain; but it remains unfinished, and he breaks in with a reference to the task immediately before him. "But at the present moment I am bound for Jerusalem to bring help to God's people there."

The collection (v. 26), the proceeds of which Paul was to take with him, was something in which he was greatly interested. He had given careful instructions concerning it to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 16^{1f}. 2 Cor. 8¹⁻⁴ 9², 12) as he had done previously to the churches in Galatia. He attached great importance to it not only because of the need of the church at Jerusalem but as the expression of the common brotherhood in which all the churches were bound together, and particularly as a possible means of healing the soreness between the Gentile and the Jewish sections of the church. Moreover, it was the payment of a debt. The Gentiles had been made partakers in the spiritual privileges of the Jewish Christians; they were bound, therefore, to minister to them in material things. When Paul had accomplished that duty the way would be open to Spain. But he seems to have felt some nervousness or anxiety about this visit to Jerusalem and what might await him there at the hands of unbelieving Jews. And he makes earnest entreaty that he may have the prayers of Christians at Rome not only for his personal safety, but that the help he is carrying may be appreciated by the Christians there, that they may accept it in the spirit in which it is bestowed. So will his coming to Rome be a joyful one. He concludes with the prayer that God the Author of peace may be with them.

By the love of the Spirit (v. 30), i.e., the love which the Spirit inspires (cf. 1 Thess. 1⁶ 2 Thess. 2¹³).

CHAPTER XVI

This chapter consists of five sections which are but loosely connected with one another; (1) a commendation of Phoebe; (2) an unprecedentedly long list of greetings; (3) a serious warning against party spirit and false teaching; (4) a short list of greetings from Paul's companions; and (5) a doxology. Apart from the last of these there is no reason to doubt that any one of them is from the pen of Paul; but there is reason to doubt whether they, all or any, belong to the Epistle in its original form. (On the questions thus raised, see intro., section on "Closing Chapters.")

1, 2. Commendation of Phoebe. Such letters of introduction given to Christians who were passing from one church to another were of great importance and very common in the early church. Paul commends Phoebe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchreae (the port of Corinth on the eastern side of the Isthmus) very warmly to those to whom she brought the letter. He invites them to stand by her in whatever matter she may have need of them, for she herself has been found a good patron and helper of many, including the apostle himself.

3-16. Greetings to Numerous Individuals. To this letter of commendation Paul may have attached this long list of greetings, which serves to reveal his strong personal attachments and his appreciation of the character and services of many men and women. Prisca (or Priscilla) and Aquila had been his fellow workers in Christ; nay, for his life they had risked their own; not only Paul but all the churches of the Gentiles had reason to be thankful to them and to the church which gathered at their house for worship. Observe how Paul emphasizes the thanks due from the Gentiles to Prisca and Aquila, who were Jews by birth. Paul had met them first in Corinth (Acts 18²), whither they had migrated from Rome when the Jews were expelled by Claudius, and they had subsequently accompanied Paul to Ephesus (Acts 18¹⁸⁻²⁶). The mention of the church in their house reminds us that not before the end of the second century do we find clear evidence of buildings specially set apart for Christian worship. Doubtless they came into use before we have evidence of their existence; but there was a long period during which the Christians were dependent upon the hospitality of those of their number who had houses large enough to accommodate them (cf. 1 Cor. 16¹⁹ Col. 4¹⁵ Philm. v. 2). The names which follow have all been found in ancient inscriptions, not only in Rome but in many parts of the empire, though some of them are rare. Nearly all of them appear to have been names which were commonly borne by slaves. Epenetus had been the first convert of the gospel in the province of Asia, as Stephanas had been in Greece (1 Cor. 16¹⁵). Andronicus and Junias were Paul's fellow countrymen who had also shared in one of his imprisonments. It is uncertain whether Junias was a woman (Junia). Chrysostom took that view, remarking on the fact that a woman was found worthy to be "one of note among the apostles." Beyond what Paul tells us about some of them nothing further is known about the persons mentioned here. It is probable that those which are of the household of Aristobulus were the dependents of the grandson of Herod the Great, who lived and died at Rome. They would doubtless include many Jews who had become Christians. Herodion naturally suggests the same origin. Rufus may have been the same who is mentioned in Mk. 15²¹, the son of Simon of Cyrene; his mother had been also as a mother to Paul. The closing sentence is remarkable for its reference to the churches of Christ, a phrase found only here in all the N.T. Elsewhere we read of the church, or churches, of God.

17-20. Sudden Introduction of Serious Warnings. The sudden change both of subject and of tone is not easy to account for. There is nothing in the foregoing chapters to account for his sharp warning against party spirit and false teachers. The discussion hitherto has been conducted without any direct reference to special circumstances in the community addressed. Those who think that this paragraph belongs to the Epistle suggest that "now at the end of his writing the apostle with a sudden impulse breaks through the reserve he has hitherto practised, clearly indicates his opponents, warns the Romans while praising them, and expresses his confidence in the ultimate victory of the right" (Lietzmann). The fact remains, however, that there is no reason to presume any such previous "reserve," neither has there been anything to suggest the presence or activity of definite opponents or propagators of false teaching. It seems more probable that Paul is here addressing a community which was better known to him than that at Rome, and one where the circumstances were different.

V. 19 guards against any suggestion that he is criticizing the community as a whole; it is only the mischief-makers he has in view, "I would have you experts in good, innocents in evil" (Moffatt). Ancient authorities differ as to the position of the benediction (v. 20b), some placing it here and others after v. 23.

21-23. Greetings from Paul's Companions—Timothy and Sosipater (cf. Acts 20⁴), Lucius, who may be the Lucius of Cyrene mentioned in Acts 13¹, and Jason, who appears as Paul's host in Acts 17⁵. Tertius, who has acted as Paul's amanuensis, puts in a greeting of his own. Finally, Erastus, the city treasurer, a man of importance, adds his greeting, and Quartus, whose only claim to recognition is that he also is a member of the Christian Church.

24-27. Concluding Doxology. V. 24 is now omitted by R.V. (see on v. 20). The appearance of a doxology at this point is contrary to the usual practice of Paul, who generally concludes his letter with a benediction. And its contents present a somewhat mechanical combination of phrases which have played their part at the beginning of the Epistle (e.g., "stablish you," cf. 1¹¹; "my gospel," cf. 2¹⁶; "obedience of faith," cf. 1⁵) with others which are specially characteristic of the Pastoral Epistles. "It is very difficult to believe that such mosaic work is the original composition of Paul" (Denney). When it is further remembered that the position of this doxology is uncertain, some ancient authorities placing it after 14²³, it will appear as most probable that it was provided by some later hand for an Epistle which was felt to lack a suitable ending.

FIRST AND SECOND CORINTHIANS

BY PROFESSOR W. F. HOWARD

INTRODUCTION

Paul's Relations with Corinth. The story of Paul's arrival at Corinth in the course of his Second Missionary Journey, of his breach with the synagogue, of the founding of the church, and of his successful proclamation of the gospel during a residence of eighteen months is told in Acts 18¹⁻¹⁸. Luke also records a later visit, when Paul, after his long stay in Asia, left Ephesus, journeyed through Macedonia and spent three months in Greece (Acts 20³). Between these two visits we must find room for a vigorous correspondence between Paul and his Corinthian converts, the dispatch of two trusty messengers, a hurried and unsuccessful visit by Paul himself, and a crisis unparalleled in Paul's missionary career, when this important church flouted his authority and was nearly lost to the apostolic obedience (cf. p. 940b).

The following outline represents the probable sequence of events.

(1) Paul, after eighteen months at Corinth (Acts 18¹ 1 Cor. 11⁴⁻¹⁶ 21³⁶, etc.), left with Aquila and Priscilla, and settled at Ephesus, where later on he was joined by Apollos, who had continued his work at Corinth (cf. Acts 18^{18, 19, 27, 28} 19¹ 1 Cor. 16²).

(2) Paul wrote his first letter (A) to Corinth, alluded to in 1 Cor. 5⁹. Almost certainly part of this is embedded in 2 Cor. 6¹⁴⁻⁷¹. Some scholars suspect other fragments in 1 Cor. 6¹²⁻²⁰ 10¹⁻²².

(3) The Corinthian church replied in a letter (probably brought by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, 1 Cor. 16¹⁷) asking a number of questions. Meanwhile Chloe's people (11¹) brought Paul news of factions in the church. Paul's reply to all that he had been asked and had learned forms the Epistle (B), known as First Corinthians. In it he rebukes party spirit and every lapse from the highest Christian standards, answers certain specific questions (7¹ 8¹ 12¹), announces that Timothy will come as his representative (4¹⁷ 16¹⁰), and that he will himself follow as soon as possible (4¹⁹ 16², 5-7).

(4) Timothy left for Corinth with Erastus, via Macedonia (Acts 19²²). Either he did not reach Corinth, or, more probably, he proved unequal to the emergency. Hearing that the situation was getting out of hand, Paul paid a hurried visit (unrecorded in Acts but implied in 2 Cor. 21¹²⁻¹⁴ 13¹). This was evidently an unhappy visit, when Paul suffered insult and defiance from some recalcitrant member of the Corinthian church. We infer from 2 Cor. 25-8 that ultimately the offender was disciplined by a majority of the church, and Paul was able to plead for his reinstatement. Possibly a sudden attack of Paul's recurrent malady prostrated him at the moment when he needed all his energy to cope with the revolt (2 Cor. 10¹⁰).

(5) On his return to Ephesus, Paul wrote (C), a severe letter (cf. 2 Cor. 23, 9 78-12), which he sent by the hand of Titus, who was to return by way of Macedonia and Troas. It is widely, but not universally, believed that part of this letter is preserved in 2 Cor. 10-13. (It has been suggested with less cogency that to (C) also belong 2 Cor. 21⁴⁻⁶ 13 and 72-4).

(6) After a grave illness in Asia (2 Cor. 18, 9) Paul set out for Macedonia, abandoning a project of a direct visit to Corinth in the present state of the church (11^{5, 16, 23}). At Troas, in spite of evangelistic opportunities, he pressed on to Macedonia in utmost concern about the result of his admonitory letter (21³). Here his anxiety was relieved by the arrival of Titus with excellent tidings of the restored discipline within the church, and the affectionate regard of the members for Paul (75-16).

(7) Thereupon Paul wrote (D), a letter of warm affection, contained in 2 Cor. 1-9, sending it by Titus and two other honored brothers, who were to complete the collection of the gift for the Jerusalem Christians before Paul's arrival (2 Cor. 8).

(8) Paul's last visit to Corinth (Acts 20², 3).

Corinth: The City and the Church. The largest and most prosperous city in Greece was destroyed by Lucius Mummius, the Roman general, when crushing the Achæan League, 146 B.C. Just a hundred years later Julius Cæsar refounded Corinth as a Roman colony. Its commanding position on the isthmus separating the Saronic and the Corinthian gulfs gave it high commercial importance as a center of trade between the eastern and western Mediterranean. As the political capital of the Roman province of Achaia it was the seat of the proconsular government (cf. Acts 18¹²). Its large population was made up of native Greeks, Roman colonists, Jewish settlers, and a mixed crowd of sailors, and traders from the east. A few men of standing and wealth joined the church, but for the most part the gospel won its recruits from the artisans and dock-laborers, the petty tradesmen, the slaves and freedmen, who formed a large proportion of the populace. The two deities held in special honor at Corinth were Poseidon, patron of the famous Isthmian games (cf. 1 Cor. 9²⁴⁻²⁷), and Aphrodite, whose temple, with its thousand dedicated prostitutes, towered above the city on the lofty summit of the Acrocorinthus. Thus the foulest immorality flourished under the sanction of religion, and Corinth became proverbial for its vice through all the Greek world. Temples in honor of Serapis and Isis bore witness to the prevalence of the mystery religions. Wandering exponents of Oriental mysteries, sophists and rhetoricians found a ready hearing in this cosmopolitan vortex. It is not to be wondered at that Paul's main troubles in this church arose from the low moral standards of pagan converts, the factiousness traditional in Greek democracy, a superficial intellectualism, and a tendency to exalt impressive accomplishments at the expense of ethical values.

The Message and the Value of These Letters. For the curious minds and corrupt lives of the people at Corinth Paul proclaimed one supreme message, "the word of the cross." The wisdom of God and the power of God shown forth in a crucified Christ are the theme of the early chapters of First Corinthians. In all that follows we see how Paul applies that message to the problems of personal and social life. In Second Corinthians he goes further in the argumentative exposition of this message (51^{4f.}). Most of the questions discussed in the light of the cross are due to the human failings in an undisciplined and imperfectly instructed society, or to the perplexities inevitable when a new ethical standard is applied to complex relationships that are only partially adjusted to a fresh way of life. The Christian thinker here reveals himself as a practical administrator. Theology leads to statesmanship. But there is one matter of speculative interest which arises directly from the word of the cross. The cross is the symbol not only of the death but of its sequel, the resurrection. In 1 Cor. 15 and 2 Cor. 4¹⁸⁻⁵¹⁰ we have Paul's first clear treatment of the Christian's reasoned hope in victory over death. His interpretation here of the resurrection of the body still commends itself to the Christian mind.

Each letter has a value of its own. First Corinthians of all Paul's letters shows most fully the peculiar perils and problems of a missionary church in the first century. It is of priceless worth for the incidental evidence that it supplies regarding the primitive Christian tradition about the institution of the Lord's Supper and the appearances of the risen Lord. It proves that in that early age before a single written Gospel was in existence the Christian Church was guided by the memory and tradition not only of what Jesus both said and did, but also by what he was. Second Corinthians is the most vehemently personal of all Paul's letters, and is more autobiographical even than Galatians. It both sustains and supplements the narrative of Acts, and at the same time reminds us how many chapters in the life of the great apostle must forever remain unwritten (see 11^{23f.}). Nowhere else does the rich human nature of the man reveal itself so openly. Paul himself stands before us in its pages with his fiery energy, his indomitable zeal, his mystic raptures, his abysmal despondency, his mordant irony, his scorching indignation, his tender affectionateness, his pride and his humility, his uttermost love and wonder at the grace and glory of the Lord Jesus. This letter alone is enough to show how great Paul was, both as a man and as a Christian.

Main Divisions of the First Letter. These divisions are as follows:

- I. Greeting and Thanksgiving, 11-9.
- II. Parties in the Church, 11⁰-421.
- III. Moral Disorders in the Church, 51-620.
- IV. Reply to Questions that Have Perplexed the Church:
 - (1) Sex, 71-40.
 - (2) Sacrificial Food and Social Life, 81-111.
- V. Disorders in Church Assemblies, 112-1440.
 - (1) Spiritual Gifts, 121-1440.
- VI. The Resurrection of the Dead, 151-58.
- VII. Administrative and Personal, 161-24.

Main Divisions of Second Letter. For these, see pp. 1194-5.

Literature: Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church; Deissmann, Paul; Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul; David Smith, The Life and Letters of St. Paul; E. D. Burton, Letters and Records of the Apostolic Age; D. A. Hayes, Paul and His Epistles; also, as condensed commentaries (especially of the very difficult Second Epistle), A. S. Way's translation, The Letters of St. Paul, and Moffatt, A New Translation of the N.T.

FIRST CORINTHIANS

CHAPTER I

1-3. Address and Greeting. Paul emphasizes his direct missionary vocation, couples with his own name that of a brother known at Corinth (probably not Sosthenes the synagogue ruler of Acts 18¹⁷), reminds his readers of their call to lead a dedicated life, and includes in his appeal the members of all the churches in Achaia. They are to be united in reverent worship of Jesus as Lord, and in the brotherhood of the church. Greetings characteristic of the Greek and Hebrew worlds of thought (grace, peace) receive a new meaning when God is revealed in Christ.

4-9. Thanksgiving for the Corinthian Church. A comparison with his other letters shows that Paul's prayers for his churches are not stereotyped forms, but reveal a just sense of the spiritual state of the local community. In natural endowments this church was rich; but observe Paul's silence here upon those less showy gifts which endeared the Philippian church to him. Yet their hope in the Parousia (the revelation of v. 7) is evidence of a faith which God will not disappoint. In the fellowship of God's Son they will be sustained and prepared for the ordeal of the day of Judgment.

CHAPTERS 110 TO 421: PARTIES IN THE CHURCH

10-17. Their Unhappy Divisions: Paul not Responsible. The fellowship has been broken and the church prevented from declaring the mind of Christ to the world (cf. 21⁶ Eph. 420-32) by the spirit of faction. Recent visitors have reported that the names of three renowned missionaries are being debased into sectarian watchwords. Paul protests that sectarianism is a mutilation of Christ—horrible thought! Grateful as the converts may well feel to those who led them to the light, Christ alone has died for them, and into his name alone have they been baptized. Happily, Paul cannot be charged with attempting to gain a personal ascendancy, for he remembers with thankfulness that only a few of his converts were baptized at his hands. His supreme concern had been the proclamation of the good news with such simplicity that neither the intellectual subtlety nor the rhetorical splendor of the form of the message should conceal its substance—the paradox of a gibbeted Messiah.

12. The verse is difficult, for it seems to presuppose four parties in the church, one of which was the self-styled Christ-party. The words I [am] of Christ have been variously explained. (a) As a protest against party spirit by a section of the church which was scandalized by the glorification of human leaders. In that case Paul would hardly have included this among the party cries. (b) As an arrogant attempt to claim a monopoly of Christian loyalty. But Paul would surely have added some word in condemnation of such a pretension. (c) As a claim of a small number to have been personal disciples of Jesus (cf. 2 Cor. 10⁷) and therefore that they are superior to their fellows. This is improbable at Corinth, though 2 Cor. 5¹⁶ might be so interpreted. (d) As the watchword of a Jewish Messianic party of which there is no further trace in either Epistle. (e) As Paul's vehement counter-assertion to the sectarian shibboleths (cf. 32³, ye are Christ's): "I am Christ's bond-servant and can be no party leader." (f) As a gloss, originally written in the margin by a scribe and brought later into the text. This was the view of J. Weiss, the greatest commentator on this Epistle, but it is an explanation to be entertained only when a passage will otherwise yield no sense. We must not infer from 4⁶ that there were no such parties in Corinth as those which professed special allegiance to Paul and Apollos. It is significant that no heresiarch gave his name to a party. It is not false teaching but factious hero worship which Paul deprecates. Jewish Christians would cling to the name of Cephas (the Aramaic form for Peter), "advanced" adherents would favor the rhetorical exuberance and the philosophical terminology of Apollos the Alexandrian Jew (cf. Acts 18²⁴⁻¹⁹¹), while some who owed their souls to the gospel preached by Paul would defend his name with defiant loyalty.

14. No disparagement is intended of baptism, which is assumed by Paul as the normal rite of initiation into the Christian community (12¹³ Rom. 6^{3f}. Gal. 3²⁷ Col. 2¹²). Gentile converts knew that in the mystery religions a special relationship was observed between the initiate and the mystagogue. Jews were familiar with the title "the disciples of John the Baptist." Paul's custom of leaving the baptism of most of his converts to his colleagues has secured him from the reproach of aiming at the personal attachment of devotees. For Crispus see Acts 18⁸; Gaius, Rom. 16²³ (not the Macedonian of Acts 19²⁹); the household of Stephanas, 16¹⁵.

18-25. The Reproach of the Cross. The central message of the Christian revelation is the cross. This is the touchstone of character.

Those who can see in it only the crowning absurdity of the apostolic tale seal their own doom. They lack the moral discernment to recognize their need and God's response to it. Those who are on the way to life eternal are those who discover in the very shame and weakness of the cross the way by which God's power is saving the world. It is no new thing for the worldly wise to perish in their blind self-confidence. Isaiah had warned the politicians of Jerusalem that by their statecraft they were heading for disaster (Isa. 29¹⁴). Their successors can be found in Greek sophists, Jewish rabbis, nimble dialecticians. Which of these has a message commensurate with the impending crisis? Their horizon is limited to the present age, and their boasted wisdom is proved bankrupt. It was part of an all-wise dispensation that the quest of human wisdom after God should fail. Man's extremity is God's opportunity. Intellectual pride is staggered by the nature of the proclamation. Yet

"Where reason fails, with all her powers,
There faith prevails and love adores."

It is this believing response to the preaching of a foolish theme that saves a soul alive. This is the paradox of the divine wisdom. God falsifies the expectation of mankind. The Jew demands a sign or guarantee (cf. Mk. 8^{11f.}), which is a moral impossibility in the region of faith (Lk. 16³¹). The Greek relies exclusively upon wisdom or the speculative reason, and insists upon a philosophy of life. Our one reply to both is the challenging declaration of a crucified Messiah (v. 23). The Jew stumbles at this emblem of servitude, this badge of failure. The Greek is repelled by the futility of such a manifesto. But those of us, whatever our nationality or temperament, who have heard and answered God's call have found in that very aspect of the Christian story which to the world seems the tragic climax of ineffectiveness the sure evidence of God's power and God's wisdom. His wisdom, because God's apparent foolishness has revealed to us his nature as the wisest of men never discovered it; his power, for what seemed contemptible weakness in the defeat of Calvary has proved to be the force that raises us into newness of life.

20. The language has echoes of Isa. 19¹¹, 12 33¹⁸ 44²⁵.

21. R.V. mg. is better. It is the foolishness of the thing preached, the preacher's theme, i.e., a crucified Christ, which brings deliverance. Observe that all through this paragraph it is not Paul's design to disparage philosophy as such, but, rather, the arrogant self-sufficiency of mere intellectualism—"Every high aspiring thought, that would not stoop to thee."

For the thought in v. 18 (us which are being saved) and v. 24 (them that are called), cf. Browning's "Abt Vogler," stanza 11:

"But God has a few of us whom he whispers in the ear;

The rest may reason and welcome: 'tis we musicians know."

26-31. Christ the Wisdom of God. Paul now turns the tables upon the self-satisfied Corinthians by reminding them that their own call into the church was proof of God's resourceful wisdom. Few of them had any title to worldly respect by reason of knowledge, influence, or birth, yet they had been selected that God might carry out his sovereign plan. Apostolic tact brings in the saving phrase not many. A few men of distinction were to be found among the artisans, dock-laborers, slaves and freedmen who formed the bulk of the membership of this church. True to his age-long method, God to achieve his ends chose out of all the wealth of the world those who were deemed of no account. The reason for this is stated in a sentence which sounds the knell of Pharisaism—that no flesh should glory before God (v. 29). This is central to Paul's theology (Rom. 3²⁷ Eph. 2⁹). It is an echo of the teaching of Jesus (Lk. 18⁹⁻¹⁴). Status and merit are irrelevant considerations when man stands before God. Cf. Tennyson, "In Memoriam," lines 35, 36:

"For merit lives from man to man,
And not from man, O Lord, to thee."

It is in the heart purged of pride that God's power operates most effectually (cf. 2 Cor. 12⁹, 10). It is altogether of God's grace that these despised nobodies have found a place and status in the fellowship of Jesus the Messiah. Paul has reminded them of their lowly origin that he may magnify their new estate. To him, as well as to them, Jesus the Messiah has become the revelation of the true Wisdom. The doctrine of a gibbeted Messiah has been derided as "sheer folly." But it has passed the practical test; for this crucified Christ has brought Paul and his converts into a new religious status by making them morally righteous, ethically pure, spiritually free. Such a vitalizing and regenerating energy, far more than mere knowledge, deserves to be called wisdom, for it manifestly comes from God. Thus we can give a new meaning to the prophetic word that boasting or glorifying is to be in the Lord alone.

30. Note how the ironical harping on the foolishness or "folly" of the cross is now dropped as the supreme wisdom of Christ crucified is enforced and vindicated by reference to his threefold gift of righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

31. The citation is from Jer. 923, 24. It is noteworthy for the transference in meaning of the Lord from God to Christ. This frequent N.T. adaptation of O.T. allusions to Jehovah is deeply significant (cf. 216).

It is possible, though not certain, that the phrase Christ the wisdom of God (v. 24) and the statement Who was made unto us wisdom from God (v. 30) refer to the identification of Jesus with the personified Wisdom of Prov. 812, 22, 23, 30 Ecclesiasticus 11-20 Wisdom 722-821. That Paul does apply to Jesus language originally used of Wisdom is clear from Col. 115f. The resemblance between Heb. 13 and Wisdom 726 is closer still. The Wisdom of Solomon (an apocryphal book) was a product of Alexandrian Judaism (see p. 197a) and it is not unlikely that the Alexandrian Jew Apollos had given in Corinth an impulse to this Christian appropriation of the Wisdom passages. There is reason, however, to think that the equation of Wisdom and Christ goes back to Jesus himself (cf. Lk. 1149 Mt. 2334). Notice the resemblances between 1 Cor. 119-27 and Mt. 1125-27, where the words of Jesus which follow are based upon the language of Wisdom (cf. Ecclesiasticus 626-28 5126, 27). It may well be that in the present chapter we have the germ of the thought which reappears in the developed Christology of Col. 1 (cf. pp. 1066-7).

CHAPTER II

1-5. Paul's Way of Preaching Christ. The apostle has not spared the Corinthians in exposing their vain pretensions to superior wisdom and standing. But the sting of sarcasm is removed when he places himself on the same lowly level. They are reminded of his own first arrival in their city, a preacher of God's testimony who dispensed with the arts of the rhetorician and the sophist. He had already resolved to know nothing while in their midst but Jesus as Messiah, and that a crucified Messiah. The messenger was as unpretentious as his message. He came to them in a state of bodily weakness and nervous anxiety. The style and the substance of his preaching were marked by no graces of oratory, no philosophic subtlety. Yet it wrought conviction in his hearers by means of a spiritual force which came from God. Thus Paul's purpose and method matched the very nature of the gospel. The faith that was evoked depended on no human cleverness but on the power of God.

1. Perhaps the better reading (so R.V. mg.)

is the testimony of God. Simplicity and directness of statement befit one who is giving evidence.

3. From Acts 1714-1811 and 1 Thess. 31-10 we may supply the interpretation of this poignant sentence. Jewish intrigue and mob violence had interrupted the successful mission, first at Thessalonica and then at Bercea. Paul arrived at Athens alone, Silas and Timothy being left to confirm the harassed disciples in these Macedonian cities. Challenged to give an account of his teaching before the Areopagus (the court which licensed public lecturers in that university center, see Ramsay, Paul the Traveler, pp. 246f.), Paul in a skillful exordium prepared the way for a sympathetic hearing of his message. But the mention of Jesus and the resurrection was misunderstood as the proclamation of two fresh divinities, and the audience broke up. The speech was not a failure, for one member of that court was won for the faith. A few other converts were gained at Athens, but Paul was depressed by the superficial religiosity of the city, and saw no hope of making a deep impression. Moreover, he was burdened with anxiety about the newly founded churches in the north, and was restless for the arrival of his colleagues with the latest tidings. This condition of mental depression in which he arrived at Corinth probably induced a return of his recurrent malady (cf. Gal. 413 2 Cor. 18-11 1130 125, 9, 10). The style of address quite properly suited to the Areopagus was not congenial to Paul's temperament, and it was discarded with relief at Corinth. Here Paul was cheered by the return of his colleagues with good news from Macedonia, and a successful synagogue ministry was followed up by a vigorous assertion of the Messiahship of Jesus.

6-16. God's Wisdom in a Mystery. Paraphrase: "Yet simply as the divine message in Christ has been presented at Corinth, let no one imagine that simplicity precludes profundity. To men of ripe understanding we impart wisdom: not indeed as this passing world understands that term, nor the dark powers who are in control of this world, though their days are numbered. To men of mature experience we utter as an open secret God's hidden purpose which he cherished before the worlds were formed with a view to our sharing in his glorious life. Had the dark powers who influence human destiny been aware of this divine purpose they would never have committed the monstrous folly of putting the Lord of glory to the shameful death of a slave. They did not fathom the bold magnificence of the method of God's wisdom—the cross the path to glory—so in their craft and force they overreached themselves. It is otherwise with us. The wisdom that we impart consists of "Things which eye never saw, and ear never heard, Things which never entered into the heart of man, All that God prepared for those that love him" (thus read v. 9). To us who have this discerning love God has unveiled his secrets through that Spirit who searches and discloses the deep designs of God. For as a man's secret thoughts are hidden from his fellow men and are known only to his own spirit, so only the Spirit of God perceives the thoughts of God. But it is that Spirit which issues from God himself that we have received, not the spirit which animates and blinds worldly-minded men. This has God added to all his other lavish gifts, so that we might know what is ours in Christ. The language in which we make this revelation known is not that acquired from human philosophy but that learned in the school of the Spirit, for we need a spiritual medium to convey spiritual truth (v. 13). Now the unspiritual man does not welcome the teachings of the Spirit of God, for they seem mere folly to him. He cannot understand them, for they are appraised only by spiritual tests. But the spiritual man can put all things to the test, and is himself subjected to no human test. For we Christians, by virtue of our spiritual fellowship, become the organ through which the mind of Christ finds expression. He lives in us; we share his thoughts. While this relationship holds good we may confidently quote the prophet's challenge: "For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he should instruct him?" (Isa. 40¹³ in LXX.)

6. The perfect. It has been urged by some recent writers that Paul is here using a technical term from the mystery religions, in the sense of "those who have been initiated into the Christian mystery." The evidence for such a contemporary use of the Greek word is not convincing, and every occurrence in Paul's writings is covered by the rendering "mature." In view, however, of the probability that some members of the Corinthian church had been formerly in close touch with these cults, and bearing in mind Paul's ironical allusion to such an initiate in Col. 2¹⁸, we must allow for the possibility that the language here is two-edged. For the anticipatory sense in which Paul uses the term of comparative novices in the Christian life, see Phil. 3^{12, 15}; cf. his use of "saints" in 1¹, also the appeal in Rom. 6¹¹. The rulers of this world (see also v. 8) are not the Roman authorities or the Jewish chief priests, who were the historical instruments in the crucifixion of Jesus, nor yet the moral rulers of the world, the philosophers. The reference is to "the rulers of this dark world, the spiritual hosts of evil in the heavenly regions" (thus read Eph. 6¹²). See also Col. 2¹⁵ and mg., and read "When he despoiled the principalities and the authorities and made an open parade of them, leading them in his triumphal procession by means of the cross." They are coming to nought because they belong to this age, which (15²⁴) is fast hastening to an end. (For this survival of later Jewish angelology and demonology in the Christian thought of Paul, cf. pp. 204-6; see Glover, Jesus in the Experience of Men, ch. 1.)

7. In a mystery goes with we speak rather than with wisdom. The proclamation of this wonderful purpose of God is conditioned by the spiritual fitness of the hearer. But there is no solemnly guarded secret which the Christian initiate is sworn never to divulge. Apostolic reserve follows the counsel of Mt. 7⁶. To the ordinary mind the redemptive purpose of God working through the tragedy of the cross is a thing incredible. The mystic secret is open to all who do not shrink from the means by which God "brings many sons to glory" (Heb. 2¹⁰). Cf. J. H. Newman's "O loving wisdom of our God," "O wisest love"; and Charles Wesley's "Wisdom in a mystery of bleeding love unfold." The end of all the travail of the Lord of glory is that we should share in the unimaginable bliss of the divine life.

9. The rhythmic lines are given as though they were cited from the O.T. The first and third lines are a reminiscence of Isa. 64⁴ and the second line of Isa. 65¹⁷. But the resemblance is far from exact. Origen attributes the quotation to the Secrets of Elias, and Jerome found it in this apocalypse, as also in the Ascension of Isaiah, but denies Paul's debt to these later apocryphal sources. It is of interest to notice that the words are quoted (from 1 Corinthians?) in ch. 34 of the letter from Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, exactly as here, but with "them that wait for him" (as in Isa. 64⁴) instead of them that love him (see Ante-Nicene Fathers, Edinburgh edition, vol. 1, p. 14).

13. The paraphrase given above brings out the meaning generally given to the text followed by the R.V. The translation comparing spiritual things with spiritual hardly yields an intelligible meaning. It is, rather, "combining spiritual truth with spiritual expression." R.V. mg. interpreting spiritual truth (or things, A.S.V. mg.) to spiritual men better agrees with the context. Some scholars think that words has crept into the text from v. 4, "in words of wisdom." With this omission read the whole verse thus: "Of which we speak also —not amongst men who are instructed by human wisdom, but amongst men who are taught by the Spirit, explaining (literally, bringing together) spiritual revelations to spiritual men." This suits the argument of the whole paragraph, that the deep counsels of God can only be appreciated by spiritually minded men.

14. The natural man. The word so translated stands in classical Greek for the man who is under the control of the reason. With Paul it has a slightly disparaging flavor. Such a man is far removed from the sensualist, and represents unregenerate human nature at the highest. "Humanist" gives the meaning approximately.

15. The man whose mind is illumined by the Spirit of God, and shares the thoughts of Christ, has a criterion by which he can test every principle of conduct. Insofar as he conforms to the mind of Christ he is beyond the range of the natural man's assessment. The mere humanist is no more competent in that sphere than is one who is tone-deaf to criticize music, or a man who is color-blind to discuss a painting. Cf. Letters of James Denney to Robertson Nicoll, p. 216: "Nothing in [Mark Rutherford's] story seems to explain adequately his antipathy to evangelicalism; it seems to me pretty much another proof that literature is the work of the natural man, and that non-conforming self-conscious virtue is essentially repugnant to it. Of course, such virtue is very liable to Pharisaism, and can be criticized by inspiration, but it is much more frequently caricatured from a lower level than corrected from a higher."

CHAPTER III

1-9. Sectarian Rivalry Blind to Divine Use of Complementary Service. By an adroit transition Paul returns to the theme of 21-5, explaining why, with all their boasted gifts of utterance and knowledge, he could preach the gospel only in its simplest form to them. When first he visited them, they were in a rudimentary stage of Christian experience—so we may paraphrase—Christ's little ones who needed spiritual milk, and could not assimilate food appropriate for the full grown. Even now, when time has brought development, they are still unfit for what only the spiritually-minded can receive. Their ethical relationships disclose a state of mind in no way different from that which might be looked for in ordinary men. Jealousy and faction can have nothing in common with the mind of Christ. How could those in tune with the divine will raise these party watch words? (V. 4.) Apollos and Paul are nothing in themselves. Rather are they servants, each with his own peculiar gift, through whom the Corinthians were brought into the Christian life by a decisive act of faith. What though Paul planted the seed which has grown into this church, and Apollos watered the growing plant? All the processes of growth, all the elements that contribute to its life, are from God alone. The planter and the waterer are one in aim and service, though each is responsible for his separate duty. Paul and Apollos are fellow servants in God's service. The Corinthian church is God's tilth, or, to change the figure, God's building.

1-3. Three words of great importance in the Pauline psychology occur in these verses. That rendered spiritual means "having a nature in which spirit predominates," i.e., in which the human spirit is united with the Spirit of God. Carnal in v. 1 renders a Greek word (sarkinos) meaning "made of flesh," "having a nature in which the fleshly qualities still predominate." The same word in v. 3 (twice) is used to translate a term (Greek sarkikos) which is more distinctly ethical, "having the characteristics of flesh," "carnally minded." The former carries no reproach when applied to those who are still in their spiritual infancy. The latter marks a low standard of worldly behavior.

8. For the idea of reward, cf. v. 14, 45 917 1558 Gal. 64, 5 2 Jn. v. 8. It is used to emphasize the reality of moral responsibility, as in Mt. 1627 Rom. 26 and the two parables Mt. 2514-30 Lk. 1912-27. Some writers affect to despise it as a survival of the commercialized ethic of Judaism. But the reward is regarded as internal rather than external, and it represents the principle that no good is ineffectual in a morally ordered universe.

10-15. The Foundation and the Superstructure; Ordeal by Fire. Here the metaphor is changed from a tended field to a building. Paraphrase: "It was by God's grace—so Paul writes—that, like a sound master-mason, I laid a foundation which will endure. It is upon Jesus Christ whom I preached that all who are building will base their work. There is no question about the foundation; but let the builders be sure of their material and build only what will endure. Does one man use precious metals and costly marbles, while another makes use of wood and thatch? The difference will be disclosed in the testing day when fire will be the instrument of God's ordeal (v. 13). The quality of each man's work will then be clearly shown, for one will have the reward of seeing his life-work stand, while the other will suffer the penalty of seeing his life-work perish in flames. Singed and scarred he shall escape from the burning pile. He is not doomed to death, for he has at least built upon the true foundation. It is his work that suffers destruction."

16, 17. The Church the Temple of God. Paraphrase: "You are God's building, as I said. Need I explain to men of knowledge the character of that building? It is a sacred shrine in which God's very presence dwells. You are the church of the living God. Woe to him who desecrates by foul conduct the temple consecrated by the habitation of the Holy Spirit. Woe to him who brings this hallowed structure down in ruins by his divisive efforts."

16. Ye are a temple of God. Here, as in 2 Cor. 6¹⁶, the reference is to the Christian society as the home of the Spirit. For the same metaphor, cf. Eph. 2²⁰⁻²² Col. 2⁷ 1 Pet. 2⁵. For the individual as a temple of the Spirit, see under 6¹⁹.

18-23. The Folly of Worldly Wisdom; The Unlimited Wealth of the Christian. As happens so often in Paul's letters (cf. 12³¹⁻¹³ 2 Cor. 8⁹ Phil. 2⁵⁻¹¹—all roads lead to Christ!), a trifling occasion, or some failure in conduct, starts an argument in which the writer is borne far beyond the expected goal to assert an abiding truth of religion. Logic here passes into inspired appeal, and we are swept onward from party strife at Corinth, through realms of experience and worlds unknown, to the throne of the universe.

"Be on your guard"—so we may paraphrase—"against the self-deception of worldly wisdom. The only wisdom worth gaining is that which brings us to God. This he gives only to those who have taken the first step toward wisdom by acknowledging their simplicity. Scripture has given us many warnings that disaster overtakes the strategy of the clever who will not stoop to learn from God. Put not your trust in mere man. Yours is a vast inheritance in which all human agents are your ministers through whom God bestows his gifts on you. The world with all its wealth is yours, in life and death, in the present age and in the age to come. You are lords of creation, just because you are owned by Christ, who himself bows to the sovereign sway of the Father."

18. Wise in this world, literally, in this age (R.V. mg.), implying the passing fashion of worldly wisdom.

CHAPTER IV

1-5. The True Standard of Judgment. Paraphrase: "Let there be then no more of this excessive valuation of mere men, who are but servants of Christ, and stewards of the secret truths of God. Are we stewards? In that case the chief qualification is fidelity (cf. Lk. 16¹⁰). So it is a matter of indifference to me what inquiries into my fitness may be conducted by you or any human tribunal. I am not even concerned to search my own heart, for my conscience is not uneasy. Not that this acquits me, but the one judge to whom I am accountable is the Lord. Therefore withhold your criticism until the Lord comes. He it is who will bring all dark secrets to light, and expose men's real motives. Then, and not till then, every man will get his due praise, and it will come from God."

6-13. The Corinthian Disciples Superior to Their Teachers! Paraphrase: "Now I have used these illustrations from farm life and building (3⁵⁻¹⁰), and have brought in my name and that of Apollos to show you that you have no warrant from us for this vain party rivalry. What claim has any one of you to superiority? Have you any spiritual possession which has not come to you as a free gift? Then is there any ground for boasting? The trouble is that the disciples have grown too big to acknowledge their teachers! You Corinthians have all you want; you have made your fortune; you have come into your kingdom, and we are left outside! Would that you had really come into your kingdom, for then we might share in your royal bounty! How far away we are from that dream! It seems rather as though God had made a public spectacle of us missionaries, for all the world, angels as well as men, to gaze at (v. 9.) We are the doomed captives at the end of the triumphal procession. While we preach the sheer folly of the crucified Messiah, you secure a reputation for an 'intellectual faith.' Mark the contrast between your strength and influence and our weakness and low repute. We know what it is to go without the bare necessities of life, to suffer violence, to roam as homeless vagrants (cf. Mt. 8²⁰), to toil at manual labor. We have learned to submit with gentle dignity to insult, persecution, slander. To this day we are accustomed to be treated as the scum of society, the refuse of the world."

6. The five Greek words translated not to go beyond the things which are written are almost certainly a marginal gloss which originally called attention to a copyist's error in the manuscript. (See Expository Times, xxxiii, p. 479, where they are shown to make excellent sense as a marginal note.) Their intrusion reduces the text to nonsense, from which no expository ingenuity has ever drawn a satisfactory meaning. Without these words the text states, "I have used these metaphors in writing of Apollos and myself on your account, to show how absurd it is for any of you to pride himself on his party loyalty to one of us by disparaging the other."

7. The meaning is difficult. It may be "God has given you any spiritual endowment you possess, therefore boasting is excluded." Or, connecting with the preceding verse, "For who has authorized you to pose as a party leader? Certainly neither Paul nor Apollos." A third possibility is, "To whom do you owe the discovery that you are spiritually rich but to these despised missionaries who brought you the gospel!"

12, 13. Where did the erstwhile proud Pharisee learn this secret? See notes on ch. 13, and cf. 1 Pet. 221-24.

14-21. The Ground of Apostolic Authority. Paraphrase: "Why do I write in this strain? Not to reduce you to abject self-reproach, but to remind you that I am your father in the faith. You may have any number of spiritual guides, but one man alone brought you into living fellowship with Jesus Christ. This gives me the right to appeal to you to model your way of life upon mine. You may have forgotten some of those unstudied lessons once learned from my example, so I am sending Timothy, another of my spiritual sons, to remind you of these principles of practical Christianity which I am responsible for making known wherever I preach Christ (v. 17). As for those braggarts who are so confident that I am never going to visit you again, they will soon have an opportunity of showing whether their high-sounding boast is anything but wind. The presence of the kingdom of God is proved by spiritual influence, by moral strength, not by mere talk. As soon as God opens the way I shall visit you. It is for you to determine whether I am then to vindicate my apostolic authority as founder of the church at Corinth by disciplining the offenders, or to appear among you in self-effacing love as your spiritual father."

15. The Greek word translated tutor here and in Gal. 324 signified the trusty slave to whom the father committed his son. He was responsible for the boy's care out of school.

16, 17. Cf. 11¹ Phil. 317 1 Thess. 16. The missionary's bearing and behavior would be a practical object lesson for pagan converts. The Christian way of life is caught as well as taught.

CHAPTERS 51 TO 620: MORAL DISORDERS IN THE CHURCH

This was one of the most serious questions that Paul had to deal with in the Corinthian church.

CHAPTER V

1-8. The Moral Scandal and the Responsibility of the Church. A flagrant case of immorality—a man's incestuous union with his step-mother—has not even disturbed the indulgent complacency of the Corinthian church. To preserve the church from corruption, and to save the soul of the sinner, Paul has resolved on drastic action. He directs that the local church shall meet in full session, conscious of the presence in all his power of the Lord in whose name they meet, remembering too that the apostle is with them in thought. Acting upon his counsel they shall excommunicate the gross offender with every solemn circumstance.

5. The sound recommendation of the missionary pastor and statesman is obscured for modern readers by the language of v. 5. The sentence is to deliver the obdurate sinner to Satan. The immediate result will be the destruction of the flesh; the ultimate aim, that the spirit may be saved (or preserved) in the day of the Lord Jesus. This is a striking instance of Paul's use of current Jewish ideas. The synagogue elders exercised the ban (cf. Ezra 10⁸ Jn. 922 1242 162 Lk. 622). Outside the beneficent influences of the Christian community the condemned reprobate would be unprotected from the authority of Satan. Numerous bodily ills were attributed to demonic influence, and death itself was regarded as under the dominion of Satan (1526 Jn. 844 Heb. 214 Wisdom 214). This man's punishment will be wrought in the sphere of his sinful practice—he sinned in the flesh, and it is the flesh that must be destroyed (cf. the cognate idea, 1129f.). But the body (the flesh), the organ of the personality, is to be destroyed, so that the spirit may be saved in the day when the Lord passes judgment. If Paul's language sounds harsh, we must remember (1) that Jesus allowed (Mt. 1815-18) for extreme discipline in the case of a man who persists in flouting the moral authority of the Christian brotherhood; (2) that it would have been fatal to the purity of a church largely recruited from paganism to tolerate lax moral standards in the community; (3) that physical sufferings were regarded as the inevitable result of alienation from the society that enjoyed protection from demonic assault; and (4) that this chastisement of the flesh was expected to work out godly repentance and ultimate spiritual salvation.

6-8. Turning from the doom of the sinner to the danger of the acquiescent church, Paul rebukes the pride that can suffer such a stain, quotes a proverb (cf. Gal. 59) in reminder of the extent to which this foul infection will spread, and finds a happy application of the Christian symbolism of the Paschal feast. For the ancient custom of removing all yeast from the house on the 14th of Nisan, see Ex. 12¹⁵ 13³ (notes). If, as the fourth Gospel seems to declare, Jesus was crucified on the 14th of Nisan (see art., Chronology of N.T., p. 875b, and notes on Mt. 26¹⁷⁻¹⁹ Jn. 18²⁸), and if (cf. 16⁸) this letter was written shortly before Easter, this figurative language becomes the more effective.

9-13. The Internal Discipline of the Church.

An earlier letter, with its warning against tolerating men of immoral life in the Christian community, has been misunderstood as forbidding intercourse of any kind with the heathen world. In view of the indulgent attitude to the gross offender in their own midst, it seems less likely that the Corinthian Christians had made a brave attempt at social isolation than that they urged the impracticability of this policy as an excuse for ignoring Paul's high demand for internal discipline. Paul concedes the obvious necessity for all but anchorites to have business dealings with men of the world who fall below the Christian standard of monotheism, sexual purity, disinterestedness, and honesty. It is not the missionary's duty to pronounce sentence upon those who have not accepted the Christian yoke. That would surely be to usurp the divine function. But it is the duty of the church to maintain its high moral standard among its own members. Christian fellowship must be withheld from anyone bearing the name of brother not only if he lapse into idolatry or sexual sin, but also if he discredit the Christian standard of life by losing control of appetite or tongue, or by inordinate desire for gain, leading to unfair exactions. Tolerance has gone too far. The scoundrel must be expelled.

9. For the possibility that part of that earlier letter has been preserved in Second Corinthians, see introduction, section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (5), p. 1169.

11. The condemnation of covetousness (cf. Col. 3⁶) recalls the teaching of Jesus (Lk. 12¹⁵ 16¹³), but the word is often used by Paul in a wider sense than greed for gold, and covers all selfish disregard of the just claims of brotherhood.

CHAPTER VI

1-11. Christians in Dispute before Heathen Tribunals. Paul describes the judicial prerogative and responsibility of the Christian society. This function may be exercised in simpler fashion to save the scandal that has arisen from the spectacle of fellow Christians suing one another before heathen courts (v. 7). Four reasons are given why the church should provide for arbitration in all such disputes: (1) The saints shall judge the world (v. 2)—a mingling of the Jewish belief that the righteous will share in the divine judgment of the heathen nations (Wisdom 37, 8 Dan. 7²², and cf. Rev. 20⁴) with the promise of Jesus to his disciples (Mt. 19²⁸ Lk. 22³⁰). Much more easily then can they settle these trifling disputes. (2) The saints are also to judge angels (v. 3)—an allusion to the popular Jewish belief contained in the apocryphal Book of Enoch (see 91¹⁵ and cf. Jude v. 6, 2 Pet. 2⁴) that angels will be involved in the Judgment (cf. p. 204). (3) Those accounted fit for such exalted offices will surely not submit things that pertain to this life (v. 3) to the judgment of the despised heathen! Yet a church that boasts of its "wisdom" cannot find one member wise enough to arbitrate between fellow members! (4) Even apart from the unsuitable character of the tribunal, a defeat is sustained by the mere fact of going to law against a fellow Christian (v. 5). How much better to suffer injustice and fraud than to incur this reproach! On the contrary, they are inflicting such treatment on their brothers! This conduct excludes them from the kingdom of God (v. 9). Membership in that redeemed society is impossible for those who practice idolatry or the shameful vices of the Gentile world. But self-indulgence of appetite and speech can exclude, as also will any kind of dishonesty. The greed, then, which leads to these squabbles must be suppressed. All these repellent vices have found representatives in the Corinthian church. But when they offered themselves for baptism they came under the purifying influences of the Christian fellowship, and found pardon in virtue of the name of Christ and by means of the Spirit of God (v. 11). The apostle humbles their pride that he may extol the effective grace of God.

Two questions emerge from this discussion.

(1) Does Paul advocate a complete divorce between members of the church and state institutions? (2) Is Paul interpreting the teaching of Jesus as passive submission to evil? In answer to (1) we must refer to Paul's teaching in Rom. 13¹⁻⁷, his appeal to the imperial tribunal, Acts 25¹⁰, 11, and his insistence upon respect for Roman law when its forms and privileges were lightly ignored by officials, Acts 16³⁷ 23²⁵⁻³⁰. The Roman power secured impartial administration of justice, and gave protection from mob violence. Paul was too wise and experienced a traveler to disparage these benefits in an ordered society. The answer to (2) must be determined accordingly.

It is evident that passive endurance of all evil was not regarded as essentially Christian. Moreover, the question is not raised how far the vindication of one's good name, or the determination of the right ownership of property may compel a Christian man in the interests of others to appeal to the properly constituted courts of his country. Paul is concerned to rebuke the litigious habit of his converts, who do not scruple to expose disputes of fellow Christians to the public scorn. He also probes to the root of the trouble and declares it to be desire for gain that warps the sense of justice. Notice again the prominence of covetousness and extortion in a catalogue of vices (vv. 9, 10). So Jesus replied, "Keep yourselves from all covetousness," when appealed to on a question of property division (Lk. 12¹⁵). The teaching of Jesus (Mt. 5^{39,40}) in setting a higher value on good will and friendly relations than on the successful assertion of rights is further echoed in v. 7b.

9, 10. There is suggested here the raw material upon which the gospel worked at Corinth, the city in which Paul wrote his terrible description of the pagan world (Rom. 124-32). Yet by the alchemy of grace (v. 11) this dross has been refined.

12-20. The Sanctity of the Body. In this section (possibly a fragment from an earlier letter—see intro., section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (2), p. 1169), Paul takes up some of the watchwords of the antinomians, and argues with those who cannot recognize the deadly nature of sexual vice.

Paraphrase: "Do you quote the formula, 'All things are lawful for me'? But Christian freedom has its limits, and everything is not to my highest advantage. Nor on the strength of this liberty will I allow anything to tyrannize over me. You quote the saying, 'Food is for the belly, and the belly for food.' True, but these belong to the temporary phase of our earthly life. Eating and drinking are legitimate functions of our present physical organism, but fornication is an abuse of bodily functions, and inflicts a permanent injury upon the personality. Remember that our bodies are to be transformed, and are to become fit raiment for the soul in the eternal realm where the risen Christ reigns. Indeed, our bodily powers are organs of that spiritual body whose head is Christ. Sexual union involves one bodily life. This applies to immoral intercourse (v. 16) as well as to the primal bliss of Eden (Gen. 224), whereas a spiritual union with the Lord is the Christian's privilege. You must therefore avoid immorality, for while other sins may not leave a stamp upon your bodily life, this is a sin which desecrates the shrine of the Holy Spirit, who cannot take up his abode in so dishonored a home. One thought more: You have been liberated from a cruel servitude to become the slaves of Christ in that service which is perfect freedom. Remember the cost at which you were ransomed. Your gratitude to God must be shown in the pure service of your bodily powers."

The reasoning of the libertines (not infrequently reproduced in our own time) was that the use of bodily functions is natural and therefore permissible. Paul replies: (1) Your illustration touches only the instinctive requirements of that body which perishes (v. 13a). There are bodily reactions upon the soul which are of lasting effect. This is the bodily life which is raised to immortality (vv. 14, 18; cf. 1544, 50). (2) Your illustration ignores the distinction between the designed use and the abuse of instinctive functions (v. 13b). (3) The union of man and woman is not only physical, it is psychological. The two lives grow incorporate into one another. The spasmodic union with a prostitute is injurious to that growth of the higher self which depends on spiritual fellowship with Christ (vv. 15-17). (4) The body is designed to fit us for union with God. This privilege is forfeited by debasement of the body (v. 19a). Libertinism claims a freedom to follow its own will, which a ransomed servant of Christ can never assert (vv. 19b, 20). The main difficulty arises from Paul's conception of the body as something more than the perishable tenement of the soul. To him it is the outward and visible form of the entire personality. (See Anderson Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul, pp. 208f.) We must also allow for Paul's mysticism, in which the metaphor of union becomes almost a physical relationship. The modern Christian may wonder that Paul is silent about the shameful wrong to womanhood that underlies prostitution, and that he does not urge the ennobling influence of marriage and the Christian home. He will do well at the same time to contrast with the prevailing attitude to sensuality in the contemporary Greek world the strong emphasis which Paul constantly lays upon chastity.

20. Ye were bought with a price. See Deissmann's Light from the Ancient East, ch. 4, for a vivid exposition of this technical term in the process of manumission. By a legal fiction the slave's savings were handed over to the priest in the temple, who then bought him from his master and freed him by transferring the ownership to the divinity in whose shrine they were. Even so Christ has bought us for himself, not with our hard-won earnings, but with his own life blood. Hence he has a claim upon our souls and bodies (see pp. 1190-6).

CHAPTER 7: PAUL'S REPLY TO QUESTIONS CONCERNING SEX

As explained in the introduction (section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (3), p. 1169), Paul received from the Corinthian church a number of questions, which he proceeds to answer in 7¹⁻¹¹.

CHAPTER VII

1-7. Marriage and its Obligations. Consulted by the Corinthian church on the general question of marriage, Paul declares celibacy to be preferable, but will not make this an unconditional counsel. In view of the danger of sensuality Christian marriage is recommended. There is no trace of asceticism, for mutual marital obligation is recognized in the intimacy of wedded life, with the self-control demanded by seasons of special prayer. Such separation should be temporary and by consent. The dangers arising from the ill-disciplined Corinthian character, and the sensuality of life in that city, influence this counsel, which Paul would not have them regard as a command. His own wish is that they might all share his gift and remain unmarried, but each man's state must be determined by God's gift of temperament.

6, 7. In the phrase, this I say, it is impossible to decide whether this refers to the abstinence, or to the resumption. Read v. 7a thus: But I am quite willing that all should be as myself, i.e., undisturbed by the dominance of desire.

8-24. Moral Safeguards; Mixed Marriages; Outward Conditions Unchanged by Christian Call. The unmarried and widowed do well to remain so, but marriage is better than incontinence or an inflamed imagination. With regard to divorce, the actual prohibition of Jesus is quoted (cf. Mk. 10^{11, 12}). If separation has actually taken place, let the woman remain single or else be reconciled to her husband. This rule of the indissoluble bond of Christian marriage applies equally to both partners. For the grave problem of mixed marriages Paul has no dictum of the Lord to cite, but gives his own judgment (vv. 12-16). The Christian husband or wife whose heathen partner is willing to share the home is not to sever the tie, for the believer consecrates the partner, whether husband or wife, just as children of Christian parents are not unholy, but consecrated to God. If, on the other hand, the heathen husband or wife dissolves the union, this situation is to be accepted, for in such conditions the Christian wife or husband is in no slavish subjection to marriage; for God called us to a life of peace. It would be dangerous presumption to hold that the heathen partner must inevitably be saved by the forced attachment of the other.

The Christian's call does not involve a change in external conditions (vv. 17-24). This is a universal requirement in the churches of Paul's foundation. This applies alike to the status of Jew and Gentile. No operation is to be attempted to acquire or remove the mark of circumcision (v. 17). Loyalty to the moral code is what matters, not mere externals. A man should be content to remain in that status which is his at the time of his conversion. A slave need not trouble about his position when called by God (though if an opportunity of gaining freedom is given he should take it—v. 21), for the Christian slave is the Lord's freedman, just as the Christian freeman is the slave of Christ. All alike are slaves of Christ (by whom they were bought for a great price—cf. 6²⁰); in the Christian Church no artificial distinctions are to be observed (cf. Gal. 3²⁸), and no servant of Christ is to stand in slavish fear of human opinion. So then, seeing that we are brothers, let every man remain in that state in which he was called of God, for God is with him there.

14. Is sanctified in the wife, i.e., has been consecrated to God by means of his wife's consecration. The meaning is not that her influence will gradually change his character, for the perfect, not the future tense is used. The conception belongs to a group of ideas inherited from Judaism, according to which family relationship involves a share in ritual consecration. The word is used in its technical religious, not in its moral sense. Similarly unclean and holy are used in this ritual sense of the children of a Christian parent.

17. Uniformity of teaching in local churches. Cf. 11¹⁶ for uniformity of practice.

19. This fundamental distinction between the external and the spiritual is found also in Gal. 5⁶ 6¹⁵. There the vital requirement is "faith working by love," or "a new creation" (mg.). Here we see that faith, the moral dynamic of the new creation, inspired by love, results in the observance of God's commands (cf. Jn. 14¹⁵ 15¹⁰).

21. Use it rather is an ambiguity to cover the deep division among commentators. Some supply the word "slavery," others "opportunity." The former hold that the context favors the interpretation, "Remain in slavery even if you have a chance of winning your freedom. Use that state as a sphere for glorifying God." In view of the tense of the imperative Paul probably meant, "Don't let your position as a slave weigh upon your mind. But if, as a matter of fact, you can get your freedom, the rather seize the chance."

25-40. The Marriage of "Virgins." Here again the apostle can give no direct answer from a definite saying of the Lord. He can only express a judgment as one whose special treatment by God marks him as trustworthy. The general trend is that, while marriage is honorable, it is unwise to incur fresh responsibilities in view of the near approach of the Advent, and the tribulations that will herald its dawn (vv. 29-31). The cares of the home encroach upon a single-minded devotion to the Lord. An attitude of detachment to the claims of this rapidly passing world is necessary for concentration upon the Lord's affairs. This counsel is offered with no desire to restrict freedom, but in the interests of seemly and efficient Christian service.

The specific case, however, on which Paul's advice was sought presents unusual difficulties. According to the older interpretation (followed in the R.V.), vv. 26-35 resume the general teaching regarding marriage already given, explaining more fully the apostle's preference for the unmarried state, with merely a passing reference to virgins in vv. 28 and 33. The special case is first introduced in v. 36, and is concerned with the duty of a father or guardian to a virgin who is under his control. But the word daughter is not in the Greek (see mg.), the phrase his own virgin (v. 37) hardly bears this interpretation, and in v. 36 the sentence let them marry must refer to any man and his virgin. There is strong reason for accepting the theory that Paul is here dealing with a case of what came to be known as "spiritual marriage." In recoil from the prevalent sensuality of Corinthian life asceticism was highly favored in some quarters. One manifestation of this tendency may well have been (as we know it was in the second and third centuries) an agreement by which an unmarried man and a maid pledged themselves to any other in a spiritual union. (See art., "Agapetæ," in Hastings Encyc. of Religion and Ethics; Lake, Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, pp. 184-191; D. Smith, Life and Letters of St. Paul, pp. 266f.) With this clue to guide us, Paul seems to have two possibilities before him. In vv. 26-28 he is considering those who have been betrothed with this understanding that they will never unite in wedlock. "My opinion is that as a general principle, in view of the impending distress, it is honorable for a man to remain in this state. If you are pledged to a woman, do not look for release from this pledge. If you are free from any such pledge, do not look for a woman. But if either you or your betrothed maid has taken the step of becoming married, that is no sin. I only want to spare you the outward trouble which will be the portion of all who take that step."

Here it appears that one of the parties to the agreement wishes for an ordinary marriage, the other is unwilling, and so the betrothal has yielded to marriage with a third person. Paul refuses to denounce the termination of such an agreement as sinful. But in vv. 36-38 he seems to be considering a case in which the conditions they have imposed upon themselves prove too strong a trial of endurance. In that case, says the apostle, let them marry. "But if any man thinks that he is not behaving properly to his spiritual bride, if his instincts are vehement and necessity urges, let them marry. He is not sinning in carrying out this wish. But the man who is steadfast in his resolve, who has control where his will is concerned and is not driven by necessity, and has resolved to keep his spiritual bride as such, will do well. So then he who marries his spiritual bride acts honorably, and he who does not marry follows the better course of action."

In vv. 39, 40 Paul rounds off his principal counsels. He has already dealt with the marriage of a Christian couple (vv. 10, 11), and of mixed marriages where the heathen partner happily preserved (vv. 12-14) or else severed the bond (vv. 15, 16). It remains to settle the case where a wife is required to live with an uncongenial husband. The apostolic counsel is emphatic. Marriage is indissoluble during the husband's lifetime, but the widow is free to make a Christian marriage after his death. Paul adds once more his advice in favor of single blessedness, with a final reminder, aimed perhaps at some prominent leaders whose "spirituality" lifted them above such practical questions, And I think that I also have the Spirit of God.

36. Past the flower of her age. The rare Greek word may equally well mean "overpassionate," and is either masculine or feminine.

38. Given in marriage. There is good reason to render "marries."

NOTE ON PAUL'S TEACHING ON MARRIAGE

We observed with surprise that Paul's denunciation of immorality in ch. 6 fails to urge the true consecration of the sexual impulse in the home and family life. The disappointment deepens in ch. 7, where marriage is treated on sufferance as a refuge from grossness of thought and practice. There are, however, conditions of time and place which left a deep impress on this letter. When Paul wrote it he was eagerly anticipating the speedy return of the Lord, and looked for tribulations as ~~is~~ sure accompaniment (vv. 26, 29; cf. Lk. 21²³). With this shortened perspective it was natural to view responsibilities in a changed relativity, and to give marriage a lower place in consulting the welfare of his converts (vv. 31b, 32a, 35). It must also be remembered that all this teaching is projected against the foul moral background of Corinth. Knowing their antecedents, and the polluted atmosphere of their city, Paul adopts a courageous realism in vv. 2, 5b, 9, when warning his correspondents of their peril. For it is probable that in such a place sensuality led to an ascetic reaction. The apostle holds the balance evenly, and, while stating his own preference in view of the world-crisis, he recognizes differences of temperament as varied gifts from God, refusing to impose his advice as an injunction. It is significant that the one dogmatic command is a word of Christ's, based upon the ideal permanence of the marriage bond. We must not overlook the mutuality of the marriage obligation in v. 4. The woman's right stands on the same footing as the man's. The curious situation disclosed in vv. 25-28, 36-38, arose in a city where grave perils may have led to strange safeguards. Paul is asked to advise in certain exceptional cases. As this experiment has not survived, Paul's advice is only of historical interest. Whatever the conditions, it is clear that he recognizes as the only possible alternative to a life of consistent celibacy honorable Christian marriage, just as the former is the only alternative to the latter. This is the last letter dominated by the imminent expectation of the Advent. The teaching about marriage in Eph. 5²²⁻³³ reveals a steadier outlook upon society and a higher conception of the Christian home.

CHAPTERS 81 TO 111: PAUL'S REPLY TO QUESTIONS CONCERNING SACRIFICIAL FOOD AND SOCIAL LIFE

On the origin of these questions, see the introductory note to ch. 7.

CHAPTER VIII

1-13. Meat Offered to Idols; Christian Freedom and the Restraint of Love. The first group of questions related to the various problems of sex (see ch. 7) which perplexed the church. The second group arose out of the social relationships of Corinthian life, and consisted of two questions raised through the pervasive influence of heathen religion. Most of the meat sold in the market had been offered first to some idol. Social and business relationships often involved participation in a common meal that was either held in a temple or attended by some recognition of the divinity. Paul was asked, (1) Can a Christian eat such meat? (2) Can he share in such a meal? The discussion ranges over the next three chapters. In ch. 8 Paul takes up some of the catchwords of the "advanced" party who pride themselves on their "knowledge" (vv. 1-3) that idols are nonentities and who, therefore, see no reason to avoid the alleged contamination which the "weaker" (vv. 7f.) members fear.

Paraphrase of vv. 1-13: "Beware of the conceit that is bred by superior 'knowledge,' for it is love which alone admits us to the friendship of God. Of course I know as well as you that 'idols don't exist,' and that 'there is no God but one.' There are plenty of so-called gods and lords, but for us there is one God, the Father, source of all things, and end of our existence, one Lord Jesus Christ, agent of the creation and of our redemption (v. 6). But this higher knowledge is not understood by all. Some who were reared in idolatry cannot even now eat food that has been sacrificed to an idol without recalling the old associations, and their conscience, morbid as you consider it, tells them they are defiled. Now, food is not an important factor in religion. Abstinence does not separate us from God, nor does eating bring us nearer (v. 8). The main thing is to take care that the exercise of your right does not trip up the man who is not yet established. There is a risk that a weak man of this kind may see you taking part in a meal at an idol temple. The sight of one with your superior knowledge sitting there, so far from establishing his feeble conscience, will encourage him to act against his scruples and thereby come to grief. So his ruin will lie at your door (v. 11), all because of your superior 'knowledge.' Yet he is a brother for whom Christ has laid down his life. The injury that some of you are doing to others when their conscience is in that morbid state is a sin against the brotherhood, and therefore against Christ. Rather than trip up my brother, if meat is a stumbling-block in his case, I will be a vegetarian all my life!"

3. Cf. 13¹² Gal. 4⁹ 1 Jn. 4⁷ 8.

7. Rendel Harris conjectures a change in the order of two Greek words, with this result: But some eat the sacrifice from long habit as if they were eating the idol.

The weak conscience in this chapter (v. 7b, etc.) is the morbid conscience which cannot see things in their right proportion. It is a symptom of immaturity. The weak brother is not yet so established in the faith as to rid himself of false but powerful fancies. The danger is so real to him that he must be handled sympathetically.

CHAPTER IX

1-27. The Apostle's Example of Self-Surrendered Liberty. The twofold question regarding sacrificial meat, and common meals under the auspices of a heathen divinity, is answered with a double reference. In ch. 8 Paul has considered the Christian's action in relation to others, returning to this in 10^{23f}. In 10¹⁻²² he discusses such action as it affects the character of the man himself. Ch. 9 connects the two by a frank expression of his own attitude toward the assertion of rights. At first, the eager assertion of apostleship seems irrelevant to the main discussion, but v. 22 picks up the thread apparently dropped at 8¹³, and v. 27 effects with remarkable skill the transition to 10¹⁻¹³. What at first seems to the superficial reader egotism is seen at last to be consummate tact.

Paraphrase of vv. 1-27: "I have said what I should do. But the policy of my whole career warrants this appeal. My apostleship began with my vision of Jesus at Damascus. For you it has been sealed by God's use of me in your conversion. Apostleship entitles me to maintenance, just as though I were a soldier, a vine-dresser, or a shepherd. Peter and the Lord's brothers, and the other apostles, even take their wives with them on their missions. Barnabas and I alone claim no support. This is not strictly just, for the Law recognizes in analogous cases (Deut. 25⁴ Lev. 6¹⁶, 26⁷, 31-34 10¹²⁻¹⁵) a principle which is applied to our case by the Lord himself, when he said that those who proclaim the gospel should live by the gospel (v. 14). Now, at Corinth I have waived this right to avoid injuring the cause of Christ. I am not claiming it now, for I would rather starve than feel that I have hindered the good work by accepting grudging support. Preaching the gospel in itself is no ground for satisfaction, for I do that under a sense of moral compulsion. If I act thus on my own initiative, I am entitled to my hire; but if otherwise, my position is that of a slave intrusted with a stewardship (v. 17). My reward, then, is that in preaching I lay no burden of cost on the gospel, so as not to make full use of the right which is mine as a preacher. My voluntary renunciation of privilege, I say, amounts to resignation of absolute freedom, becoming the slave of all in order to win as many as possible. I have adapted myself to all sorts and conditions of men in the hope of saving some (v. 22). All this I do for the sake of the gospel, that others may share it with me. Now, efficiency depends upon steadfastness of purpose and rigorous self-discipline. Like a trained athlete I keep my body in fit condition, lest after preaching to others I should myself be disqualified."

1-3. Paul's apostleship rests on two claims: (1) His vision of the risen Jesus (15⁸ Acts 9^{3f.}) who commissioned him (Acts 22^{18f.} Gal. 1^{15f.}). (2) There was fruit to his ministry (2 Cor. 3²). 5. The Lord's brothers, cf. Mk. 6³ Gal. 1¹⁹. 6. On Paul's financial independence of the Corinthian church, cf. 2 Cor. 11⁹ Phil. 4¹⁵ Acts 18³. 9, 10. A glaring instance of rabbinical exegesis. The injunction was purely humanitarian. 14. Cf. Mt. 10¹⁰ Lk. 10⁷. Note, as in 7¹⁰, the reliance upon authentic sayings of the Lord (cf. Acts 20³⁵). 17. Stewardship. Often a slave's appointment, thus giving meaning to v. 19. 20. At what point of his missionary career did Paul conduct himself as a Jewish legalist? The unrecorded period of Gal. 1²¹⁻²¹? 22. The adaptability of self-renouncing love is not to be confounded with pliable opportunism. When vital principle was at stake, Paul proved adamant (Gal. 2⁵).

CHAPTER X

1-13. No Sacramental Guarantee of Salvation; Temptation and Trust. Paul now urges the need of vigilance upon the self-confident intellectuals of Corinth. Perhaps they imagine that they are secured by sacramental grace from the moral perils of heathen society and social customs that bring them into a pagan atmosphere. By a bold application of the story of the wilderness experience of the Israelites he reminds them that baptism in the cloud and enjoyment of miraculous food did not save these favored Israelites from the consequences of their sins (v. 5). They stumbled into grave moral perils. Idolatry and its attendant immorality brought death to thousands. Others were brought low by a reckless pride that challenged God, or a discontented spirit that resented the restrictions of their lot. The church in the wilderness was a type of the church at Corinth. These experiences stand on record for the special warning (v. 11) of those who live in these momentous days in which all the lines of history are converging toward the climax. Then let the self-confident man be most of all on his guard. Yet severe as are the trials, the powers of darkness have not proved invincible. God may be relied upon not to allow his servants to be subjected to an impossible strain. He is responsible for the moral order, and has not only set us in the midst of so many and great dangers, but will always provide the means of victorious endurance (v. 13).

4. An allusion to a Jewish legend based upon the double narrative of the water which gushed from the rock at Horeb (Ex. 17:1-7) and at Kadesh (Num. 20:1-13). Rabbinical fancy identified the rocks and thus accounted for the water supply of the Israelites in their wanderings. Cf. the Song of the Well (Num. 21:16-18). Paul uses this as an illustration. There was a spiritual source which never failed the needy Israelites, which source he identifies with the Messiah.

5-10. The historical references are to Num. 11 (for v. 6), Ex. 32 (for v. 7), Num. 25 (for v. 8), Num. 21 (for v. 9), Num. 14 (for v. 10).

11. The usual translation (R.V., A.S.V.) means: These events had a deeper significance than contemporaries understood. They illustrated a principle of religious life which is seen most clearly in this last period of human history—the meeting point of the age now ending and the new age that will shortly begin. The last clause of the verse contains two words which admit of a different translation: “to whom the tolls of the ages have come down as an inheritance.” We are spiritual heirs of all the ages.

14-22. The Incompatibility of Fellowship in the Eucharist and in Idol Feasts. The Corinthian converts must not lose heart because of the moral dangers which surround them. But any deliberate participation in idolatrous rites is a wanton risk, and an act of disloyalty to the entire Christian relationship. The argument in this section is based on an ancient conception which is remote from modern thought. Participation with any person (see on 7:14) or institution that is consecrated to a God involves the participant in a permanent relationship. (See Anderson Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul, pp. 181f.) In the Jewish temple those who eat the sacrifices become partners of the altar. Some of its sacredness passes over to them. In the same way those who share in the cup and the bread at the Lord's Supper become partners in the sacred Christian fellowship of the church, which is the body of Christ, whose members are bound to one another and to their Lord by the covenant of his blood (v. 17). There is a sense in which participation in an idol feast brings the guest into definite relationship to the idol. Paul repudiates the thought that the idol has any real existence, but he regards all pagan rites as closely bound up with demonic influences. This, then, makes it a moral impossibility for a comrade in the fellowship of Christ to enter into a fellowship with demons (v. 21). The metaphysical conception belongs to another age than ours, but the logic and the underlying ethical principle are irresistible. Such a conflict of loyalties is intolerable. The closing note is an ironical inquiry whether the self-styled strong are stronger than the Lord, whom they are provoking to jealousy (in the language of Deut. 32:21) by such flagrant disloyalty.

23-33. Meat Sacrificed to Idols; The Principle of Edification. (See also 11:1.) Returning to sacrificial meat, Paul finds here no question of lawfulness, but, rather, of expediency and edification. “Your neighbor's good is the criterion,” so we may paraphrase. “Eat any meat from the market without raising conscientious scruples, for all that the earth produces is the Lord's. If you accept an invitation to an unbeliever's table, eat without scruple the food before you (v. 27). But refrain if told that the meat is sacrificial, for your informant's sake. Your own conscience is unchallengeably free (v. 29); but put no difficulties in the way of Jew, or Gentile, or the church. I follow Christ's example by sacrificing my own advantage to that of the many for their salvation. Copy me in this.”

CHAPTERS 112 TO 140: DISORDERS IN CHURCH ASSEMBLIES

This section is marked by Paul's characteristic ethical passion and deep concern for order. (Cf. notes on Eph. 4:25-6:9 Col. 3:5-4:6.)

CHAPTER XI

1. See under 10:23-33.

2-16. The Veiling of Women in Church. The advice of Paul here is an outstanding example of a missionary's treatment of a question of the hour which is not permanently binding. His requirement that women should be veiled in public assemblies was wise in view of Greek custom. The reasons he gives are rabbinical, and as such invalidate his judgment for modern readers. In Greek city life, if a Christian woman went about with head unveiled she might be classed with the hetairæ, i.e., women who contracted irregular marriages and entered into public life, while the matrons kept to the privacy of the home. To avoid scandal it was imperative that members of the church should refrain from exposing themselves to misrepresentation.

Paul had before given information about the general Christian practice with special reference to local conditions. This has been accepted (v. 2), but on one point further explanation is required. The veiling of women who take public share in church services is desirable for the following reasons. (1) Vv. 3-6. In the economy of the Christian life woman is subordinate to her husband, as every man is subordinate to Christ. Subordination does not detract from equality of honor, for in the same way Christ is subordinate to God. For a man to pray or prophesy with covered head is to dishonor his Head (i.e., Christ); for a woman to do this with uncovered head is to dishonor her head (i.e., her husband). For she might as well go a step further, and have her hair shorn—the sign of marital infidelity!

(2) Vv. 8, 9, 11, 12. This custom is based upon the traditional origin of woman (Gen. 221-23), for Eve was created out of Adam, and for the sake of Adam. Yet here again remember that subordination does not mean inferiority, for every man owes his birth to woman in the creative wisdom of God, and both man and woman are mutually dependent in the Christian conception of the home. (3) Vv. 13-15. Nature itself shows the seemliness of this custom by providing woman with abundant covering of hair. (4) V. 16. If anyone wants to quibble about this matter, my final argument is that we missionaries do not sanction the usage you write of, nor is it customary in any of the other churches. (See on 717.)

There are several baffling difficulties in this curious passage:

4. Dishonoreth his head. As above, or “does shame to his head” by implying that some superior is present. There is a further difficulty about the practice referred to. The custom with Greeks of both sexes was to offer sacrifice bareheaded; with Romans of both sexes to do so with head covered; whereas it is often said that among the Jews men were required to wear the tallith or veil during prayer. But praying and prophesying in a Christian assembly has no connection with sacrificing, and probably a saying of Plutarch’s applies to the Graeco-Roman world in general: “It is more customary for women to come forward in a public building covered, and for men, uncovered.” As for Judaism, Strack and Billerbeck in their Rabbinical Parallels to the N.T. show that in the N.T. period there was no obligation for men to pray with covered head, except when under some kind of curse or affliction.

6. “For if a woman makes a practice of going about unveiled, let her get shorn once for all.” An ironical rebuke for what might well be regarded as immodesty.

7. That man is the image and glory of God is an interpretation of Gen. 126 and Ps. 85. There is a late rabbinical comment which interprets Isa. 4413, “according to the beauty of a man,” as meaning “woman, because she is her husband’s glory.” Another passage, in the Talmud, says, “In the disgrace of his wife lies the disgrace of the husband.” Perhaps it is straining the meaning of “glory,” which in the Bible so often means “self-expression,” to find here the thought that the best (or worst) in the man is brought out by the woman.

10. Exceedingly difficult. R.V. and A.S.V. insert sign of before authority. This may be taken in two ways. (1) It may be the sign of the husband’s authority. So Strack-Billerbeck show from rabbinical sources that the bride walked in the wedding procession with uncovered head as a token of her free maidenhood. Then, as a sign that the husband’s authority was upon her, Jewish usage required that the married woman should always appear abroad with covered head. (2) Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, pp. 202f., shows from Dion Chrysostom that Tarsus was a most Oriental city, especially in this, that the women went about deeply veiled. With this fact he combines the evidence of Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 31, that in Oriental lands the veil is the power and dignity of the woman. It protects her from insult. Without it her authority is lost. He demands that the ordinary meaning of “authority” (active not passive) be retained. “Her authority”—that which secures respect for her—ought to be upon her head, seeing that she is her husband’s glory, owing it to him to preserve dignity and to command the respect of men.

Because of the angels (v. 10b). Two interpretations out of many deserve notice. (1) Some find an allusion to evil angels, who figure largely in later Jewish speculation. Gen. 611., and the elaborations of that story in the book of Enoch, show that it was not impossible for Jews to think of women as in danger from the lust of fallen angels. Tertullian understood the passage in this sense. Bousset therefore takes authority as possibly meaning a charm. The veil will serve as an amulet to protect the woman from the evil influence of the angels who are present. (2) It is urged against this view that the angels (with the definite article) in the N.T. always means good angels, who, in early Christian thought, were regarded as specially interested in the welfare of men (Lk. 128 1510 1 Tim. 521 Heb. 114 1 Pet. 112 Rev. 35.) For late Jewish belief in the angels’ concern in human prayer, as also for the conception in (1), consult index to Charles’ Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O.T. (See also art., Intertestamental Religion, p. 204.) Unseemly behavior in Christian worship is distressing to the ministering spirits who encompass us (cf. Heb. 113, 14 121).

17-34. The Abuse of the Lord’s Supper; Its Institution and Meaning Recalled. Praise for the wholesome observance of apostolic tradition (v. 2) must be qualified in one respect. Cliques are evident in their church gatherings. Paul adds with grim irony that one good result of this is that men of character stand out in bold relief. The deplorable consequence is seen at the Lord's Supper, which ceases to deserve that name (v. 20). "Instead of Christian fellowship there is a shameful display of greed and ostentation. The rich man does not wait for the poor man to arrive (on his return from work), but indulges too freely in the sumptuous fare that he has provided, so that his poor neighbor has to go without. What an exhibition of uncontrolled appetite! What contempt for the church of God! What humiliating treatment of the poorer brother! Contrast this with the precious tradition of the Last Supper in the upper room (vv. 23-26). Unworthy participation is to be guilty of profaning the sanctity of the passion of the Lord. It is an occasion for self-examination, for the man whose light irreverence blinds him to the meaning of the sacred symbols brings doom upon himself (vv. 27-29). This accounts for the enfeebled health of many in the church, and even the death of some. How different our condition would be if we practiced self-examination! But if we are suffering the Lord's judgment, it is a beneficent discipline to save us from being involved in the doom of the world. The practical issue may be summed up in a word: Wait, to begin the supper together (v. 33). He whose appetite is not under control must have a meal at home. The remaining instructions must stand over till the next visit."

NOTE ON THE EUCHARIST AT CORINTH AND IN THE TEACHING OF PAUL

From the allusions in this Epistle it is evident that the Eucharist in no way resembled the impressive dramatic representations to which initiates were admitted in the mystery religions. (For the mysteries, see art., Backgrounds, p. 351.) As was usual at Greek dinner parties, each person brought his own provisions. At some point in the supper one loaf was broken, a symbol of the unity of the body of Christ (cf. 10¹⁷, which may be translated thus: "Many as we are, we are one loaf, one body, for we all partake of the one loaf"). At the close of the meal they all drank from the cup. Paul's complaint is that at Corinth the supper of the assembled church is not sacramental. Some of the members by their unsocial behavior displayed a spirit which contradicted the meaning and purpose of the Lord's Supper. They stand condemned by the very fact that they could join in the sacrament of fellowship, without having a true sense of the body of Christ, the church of which their poor brothers were fellow-members with them (v. 29).

In vv. 23-26 we have the earliest record of the institution of the Eucharist. In some particulars it differs from the accounts in the Synoptic Gospels. The closest resemblance is found in Luke, but in all probability Lk. 22^{19, 20} is a harmonistic addition based on 1 Cor. 11^{24, 25}, as the words are not found in some very early authorities. There is no ground, however, for disputing the authenticity of Paul's account. It is improbable that he attributes this knowledge to a vision. The actual words indicate the "tradition" which has reached him, to be handed on to the Corinthians in their turn. The ultimate source is the Lord himself on the last night of his earthly life. Remote from any connection with the mysteries is the double emphasis on the historical and the eschatological. Cf. with vv. 23, 26, George Rawson's eucharistic hymn,

"And thus that dark betrayal night
With the last advent we unite,
By one blest chain of loving rite,
Until He come."

The historical origin of the sacrament is not invalidated by Gal. 1^{11, 12}. Paul distinguishes between the historical facts of the Christian religion (cf. 15³⁻¹¹) and his gospel, the interpretation which his illumined heart has given to them. The worthy celebration of the Lord's Supper is a proclamation of the Lord's death. Every Eucharist is, or should be, a sermon on the central text of the Christian revelation, the cross. The very purpose of Jesus (v. 24) was that he should be recalled to our minds as the one who had brought the faithful together in the fellowship of love, sealed by a covenant ratified by his own blood. That sacrificial death was symbolized in the cup. Can we drink that cup of blessing (10^{14f.}) which represents our fellowship with the Jesus who gave himself utterly for others, and at the same time flout the demands of human fellowship in the society of the Lord Jesus? The same thought is brought out in Phil. 2^{5f.} which we may read: "Let your thoughts in fellowship with one another be the same as your thoughts in fellowship with Christ Jesus," who stooped in lowly obedience to the utmost limit of the cross.

CHAPTERS 12¹ TO 14⁴⁰: SPIRITUAL GIFTS

This is properly a part of the section 112-14⁴⁰. See the introductory note to ch. 11.

CHAPTER XII

The next three chapters deal with the same great central theme—spiritual gifts. These vary in character and worth, but supreme among them is love (12³¹ 13¹³).

1-3. The Criterion of Spiritual Gifts. Paraphrase: "Your pagan experience tells you how at one time you used to be swept away by frenzied impulses under the control of idols that only spoke by those whom they possessed. Even so, the man who breaks out into ecstatic language in your assemblies will reveal the quality of his inspiration. If he curses Jesus, you know the source. If he acclaim Jesus as Lord, it is indeed a power of the Holy Spirit which possesses him."

4-11. Variety of Gifts but the Same Spirit. Paraphrase: "The rich variety of special gifts displayed in your church is but a manifestation of the resourcefulness of the one Spirit, who considers the profit of every member. So he gives to one philosophic speech, to another the language of insight into truth, to another faith, to another healing gifts, to another miraculous energies, to another prophecy, to another the faculty of distinguishing good from evil spirits, to another varieties of 'tongues,' to another the interpretation of 'tongues.' But all these spring from the energy of one and the same Spirit, distributing to each according to his will."

8-10. See below on vv. 28-30, and cf. Rom. 126-8 Eph. 411.

12-31. The Body and the Members. This diversity in unity is no arbitrary dispersal of gifts, but inheres in God's design of an organism to fulfill his will on earth. "The Christ that is to be" (cf. Tennyson's "In Memoriam," end of stanza cvi) is the thought which Paul here introduces. We are not merely the body of which Christ is head. We are all united in the Christ, by the Spirit which we received when faith enabled us to make the public confession which was symbolized in baptism. Imbued with one Spirit we rose above all national and social distinctions. This idea is then illustrated by a parable which Paul had no doubt often met with in Stoic diatribes. It was a favorite story with the political philosophers of that period, and is best known to us from Shakespeare's use in Coriolanus of the fable of Menenius Agrippa, which is borrowed from Plutarch's Lives. Paul lifts the parable to the highest application in v. 27 (cf. Rom. 125 Eph. 530). If then the church is the body of Christ, it follows that its members will be endowed with a wide variety of gifts for spiritual ministration.

28-30. Cf. vv. 8-10, Rom. 126-8 Eph. 411. Apostles come first, partly on chronological grounds as first-hand witnesses, partly as those who gave the first impulse to the local Christian communities. The prophets come next, including not only those who have the gift of "prophecy" in the narrower sense (cf. Acts 1127f. 2110f.), but also the "word of wisdom" and the "word of knowledge" (vv. 10, 8). In the third place come the teachers, who probably took regular part in the instructions at public worship, as well as in the special work of training candidates for baptism. Then follow a group of functions, in contrast to the personal titles, "apostles," "prophets," "teachers." Powers (see mg.) would include both "faith" (v. 9) and "workings of powers" (v. 10); gifts of healings are regarded as distinct from these. Helps may well have covered such functions as "ministry," "distribution," "deeds of compassion" named in Rom. 127. 8. Governments will represent all administrative and judicial offices, and it is significant that at this stage in ecclesiastical development this kind of gift ranks low in the list. Last of all comes the gift upon which so many of the Corinthians prided themselves. The meaning of kinds of tongues will appear in ch. 14. A necessary complement to this gift of uncertain value is that of interpretation (v. 30). It is obvious that all cannot exercise all these gifts. The health of the whole body depends upon the faithfulness with which each makes use of his special endowment. Yet it becomes every man to exert himself to possess the qualities of highest value to the church. It is of more importance to the Christian society that there should be prophets and teachers than that there should be many "speaking with tongues." Yet even this worthy ambition may be followed in an unworthy spirit. Envy, rivalry, ungenerous depreciation of another's gift will not bring us to our goal of highest spiritual attainment. There is a super-excellent way, which the apostle now points out in the noblest lines he ever wrote.

CHAPTER XIII

The Most Excellent Way of Love. Nowhere does Paul show more clearly how entirely his thought is ruled by the Spirit of the Lord Jesus. This hymn is a lyrical interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount—the Beatitudes set to music. The translations by A. S. Way (Letters of St. Paul) and by Moffatt are valuable, and out of the vast literature of exposition Henry Drummond's The Greatest Thing in the World, and Percy Ainsworth's St. Paul's Hymn to Love are classics of the devotional life.

1-3. The Worthlessness of Spiritual Endowments Apart from Love. Without love, the most exalted speech ever heard on earth or possible in heaven is a senseless sound, like the clashing cymbals of the frenzied priests of Cybele (v. 1); a mastery of every field of knowledge joined with inspired insight into hidden truth will not raise a man above a cipher (nothing); the mountain-moving energy of faith of which Jesus spoke (Mt. 17²⁰) will leave him of no account (v. 2); even the dutiful doling away of every possession, even self-immolating devotion, wins no advantage (v. 3).

3. To be burned (mg. reads that I may glory) may mean "Though I surrender my body as a living sacrifice (cf. Rom. 12¹) so as to have 'whereof to glory in the day of Christ'" (cf. Phil. 2¹⁶).

4-7. Love Described. Love takes long views and acts with kindness; is free from jealous thoughts, from boastful words, from self-conceit, from discourtesy; it is not self-seeking nor passionate, keeps no reckoning of wrong, takes no delight in injustice, but finds its joy in that which rejoices Truth also. It sets no limit to tolerance, trustfulness, hopefulness, endurance. It is easy to find in all these verses a tacit rebuke of the besetting sins of the religious at Corinth. Is there not also more than one stab of self-reproach? In Jesus, Paul had learned that love saves enthusiasm from passing into fanaticism (cf. v. 3).

5. Is not provoked. The translation conceals the sharp edge of the Greek word (paroxysmos) which Luke uses twice of Paul (Acts 15³⁹ 17¹⁶), and our word "paroxysm" preserves. The quick temper and the incisive tongue survived the crucifixion of the old Adam and may have served a disciplinary use in puncturing complacent conceit (418-21) and exposing flagrant injustice (Acts 23³). But Paul had learned that as love is the first of the fruits of the Spirit, so is self-control the last and crowning gift (cf. "temperance" and see mg. in Gal. 5²², 23).—Take not account of evil. Cf. Mt. 18²¹, 22.

6. Rejoiceth not in unrighteousness, etc. Is not this a bitter memory of the time when Paul found it "hard to kick against the goad"? He who consented to the judicial murder of Stephen could only persecute him who is the Truth. Cf. the close of Francis Thompson's Hound of Heaven, "Thou dravest love from thee, who dravest Me."

7. Beareth all things (R.V. mg., covereth). Cf. 1 Pet. 4⁸. Hopeth all things. Cf. Lk. 6³⁵. For the whole verse, cf. the thought in Shakespeare's Sonnet 116:

"Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom."

8-13. The Imperishable Quality of Love. Love is contrasted with prophecy and knowledge. See the noble paraphrase of this verse in F. W. H. Myers, St. Paul. These gifts are transitory because fragmentary, just as the language, disposition and mental processes of childhood are superseded by those of adult life. Now we try to guess at truth as we see its blurred and distorted outlines in the mirror of burnished metal. Prophecy (or Scripture) and knowledge (or Theology) (as G. G. Findlay happily suggested) serve our needs now, but of necessity leave much unexplained. These gifts belong to the present order, but will have had their day when immediate communion brings us into the presence of Him who knows us perfectly. There are three gifts of God which we shall exercise even in the world to come. For faith will still find scope in the ever-deepening mysteries of the unfathomable wisdom of God, and hope will still look onward with assurance to some fresh fulfillment of God's redemptive purpose. Love too abides forever, but is greatest of these, for it is of the very character of God.

CHAPTER XIV

1-19. "Tongues" and Their Tests: Intelligibility. Provided that love is in the foreground, the Corinthians are exhorted to cultivate these spiritual gifts; but prophecy rather than "tongues." Paul does not dispute the reality of this experience, or deny its spiritual origin; he even claims a pre-eminence in this endowment (v. 18). But he counts it inferior to prophecy, which is also inspired utterance, for the latter edifies, comforts, consoles, while the exercise of "tongues," though it may edify the performer himself, brings no revelation of truth, nor insight into spiritual values, nor inspiration, nor instruction to the assembled church (vv. 9-11). "Unless musical intervals are properly observed"—so we may paraphrase—"how can any air be recognized when a player is breathing into the flute or twanging the harp? Or what citizen will arm himself and rush to the walls for defense against the enemy unless the bugler sounds the alarm in notes that can be recognized? This is not only true of inanimate instruments. There are many human languages on earth, all foreign and unintelligible except to the man who can speak them. Let edification determine your desire for some spiritual endowment. If you want to speak with a 'tongue,' pray for the gift of interpretation, or you are merely wasting your breath (v. 13). The spirit may be speaking, but the intelligence has no share in the utterance. You may be mouthing sounds with superb impressiveness, but when you have finished how is the uninstructed novice to join in the 'Amen,' and make your thanksgiving his own? I prefer to leave my own gift in abeyance and speak a few intelligible words to explain the Christian message to others rather than make a long and meaningless oration."

20-25. The Test of Convincing Power. Paul next suggests that this undue respect for "tongues" is childish (cf. 13¹¹). The childlike heart is to be preserved unembittered through life, but the intellect must reach maturity. Words are quoted from Isa. 28^{11, 12} to show that "tongues" are intended to impress unbelievers, whereas prophecy is for those who believe. A picture is then drawn of a full church meeting when all are exercising the gift. In the midst of this babel some novices and unbelievers come in, and conclude that they are among madmen. If, however, a series of prophecies is heard, the stranger, whether an unbeliever or a mere novice, will feel that his secret thoughts are being read and examined. Deeply convinced of his unworthiness he will abase himself before God and recognize the divine presence in the Christian Church.

21, 22. The use made of Isa. 28^{11, 12} is another instance of Paul's rabbinical handling of scripture. When Isaiah's simple message of warning was derided by the tipsy priests and prophets of Ephraim he declared that if he was taunted as a stammerer, a time would indeed come when God's message of judgment would sound at their gates in the uncouth tongues of barbarian invaders, and then their bitterness would lie in the memory of the rest and refreshing which they had once refused. "Nay, but by men of strange lips and with another tongue will he speak to this people; to whom he said, This is the rest, give ye rest to him that is weary; and this is the refreshing: yet they would not hear." There is, of course, no connection between the divine judgment inflicted by a foreign nation and the gift of "tongues." The past tense of "hear" has been changed into the future. Paul has drawn the inference that "tongues" are intended for unbelievers and not for believers, and by contrast infers that the opposite must be true of prophecy.

23-25. It is strange that in these verses prophecy is shown to be a far more powerful sign to unbelievers than "tongues." The connection of thought is logical only if we may understand by "sign" in v. 22a, as in Lk. 23⁴ ("a sign to be spoken against"), a means for confirming the unbelieving in their unbelief.

26-33. The Test of Control. The principle of edification, as already shown, demands intelligibility on the part of those who speak. They must also exercise self-control, and submit to the restraint of others. There is room for each to contribute his gift, whether it be a hymn of praise, a spiritual exposition, an immediate perception of the will or thought of God (cf. Acts 13² Gal. 2² Rev. 17⁹⁻¹⁸), an ecstatic utterance, or an interpretation. "Let two or at most three who have the gift of tongues speak in succession, with an interpreter. In the absence of an interpreter let him indulge his gift in silence. In the same way let two or three prophets speak in turn, while the others use the gift of discrimination (cf. 12¹⁰ 1 Jn. 4¹). If while one prophet is speaking a neighbor is inspired to speak, let the first speaker stop, so that all may have an opportunity of doing and receiving good. Prophetic self-control is possible, since the inspiring spirit comes from God, who rules in ordered peace."

34-40. The Test of Decency and Order. There are strong reasons for believing that vv. 34, 35, are a later marginal gloss, or an addition to the text by a later writer. For (1) these verses are placed differently in a number of important MSS.; (2) the sequence of thought is interrupted; and (3) the prohibition contradicts 11^{5, 13}, where no objection is offered to a woman's public share in the service of the church, but only to her speaking with head uncovered. It is quite possible that these words were based on 1 Tim. 2^{11f.}, and inserted here at a time when this letter was used as a standard to regulate worship. The belief that First Timothy was entirely from Paul's hand would give warrant for such editorial expansion. V. 36 then follows closely after v. 33b (v. 33a being part of a parenthesis), and we may paraphrase thus: "As is the case in all the churches of the saints. Do you resent this as an encroachment on your liberty? Are you the original church, or do you suppose that you are the only church to receive the gospel?" (Cf. 7¹⁷.) Paul believes that the man of real spiritual discernment will recognize that these counsels accord with the Lord's command (v. 37).

To sum up (vv. 39, 40)—prophecy is a gift to be cultivated; speaking with "tongues" is not to be suppressed. The guiding principle is that all things be done in a seemly and orderly fashion.

NOTE ON THE GIFT OF TONGUES

The gift of ecstatic utterance referred to above was one of the most remarkable phenomena in the life of the early church. The narrative of Luke shows that it often accompanied some special sense of spiritual quickening (Acts 2⁴ 10⁴⁶ 19⁶). It is often assumed that Luke understood the phenomenon as a miraculously conferred facility in the use of foreign languages (cf. Acts 2¹¹, which is capable of another explanation; see Latham, Risen Master, pp. 439f., and art., N.T. Miracles, p. 928b). In view of the widespread use of the Common Greek, which was a lingua franca throughout the empire (p. 881), there is no need to postulate a special endowment to equip the apostles for missionary preaching. But whatever may be thought of the data in Acts, there is no room for doubt in the case of Corinth. The problem here is psychological, not linguistic. From time to time in the history of the Christian Church similar manifestations have appeared in times of spiritual awakening. The best-known parallel was associated with the preaching of Edward Irving, but even more significant is the account written by Thomas Erskine, of Linlathen, of some remarkable occurrences in the homes of simple pious folk at two places on Clydeside, Scotland, in 1830-32. (See his Letters, edited by Hanna, pp. 129-167.) Two or three facts are well attested: (1) these persons while "speaking in the Spirit," whether in their own language or in the unknown sounds, had every appearance of being under direction; (2) they declared that their organs of speech were used by the Spirit of God, and their utterances did not convey their own conceptions; (3) the sounds corresponded to those of normal human speech, though no known language was heard; (4) the speakers themselves could not interpret, except on rare occasions, when this gift was added in answer to urgent prayer. The correspondence to the situation at Corinth is remarkably close except in two particulars: for there was a complete absence of ostentation and unseemliness on the part of these Scottish peasants, and it is clear that the experience was induced by much earnest desire for a revival of the gifts possessed in the early church.

CHAPTER XV

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD

This section does not, like chs. 7, 8, 12, open with the formula "Now concerning," which marks Paul's detailed reply to a question. Information had reached Paul that a bodily resurrection was denied by some in the Corinthian church. The thought was not congenial to the Greek mind (as he had found at Athens; cf. Acts 17³²), which found satisfaction rather in speculations about the immortality of the soul. But Paul determines to treat the matter in considerable detail, for contempt of the body has already led to immorality. See 6¹²⁻²⁰, with the appeal to Christ's resurrection and our future rising as a refutation of the reasoning of the libertines (6¹⁴).

I-II. Paul and the Christian Tradition.

Gospel and tradition are blended: the facts that were central to the Christian message have their significance for the faith of the church. Truth embodied in a narrative is the essence of the gospel. This is the foundation of their life as Christians, the means by which they entered into a saving relationship with God, unless, that is, their grip on truth has relaxed, or they never have believed firmly.

Among the things of primary importance which Paul had himself received in the apostolic tradition, and then handed on to his converts at Corinth, were statements affirming the death, burial, and resurrection on the third day of Jesus, and a series of appearances to individual disciples and to groups of varying number. As an addendum to this list, Paul declares his own vision of Jesus near Damascus, for that had convinced him of the truth of the primitive Christian testimony, and gave him a place in the apostolate, in spite of his earlier career as a persecutor of the church. Indeed, though he started late (v. 8), God's grace had been so abundantly bestowed on him that he had by now outstripped all the other apostles in missionary labors. So whatever different views might be held about apostolic rank and authority, there was common ground in this tradition, which was shared alike by the Twelve, by Paul, and by the Corinthian believers.

The main difficulties in these verses must be treated.

3. That Christ's death was in some way related to human sin, and conformed to a spiritual principle taught in the O.T., was undoubtedly a conviction of the primitive church. See Acts 22³ 31⁸ 83²¹. 132⁷¹. In the Gospels see Mk. 9¹² 14²¹, 49 Lk. 24²⁶, 27. Cf. 1 Thess. 5¹⁰ Gal. 1⁴ Rom. 4²⁵ 1 Pet. 2²⁴. Such passages as Psa. 22⁷, 8, 16, 18 69⁹, 29 must have been in the thought of the early believers, but most important of all was the great song of the Suffering Servant of Jehovah in Isa. 52¹³⁻¹⁵ 53. It must have been Jesus himself who first made the daring identification of the Messiah with this mysterious figure in Hebrew prophecy (see the Excursus, p. 664.) The use of the title "Servant" for "Jesus" (see R.V. Acts 3¹³, 26 4²⁷, 30) is another witness.

4. Raised on the third day according to the scriptures is still more difficult. Prediction of the resurrection would be discovered in Psa. 16⁸⁻¹¹ (cited in Acts 22⁵⁻⁸ 13³⁵) and, by the Greek-speaking readers of the LXX, in Isa. 33¹⁰, which there reads, "Now I shall rise up, saith the Lord, now shall I be glorified, now shall I be lifted up." Hos. 6¹⁴. could not be regarded as in any way a prediction. The true solution seems to have been offered by B. W.

Bacon (Expositor, VIII, xxvi, pp. 426f.). He suggests Lev. 23^{4f.}, and compares 1 Cor. 5^{7f.} 16⁸ 15²⁰. In the year of the crucifixion the Passover fell on Friday, Nisan 14, so that it was on Sunday, Nisan 16, that Jesus rose (see art., Chronology of N.T.). The symbolism was unmistakable to the early Jewish Christian. Just as Paul alludes to the ceremony of preparing for the Passover by purging the house of leaven, so he refers to the law for the offering up of the sheaf of firstfruits on Nisan 16, "the morrow after the Sabbath" (Lev. 23¹¹). So also "hath Christ been raised from the dead, the first-fruits of them that are asleep" (v. 20). Thus as the Scriptures have been fulfilled in the offering up of the true Paschal Lamb on the Passover, so they have been fulfilled in the new meaning which henceforth belongs to the ceremony of "lifting up" (cf. Jn. 12³²) to God the new sheaf of firstfruits on the third day from the Passover.

5-7. For the problems raised by the divergent accounts of the first Eastertide see J. M. Shaw, The Resurrection of Christ, or his article in Hastings' Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, vol. ii. It must not be forgotten that our earliest testimony is this obviously primitive tradition repeated as from a catechism by Paul. The difficulty of harmonizing this terse summary with the gospel narratives is due to a difference in aim. The evangelists are concerned principally with the empty tomb. Paul is here concerned with the actual appearances of Jesus to his friends after the resurrection. He cites five appearances. (1) That to Peter (Cephas) is simply referred to in Lk. 24³⁴. (2) The twelve: cf. Lk. 24³⁶ Jn. 20^{19, 26}, also Acts 10^{40f.} (3) The five hundred together, probably in Galilee, possibly disciples not at the feast, or, with such, some who had gone up to Jerusalem (cf. Jn. 11⁵⁵ 12^{12f.}). (4) James: cf. Jerome, Of Illustrious Men, 2, who quotes from the Gospel according to the Hebrews: "Now the Lord, when he had given the linen cloth unto the servant of the priest, went unto James and appeared to him (for James had sworn that he would not eat bread from that hour wherein he had drunk the Lord's cup until he should see him risen again from among them that sleep)"; and again after a little, "Bring ye, saith the Lord, a table and bread," and immediately it is added, "He took bread and blessed and brake and gave it unto James the Just and said unto him: My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of man is risen from among them that sleep." Whatever degree of truth there may be in this story, we know that the brothers of our Lord are represented in the Gospels as not believing in him (Jn. 7⁵ Mk. 3^{21, 32f.} 6³), whereas James soon took a leading place in the church at Jerusalem (Acts 12¹⁷ 15¹³ 21¹⁸ Gal. 1¹⁹ 2^{9, 12}). The reference in the present passage helps to an understanding of the apostolic rank which was evidently accorded to this brother of our Lord. (5) To all the apostles. Perhaps this refers to the final appearance recorded in Lk. 24⁵⁰ Acts 14⁻⁹. To this primitive tradition, officially certified, Paul adds his own testimony to the appearance of the glorified Lord. It is of a different order from the others, but inasmuch as apostolic status depended partly upon witness of the resurrection (Acts 12²), Paul always insists upon his first-hand assurance of this fact (cf. 9¹).

8. One born out of due time. Paul actually wrote "the abortion" (see mg.), and the reference is doubtless to the contrast between the maturity of preparation with the other apostles, and his own abrupt conversion to faith and immediate service.

10. Boasting is excluded; all is of the grace of God (cf. Gal. 2²⁰).

12-19. The Logic of the Empty Tomb. Although this witness to the risen Christ had never been challenged at Corinth, the cognate belief in the resurrection of believers was assailed under the form of a universal negative, There is no resurrection of the dead. Paul shows that under that proposition the Christian testimony about Christ is nullified, and the whole structure of Christian faith and character is undermined.

19. This is not clear. The order of the Greek words favors R.V. mg. rather than the text. There is no point in attaching only to in this life, for hope in this special sense belongs essentially to this life and not to the future state. The difficulty of the other rendering is that hope seems to be emptied of its virile and victorious meaning, elsewhere in the N.T. inseparable from its use. Probably Paul's meaning has best been brought out in the rendering, "If we are men that have had our hope in Christ in this life, and nothing more," then we are most to be pitied of all men, because our hope in Christ has raised us to such a height of confident expectation only in the end to be dashed ruthlessly to the ground.

20-28. The Significance of Christ's Resurrection. Paul has provided a reductio ad absurdum. By assuming that the assertion of resurrection is false, he has followed out the consequences of that assumption to the point of logical absurdity. Now he reasserts the undeniable conviction of the witnesses that Christ has actually been raised from the dead, and claims that this is the test and pledge of the revival of all that die. Just as Adam is natural head of the race and all men share in his death, so Christ is spiritual representative of the race and all mankind must be raised from death through him. (For these racial acts and their results see notes on Rom. 5:12-21; also Peake, The Quintessence of Paulinism, pp. 23f.) But though a universal resurrection must follow from Christ's representative act, it will take place by stages. First Christ has risen (for firstfruits see on v. 4); then Christ's followers will rise at his Advent. A third stage seems to be required, but the sequence then cometh the end is inappropriate, for we are immediately told that he must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. There is good reason to follow several recent commentators in taking v. 24a as meaning, "Then the rest, when he shall deliver up the kingdom to God." This idea of a general resurrection appears in Jn. 5:28f. Acts 24:15 Rev. 20:11-15. Meanwhile the reign of Christ must continue until every foe has been vanquished. Language is borrowed from Psa. 8⁶ 110¹ (with striking adaptations) to emphasize the completeness of the Messianic victory. The ultimate enemy is death. Then, after gaining that final triumph, Christ will hand over this universal dominion to Him who is God and Father. Paul's belief of the subordination of the Son to the Father is as clear here as in 3:23 11:3. That God may be all in all is the "... one far-off divine event,

To which the whole creation moves."

29-34. The Dreadful Alternative. Paraphrase: "We can scarcely bring ourselves to imagine what is involved in denying the resurrection. Even some who deny the doctrine prove that they really believe it by their otherwise meaningless custom of undergoing vicarious baptism for their relatives who have died before being received by baptism into the Christian fellowship. If I had not the confidence inspired by this blessed hope how could I run into deadly peril as I do every hour of my life? If I seem to be exaggerating, I can only appeal to your generous appreciation of my toils and sufferings in Christ's service, and declare that 'my daily life is a daily dying.' There was that desperate peril in which I was involved at Ephesus. If I had actually been flung into the arena, as might well have happened, to fight in vain for my life with beasts, what gain would there have been for me in death? (Cf. Phil. 1:21.) It is fatally easy for some of you in your loss of all hope to say, like the men in Isaiah's day (Isa. 22:13), 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' Do not let your old associations lead you astray. There is truth in the line, 'Bad company spoils good morals.' Start up from your slumber as you ought to do. Cease from sinning. There are those whose superior knowledge is mere ignorance of God. This I say to rebuke you."

29. The interpretation followed above presupposes a local usage—namely, baptism in behalf of the dead—which Paul neither commends nor condemns, for which parallels can be supplied from later custom in some heretical sects as well as in certain mystery cults. Paul merely uses this as an illustration of the principle that "the Heart has its reasons that Reason does not know" (Pascal, Thoughts, Art. xvi, 3). "Someone's death" disturbs the skeptic's unbelief, and "the grand Perhaps" is "on his base again" (see Browning, Bishop Blougram's Apology). Life is continually challenging logic.

32. Read If men had wrought their will and I had been thrown to the lions. It is best to take this in the literal sense, and to recognize that Paul passed through some terrible peril during his stay at Ephesus, when such a doom seemed imminent. Did Aquila and Priscilla make some great sacrifice to spare him this fate? See Rom. 16:4.

33. A line from the Thais of Menander, chief representative of the New Comedy at Athens, whose sententious moralizing made his plays a quarry for quotation. For other traces of Greek literature in Paul compare lines from Epimenides and Aratus in Acts 17:28, from the same context in Epimenides in Tit. 1:12, the sentence from Aristotle in Gal. 5:23, and the possible allusions to lines of Euripides in Acts 21:39 1 Tim. 6:12.

35-49. The Natural Body and the Spiritual Body. Paul now turns to the doctrine of bodily resurrection, to remove difficulties by explaining its true meaning. The main obstacle is a materialistic view of resurrection. By the parable of the grain of wheat we are reminded of the difference in outward form of the present and the future body. The present body must perish (v. 36); God gives a new body according to his own creative decree (v. 38). Even in this world there are generic differences in types of fleshly bodies. There is also a vast difference between the kind of body suited for this region, and that suited for the higher region of life. In the same way, in that higher region there are differences in outer appearance, just as the "heavenly bodies" shine in the firmament with varying splendor. All this illustrates the resurrection of the dead (v. 42). Our present life is the seed-time, marked by perishableness, dishonor, weakness (cf. Rom. 8:10, 21 Phil. 3:21 2 Cor. 13:4). Through death we pass to the state of incorruption, glory, power (cf. Rom. 8:18-23). Corresponding to these two conditions are two different kinds of body, one natural, the other spiritual. The first corresponds to the needs of the soul in this order of physical existence, fulfilling the requirements of thought, feeling, will, and is thus in process of adaptation for the higher service of the life above the realm of the senses (cf. Gal. 6:8). In that spiritual sphere a suitable vehicle of self-expression will be needed. The type of the first is the first man, who, in the words of Scripture, "became a living soul" (Gen. 2:7). As the first Adam was thus made of the earthly substance which fitted him for life on this earth, so there is a last Adam, who by his entrance into the realm above has assumed a form that accords with the spiritual realm, and has also become a life-giving spirit. It is the resurrection of Christ which assures us that as we have hitherto borne the image of the man of earth, so hereafter we shall wear the likeness of the man of heaven. The new humanity united in Christ has a solidarity no less than that of mankind on earth.

50-58. Death Swallowed up in Victory. The central principle of the foregoing argument is summed up in v. 50. In speaking of bodily resurrection Paul has no material body in mind. The perishing cannot inherit the imperishable. So self-evident is this that Paul discloses the secret purpose of God. At the advent of Christ we shall all be changed, whether dead or alive at the moment when the trumpet blast announces his arrival. For the conditions of that new order of life demand that this corruptible nature of ours should be clad in an immortal vesture (cf. 2 Cor. 5:4). When our mortality has been replaced by immortality the full meaning of Isaiah's mighty affirmation will be seen (the quotation in v. 54 is from Isa. 25:8). In the form of the Greek translation known to Paul the words "for ever" in that citation are superseded by in victory. That word provides the keynote for the rest of the chapter. Hos. 13:14 (quoted, although with a considerably adapted meaning, in v. 55) is flung down in triumphant challenge to death. But even in this moment of exultation at the thought of Christ's victory over death, Paul cannot separate the empty tomb from the cross. It is sin that has invested death with terror, that has brought desolation to the heart of man by alienating him from God (Rom. 5:12 7:9f.). It is the law that gave power to sin (Rom. 4:15 5:20 6:14 7:1-25 Gal. 2:16 3:10, 13, 21 5:1-3). So then "the word of the cross" is made complete in the risen Saviour. God be thanked, who offers us (read thus for giveth us) the victory over both sin and death through our Lord Jesus Christ. To the careless reader the closing words (v. 58) form an anti-climax. To Paul the only justification for this inspired speculation and argument is the glory of the Lord made known by the victorious advance of his gospel and kingdom. He therefore finds a wagon to hitch to the star of the Christian hope. Apostolic preaching, the Christian's faith, is not vain (v. 14), neither is the toil of those steadfast heroes who share the travail that gradually brings in the kingdom of God.

NOTE ON PAUL'S DOCTRINE OF THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY

We have been so deeply influenced by the Greek doctrine of the immortality of the soul that Paul's teaching sounds remote from modern thought. Later Judaism in working out a belief in a future life adopted the idea of a resurrection of the material body of flesh and blood. The dead sleep beneath the earth (Dan. 12:2) until the day of judgment (Jn. 5:28), which is also the day of resurrection. The future life was generally conceived in material terms, but our Lord's rebuke of the Sadducees (Mk. 12:18-25) is evidence of a spiritual interpretation with which his interrogators should have been familiar. To the Jew of the first century the Greek doctrine was no more than a faint hope of a shadowy survival. He craved for the preservation of the entire personality, and this could be secured, according to Jewish psychology, only by the restoration and reanimation of the body (see H. Wheeler Robinson, Religious Ideas of the O.T., ch. 4, sec. 4). Now Paul shared the Jewish belief in a general resurrection at the end of the age, and he carried over into his Christian thought much of the apocalyptic imagery in which the hope of Judaism found expression (see p. 846b). This is very evident in First and Second Thessalonians and First Corinthians, though it fades away from this time on. But the notable feature of Paul's teaching is his insistence on the spiritual nature of the future life, and the spiritual character of the resurrection body. The body that decays in the tomb does not rise again. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." The body which is "raised" is a medium of expression and communication fitted to the spiritual conditions of the new life of the persistent self. Paul takes up the question again in 2 Cor. 5:1-10 (see notes). Compare Spenser, An Hymne in Honour of Beattie:

"For of the soule the bodie forme doth take,
For soule is forme, and doth the bodie make."

CHAPTER XVI

ADMINISTRATIVE AND PERSONAL

The chapter is concerned with certain administrative problems, and contains as well many interesting personalia.

1-9. The Collection. This favorite project of Paul's later missionary career is very prominent in the letters of this period. Support of it was to be the visible sign of the loving loyalty of the Gentile churches to the mother church at Jerusalem. Begun in Galatia (v. 1; cf. Gal. 2¹⁰ 6¹⁰), it was carried on in Macedonia (2 Cor. 8, 9) as in Achaia. See also Rom. 15²⁵⁻²⁸. In the three letters named Paul refers to it under seven different Greek words, meaning "collection," "grace," "fellowship," "bounty," "blessing," "service," "ministry." In Acts 24¹⁷ he is reported to have described his mission to Jerusalem: "I came to bring alms to my nation, and offerings." Vv. 2-4 incidentally tell us much about early church usage. The first day of the week (cf. Rev. 1¹⁰, "the Lord's day") was evidently already honored in Christian worship (cf. Acts 20⁷). On that day each was to put aside at home something from his weekly earnings, forming a little hoard, so that there might be no hasty effort to raise funds on Paul's arrival. The local church was to appoint its own representatives, who would carry the gift to Jerusalem, with credentials from Paul. If the amount was worthy of the occasion, Paul would take these representatives with him. In Acts 20⁴ we find the names of the delegates from the other three provinces (three from Macedonia, two each from Galatia and Asia). No names represent Achaia. Does this mean that in spite of all his pleading the total raised was trifling, or that the Achaian representatives went in advance of Paul and his friends? Paul's plans are given that they may know when the money should be raised. For the present, great evangelistic opportunities, combined with formidable opposition, keep him at Ephesus. But after Pentecost he intends to take the overland route through Macedonia, reaching Corinth in time to spend the winter months among them. To reverse the route, and take Corinth first on his way to the Macedonian churches in the north, would mean only a passing glimpse.

10-12. The Visits of Timothy and Apollos. For the former cf. Acts 19^{21, 22}, and note the silence in Second Corinthians about Timothy's visit. Vv. 10, 11 accord with the impression of Timothy's character made by 1 Tim. 5²¹⁻²³ 2 Tim. 16-8 21, 3, 15 41, 2. (For Timothy's proposed visit to Corinth, see intro., section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (3) and (4), p. 1169.) Paul takes care to make it clear that no jealousy of Apollos is in his own heart. He has urged him to visit them, but the popular Alexandrian rhetorician declines to go just now. Probably he knew the danger of the party feuds, and feared that his coming might be exploited by the Apollos faction, and this he would desire to avoid.

13-24. Closing Messages and Greetings. Four brisk imperatives give a martial warning against external perils, followed by an appeal for love as the solvent of divisions within their camp. Stephanas and his household deserve respect on two grounds: they were the first family in the province to embrace the Christian obedience, and their self-dedication to the humble service of the brotherhood gave them a primacy in the church. Willingness to work hard and ability to work in harness form the true hall-mark of ecclesiastical rank. This man and his two friends have brought joy to Paul by bringing Corinth to him. A personal visit supplies what no letter or gift can confer (cf. Phil. 23⁰).

Greetings are sent from the churches of the province of Asia, for Ephesus is now the center of a group of churches (cf. Rev. 1¹¹ Col. 4¹⁶). For Aquila and Prisca see Acts 18^{2, 3, 18, 26} Rom. 16³ 2 Tim. 4¹⁹. The lecture hall of Tyrannus was the scene of Paul's public preaching (Acts 19⁹); the home of this devoted pair was the rallying center of the members. Vv. 21-24 are the Pauline autograph to the dictated letter (cf. 2 Thess. 3¹⁷ Gal. 6¹¹). Marana tha: the original Aramaic prayer of the Palestinian church, meaning, "Our Lord, come!" (Cf. Rev. 22²⁰.)

SECOND CORINTHIANS

Introduction. See Introduction to First and Second Corinthians, p. 1169, especially for discussion of the view that chs. 10-13 belong to the intermediate letter referred to in 2 Cor. 23, 9 78, a question also considered in notes to ch. 10 below.

Main Divisions of the Second Letter. These divisions are as follows:

- I. Greeting and Thanksgiving, 11-11.
- II. Paul's Relations with the Corinthians, 112-716.
 - (1) Defense against the Charge of Untrustworthiness and Harshness, 112-217.
 - (2) The Glory of the Apostolic Office, 31-610.

(3) Paul's Reconciliation with the Corinthian Church, 6¹¹⁻⁷¹⁶.

III. The Collection for the Church at Jerusalem, 8¹⁻⁹¹⁵.

IV. Paul's Defense of His Character and of His Work, 10¹⁻¹³¹⁰.

V. Farewell and Benediction, 13¹⁰⁻¹⁴.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Address and Greeting. Cf. 1 Cor. 11-3. Timothy (Acts 18⁵ 1 Cor. 4¹⁷ 16^{10f.}) now replaces Sosthenes, and the indirect reference to Achaia now becomes explicit. These churches would include Athens (Acts 17³⁴) and Cenchreae (Rom. 16¹).

3-11. Thanksgiving and Hope. The silence about the state of the Corinthians is significant. Paul gives thanks for God's comfort of him in his tribulations, which will work out to their salvation. The exact nature of the apostle's terrible ordeal is uncertain. Not the experience of 1 Cor. 15³², for it must have happened after that letter was dispatched. Conceivably the formidable opposition described in Acts 19^{23f.} involved Paul in perils unrecorded by Luke. Probably his keen anxiety about Corinthian loyalty, together with the daily risks of work in Ephesus, brought on a dangerous illness after he had left the city but was still within the province of Asia. From the very brink of death God had rescued him, teaching him the dependence of faith and the confidence of hope. Let the Corinthians join their prayers with his, that God's continued deliverance of his apostle may give many of them ground for thanksgiving that their prayers have been answered.

CHAPTERS 112 TO 217: DEFENSE AGAINST THE CHARGE OF UNTRUSTWORTHINESS AND HARSHNESS

Paul's moving statement of this defense is the first part of the general section, 112-7¹⁶, on Paul's relations with the Corinthians.

12-22. The God of the Amen, and His Apostle. Among the complaints murmured against the apostle at Corinth were his self-confidence and his failure to act straightforwardly. Paul repudiates the suggestion of any worldly-minded diplomacy. His own conscience assures him that in all his public conduct, not least in his intercourse with the Corinthians, God has enabled him to behave as a consecrated and sincere man. They are surely intelligent enough to read that in his letters! As for his confidence, is there not mutual boasting? Some of them know him well enough to be proud of him, as he confidently expects to be proud of them in the judgment day (32, 3 51² 1 Cor. 17, 8). It was this confidence in them that led Paul to propose a double visit to Corinth, one on his way to Macedonia, another on his return before sailing for Judaea. His failure to carry out the proposal was not due to the mundane policy of saying "yes" and "no" in one breath (vv. 17, 18). He had not so learned Christ (the Jesus whom he and his colleagues had proclaimed on his first visit to Corinth), the eternal warrant of the faithfulness of God. The entire gospel gives the lie to such moral inconsistency. This same God is continually confirming those whom he has called to his service, both apostles and converts, to whom he has given an installment of his own Spirit.

15, 16. This does not refer to the proposal of 1 Cor. 16⁵⁻⁷, for the itinerary is quite reversed. On the whole, the best explanation is that at the close of his short intermediate visit (see on 21) Paul promised another, and even hoped to make it a double visit. Further information convinced him that the time was not opportune, and he sent the sharp letter described as (C) in the introduction (section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (5), p. 1169). This has led to misunderstanding which Paul here removes. The visit is only postponed.

20. An excrescence in a Pauline argument generally yields a goodly pearl to the expositor. Many as are the promises of God in the Scriptures, or in the heart of man

"August anticipations, symbols, types, Of a dim splendor ever on before," all find their authentication in Christ. In himself, his life, death, and resurrection, he proves that God is as good as his word. He does more. Jesus, as made known by his missionaries, kindles the desire to appropriate these promises and claim their fulfillment, thus proving the faithfulness of the divine character.

23, 24. See notes on 21-4.

CHAPTER II

1-4. An Alteration Due to the Forbearance of Love (including 123, 24). The postponement of the promised visit has left his friends sore. Let them know that he forebore to inflict and suffer further pain. The severity of his rebuke and the authority he had been compelled to exercise (1 Cor. 4²¹) exposed him to the charge of spiritual tyranny. How unfair to one who rejoiced in the freedom of their faith, and shared with them in the joy of service! One return visit had indeed been paid. But so unhappy was this that Paul had resolved not to repeat the experience. Where was he to look for happiness if he inflicted pain on those from whom he looked for cheer? This was the burden of his last letter, that it was better not to visit them if that would bring grief to him instead of happiness, for he was confident that their happiness depended on his. That letter had been wrung from his heart with anguish and tears. His purpose was not to grieve them, but to let them know his overflowing love for them.

1. The order of words in the Greek text favors the interpretation which implies a previous visit, though some commentators take the verse to mean, "My first visit was happy; I determined that my second visit should not be painful." For the second visit and the painful letter, see the introduction (section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (4), p. 1169).

4. Against the theory that chs. 10-13 are part of this preceding letter, it has been urged (1) that the vehemence and mordant irony of those chapters do not fit the description of v. 4. See, however, Newman's account of the writing of the Apologia, or that part of the self-revelation which followed the biting sarcasm of the polemic against Kingsley: "I have been constantly in tears and constantly crying out with distress" (Wilfrid Ward, Life, vol. ii, p. 25). It has also been urged (2) that the sternness of those chapters is inconsistent with the "abundant love" of this verse. But see Francis Paget, The Hallowing of Work, p. 53, for the note of severity in true love.

5-11. Discipline and Reinstatement. This section, supplemented by 7¹², throws further light upon the obscure "intermediate visit." The personal tone of the language precludes any reference to the incestuous person of 1 Cor. 5¹. When last at Corinth, Paul had been wronged (vv. 5, 10) by some member of the church. The injury (probably an insult which flouted his apostolic authority) was condoned by a section. News now reaches Paul that the loyal majority have insisted upon the severe punishment of the offender. Now that the principle for which he had contended is established, Paul pleads that the culprit has undergone enough discipline and may be restored. After all, it was not Paul himself but the whole church, or, rather, the loyal majority, that had suffered by the offense. The purpose of the severe letter had been answered (cf. 10⁶); the Corinthians had shown their readiness to comply with apostolic requirement even when compliance was difficult. As they had been willing to exercise discipline at his request, so he would gladly forgive anything there might be in the way of personal injury if they saw their way to forgive (v. 10). There is a twofold reason for this. He thought of their own interest as he called to mind the presence of Christ. He thought also of the offender, who might become the victim of remorse and fall into the clutches of Satan. Mischief enough had been wrought through this unhappy incident. Satan was defeated by the restored harmony. Let them not give this wily adversary a chance of wresting from them this trophy of a penitent soul.

5. R.V. (cf. A.S.V.) is preferable to A.V. In part is ambiguous. It probably limits you all—a delicate reminder of the minority who had not supported Paul—and means "in some degree," modifying he hath caused sorrow. The parenthesis that I press not too heavily may mean "that I be not too severe," or simply "not to overstate the case."

10. If I have forgiven anything, i.e., if I had anything to forgive. Compare the delicate tact of the same "if" in v. 5. Paul wishes to minimize the personal affront. Yet forgiveness by Paul (thus, he hints, by the church also) is not a careless oblivion, but a solemn act in the presence of Christ (A.S.V.; cf. R.V. mg.). For the discipline and restoration of the offender cf. 2 Thess. 3^{14, 15}.

12-17. Paul's Tribulation, and the Triumph of the Gospel. This is a striking instance of Paul's broken method of narrative. The story begun at 18, broken off at 110^a, is resumed at 212. 13, only to give way at once to a doxology which expands into a glowing exposition of the apostolic ministry. The thread of narrative is picked up once more at 75. It seems that Titus had been sent with the severe letter and was to return by the overland route to rejoin Paul at Troas with news of the effect produced at Corinth. Recovered from his grave illness in Asia, Paul carried out his purpose of a missionary campaign through Troas and Macedonia. Great success and fresh evangelistic opportunities met him at Troas, but growing anxiety about Corinth due to the delay in the arrival of Titus robbed him of the power to work, and he pressed on into Macedonia. At this point in the story he was to describe his joy at meeting Titus and hearing the good news of reconciliation with the church at Corinth, but the memory of that vast relief overwhelms him with thanksgiving. "The word of God has won the day at Corinth," so in effect he writes. "There, as elsewhere, Christ makes his way as conqueror, and we are led in his procession of triumph, captives of his grace. By means of us he wafts abroad in every land the incense of the triumph, which is the knowledge of Christ. It is Christ whom we preach, and our message is well pleasing to God, though it produces opposite results upon the hearers. Those who are doomed to destruction find it a deadly fragrance that leads them on to death, while those who are on the way to salvation find it a life-giving fragrance that leads them on to life (vv. 15, 16). Who is fit for such a ministry? By God's grace we are; for unlike many we are not reducing the divine message to make profit. As men of sincerity, commissioned by God, we proclaim the Christian message as in the sight of God."

14. The A.V. "causeth us to triumph" misses the point. Paul has no thought of his personal victory over opponents. With supreme humility he regards himself as merely a captive in Christ's triumphal train. For the thought cf. 1. Cor. 4⁹; for the Greek word Col. 2¹⁵.

17. The first reference in this Epistle to rival teachers. Cf. 3¹ 4² 5¹² 10¹—13¹⁰. The R.V. text and mg. (cf. A.S.V.) represent attempts to bring out the depreciatory meaning of a verb derived from a Greek noun for "huckster."

CHAPTERS 3¹ TO 6¹⁰: THE GLORY OF THE APOSTOLIC OFFICE: THE WEAKNESS OF AN APOSTLE

Paul now leaves his consideration of the charge of unworthiness and sets forth the glory of the apostolic office, even though the apostle himself be weak. This is the second part of the general section, 1¹²—7¹⁶, on Paul's relations with the Corinthians.

CHAPTER III

I-II. The Old Ministration Surpassed by the New. Part of the opposition at Corinth seems to have arisen from some Judaistic Christians, who, without denying Paul's apostleship to the Gentiles, regarded this mission as inferior to Judaic Christianity, and hinted that his credentials were not of the highest. They appear also to have wanted a commendatory letter from the Corinthian church to present elsewhere. Paul meets this double disparagement by showing how unnecessary such certificates of character are in his case, and by proving the superiority of the ministry of the new covenant to that of the old. Self-recommendation indeed is no praise, but God has ratified his work. The lives of the Corinthian disciples are letters written by Paul at God's dictation. How much better is a letter written with the Spirit of the living God than one written in ink! And how much inferior is a covenant engraved on stone tablets, as was that given on Sinai (Ex. 24¹² 31¹⁸ 34¹), to such a covenant as that which Jeremiah (31³³) and Ezekiel (11¹⁹ 36²⁶) dreamed of! But that is the nature of the covenant of which God had made Paul fit to be a minister; no lifeless code, but a spiritual covenant (v. 6). It is the thought that God has deemed him fit for this ministry, not any confidence in his own fitness for judging the effectiveness of his own work, that makes him write in this strain. What a glorious ministry is this! Even the old covenant with its legal system that brought condemnation and death to the sinner was inaugurated with such dazzling brightness that the Israelites could not gaze on the fading reflection of the divine glory which still shone from the face of Moses. Then that vanishing splendor pales in comparison with the overwhelming and abiding glory which must accompany the ministry of the Spirit, under a covenant which brings the sinner into a state of righteousness and inspires him with newness of life.

12-18. The Liberating and Transforming Spirit of the Lord. Paraphrase: "This hope that the divine splendor of the new covenant will endure gives us confidence to speak with candor. We have nothing to hide, as had Moses, who veiled his face that the people should not see that the glory was fading away from his face. But the frankness of our message makes no impression on the dulled perceptions of the Jews, who have not yet learned the meaning of that veil on the face of Moses. Indeed, to this day when the Scriptures of that old covenant are read in the synagogue their meaning is veiled—that is, the hearts of the hearers are obscured by a veil of ignorance concerning the waning validity of the Law given through Moses (v. 15). Just as Moses removed the veil when he 'went in before the Lord to speak with him' (Ex. 34³⁴), so now any man who turns to the Lord finds the veil lifted from his heart. That is why we use such boldness of speech. For the Lord to whom we turn, Jesus Christ, represents the Spirit, not the letter, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom from legal bondage (v. 17). But all we who bear the Christian name gaze with unveiled face at the glory of the Lord until we reflect its brightness, and from that reflected glory we are being gradually transformed into the same likeness as himself. This change is wrought by the Lord, who is Spirit."

17, 18. The Lord and the Spirit. These verses are further evidence of the equation of Jesus with the Lord (i.e., Jehovah) of the O.T. in the mind of Paul (cf. 1 Cor. 13¹; it is, however, not impossible that Paul uses "Lord" as it is used in Jn. 20², 13, 18, 20 of the risen Christ). The identification of Jesus Christ with the Spirit of God must not be inferred from this passage (cf. 13¹⁴), for the context demands a reference to v. 6, where the contrast between letter and spirit is the key to interpretation. Nevertheless, in the region of Christian experience Paul writes as though there were equivalence of function on the part of the exalted Christ and the Holy Spirit. Theological precision is not to be looked for in Paul's letters (cf. Rom. 8⁹⁻¹¹ and see Anderson Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul, pp. 257f.; H. A. A. Kennedy, Theology of Epistles, pp. 88f.). Both the A.V. mg. and the R.V. mg. (cf. A.S.V.) interpret a difficult Greek verb as meaning that we gaze at the glory of God as it is reflected in the face of Christ (v. 18). The R.V. takes it as meaning that as we gaze upon Christ his glory shines reflected in our character. For this thought cf. 1 Jn. 3^{2, 3}.

CHAPTER IV

1-6. The Light of the Gospel. Such is the ministry of the new covenant. It is only of God's mercy that we are called to this privilege (cf. 3⁶ 1 Cor. 15¹⁰), and we owe it to him not to tire in his service (cf. 2 Thess. 3¹³ Gal. 6^{8, 9}). There is no place in such a ministry for dishonorable secret practices (cf. 1 Cor. 4⁵), for unscrupulous methods (12¹⁷ Eph. 4¹⁴), nor for any falsification of the gospel message (2¹⁷). Our confidence is that the self-evidencing truth of our message will illuminate the conscience of every man (Eph. 5⁸⁻¹⁴). "If any find our gospel dark, it is because Satan has blinded their minds to prevent the illumination of the gospel of Christ's glory from shining upon them. Self commendation is thus no part of our message (v. 5). We proclaim Christ Jesus as Lord (1 Cor. 12³ Phil. 2¹¹) and ourselves as your bond-servants for the sake of Jesus. The God whose creative fiat called light out of darkness (Gen. 1³) is he who shone into our hearts so that we might flash back to men the truth of the divine character as it is disclosed in the face of Christ."

4. The god of this world. For this conception of Satan, cf. Eph. 2² 2 Thess. 2¹¹ 1 Jn. 5¹⁹ Jn. 12³¹ 14³⁰ 16¹¹ 1 Cor. 2⁸. Christ, who is the image of God. For this term, pregnant with theological import, cf. Col. 1¹⁵ Heb. 1³ Jn. 1¹⁴ 14⁹. The word is actually used in the descriptive personification of Wisdom (see Wisdom of Solomon, 7²⁴⁻²⁷). The face of Jesus Christ (see 5¹⁶).

7-15. The Paradox of Apostolic Service. The contrast between the priceless treasure and its humble, fragile casket emphasizes the relation between the divine power and the human messenger. The apostle survives humiliations and sufferings by the life of Jesus within him. We are one with Christ, delivered up to death as he was, so that the power of his resurrection may give life to our mortal bodies (v. 12). Our physical sufferings in the ministry of Jesus are a living death, but the inner secret that sustains us is a dying life (Gal. 2^{19, 20}). A further paradox—the ministry which means self-mortification for us brings life to you. Faith produces hope. Therefore in the same confidence as the psalmist (Psa. 116¹⁰) we speak out, assured that the power which raised Jesus from the dead will enable us who share the death of Jesus to be presented with you, who are spared our mortal sufferings, before the throne of God (v. 14). For all our service and suffering is in your interest, so that the grace which equips us for our ministry may overflow into an increasing number of lives, and so bring forth a richer chorus of thanksgiving to the glory of God."

16-18. The Transient and the Eternal. "Once more, we yield to no languor or despair. Not only does the memory of God's converting grace (v. 1) prevent that; there is also in our fellowship with the risen Christ (Col. 3³) a secret source of inward renewal (Eph. 3¹⁶⁻¹⁹) which counteracts the wastage of physical exhaustion. We have also the liberating grace of hope, which calls in the new world to redress the balance of the old! What is the light trouble of the fleeting age that now is compared with the incalculable weight of glory in the eternal realm which it secures us (Rom. 8¹⁸⁻²⁵) if we will but fix our gaze on the world unseen? (Col. 3¹, 2 Heb. 11^{26, 27} 12².) For the visible is transient, the invisible is eternal."

CHAPTER V

1-10. The Eternal Habitation of the Soul. This very difficult section is closely related to Paul's doctrine of the resurrection body already discussed under 1 Cor. 15³⁵⁻⁵⁸. We saw there that Paul was concerned with the body as an integral part of the personality, the organ of the soul. Discarding the thought of the resurrection of the physical body, he taught (1 Cor. 15⁵⁰⁻⁵²) that at the trumpet blast heralding Christ's Advent, a new body shall be formed by resurrection or transformation from the old, incorruptible instead of corruptible, a spiritual body fitted for the high uses of the heavenly realm. An advance in thought meets us in the present passage. Meanwhile Paul has trembled on the brink of the grave (18, 9). He no longer assumes his own survival till the Advent. But if God gives to each man his new body on that day, is the soul to shiver in nakedness from the hour of death until the day of the Lord? He has now found an answer to that alarming thought. There awaits him in heaven a spiritual and enduring body.

The language is obscure because of the change of metaphor. First Paul speaks of the present body as a tabernacle (tent) to be superseded by a building. The insecurity and temporary nature of the one is contrasted with the durability and permanence of the other. Substituting "the earthly body" for "earth," Paul's thought is well paraphrased in the hymn,

"Earth's but a sorry tent, Pitched but a few frail days."

Then Paul alternates between the metaphor of habitation and that of clothing. Discontent with the present burdensome vestment of the soul is not a desire to be unclothed, but a longing for investiture with the raiment of immortality. This new raiment is put on above the old, which then perishes without leaving us naked (v. 3). The idea is akin to that of 1 Cor. 15⁵⁴, "when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality." Read the phrase here as that what is mortal may be absorbed by life. In 1 Cor. 15⁵⁴ it was "death is swallowed up (or absorbed) in victory." The certainty of this expectation (v. 1) is based on the inner renewal (4¹⁶), which is evidence of God's creative design, and finds a guarantee in the gift of the Spirit, a pledge and foretaste of the powers and processes of the spiritual realm (v. 5). "With such a confidence, and knowing that presence here in the body means exile from our home in the Lord, we prefer to go into exile from the body and to enter upon our life at home with the Lord. But it is not for us to choose. Our one concern must be to give satisfaction to our Master, whether here in the body or in the spiritual realm. For our confidence in the certainty of the abiding home that awaits us hereafter brings no exemption from the ordeal of judgment." This paragraph follows closely on the last. The toils and troubles of the present time cannot daunt one who has no reason to dread the sequel to death. Nevertheless, this assurance of future bliss does not diminish the ethical alertness of one who lives with the judgment throne before his eyes.

Two points call for further treatment. (1) Paul's thought of life in the body as exile from the Lord does not deny his cardinal doctrine of the mystical union with Christ. The apparent denial is qualified by the parenthesis in v. 7, where read We lead our life in faith, without seeing him, i.e., in the present order a veil of the senses hides Jesus from our vision. That barrier will have vanished after death. (2) Paul shares the Jewish doctrine of the final Judgment of all. But for the Christian Christ is the judge, and, inasmuch as the new body is in readiness for him in the hour and article of death, his judgment takes place then. He does not dread that ordeal (Rom. 8¹), for faith has brought him the power of the Spirit, with immeasurable moral reinforcement.

An arresting feature of this section is the virtual discarding of traditional Jewish eschatology for the personal and ethical trust in Jesus. The future life for the Christian means a fuller enjoyment of fellowship with Christ, guaranteed by our present experience of this union. (See Phil. 1²¹, 23 Jn. 14¹⁹, and cf. art., Intertestamental Religion, pp. 210-3.)

11-19. The Ministry of Reconciliation. Remembrance of the Judgment insures for Paul's ministry honorable methods, transparent to God and to the readers' honest scrutiny. Not another instance of "self-commendation"! (31.) This is rather a weapon for his champions (1¹⁴) when defending him from those who lay stress on outward advantage. Do his critics charge him with "madness"? (V. 13.) His ecstatic gifts are reserved for private intercourse with God (1 Cor. 12¹ 14¹⁸). He is severely "sane" in his dealings with the church (1 Cor. 14¹⁹, 40). All selfish considerations are impossible in a ministry ruled by the love of Christ. The central doctrine of the cross, "Christ for all: all in Christ," is the negation of selfishness (Gal. 2²⁰ Rom. 14⁷⁻⁹). There is, therefore, no place for pride of privilege in the Christian ministry, even though it be based on knowledge of the human life of Jesus (v. 16). Fellowship with the living Christ brings a man into a new world, in which old advantages no longer count. God is the author of this new creation—God, who reconciled these sinners who are now his missionaries, and then sent them forth on the ministry of reconciliation, to tell mankind that in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself—by forgiving men their sins.

12c. The reference is to those who pride themselves on acquaintance with some of the Jerusalem apostles (cf. Gal. 2⁶) but do not bear the hall-mark of genuine Christian experience.

16. The most probable of many explanations of this difficult verse follows the Greek text by keeping after the flesh in close adverbial relation to know. From the time when his spiritual apprehension of Jesus wrought a revolution in Paul's life, he no longer stood in the same relations to his kinsfolk and friends (cf. Mk. 3³³ 10^{29f.}). All his outward relationships changed when he began to live "in Christ." In the same way, there was a time when as a zealous Pharisee he had seen Jesus and known his outward way of life (cf. Phil. 27), but had possessed only the kind of knowledge possible to the flesh (cf. Mt. 16¹⁷). The true discernment of Christ first came when God revealed his Son to him (Gal. 1¹⁵, 16). The words contain no disparagement of the original disciples of Jesus. So far as they have a polemical reference they are directed against those who pride themselves on closer relations with the Palestinian disciples (v. 12c). Paul never discounts the value of the historical basis of the faith. God has revealed his redemptive purpose in history, but the revelation must be spiritually discerned. For the probability that Paul saw Jesus during the last week in Jerusalem, and the possibility that he was an agent provocateur in gathering evidence for the trial, see J. Weiss, Paul and Jesus, pp. 17–56; J. H. Moulton, Expositor, VIII, ii, pp. 16–28.

20, 21. See notes on 6^{1–10}.

CHAPTER VI

1–10. The Christian Embassy; Pains and Consolations (including also 5²⁰, 21). The supreme dignity of the apostolic office is that the minister is God's ambassador, the actual representative of Christ, delivering his message, Be reconciled to God (5²⁰). As always in Paul, it is man, not God, whose antagonism is the barrier. The urgency of the appeal is marked by the cost at which this reconciliation is announced to the world. Elsewhere Paul has set forth the significance of the death of Christ in relation to human sin in bold language. He is a "propitiation" (Rom. 3²⁵), a "curse" (Gal. 3¹³). Nowhere else is paradox carried so far as here in 5²⁰, 21 in the attempt to express the complete self-identification of Jesus with the sinful race he came to save. The Sinless One was identified in some mysterious way with our sin, that by that same union with him we might become righteous, not according to the human but the divine standard of character.

Paraphrase of vv. 1–10: "As fellow workers with God in this embassy our appeal to you is to make effective use of this gracious message. Now is 'the favorable opportunity,' 'the day of salvation' spoken of by the prophet (Isa. 49⁸). Our aim as ambassadors is to put no sort of obstacle in your way, so that no blame may attach to our ministry if you reject God's overtures. What are the marks of a genuine ministry? Unflinching endurance (vv. 4, 5) of such sufferings as befell our Master (cf. 4¹⁰ Gal. 6¹⁷); a blameless character after the pattern of Jesus himself (v. 6); effectiveness in attack and defense in the righteous cause of Christ (v. 7), repelling every slander and triumphing over every adversity by the spirit of disinterested love."

CHAPTERS 6¹¹ TO 7¹⁶: PAUL'S RECONCILIATION WITH THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH

We saw that in 11²–21⁷ Paul was defending himself against false charges, and that in 31–61⁰ he was setting forth the apostolic office. He now rejoices in the reconciliation which has been accomplished. This is the third part of the general section, 11²–7¹⁶, on Paul's relations with the Corinthians.

11–13. Paul's Large-Hearted Appeal. Paul's personal relations with the Corinthian church are once more the theme. Reconciliation has been effected, and he has written with the frankness of their spiritual father. Will they not respond with the same unrestrained affection? (An interpolation interrupts the appeal, which is resumed at 7².)

14–18. Warning Against Pagan Entanglements (including also 7¹). This passage so obviously breaks into the sequence of thought which would otherwise flow smoothly from 6¹³ to 7^{2–4}, that it is generally taken to be a fragment of another letter, probably the letter (see letter (A) in intro., section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (2), p. 1169) referred to in 1 Cor. 5⁹. (For the possibility that loose papyrus sheets became detached, and were wrongly replaced when the Pauline correspondence was collected and edited at a later stage, see G. Milligan, The N.T. Documents, pp. 181f.) Mixed marriages and all compromising entanglements with pagans are deprecated on the ground of moral incompatibility. Some of his readers seem to have taken the prohibition too stringently, and to have understood it as forbidding any kind of social or business connections with their pagan neighbors. This misunderstanding was corrected by Paul, 1 Cor. 5¹⁰.

15. Belial (R.V. mg. Beliar) in later Judaism (e.g., Book of Jubilees, and Testaments of Twelve Patriarchs) was often used for Satan, or some personal power of evil. (See art., Inter-testamental Religion, p. 205, and cf. p. 846b.) The word itself was Hebrew, meaning "worthlessness," and commonly occurs in the O.T. phrase "man of Belial," i.e., "worthless fellow." An elaborate demonology (as well as angelology) was a marked feature of post-exilic Jewish thought. It is possible that, as the word "Belial" is sometimes rendered "transgressor" in the LXX, Paul here uses the name for Antichrist, for the term "Man of Lawlessness" is used in that connection in 2 Thess. 2³, mg.

16. No greater contrast could be imagined than the Jewish Temple, in which no image was allowed, and a heathen temple with its statuary. But Paul immediately turns to the favorite Christian conception of the "temple not made with hands" (Acts 7⁴⁸ 17²⁴) and claims that the Christian Church (so 1 Cor. 3^{16f}. Eph. 2²¹) is the shrine of the living God. The mosaic of O.T. phrases is made up from Ex. 29⁴⁵ Lev. 26¹² Jer. 31³³ Isa. 52¹¹ Ezek. 20⁴¹ 2 Sam. 7¹⁴ Jer. 31⁹ Isa. 43⁶. The entire course of religious development through the O.T. leads up to the new society created in Christ, which is called to purification, not from ritual but from ethical defilement, and to the positive achievement of all that the holy will of God demands.

CHAPTER VII

1. See notes on 614-18.

2-4. The Appeal Continued. In resuming the affectionate plea interrupted at 613, Paul protests his innocence against three reproaches that seem to have been thrown at him, or else hints that in this respect some of his critics compare unfavorably with him. He has wronged no one, ruined no one, taken advantage of no one. Cf. 4² 1 Thess. 2³ Acts 20^{26f}, and the challenge in 12^{17f}.

5-16. The Successful Mission of Titus; the Discipline of Godly Sorrow. At last Paul picks up the thread of narrative dropped at 213. From Troas he had pressed on to Macedonia in deepest depression. The churches of Galatia and Corinth were in revolt, his work in Asia was endangered by Jewish and heathen fanaticism, his own mind was tormented by restless fears. Had the sharp letter (described in intro. as (C); section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," (5), p. 1169) done harm rather than good? At this crisis of his fortunes Titus arrived with the news that the Corinthian church was loyally and affectionately disposed toward the apostle. Not only was Paul relieved of the intolerable strain; the mind of Titus, that trusty ambassador whose wisdom and firmness had saved the situation, was also set at rest. Nowhere does Paul's tact and tenderness show better than in the words in which he confides to his readers that Titus now shares his pride in the Corinthian church, which Paul had preserved all through the painful controversy. The vindication of this confidence was to be found in the joy with which Titus gave his report (v. 7).

There was still the memory of the painful letter. Even this, however, is now a source of satisfaction (v. 9). It was written primarily, not for the punishment of the offender, nor yet to secure redress for the victim, but to bring home to the Corinthians a keen sense both of their fault and of their love for him (v. 12).

8-10. These verses distinguish between a morbid sorrow which leads to despair and death, and the God-given pain which leads to repentance and life. We may contrast the remorse of Judas and the penitence of Peter. For the sorrow of the world see F. Paget, The Spirit of Discipline, in which the essay on Accidie and the sermon on these words together form a classic of the devotional life. For godly sorrow cf. R. L. Stevenson's lines in The Celestial Surgeon, and the closing sections of Tennyson's Guinevere.

12. He that did the wrong; not the incestuous person of 1 Cor. 5¹⁻⁵, for Paul could not have written so lightly of this appalling sin. He that suffered the wrong; probably Paul himself (see on 25-11). Some think the reference is to Timothy (so Findlay, art., "Paul," Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iii, p. 711). It is quite possible that the ringleader of the opposition to Paul had first insulted Paul's emissary, Timothy, and then refused any apology on Paul's hurried visit to assert authority in his own person.

CHAPTERS 8¹ TO 9¹⁵: THE COLLECTION FOR THE CHURCH AT JERUSALEM

This collection forms the theme of the next main division of the letter.

CHAPTER VIII

1-15. The Macedonian Example an Encouragement to Corinth. This perfect confidence in the love and loyalty of the Corinthians enables Paul to refer to the collection (see 1 Cor. 16¹⁻⁹). The extraordinary generosity of the Macedonian churches is quoted as an example. Unasked, these poverty-stricken communities begged to share in the privilege of relieving their poor brethren at Jerusalem, and had given beyond all expectation, dedicating first themselves and then their scanty savings to the Lord, and through him to his apostles. Moved by this abounding liberality Paul has asked Titus, who had started the arrangements for this fund at Corinth, to visit the church to see the scheme through to a successful result (v. 6). There can be no doubt that a church rich in every endowment (cf. 1 Cor. 14-8), and united to Paul by ardent love, will contribute on a scale worthy of its spiritual wealth. Not that Paul would put any pressure on them. He cites the zeal of the Macedonians to give the Corinthians an opportunity of showing that their love is no less sincere (v. 8). Not that he would use rivalry as a motive. The supreme motive must be gratitude to the Lord Jesus for his transcendent grace (cf. Mt. 10⁸). Nevertheless, the Corinthians were first in the field, both in their desire to help and in their organization a year ago. They are ready to give, and are not expected to give beyond their means, or to relieve the responsibility of others. At present it is within their power to help the Christians at Jerusalem. Later on the position may be reversed (v. 14). The principle of equalized supply is taught in the story of the manna in the wilderness (Ex. 16¹⁸).

9. Here, as in Phil. 2⁵⁻¹¹, Paul indoctrinates his ethics, as elsewhere (e.g., 1 Cor. 15⁵⁸ Gal. 5^{22f}. Eph. 4, 5 Col. 3, 4, notes) he moralizes his theology.

16-24. Titus and Two Others Commended for this Mission. The first named, as Paul's intimate colleague, was already well known at Corinth. He needed no pressing to go on this mission, but had volunteered. The two companions of Titus are unnamed here. One was appointed by the Macedonian churches to share Paul's responsibility in collecting and conveying this benevolence to Jerusalem. His zeal in spreading the gospel has already won him wide renown. The appointment of such co-treasurers is part of Paul's deliberate policy to prevent suspicion and scandal where detractors are busy (v. 21). It is more than probable that Luke was the delegate. We know that he accompanied Paul to Palestine, and we read (Acts 20⁴) of two Thessalonians and one Berean among the delegates, but no Philippian. Ramsay's argument that Luke's home was Philippi gives point to this suggestion. A. Souter (Expository Times, vol. xviii, pp. 285, 335f.) argues from the use of the Greek article that the words here used mean that Luke was Titus' brother, which would explain the otherwise inexplicable omission of the name of Titus in Acts. Speculation is less fruitful with regard to the third name, but he may well have been one of the three Macedonian representatives named in Acts 20⁴.

CHAPTER IX

1-5. The Reason for this Mission. With delicate tact Paul hints that, though he has no anxiety about the readiness of the Corinthians to do their utmost for this fund, he does not want his Macedonian friends to suspect him of overestimating their zeal. After stimulating them with the cry, "Achaia hath been prepared for a year past," it would be humiliating to arrive at Corinth in the company of Macedonian delegates only to find the Corinthian church unprepared. For the credit of the apostle (not to say of Corinth), he was sending the three brethren in advance, so that in due course their reputation for foresight and for generosity would stand secure.

6-15. The Ground of the Apostolic Appeal for Liberality. Paraphrase: "Remember that the sparing sower reaps a sparing harvest, and the lavish sower a lavish harvest (cf. Prov. 11^{24f}. 19¹⁷ 22⁹). Let no man give on impulse, or yet under compulsion, but as the cheerful giver whom God loves (Prov. 22⁸, 9). God, on the scale of the divine bounty (Phil. 4¹⁹), will make this possible by supplying all your actual needs and giving you also enough to meet every claim on your generosity (v. 8). You will be like the man of whom the psalmist (Psa. 112⁹) sings, 'He hath scattered abroad, he hath given to the poor; his righteousness abideth for ever.' The same Lord who multiplies the farmer's seeds will make all your good deeds fruitful. While you are being enriched in every way so as to become generous in every direction, your generosity administered through me will evoke thanksgiving to God. For the distribution of this fund will at the same time supply the wants of the poor Christians at Jerusalem and inspire a chorus of thanksgiving to God (cf. 11¹ 41⁵). Men will recognize the true meaning of your service, and will praise God as they see the outcome of your creed in your conduct, and the generosity of your contribution to them and to the whole church. They will also pray for you, and will be drawn into a closer fellowship with you as they think of the overwhelming grace of God which he has poured upon you. Thanks be to God for his inestimable gift."

7. Cf. Wordsworth's sonnet, King's College Chapel,

"Give all thou canst; high Heaven rejects the lore
Of nicely calculated less or more."

8, 10. In later Judaism righteousness was often a synonym for "almsgiving." Cf. Mt. 6¹, 2.

10. Language borrowed from Isa. 55¹⁰ and Hos. 10¹².

CHAPTERS 10¹ TO 13¹⁰: PAUL'S DEFENSE OF HIS CHARACTER AND OF HIS WORK

A sudden change of tone strikes harshly on our ears as we pass from the tender-hearted, conciliatory appeal of the preceding chapters to the vehement self-assertion of this closing section. Most of the weapons in Paul's polemical armory are brought into vigorous use. This fighting temper seems the more ill-timed as an immediate sequel to the doxology of

915. Those who stand by the integrity of Second Corinthians have to assume that, after addressing the loyal majority, Paul now turns to the disloyal minority. The calumnies and innuendos of his detractors are now disposed of with withering scorn and sarcasm. It is said that a letter which was dictated at intervals during the course of several days would reflect different moods of Paul's mercurial temperament. Psychological probability, however, favors the view that these four chapters are part of the severe letter to which Paul definitely refers (23. 9 78). There are, indeed, passages in chs. 10-13 which seem to be alluded to in chs. 1-9. Cf. 10⁶ with 2⁹; 13² with 12³; 13¹⁰ with 2³. The protest in 3¹ and 5¹² that "we are not again commending ourselves" may well be a reply to criticisms provoked by 107 115, 23; and "whether we are beside ourselves, it is unto God," 5¹³, becomes significant if 12² had been twisted into a confession of an unbalanced mind. Eager self-defense and relentless exposure of his slanderers were not only permissible but obligatory for one who was struggling to save the Corinthian church from the mischievous propaganda that threatened the peace and loyalty of communities in the Christian mission. It is less easy to justify this personal polemic after the complete victory signalized in 7¹¹⁻¹⁶. For these reasons the priority of chs. 10-13 to chs. 1-9 is here accepted.

CHAPTER X

1-6. The Charge of Cowardice Repelled. Paraphrase: "I make my personal appeal to you in the name of the gentle and gracious Christ. Do not put me to the necessity of drastic dealing with insubordinate agitators when I visit you. I know the slander, 'He cringes when present, but can be bold enough at a distance.' I shall have to show those people that we conduct our campaign on no worldly policy. Our weapons are invincible for the demolition of strongholds—all sophistries and every rampart raised to oppose the knowledge of God. I shall capture every plan and bring it into the obedient service of Christ, and I am ready, once your submission is complete, to exact a penalty for every mutinous act."

1. Meekness in modern English is inadequate for this fine ethical quality. It is the velvet glove that encases the hand of iron. It saves the giant from the tyranny of using his strength as a giant. Cf. Psa. 18³⁵ Mt. 5⁵ 11²⁹. The word translated gentleness in A.V. and R.V., and "sweet reasonableness" by M. Arnold, is cognate with that rendered "fearbearance" in Phil. 4⁵.

4-6. These verses are full of martial metaphors well brought out in Moffatt's translation.

7-11. The Charge of Weakness Repelled. Paraphrase: "Then there is the sneer, 'He is powerful with the pen, but a weakling to look at, and a poor speaker' (v. 10). Have you eyes for outward appearance only? (V. 7.) I have as good a claim to the authority of Christ as any other man, and though I may seem to exaggerate my authority now, it will prove no empty boast when I arrive among you. This authority was given me to build up the church, not to pull it down (as is the case with my rivals!), so I do not want to overawe you by my letters. But let the man who sneers at me make sure of this, that however strong may be the language of my letters I shall prove just as strong when I stand in your midst."

10. This may preserve a malicious jibe at Paul's personal appearance (cf. the traditional description in the Acts of Paul and Thecla, 3). On the other hand it may refer to Paul's failure to make his presence felt on his last unfortunate visit. If this was due to physical prostration, we may compare the language of Gal. 4¹³, 14.

12-18. The Charge of Trespass Repelled. Paraphrase: "I cannot bring myself to emulate those self-praisers whom you know so well, or to compare myself with them. In their folly they set themselves up as a standard of self-measurement! But I will not glory beyond my legitimate province, but will keep within that province which God measured out to me, which embraced our mission to you. By this I mean that in bringing Corinth within our sphere of operations I was not straining my commission. We were the first to come to you (v. 14, R.V. and A.S.V. mg.) as missionaries of the gospel. I make no illegitimate boast as the result of other men's labors, but hope that as your faith grows our range of influence may be enlarged through you, so that my legitimate province may be extended, enabling me to preach the gospel in districts beyond Achaia. But in doing this I shall not (as some whom you know) trespass on another man's province, and then boast of work that he has already brought within sight of success. In any case we must remember Jeremiah's maxim (Jer. 9²⁴), 'Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord.' For there is one decisive test, which is not self-commendation, but commendation by the Lord."

12b, 13a. The interpretation of this very difficult passage is complicated by a variation in the text. Some ancient authorities omit four words (for the change thus produced see Moffatt's translation). The paraphrase given above represents the R.V. text. With the shortened form of text the meaning will be: "These self-praisers poach on other men's preserves and then boast of their success. I keep my own province, compare myself with my own standard, which is limited for me by the province God has appointed me."

CHAPTER XI

1-15. Counter-Attack on Spurious Apostles.

We have already met with several allusions to some opponents who disparaged Paul's status, and trespassed on his apostolic sphere of influence. They are not the overzealous partisans of Peter or Apollos (1 Cor. 11²), but some wandering propagandists whose motives and methods arouse Paul's deepest resentment and concern. In this painful section he warns the Corinthian church, and exposes the character of his opponents. This personal statement of his own position will, of course, seem "folly." His defense is his earnest desire to present the Corinthian church to Christ with a stainless reputation. After all, they put up with folly enough from these interlopers, who are asking them to accept another Jesus, a different Spirit, a different gospel. Is Paul really inferior to these superlative missionaries! He may be less glib, but he has spiritual insight, and he can make his meaning clear (v. 6). The cruel wrong is that his scrupulous care to avoid being a burden to them has been twisted into a confession of defective title. He has supported himself, has even accepted help from the Macedonian churches so that his gospel should cost the Corinthians nothing. Now he will persist in this course, not that he loves them too little to receive gifts from them, but in order to expose the contrast between his method and that of his rivals in the eyes of all Achaia (v. 10). So far from taking advantage of his forbearance they will now have to meet him on equal terms, and they will be found out as sham missionaries, masquerading as ministers of righteousness, just as Satan, their master, masquerades as an angel of light.

2. This is the first appearance of the figure of espousal representing the mystical relationship between Christ and his church, which is developed in Eph. 5²⁶⁻³². It is based on O.T. language regarding Israel's relations with Jehovah (Ezek. 23 Hos. 1-3).

5. The R.V. mg., Those pre-eminent apostles, is preferable. There is no reference to the Twelve. Cf. 12¹¹.

16-33. The Fool Answered According to His Folly. Paraphrase: "I am driven to the necessity of meeting my detractors on their own ground. It sounds boastful and foolish, and you must not think that I am speaking as the Lord's mouthpiece, or in my own character. You must not complain, for you fall a ready victim, in spite of your boasted shrewdness, to any charlatan who domineers and fleeces you, who hoodwinks you, who lords it over you with arrogance and insult (v. 20). It is a shameful confession to make, but really I was not man enough to adopt that course! For all that, if I must play their foolish game of self-advertisement, I can make claims as big as theirs. What is their vaunt on grounds of language, nationality, ancestral privilege? I am at least their equal. Do they claim to be ministers of Christ? It is sheer madness to talk like this, but how does their record of service compare with mine! (V. 23.) What do they know of all my toils, and imprisonments, and scourgings, and deadly perils! Think of the catalogue of adventures! Five times the Jews have inflicted on me the severest legal flogging, three times I have suffered the Roman lictors' rods, once I suffered the sentence of stoning, three times I have been wrecked at sea, and once for a whole night and day I was adrift on the deep. Think of all I have suffered in my travels: dangers from swollen torrents, from brigands, from hostile Jews and fanatical Gentiles, dangers from city mobs and from unpeopled deserts and from the uncertain sea; worse still, dangers from the treachery of men who bear the Christian name. Think of all my toils and hardships, sleepless nights, hunger and thirst, shortage of food and fuel and clothing (v. 27). These are the bodily sufferings, but in addition to them I have the care which haunts me every day—my anxiety for all the churches. Whenever some poor weakling stumbles and falls, virtue goes out of me as I share his weakness and shame. If there is to be any boasting, that alone shall be my boast—the toils and troubles that drain my strength."

18. Glory after the flesh, i.e., rely boastfully on the accidental privileges of birth and nationality. Cf. Phil. 3^{4f}.

23-27. Cf. 6⁴⁻¹⁰.

24. Five times. See Deut. 25³. Not one of these judicial acts of the Synagogue against Paul is recorded in Acts. They may belong to an earlier period of his ministry. In any event, the reference shows how much of Paul's Christian labor is unrecorded (cf. Jn. 21²⁵).

25. With rods. Roman magistrates alone could sentence to this punishment. Paul as a Roman citizen could claim exemption from corporal punishment (cf. Acts 22²⁵). The one instance recorded in Acts 16^{22f}, suggests that Paul may have endured this illegal outrage on each occasion because his comrade could not demand exemption. At Philippi his endurance of this illegality may have enabled him to secure his friends from official molestation by the threat of exposure (cf. Acts 16³⁷⁻³⁹). The stoning was that at Lystra (Acts 14¹⁹). The only shipwreck reported in Acts (see ch. 27) belongs to a later period than this letter. Must we allow for an active ministry before Paul was sent out with Barnabas from Antioch? (Acts 9³⁰ 11²⁵.) Or must we recognize that Luke's narrative is but an outline of journeys far more adventurous than even his pen could describe?

29. And I burn not may mean to burn with sympathetic shame, or to blaze with indignation at the tempter (cf. Mt. 18⁶).

32, 33. The verses have the appearance of a postscript. Cf. Acts 9²⁴, 25.

CHAPTER XII

1-10. Visions and Revelations of the Lord. Paraphrase: "This hateful necessity brings me to another subject for boasting—mystical experiences which the Lord has granted me. It is fourteen years since this ineffable privilege was mine. I only know that I was transported to the dwelling-place of God and heard unutterable secrets. I could boast of the Paul who enjoyed that ecstasy, but of the Paul whom you know my only boasting must be of his weaknesses (v. 5). For, to save me from undue elation because of the visions, God gave me a painful affliction, like a stake in the flesh, to keep me humble. Three times I have made earnest prayer to be delivered from this affliction, and this is his reply: 'Enough for you is my grace, for my power is perfected in weakness.' For this reason my proudest boast shall be in the things that make me weak, so that I may find protection under the power of Christ. Therefore I delight in all I suffer for Christ's sake, for in him I find my strength when I myself am weak."

2-4. Paul naturally describes this ecstatic experience in the language of his Jewish contemporaries. According to post-exilic ideas, the Jews spoke sometimes of a series of seven heavens, at other times of three. Here Paul seems to identify the third heaven with Paradise (cf. Lk. 23⁴³ Rev. 27), the dwelling place of God. (For a discussion of these terms and the varying conceptions in the Jewish apocalypses, see arts., Intertestamental Literature, pp. 188-9; Intertestamental Religion, pp. 210-3; Backgrounds, p. 845-7.) The date, fourteen years before (i.e., as we reckon, thirteen), emphasizes the actuality of the experience. The "unutterable utterances" (v. 4) are not the "voiceless groanings" of Rom. 8²⁶, but transcendent and incommunicable revelations which left on Paul's mind a sense of assurance. In accordance with all ancient mysticism it was regarded as irreverent to report such sacred sensations to the unsympathetic.

7. Paul's thorn in the flesh has been a theme for endless discussion. The phrase a messenger of Satan recalls Job 21-7. The most likely meaning is some physical malady, intermittent or chronic, which not only tried the apostle's endurance, but sometimes reduced him to abject helplessness.

10. Cf. 13⁴, also Phil. 4¹³ Eph. 3¹⁶ 6¹⁰ Col. 1¹¹.

NOTE ON THE MYSTICISM OF PAUL

Recent studies in the psychology of religion have given this description of the mystic trance considerable importance in the treatment of the mysticism of Paul. Reference may be made to Inge's essay on the psychology of mysticism in Studies of the English Mystics, ch. i; Inge, Christian Mysticism, pp. 60-72; R. H. Strachan, The Individuality of St. Paul, ch. xiv. Deissmann, who offers an illuminating study of Paul as a reacting (as opposed to an acting) mystic (Paul, 2nd edit., ch. vi), remarks, "Paul himself subordinated ecstasy to ethos." For a parallel to this Pauline memory of a special revelation granted years before, cf. Principal Shairp's record of words spoken to him by Thomas Erskine of Linlathen (Letters of Thomas Erskine, p. 539). On the alleged dependence of Paul's mysticism on the mysteries, see Morgan, Religion and Theology of Paul, pt. ii, ch. 1, and for a contrary opinion see H. A. A. Kennedy, Paul and the Mystery Religions. Cf. art., Backgrounds, p. 851.

11-18. Apostolic Credentials. Paraphrase: "You drove me to all this foolish self-commendation, for you ought to have been as quick to defend my reputation as you were to give letters of commendation (31) to those superlative apostles (115) whose superiority I am not prepared to acknowledge, though they affect to regard me as a nonentity. While we were in your midst none of the signs were missing that mark an apostolic ministry. Without grudging the cost (cf. Mk. 5³⁰ 9²⁹) we so labored and prayed that God's marvelous powers were at work among you. In what way do you suffer in comparison with churches founded by other apostles, except that I have refused to be a financial burden to you? You must forgive me for this omission! I am ready to visit you for the third time, without burdening you; since it is you and not your money that I want (v. 14). For, after all, I am your father, and it is only fitting that instead of drawing on your savings I should gladly spend what I have and be utterly spent myself for your souls. Do you love me less because I love you all too much? But the charge is that, though I was not a burden to you on the claim of personal maintenance, I was cunning enough to trick you into paying in another way. Is that true? Did I fleece you by means of any of my emissaries? I asked Titus to visit you, and his brother (cf. 8¹⁸) with him. Did Titus fleece you? Of course not! Yet, as you well know, he and I are guided by the same principles and follow the same course."

16-18. These spurious missionaries, who were themselves drawing supplies from the Corinthian church, first tried to score off Paul by hinting that he did not take maintenance because he knew he was not entitled to do so (117; cf. 1 Cor. 9³⁻¹⁸). When that line of attack failed, they whispered that the fund which his agents were organizing at Corinth and elsewhere was an instrument of Paul's craft and cupidity. Hence Paul's honorable safeguards. See 820^f.

19-21. Paul's Hopes and Fears for the Corinthian Church. Paraphrase: "Do not imagine that in all this I am standing on my defense before you. It is at God's tribunal that I stand as a servant of Christ, and my motive is that the church at Corinth may be built up. For I have misgivings, unless things change, that my next visit may bring mutual disappointment. You will find me helpless in the face of a church divided, and demoralized by every un-Christlike temper. I, on the other hand, shall be heartbroken by finding some who have in the past practiced heathen vice flaunting themselves unabashed in the ranks of the church" (cf. 1 Cor. 6¹¹).

CHAPTER XIII

1-14. Final Warnings and Appeal. Paul continues on the same note. Paraphrase: "If such there be, they must repudiate any unlawful associations before my approaching visit, when there will be a thorough investigation. This is but to repeat the warning given during my second visit. I shall exercise my disciplinary powers to the full, and thus prove that I am the representative of Christ, who is not weak but full of power in his dealings with you. In human weakness he died upon the cross, but he is alive for evermore in the power of God. My weakness brings me into fellowship with him whose boundless power will give me strength to deal with you (v. 4). The urgent question, however, is not whether Christ is in me, but whether he is in you. Put this to the test and discover whether you have that faith in Christ which saves from sin. I cannot believe that you shrink from this test. I hope that you will have reason to know that I have not failed in the test applied to my mission (cf. 1 Cor. 3¹²⁻¹⁵). For the apostle is responsible for the purity of life of the churches under his control. Therefore I pray that you at Corinth may reach a high moral standard. This is not that I may get the credit of a spiritually prosperous church. Indeed, from one standpoint I should have failed, as the test of my moral authority is effective disciplinary action, which in this case would not have been put to the proof. But I am not influenced by the thought of personal prestige, but of what is right and true (v. 8). What if my detractors call me a 'weaking' once more for not justifying my promise of bold action? If the true reason for my inactivity is that you have proved the strength of your faith in Christ, I shall rejoice in the lost opportunity of showing my strength. So I pray that God may supply all that is at present lacking in your Christian character, and I send this warning to avoid the necessity of displaying my apostolic authority, which was given me for the one purpose of building you up in the Christian life (v. 10). Farewell, brothers, make good your defects, attend to my exhortations, live in harmony and peace, so that you may claim the presence of the God of love and peace."

1. Third time. Cf. 12¹⁴, and see introduction, section on "Paul's Relations with Corinth," p. 1169. At the mouth; etc., is a quotation from Deut. 19¹⁵. The original words may simply indicate a formal inquiry with judicial results, or it may be an instance of rabbinic "preciousness" in the use of scripture. Remote as such citations are from our modern conceptions of sound scripture exegesis, there are undeniable instances in the letters of Paul (cf. Gal. 3^{16 42b}) of survivals of his rabbinical days.

4. Cf. Phil. 27. 8 1 Pet. 3¹⁸ Rom. 6⁴. 4b. Cf. 12¹⁰ Gal. 2²⁰. 10. Cf. 10⁸.

14. The triple benediction contains in solution the Christian doctrine of God which was crystallized later in the trinitarian dogma of the creeds. Here, as in Eph. 2¹⁸, the theology of experience prepares the way for the definitions of a metaphysical age (see Garvie, Christian Doctrine of the Godhead, pp. 24-26).

GALATIANS

BY PROFESSOR JOHN DOW

INTRODUCTION

To Whom Addressed? When Paul on his first missionary journey passed from Cyprus into Pamphylia a rift appeared in the company and John Mark broke off (Acts 13¹³). It is natural to suspect here a change of plan due to untoward circumstances. In the low-lying coastlands Paul may have contracted malaria (cf. 1 Cor. 2³ 2 Cor. 12⁷; Ramsay's Galatians, p. 422). Consequently, he headed for the highlands of the interior, entering territory less hospitable and civilized, which may well have seemed a foolhardy experiment for a sick man. Here, however, in Pisidian Antioch, Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium, the apostle made friends and founded churches. The Galatians here addressed may be the people of this region. They had received him generously in spite of something repulsive in his ailment (cf. 4¹³). Steeped as they were in pagan superstition, they even took Paul for a god (cf. 4¹⁴). To such people, believers in multitudinous evil spirits and astral divinities and the magical efficacy of ceremonial rites, he preached faith in the one living God—who made the heaven and the earth and the sea, and all that in them is (cf. 4⁹ Acts 14^{15f.}). A volatile people, they were quick to hear, as later they were quick to change again (16³¹).

In Pisidian Antioch Paul pursued his regular method of appealing first in the synagogue to the Jews, and some of his fellow countrymen doubtless adhered to him. Other converts were Gentiles who had previously attached themselves to the synagogue and had gained the moral discipline of the Jewish ethic. But probably the majority of the converts would pass straight out of paganism into Christianity. Thus came into being a new phenomenon, a predominantly Gentile church, and with it arose new problems. Judaism in particular had reason to regard the movement with alarm. The synagogue leaders saw their own ranks thinned and their Gentile adherents drawn elsewhere. They were jealous of a cause far more successful than their own and they resented the non-enforcement of their traditional laws and practices—a cheapening of religion in their eyes (1¹⁰). Small wonder that in this region the apostle found himself pursued by the fanatic hate of his compatriots. They drove him from city to city, pelting him with stones, covering him probably with those scars which he proudly calls the "marks of the Lord Jesus" (6¹⁷; cf. Acts 13⁵¹ 14^{5,6,19,20}).

The deepest national prejudice was stirred by this admission of Gentiles to equality with Jews in the Pauline churches with the consequent social intermingling. It meant a national disintegration, and startled even Christian Jews. On his return from this journey Paul found himself faced with a crisis in the church at Antioch on this very question (Acts 15). Those who forced the issue before the church were not likely to leave unvisited with their propaganda the district in Galatia through which Paul had passed. Emissaries traversed the region, insinuating (1) that Paul was no true apostle, but only a secondary authority dependent on the Jerusalem apostles; (2) that he had made the way into Christianity too broad by removing the barriers of circumcision and the Jewish Law, simply to curry favor with men (1¹⁰). Before this propaganda—with its specious appeal to the authority of those who had been actually with Jesus and to the pagan reverence for ascetic and ritual practices—the Galatian converts lapsed into doubt and fell away from the simple gospel. Paul writes this letter (1) to vindicate the divine right and authority of his own apostleship as derived immediately from the risen Christ, and (2) to affirm faith in Jesus Christ as the essential gospel independent of the Jewish Law. He courses on in burning hot haste, the quick nervous sentences tumbling from his pen so fast that grammar is defied and the sense frequently clouded. (The questions raised here are discussed at length in the art., Life and Work of Paul, pp. 936–7, and in the commentaries on Acts and Second Corinthians.)

Location of the Galatian Churches. This account assumes the destination of the letter to be the churches of South Galatia (Derbe, etc.). The Romans had taken the name of the small kingdom of Galatia and applied it to a large province including part of Lycania, Pisidia, and Phrygia. Paul's habit was to use the Roman provincial titles (Asia, 1 Cor. 16¹⁹ 2 Cor. 1⁸; Achaia, 1 Cor. 16¹⁵ 2 Cor. 1¹; cf. Rom. 15¹⁹ 1 Thess. 17⁴¹⁹). The one name comprehending all the churches of that region was "Galatia." They were the fruits of his first missionary journey and very precious to him, and allusions in the letter fit his experiences there at many points. Some, however, still assign the letter to the ethnic kingdom of Galatia, the region about Ancyra, in northeast Asia Minor. The question will be found discussed at length in the larger commentaries on this Epistle. (See also pp. 940, 1112b.)

Date. The Galatians had lapsed from Paul's teaching soon after he had left them (16). He had already paid them two visits—if we take "the first time" (413) to mean the former of two (visits). These two visits might be on the outward and return journey of Acts 13, 14. Thus the letter can be dated any time after the first journey (Acts 13, 14). The Jerusalem Decree was pertinent to the subject of the letter and would have been quoted surely to strengthen Paul's case had it been issued. Probably then we should date the letter as soon as possible after the first missionary journey.

If the visits going and returning in Acts 13, 14 are counted as one, the second visit would be that which Paul paid with Silas (Acts 16). The letter would then be written from Corinth.

The North Galatian theory requires a later date. The two visits would be those of Acts 16, 18 on the second and third journeys. This would place the letter about the Ephesus period during the three-years' sojourn. As far as doctrine is concerned Galatians could have been written any time after Paul's conversion.

Importance. Galatians has a fourfold interest, as follows:

(1) It shows Christianity in the first hard bout of its lifelong struggle to maintain its freedom and spirituality. What is passing, what permanent, is an issue ever with us. Indeed, in the very beginning, beneath the practical grievance that led to the appointment of the Seven (Acts 6) may have been a difference of interpretation: a Stephen who preached that God needed no temple made with hands (Acts 7) was following a different line from the older disciples with their close concentration on the old Temple worship. Conflict was inevitable. The Hebrew trained in law and precept tended to literalism; the Greek trained in philosophy sensed the ideal and spiritual. The challenge raised in Galatia was really whether or no Christianity was to carry too much lumber: was she to be free, or bound by Jewish legalism? Paul was the first church statesman to have courage to cut away dead wood. He was true to Jesus in maintaining that the children are free (Mt. 1726). Christians are under no obligation to the Temple tax or to any modern form of imposition that conscience may not approve. Through Christ we enter into gracious spiritual relationship to the Father and in the strength of that we regulate life.

(2) It shows that the testing of Christianity is not in her doctrine but in the application of her doctrine to life. The issue was more than a dispute about the rite of circumcision: it involved the whole question of whether Christianity was to follow Judaism in segregating itself from the rest of mankind. The test of true brotherhood is the common table, the ability to eat and live together. The food laws and Sabbath laws of the Jews made concrete their claim to be a separate people. By the discipline of legalism Judaism had hedged itself off from contaminating paganism. Jesus by his contact with publicans and sinners had broken through that hedge, and the problem of Christianity now was whether it could maintain that gap and continue fraternal intercourse. The difficulties were human and social. Meat offered to idols appeared on the tables of one's friends. An invitation to dinner might be coupled with the name of a pagan god. (J. H. Moulton, From Egyptian Rubbish Heaps, p. 41.) To keep up the Jewish Law and racial prejudice inside the Christian Church meant a policy of separation from the world, which had no redemptive power. It is precisely on this field of social intercourse that Christianity is still in the testing. Is there yet fellowship between white, black, and yellow races?

(3) It is invaluable as a study of the human factor in the history of Christianity. This marks the first great deliverance of the faith from the danger of being smothered by non-essentials, and it was because Paul's own experience was so direct and personal a contact with the living Christ that he could thus so clearly distinguish the essential gospel. Again and again the good news is reborn.

(4) It is of incomparable historic value as a piece of autobiography and a document of church history. The opening of Christianity to the Gentiles was a crucial episode, and upon this struggle the Epistle casts light. It reminds us how great are the walls of prejudice that must be beaten down and how terrible the toll of pain and tears that the task demands of chosen souls before victory is won for the forces of progress. Progress is not automatic: it comes by the repetition of the fact of the cross, the reincarnation of Christ in the Pauls of history.

Literature: Commentaries: Bacon (Bible for Home and School); Burton (International Critical); Emmet (Readers'); Findlay (Expositor's Bible); Lightfoot; McFadyen (Interpreter's); Ramsay. Also Luther On Galatians; Macgregor, Christian Freedom.

CHAPTER 1

1-5. Paul States His Theme. Paul states at once what is to be the burden of his letter, namely, the divine source of the salvation that is in Christ, and the utter adequacy of this salvation to all human need. These deep convictions of Paul were being challenged by the men who could see in the gospel of Christ nothing but a means of increasing the influence of Judaism. (See art., Life and Work of Paul, p. 936.) He vindicates his apostolic authority by deriving it directly from Christ. It was the risen Christ who commissioned Paul (Acts 26¹⁶). Christ, however, did not raise himself: God raised him, that through him he might work his will. Already, in his life and suffering, Christ had given himself up to that will to open the way to salvation, and the divine raising had to do with the salvation being carried out (Acts 22-24 Phil. 25-11). Hence both Paul's commission and his message, equally with the saving grace that he proclaims, are derived ultimately from God through Christ.

There is a certain pessimism about Paul, revealed in his description of the present world (or age) as evil (v. 4). The pessimism is not, however, hopeless. The divine grace in Christ makes a transformation possible. The age of evil does not have to pass before the age of good can appear. A person leaves one age and enters the other accordingly as he passes from the control of the "flesh" to the control of the "spirit." Flesh and spirit are principles, each with its appropriate expression (516-24).

6-9. One Gospel Only. In the nature of the case, there cannot be two gospels. The contrast between salvation by faith in divine grace and salvation by observance of law and personal self-righteousness is fundamental and absolute. Either men can save themselves by perfect obedience or they cannot. If they can, divine grace is unnecessary, and Christ's sacrifice becomes meaningless. If they cannot, then their reliance must be placed on something other than themselves. A gospel is a piece of good news. How can that be good news, Paul is asking, which increases men's moral burden, when what they need is to have the burden lightened?

The gospel may be susceptible of various interpretations, but an interpretation which takes Christ from the place of supremacy is a perversion (v. 7). How strong Paul's feeling is when he says he would not give way even to an angel (v. 8) becomes evident when we remember the large place occupied by angelic mediation in Jewish belief (31⁹ Gen. 22¹¹ Judg. 6¹¹ Zech. 19, 12, 14 Lk. 11¹, 26). The anathema (v. 8), or curse, is not uttered upon the person of the man or angel who might bring a perverted gospel. Paul's meaning is that one must turn from such a message and messenger as from an unholy thing. They are to be taboo, fled from in horror as incredible impieties.

10. One who utters such severe rebukes as this is on the face of it concerned only to please God. To incur human enmity, or to endanger personal friendship, in duty's name, is a severe test.

11-17. Events Following Paul's Conversion. Paul has in mind the charge that he is not a real apostle, because, unlike the Twelve, he had not personally known the Lord. He meets the charge by showing that no man was his teacher in respect of the gospel. If an apostle is one who received the truth directly from Christ himself, then Paul is an apostle.

Paul's language in vv. 15, 16 may echo the claims of the Judaizers. They had professed reverence for the traditions of the fathers, prided themselves on their name as Pharisees ("separated ones"), insisted that God had separated the Jews from the beginning and revealed his law in Israel, to which Paul retorts that God separated him also from his mother's womb like the prophets (cf. Jer. 15 Isa. 49¹) and had revealed in him something better than the Law, namely, his Son, and that too for preaching among the Gentiles (v. 16).

There are certain difficulties connected with Paul's vigorous assertion that he had no human instructor in Christian things. A comparison of this passage, and the ensuing one, with Acts reveals some apparent inconsistencies (see Acts 9¹⁰⁻³⁰). He proclaimed Christ immediately after his conversion, but he had heard Stephen's defense (Acts 7⁵⁷, 58), and had doubtless been instructed by Ananias. The visit to Jerusalem with Barnabas (Acts 9²⁷) seems to have been soon after his conversion, notwithstanding v. 17. The writer of Acts, however, is not giving a complete biography of Paul. He says nothing, e.g., of Paul's visit to Arabia, which evidently marked a significant period in the young convert's life. Moreover, when we get the drift of Paul's present contention, we see that his assertion of independence is correct. What he is insisting on is that his gospel came to him by revelation (v. 12). When he was first converted, nobody had yet grasped the full meaning of the gospel. Certainly, Paul himself had not; he simply proclaimed Jesus "the Son of God" and "the Christ" (Acts 9²⁰⁻²²). But he later saw in him the universal Saviour of men from sin. Whence came that conviction? From others? No, but from the guidance of the Spirit. Hence Paul can speak of "my gospel" (2 Tim. 28). 17. Arabia was probably the neighborhood of Damascus.

18-24. Paul Asserts His Independence of Jerusalem (cf. also 21, 2). Paul had been represented as a second-rate apostle completely dependent on the real apostles at Jerusalem. This he refutes by stressing the scantiness of his intercourse with them, the fewness and brevity of his visits.

(1) He went to Jerusalem indeed, but not to consult Peter, only to visit him, the Greek word implying a visit of curiosity to a famous person or place. He was there only fifteen days—too short a time for any course of teaching. He had been hunted out of Damascus by plots against his life, and so marked a man dared not long remain in Jerusalem, where he was most hated and bitterly remembered as a turncoat. These may have been dangerous days, which would explain why so few apostles—only James and Peter—were in the city. Paul dared not appear in public and therefore could not make himself personally known to the churches of Judæa (i.e., Jerusalem and district). He was merely known by reputation as a converted ex-persecutor for whose changed life they "kept praising" God (v. 24).

(2) Immediately thereafter (v. 21) Paul went right away north, far from any conceivable intercourse with Jerusalem, and there for fourteen years in absolute independence he pursued his way, teaching his gospel without reference to any authority but the witness of the Spirit within. This stay in Syria and Cilicia almost casually mentioned took up half of his missionary career. How little we know of formative periods even in the lives of the great! But Paul had arrested attention and, when the hour struck, Barnabas sought him out (Acts 11^{25,26}).

CHAPTER II

1, 2. Paul Admits a Relation to Jerusalem. Paul now approaches an apparently vulnerable point in his story. He had to confess one visit paid fourteen years after—dating either from the last visit or from his conversion—distinctly for conference with the older apostles. It had been represented as a quest for credentials, a sign of Paul's utter dependence on higher authority. In answer he maintains that the visit would stand examination; it was made in the company of Barnabas and Titus. The mention of Titus is intended to confound the opposition. He was an uncircumcised Greek, and yet Paul dared to take him right in among the pillars of the circumcision party—the lamb in the presence of the lions. What had the Judaizers to say about the fact that the pillar apostles had suffered this Gentile in the Holy City and in their own company? This visit, moreover, was not by command from headquarters; it was prompted by revelation, i.e., by the Spirit, the form of guidance on which the early church laid greatest emphasis. Paul was frequently guided by revelation. Some equate this visit with that of Acts 11³⁰, when Agabus "by the Spirit" foretold a famine, in relief of which Paul and Barnabas went to Jerusalem. Others take the visit as that of Acts 15, when the same two men went up by appointment of the church, but only after seeking the guidance of the Spirit. The atmosphere was one of crisis. The church decided to appeal to Jerusalem, Paul and Barnabas to be delegates. They were officially welcomed and the conference was public. The occasion was thus a formal charge laid before the church by the circumcisionists. The decision was likewise formal—a church decree, duly signed and sponsored, allowing the liberty of the Gentiles in the matter of circumcision, but making certain reservations, and addressed only to the local centers of agitation in the Antioch district, where Jewish and Gentile civilizations met and clashed on equal terms. (For a fuller discussion, see notes on Acts 15.) On the other hand, Paul insists here that the conference was unofficial and private, a consultation simply with the "would-be authorities," as he calls them, with a touch of irony perhaps, taking up the catchword of the Judaizers who had made out Paul an insignificant nobody in comparison. Paul wanted simply to have, not authorization, but influential assurance that he was not on a false track (metaphor from the race course). For that purpose Paul laid before them the "gospel." Not that he would have surrendered it had they disagreed. Only he set value on their indorsement for the good of the work in future. That "gospel" meant the admission of Gentiles without circumcision. Paul's private conference may have preceded the public discussion.

3-5. Titus and the False Brethren. Paul now runs into an obscurity, not in the confusion of a bad case, but through excitement and haste. The facts are known to his readers and only allusions are needed. There are two possible interpretations: (1) Titus was not circumcised albeit he was a Gentile. The much-quoted people of consequence did not demand circumcision in this glaring case before their eyes. In that view Paul is triumphant here. (2) Titus was circumcised—not because of any compulsion, but simply as a concession which it was thought wise policy to make. In that case Paul is claiming credit for large-mindedness. The former makes the stronger and likelier case for Paul. If this one Greek was suffered uncircumcised in the very citadel of Judaism by the pillars of orthodoxy, then Paul's case was proved up to the hilt. On the other hand, the apostle's failing was toward compromise.

Every syllable rings with indignation against the false brethren. These were not Jews who pretended to be Christians to gather evidence of disloyalty to Jewish customs, but more piquantly actual Christians who posed as brotherly and yet played the traitor. They had had themselves introduced by a side door to spy upon the new-found liberty of the Christian fellowship; they would fain have dragged their victims back into utter enslavement to the legal system. Crafty scheming has ever been the method of ecclesiastical reactionaries. But there was no craven yielding, not for a moment, to these plotters. There are times when a Christian cannot bend. The freedom of life and conscience under the gospel had to be made good for all time for these Galatians and so for all Christians in general.

6-10. The Verdict of Jerusalem: Not Command, but Approval. This historic verdict decided that Christianity was to be a world religion, not a sect, a gospel of personal faith in God through Christ, and not a bondage to legalism.

6. The "authorities" (quoting the Judaizers, and possibly ironically), "whatever status they held, or whatever they once were (i.e., disciples of Jesus in the flesh)," left Paul indifferent. Human standing does not count with God (an O.T. phrase). They had no addition to make, i.e., no limiting stipulation—not quite consistent with the decree in Acts 15:20, 29, which has a modifying clause.

7. They recognized two commissions equally divine: Paul's to the Gentiles, Peter's to the Jews—a momentous decision, as Pauline Christianity without the Law was thus put on the same rank nominally as Petrine with the Law. Really they avoided a definition of the essential gospel by simply delimiting spheres of influence. The issue was shelved, not decided. Gentile Christianity was "suffered." The simple ex-pagan saw Jews with all their prestige as kinsmen of the Lord still adhering to the old forms, and he doubted his liberty. Was his Christianity not being simply tolerated? Good enough for Gentiles, it was not good enough for Jews evidently. Open disapproval is often more welcome than toleration. You can fight the one but only gnash the teeth at the other.

8, 9. The leaders saw that Paul's work, like Peter's, was certified by "signs" of the Spirit, e.g., miracles of healing, the supreme practical authentication of an apostle. Hence they gave the right hand in formal fashion before the church. These leaders were James, brother of Jesus, Peter, and John, son of Zebedee. James had taken first place as a kinsman of Jesus or because of his ascetic piety or organizing gifts. The phrase reputed to be pillars seems to drop out as if it ranked in Paul's mind. He is sensitive about his authority derived from Christ. Surely, he himself had been selected as pivotal—by the fact that Christ had apprehended him.

10. The only request made was a matter Paul had already on his conscience—to collect for the poor in Jerusalem, where under enthusiastic apocalyptic hopes they had burned up their capital; or they had suffered social and business ostracism (cf. 1 Cor. 16:1-4 2 Cor. 8, 9 Acts 9:30, 11:25). Amid all the confusions and upheavals of ages Christians have always found this common service.

11-13. The Antioch Affair. This incident, not mentioned in Acts, evidently happened after the Jerusalem concordat. Antioch was a place where the division into Gentile and Jewish spheres as defined by the Jerusalem Decree could not work. It was a mixed community with inevitable interflow between Jew and Gentile in social life. Table fellowship was the testing point (see intro., p. 1208b).

Peter had lived in free intercourse with his Gentile Christian brethren unhampered by scruples. Then certain came from James—delegates from Jerusalem, self-appointed guardians of James' conscience or his real emissaries. Peter, from fear or policy or pressure, withdrew from his free intercourse with Gentile Christians, especially refusing them fellowship in the love feast. The man who had quailed before a serving maid quailed again. It was a crucial issue: it was disrupting the body of Christ.

Paul broke out on Peter openly. This was not Peter's innermost conviction: he was playing an unreal part and others joined him in this inconsistent conduct. Even Barnabas, companion of Paul for so many years in propagating a liberal view of the faith, succumbed to the atmosphere (v. 13)—his Levitical training being still in his blood (Acts 4:36). This probably marks the first break in the friendship with Barnabas which afterward led to separation. (See Acts 15:37-40.)

This exposure of Peter was in public (v. 14).

As his action had affected the community in general, there was call for public rebuke. Peter might claim that he was going his own way and not legislating for others, but such action as his undermined the confidence of immature converts. They felt they were reckoned on a lower plane. "Why this right-about turn?" asks Paul. "You used to eat with Gentiles; that is, you accepted Gentile standards of living, showing that you really felt no obligation to maintain Jewish practices. How utterly inconsistent, then, that you should now want Gentiles to accept those Jewish standards you used to discard!" Here the public rebuke may end (v. 14), but Paul continues the argument. "We who are true-born Jews, and not 'Gentile sinners,' as you disdainfully call them, are aware that our 'justification' is not won on the basis of keeping the Law. Jews though we were and proud of it, we yet became disciples of Jesus simply because we could be set in the right relation to God only in that way—through faith in Christ. That was a practical confession of the valuelessness of the Law. No man's salvation can be achieved by it. Yet here you are reviving it as a standard and essential!" (Cf. Romans for the idea of justification.)

Faith in Christ (v. 16) was to Paul a personal reaching out to the love and peace of God that discovers itself in Jesus. Justification is a formal legal word, but it signifies simply our acceptance before God, admission to standing as members of his household, recognition as sons with all the potentialities of sons, that restoration to status which the prodigal received from his father's grace when all he sought was rank as a servant. Note how Paul clinches his argument by a quotation from the O.T. (Psa. 1432). Scripture was to the Jew the final court of appeal.

17. Peter's conduct is still in Paul's mind. By withdrawal from table fellowship with Gentiles he in effect condemned it as sinful. But he had done it himself once, led thereto by his Christian faith. It was sin, then, that he had perpetrated under Christ's leadership. Christ was the inspirer of his former intercourse with Gentiles and therefore responsible for sin. How absurd! 18. It is the man who goes back to the Law who is the sinner. Peter in reverting to his legalistic scruples was re-establishing what his Christian conscience had outgrown. That was sin, and it was his own doing.

19-21. Paul's Religion: His Self-identification with the Crucified but Still Living Christ. Paul now has definitely "drifted away from a mere narrative of the Antiochian crisis into the memory of that crisis in his own life, which was ever present to his mind" (Ramsay, Galatians, p. 330). Whatever Peter and these like-minded may do or think, Paul for his part has ceased to live in the same universe as the Law. For him it does not exist, and that renunciation came through the Law itself, i.e., (1) it set up impossible demands so that man could not live under it; or (2) it provoked to sin and compelled man to find deliverance elsewhere (Rom. 77); or (3) it piled up the score against man so that Christ had to die to satisfy its claims and end its rule.

20. Paul's life has now one drive, one urge—toward God, not like Peter's which wavered between the rule of Law and the way of grace. The heart of his religion is a faith-attitude ethical and spiritual. (1) It is primarily a warm personal bond, faith in the Son of God who loved me and gave himself for me. (2) It deepens into mystical union whereby he feels himself a sharer in the experiences of Christ in his attitude to God and to sin. (3) In particular the old bad man in him perished with the other powers that Christ vanquished on the cross. When Christ rose there took place a fresh creative act; a new power began to animate personality, and that power was Christ. Thus Christ lives in him, exercising sway through the vital moral nexus of faith. Flesh to Paul is the seat of sin, the poisoned constitution of man, not the body only, but the whole human organization of thought, will, etc. (Rom. 714-25; cf. Mk. 833).

21. This Christian reliance on faith was not, as the Jewish party urged, a nullification of the gracious revelation of God in the O.T. and the Law. On the contrary, that revelation was carried to completion, for men's salvation, in Christ—and it was for that he died. His death would be an act of futile waste, empty of purpose, if redemption could be achieved by the legal system.

Paul forgets to tell us the issue of the Antioch incident. It raised the crucial issue of faith or the Law, the good news of grace or the tyranny of legalism, and the defense of that drives lesser issues from his mind. If religion has first place, the lesser things need not trouble us.

CHAPTER III

1-6. Does the Spirit Come by Faith or by Law? Affectionate yearning here mingles with rebuke. This relapse into Jewish legalism is foolish, and more: people of intelligence would not act so; there is something uncanny about such a quick change—it must be the work of the evil eye. To think that Jesus Christ painted so vividly as the Crucified before their eyes should fade out of sight! One question: How had the Spirit come? Gifts of healing, tongues, etc., were the work of the Spirit and were supremely valued. Did that new power descend with the keeping of the Jewish Law or with the receiving of the message of the cross by faith?

1. Ramsay thinks Christianity drew largely from the progressive class desirous of education. The sense is, "O you who plume yourselves on your intelligence—how foolish!" Openly set forth, i.e., placarded like an advertisement. Paul had preached not with cold argument but in appealing graphic pictures.

3. The Judaizers had either patronizingly allowed that the Christianity of the Galatians was a beginning or simply pooch-pooched it as "elementary," "crude"; the highest form required obedience to Law. How absurd! To begin with moving spiritual experiences and end up with external trivialities like circumcision. Christianity to-day often begins in simple faith and ends in ritual and denominational refinements. Begin and perfect may be technical terms from the mysteries (see p. 851), but are more apt if taken as catchwords of Paul's opponents.

4. Had they experienced all these things in vain, i.e., experiences of the spirit, not necessarily persecutions, though that was the lot of Christians generally, through social ostracism if not from governments? (Cf. Acts 145, 22.)

5, 6. God's lavish supply of spiritual gifts was not the outcome of law-keeping, but of dynamic faith—the quality which God approved in the spiritual father of the race, Abraham. The Greek word for supply, used of providing the chorus for dramatic performances, suggests unstinted lavish expense: the Spirit is given without measure.

7-14. Faith Brings the Blessing, Law a Curse. Paul has cited the evidence of experience, "gifts": now he appeals to Scripture. To claim for his case Abraham, the pattern of righteousness, was to steal a march on the traditionalists. The opposition, being Jews, were readily impressed by subtle exegesis. Rabbinism apart—there is a real point here—the great souls of the O.T. had a relationship with God deeper than the legalistic bond, a spiritual converse with God. Thus faith under the original regime was the principle of acceptance with God. Christians by their faith-relation to God are Abraham's real descendants—truer to his type than circumcised Jews. Scripture which to the pious Jew is inspired of God had foretold this in Gen. 123 1818. The Hebrew really means that Abraham was to be a famous example of bliss—"all the nations of the world are to seek bliss like his" (Moffatt). But to Paul this is a prediction of Christianity. Abraham was the pioneer of the faith-relation and all men of faith come under that blessing.

10-14. Paul next attacks the Law. So far from being the instrument of salvation that the Judaizers claimed, it was actually the source of a curse. Deut. 2726 implies that the whole Law must be kept or else we are under a curse, and no man can possibly keep the whole Law. Thus the curse falls on all men. Obviously, then, on that basis of law, no man can stand right with God. Salvation must come on a different basis—by faith. Hab. 24 is quoted, but the sense there really is that during the Chaldean upheaval the prophet had urged that by faithfulness, i.e., steadfastness, the just would live (see note there). The Law is based, not on faith, but on a radically different principle, as in Lev. 185. "So keep my rules and regulations: if a man obeys them, it means life for him" (Moffatt). A promise of life, no doubt, but on condition that a man keep the whole Law! A specious and illusory promise! Really, the effect is to cast us all under a curse, i.e., the Law brings condemnation, not salvation. There would be no help for us but for Christ. It is by his intervention that the curse is removed. He hung on the cross and thereby took the Law's curse on himself and bought us out of its power (redeemed us). Deut. 2123 says that an impaled man is under a curse ("of God" is the complete text from which Paul shrinks). As our representative he took the Law's curse on himself for our sakes and rendered it null and void. That opened up the way for the rule of faith again: now the Gentiles inherit the blessing foretold to Abraham, in Christianity through Jesus Christ, and we receive the promised endowment of the spirit through the moral nexus of faith.

Paul is not thinking of Christ's death as achieving some quantitative transaction, nor has he any idea of a ransom paid to the devil. In that age a slave purchased his liberty by payments deposited on the altar: he really bought himself out of his master's keeping into the God's service, i.e., into freedom. So Christ bought us out of the Law's bondage into liberty: the personal intimate faith-relation to God could now be resumed. The free man enters into a new set of relationships, and so does the Christian. Christ is somehow representative of us and his deeds achieve results, not within us psychologically merely, as modern thinkers hold, but in a formal objective way. Taking on himself the Law's curse, he canceled it, broke its efficacy. So he was made sin for us (cf. 2 Cor. 521).

15-22. The Law's Function: Not to Cancel the Promise, but to Expose Sin. The ~~true~~ lineage of Abraham is spiritual: his blessing descends to those who like him are men of faith. But the Jew might ask: "What, then, was the function of the Law?" Paul answers that it did not come in to cancel the promise, but simply as a supplement.

Paul grows more tender as his indignation works off. "Brethren"—and it is as if he draws them closer for a confidential word—"though I am speaking of a divine promise, I am to take an illustration from human affairs. Take the case of a man's will. Once it is properly ratified, the legal forms duly observed, it stands as final: no man can annul it or add to it. If that holds of a mere human agreement, how much more of God's agreement! A duly authenticated word of God must stand. Such was the promise to Abraham: it is final and could not be canceled or admit any addition." Now, what was this promise? The bequest was to a single recipient, not to many. It was to Abraham's seed (singular), not seeds (plural). The reference is to Christ (and by implication to all in Christ). The Law was a later affair, four hundred and thirty years after, and does not cancel or make invalid the earlier agreement, the promise. The blessing we inherit cannot come both ways: if it is determined by law-keeping, the promise would cease to be operative; but God chose the method of its operation—it was to be a gracious gift freely bestowed in fulfillment of his promise. Law and promise are different in principle, the one pivoting on recompense for conduct, the other on acceptance of an unconditional gift. The Judaizers in combining Christianity and legalism were trying to unite two irreconcilable principles.

15. The Greek word for covenant means an "arrangement." The most common "arrangement" was a will, and Paul's Greek readers in the first century would so understand it. For readers of the LXX, however, it had also a different association, being applied there to God's covenant. The Galatians could see in it both shades of meaning. Thus they could pass rapidly in thought from the analogy of "will" to the "covenant" of God. The "covenant" was God's "will" or "bequest." According to a Roman-Syrian lawbook, which may preserve the practice contemporary with Paul, whereas a man cannot disown his real son without good reason, he never can put away an adopted son. Christians were adopted into God's family (which was originally the Jews) and so were in a stronger position than the natural born sons, the Jews.

16. The thing promised in Genesis is actually the land of Canaan which the Jews had actually inherited. "In other words the original passage has the very meaning which Paul denies to it" (McFadyen). Here the promise is interpreted to apply to the kingdom of God. The seed in both Greek and Hebrew is expressed by a singular (Gen. 12⁷ 13¹⁵ 17⁷ 22¹⁸ 24⁷). The rabbinic mind readily seized on such a fine point. Paul tends to interpret the covenant as a will with formal bequests. It is quite in legal style to quibble over exact phrasing. In Rom. 4¹⁶, where it suits him, Paul takes this same word in a collective sense. Legalists were well met with legalistic weapons. But finally the issue is decided by Paul's principles of freedom and spirituality.

17. For the number four hundred and thirty cf. Ex. 12⁴⁰: according to the Hebrew text this period covers only Israel's sojourn in Egypt, but according to the LXX and Samaritan Pentateuch it includes also the time in Canaan, i.e., the whole period from Abraham to Moses. Paul often uses the LXX.

19-22. By his sharp antithesis Paul appeared to have allowed no place for the Law. But as a pious Hebrew he had reverence for it as Scripture and divinely ordained. It must, therefore, have some distinctive function in God's redemptive process. It was not an instrument of salvation, as the Judaizers said, nor had it any permanent binding force: it was a temporary expedient, introduced because of sin, and valid only till Christ came. The Jews prided themselves on the Law and gloried in the tradition that it came through angels by the hand of a mediator. To Paul that was no distinction, but a mark of inferiority. The promise had real distinction: it was communicated by God in person, without any mediation. It was no contract between two parties, but a promise in which God, the Promiser, is everything. The Law is not antagonistic to the promise. Far from it! But the Law has no power to create new life; if it could have done that, it might have stood to rival the promise. But Scripture consigned all men without exception to the same pen of sin (v. 22)—to leave but one way out: only by way of faith in Jesus Christ could men come by the promise: it was restricted to those who had faith.

19. The Jewish legend that the Law was given by angels is based on the LXX version of Deut. 33² (cf. Acts 7⁵³ Heb. 2²). It was considered to add dignity to the Law and that was enhanced by the prestige of the mediator, Moses, the high priest of legalism. Moses had actually handled the tables. But God spake with Abraham face to face (cf. 2 Cor. 3¹²⁻¹⁸). It is curious how reverence wrongly applied—as here in the introduction of angels to give the Law—really removed God further off. Devotion can over-refine even beautiful ritual and worship with the same result.

20, 21. The Law was essentially a contract between two parties. Such a contract calls for a mediator to adjust relations between the two partners. The Law laid obligations on both sides, men to keep the Law and God to give the recompense. It was, therefore, a highly conditioned contingent affair. The promise, on the other hand, had not contractual element. It was the affair of one, absolute and unconditional. God spake and it stands. No mediation is needed. God is everything in the promise relationship.

The great truth Paul is probably trying to express is that under the faith dispensation there are no disturbing "ifs," no dubieties as to our salvation. It is the glory of the Christian faith that its promises are sure—they are God's affair and he never fails. God forbid is a strong term. Paul strongly resents the idea that the Law is hostile to the promise. It simply could not supply the moral energy that men needed: it could not quicken the new higher life and therefore could never save men.

22. Scripture may mean (1) O.T. in general, which included the Law; (2) definite O.T. passages, e.g., those quoted in Rom. 3 to establish universal depravity; (3) Psa. 143² or Deut. 27²⁶ (cf. v. 10). The Law that the Judaizers exalted as essential to salvation was the inexorable force rounding them all up into the same pit of despair and the one way out was by faith in Christ.

